ON a certain day in spring Mr. Brown walked from his home in a very thoughtful mood. The problem on his mind was a weighty one. His brows contracted and his hands dug deep into his pockets.

Thus he walked for a dozen blocks. He passed a certain shop and by some trick of Fate turned his head toward it. He stopped dead still and slowly but very surely there spread over his face a look of joy. At last he knew. He would give his wife a fine gown for a birthday present.

In five seconds he was inside the shop and conversing earnestly with the trim little person who was its owner.

The result of the conversation was that Mrs. Brown would have the handsomest gown the little modiste could have created in her establishment.

There must be a model, she said, since Mrs. Brown could not try it on. So the thing to do was for Mr. Brown to get the exact measurements of his wife and then advertise for a model.

Knowing that such advertisements brought dozens and sometimes even hundreds of answers, and fearing that such a crowd would not do at her very exclusive place, the little woman suggested that Mr. Brown have the models come to his office and she would come there to examine them.

Mr. Brown reluctantly consented.

That night, when Mrs. Brown had fallen into her first sound sleep, the plotting husband arose silently and with fast-beating heart from his couch and tip-toed down the dark hall to the sewing room. He softly closed the door and lighted the gas. With trembling fingers and in his heart a great fear of the pin-strewn floor, he set to work with a tape measure to take the measurements of Mrs. Brown's dress form. Many times he stopped to listen for approaching footsteps, and many times he stopped to remember just where it was Madame Eloise told him to measure. "Bust, hips, waist, back from neck to waist," he read from the paper in his hand, then struggled on.

When Mr. Brown found his wife still soundly sleeping he breathed a sigh of relief and crawled into bed to catch a few winks of sleep before the fast-approaching dawn should come.

On the morning that Madame Eloise awaited the arrival of the models Mrs. Brown took it into her pretty young head to make a call on Mr. Brown at his office.

Mr. Brown, thinking he would rather be anywhere than mixed up with the model choosing, informed the dressmaker that he had a very important engagement and left the affair entirely in her hands.

When Mrs. Brown opened the office door she stood aghast. The room was filled with young women. Her first thought was that her husband was getting a new stenographer. The second thought was that it was very queer he didn't tell her about it.

Then Madame Eloise came into sight with her tape measure. Mrs. Brown decided to await developments.

"Now, my dear, I'll measure you next."

Mrs. Brown stepped forward.

"Thirty-six bust. That's right. Forty hips—good. Turn 'round, please. Back—— Why, my dear, this is splendid!"

As she measured she went more and more into ecstasies, until she finally exclaimed:

"This is really the most wonderful thing I ever saw. You are the exact size of the lady for whom the dress is to be made.

A light began to dawn upon the brain of Mrs. Brown.

"May I ask who the lady is?" she asked.

"I don't know that I ought to tell you, for it is to be a secret from the lady until it is done. But I am sure you will take more interest in your work if I tell you."

Mrs. Brown assured her that she would.

"Well," said Madame, in a stage whisper, "Mr. Brown is having a very beautiful gown made for his wife's birthday. You are the lady's size exactly, and the gown will fit perfectly. Come a day after to-morrow for the first fitting, my dear."

Mrs. Brown lowered her eyes so that Madame might not see the twinkle in them. "Very well," she said; "I'll be there."

This was a lark, indeed, thought Mrs. Brown. How delighted Mr. Brown would be to find that it fitted her so perfectly!

Mr. Brown was satisfied to telephone from time to time about the gown, after he knew that the model was so exact in her measurements. It was only when the creation was complete that he wished to see it on the model.

At last it was complete, and Mrs. Brown stood dressed in the lovely thing awaiting the arrival of her husband. It must be said that her heart did not feel quite normal.

The telephone rang.

"Oh, I'm sorry, Mr. Brown," she heard Madame say. "I'll keep her here until you can come."

Mrs. Brown was of a different mind. Before Madame had time to return she had slipped out and jumped into a taxicab.

She would surprise her husband for sure.

In the meantime Mr. Brown had left the office earlier than he had expected to be able to and sped away to Madam Eloise's.

He was met at the door by a weeping woman exclaiming wildly, "She is gone, she is gone! What shall I do, what shall I do?"

When Mr. Brown had managed to quiet her enough to get the story, he, too, became excited. He ran to the street and told his story to the first policeman.

"What did the dress look like?" inquired the officer with irritating deliberation.

"It was brown—er—that is, not exactly brown, but a kind of a brown with some blue—— Oh, I mean it was——"

"Oh, it was beautiful, beautiful, and it is gone, and I shall never see it again," wailed Madame, who had come running behind Mr. Brown.

The officer scratched his head. "Well," he said, "I'll do what I can. Let me see—blue and brown and beautiful—all right, all right."

As he started off Madame called after him: "She left her hat. She's bareheaded."

When a woman in a beautiful new creation of the latest Paris style and without a hat is being looked for and doesn't object to being found, she isn't very hard to find.

When Mr. Brown received the telephone message from police headquarters that the lady in question was there, he hurried off.

In the meantime Mrs. Brown was refusing firmly to answer all questions at the police station.

Mr. Brown strode into the room, the picture of unrelenting justice.

The model stood with her back turned obstinately toward the door.

"What do you mean by such actions?" demanded Brown without waiting for any information.

With one quick turn Mrs. Brown faced her husband.

He gasped. He blinked. He explained incoherently.

"Thank you, dear," she said sweetly. "It is a beautiful present."

"Well, the joke's on me, that's sure."

"But the surprise is on me, just the same."

"It's all right," called Mr. Brown as he hurried his wife to a taxicab.

"Well, I'll be—— Well, she must be a mighty fascinatin' model," said the officer who had arrested her.

WHEN THE HEART CALLS

BY VIRGINIA WEST

Adapted from Reliance Release

"DON'T, don't treat me like a boy! I can bear anything better than that."

Steven Lyman spoke with an impetuosity of youth that belied his words.

"But you are a boy, dear, and I am years older than you are," said Enid Lang as she softly ran her fingers through the young man's hair as he knelt at her feet.

"Then you don't love me?"

"Of course, I love you. As I have told you many times, I love you as much as though you were my own son."

The young man sprang to his feet and stood trembling before her. "You know I don't want that kind of love," he cried.

"But, you silly boy,.I am married and I love my husband and my little girl. What is it you expect of me?"

"Oh, Enid, I don't know. My love for you has taken all my reason. But it does seem to me that so great a love as mine is must be returned. Must I go through life with this unsatisfied longing always in my heart?"

Enid smiled. "You are young and you will meet other women."

Steve's face flushed. "Young, young! That's all you can say to me. Don't you think I have the feelings of a man?"

"Yes, dear, but of a very youthful one."

"Very well, I'll rid you of my youthful presence. You'll not see me again," and before Enid could stop him he had stormily left the room.

The next morning, as Mr. Lang and his wife sat together after breakfast, a note was handed to Enid by a servant.

She read it and sighed.

"Is anything the matter, dearest?" asked her husband.

She silently handed him the note.

Mr. Lang read:

"Dear Enid: I am leaving civilization. The world has no attraction to it without you. You will see me no more.

"Steven Lyman."

"How very youthful and—pathetic!"

"Then you—aren't angry?"

"Enid," he said almost reproachfully, "you know that my faith in you is absolute." He sighed. "Poor fellow!"

"Why 'poor fellow'?" asked Enid. "I mean why do you say 'poor fellow'?"

The husband drew her to him and held her very close. "Because he loves you and cannot have your love," he said.

"You are the best man in the world."

"No, I am married to the best woman in the world and get a little of her perfection reflected. But what are we going to do to keep this boy from going away?"

"You don't think he'll really go?" asked Enid.

"I do, indeed. I'm going to have a talk with him; a nice fatherly talk."

So Mr. Lang set out to find Steven.

When he entered the young man's room in response to a very dejected "Come in," he found him sitting with his head bowed despondently upon his arms.

Around the room were many signs of recent and hurried packing.

Mr. Lang went straight to Steve and put his hand on his shoulder.

"My boy," he began, but Steve sprang to his feet.

When he saw who it was he turned away in embarrassment. In his very youthful reasoning he felt that he had done this man a wrong, yet he told himself that he could not help it.

"It is all right," said the older man. "I understand. But you must be a man——"

He got no further. Steve turned and faced him. "She has shown you my letter," he cried. "It is not honorable. I do not care to talk to you. Kindly leave me."

Mr. Lang knew that further talking was of no use, so he quietly left the room.

It was many months before her husband was able to comfort Enid and to make her see that she was in no way to blame for the disappearance of Steve Lyman.

Gradually she was able to dismiss the unfortunate circumstance from her mind, excepting the feeling of kindness she felt she would always have for the boy.

As Faith, her little daughter, grew into girlhood, Enid gained more and more happiness. It seemed to the loving husband and wife that Faith as she grew was the symbol of their ever-increasing love.

The summer the girl was sixteen she was promised a long vacation in the mountains, near the sea.

She loved to roam over the rocks and around the marshes near the sea. To examine all the little creatures she found along the shore and among the rocks was her great delight.

One day in the late afternoon, in her enthusiasm, Faith wandered too far. When she turned to retrace her steps she found she did not know which way she had come.

She climbed to the top of a pile of rocks that she might get hear bearings. Her foot slipped over a piece of seaweed left by the tide and in a moment she had fallen and lay unconscious on the rocks below.

She did not know when she was picked up by a hunter and carried to his cabin on the mountainside.

While Faith's rescuer was tenderly and anxiously bringing her back to consciousness her father and mother wept for her in their cottage. Mr. Lang with a party of men had searched long and faithfully, but were rewarded by no sign of the girl but the hat she had dropped near the edge of the water. To them all it seemed to mean but one thing.

But Faith was being carefully tended in the little cabin. Very gently the hunter who found her questioned her. But try as Faith would, she could not tell him of her parents and her home. Everything connected with them seemed blotted from her mind.

One day, when Faith had gotten back her strength, she looked up at the man and said, "I don't know what to call you.

"Stevens."

"Mr. Stevens?"

"No, you call me Stevens or—Steve."

The girl sat looking at him, groping toward a faint glimmer of light that seemed to be dawning upon her mind. But soon she shook her head and said:

"I can't get it. I seem to have heard the name 'Steve' or to have seen a picture of somebody named 'Steve' or something. I don't know," she ended pathetically.

Faith put her hand to a locket at her throat.

"I tried to open it," said Steve, "but I don't believe it opens."

"Yes, it does."

The girl looked almost frightened. "What made me say that?" she asked. "I don't know."

Steve took her gently by the hand. "Try to think, dear. Perhaps it will come back to you," he urged.

For a long time she sat, striving to reach the things that seemed always to elude her. Then she said almost like one in a trance, "It's a secret spring somewhere—somewhere—on a jewel." Coming completely to herself again, she said in a tired voice, "Oh, it hurts to try so hard."

"There, there," said Steve soothingly, "let me have the locket and you go out into the woods for a while and don't try to think about anything."

When Faith had gone Steve began his task. Carefully he went over the locket many, many times, gently pressing every point that might contain a concealed spring. At last his efforts were rewarded. One jewel was set in the top of a tiny spring. He pressed it and the locket flew open.

"Enid!" was the one word that burst from the man's lips.

For a moment all the old memory flooded his brain. Keen as it was at first, he soon realized what a foolish, boyish thing he had done. Bitterly he berated himself for wasting his life as he had done. Then he thought of Faith. Had his life been wasted? Perhaps some ruling hand had guided him there that he might save the girl's life. If that were so, then he regretted nothing.

He heard the girl's voice and her step on the porch. The past faded and the present with its duties stood out plain as a picture. Faith must be sent to her parents.

The door opened and Steve saw that Faith was not alone.

"This is Mr. Walter Farley," she said, indicating a young man of about twenty. "He was hunting, and I brought him home with me. May he stay to supper?"

"Most certainly," answered Steve. Perhaps this was the very person to communicate with Faith's parents. He felt he could not have them know who it was who had saved their child.

"Your daughter has been very kind to me," said the young man.

"She is not my daughter."

Walter Farley looked at Steve with surprise.

"I found her unconscious on the rocks near the sea a few months ago and brought her here to revive her. She cannot remember who she is. But—— Are you from New York?"

"Yes."

Steve drew the locket from his belt.

"Did you ever see this woman?" he asked as he handed the open locket to Farley.

"No, I never did. Do you think——"

Steve nodded. "Her mother," he said softly. "I am sure that it is Mrs. Lang, and at the time I knew her she had a little girl who would now be about the age of this child."

"What they must have suffered, and are still suffering!" exclaimed Farley, looking at Faith. Then he added, "She is very lovely."

"Yes, very."

Steve called her to him and questioned her gently, saying over names he believed she had once known, and describing scenes she must have lived among.

But the result was always the same. "I don't know; I can't remember," was all she would say.

When Faith had gone to bed, the two men talked the matter over. It was decided that Farley should send a series of telegrams and then take Faith to New York.

Early the next morning the young fellow started for the nearest village. He sent a telegram asking for a full description of the missing girl and stating that he had a clue. Immediately following the answer to that he sent another, saying he was very hopeful. The second wire he followed by a third, stating that he would arrive in New York with the young woman at ten the next morning.

When the time came to leave the cabin Faith was torn between her desire to know her parents again and her desire to stay with the only person she felt she really knew.

With her going the light and the reason for living seemed to go out of Steve's life. Every day, every hour, he missed her. Constantly his mind followed her in the world with which he had once been so familiar.

As happy as the parents were to have their child back, almost from the grave, yet the first meeting was greatly saddened when they found that to Faith's mind they never the same as absolute strangers.

The physicians and surgeons gave great hope after an operation, but the long, long days of suspense were almost more than the parents could bear.

But the day came when their suffering was well rewarded. Once more they had in their home the darling child, again restored to perfect health.

Enid, with a mother's intuition, felt a subtle change in Faith. Often she found her sitting alone, thinking, in a way that had not been her custom before.

The mother began to think that the cause must be Walter Farley, who was now a frequent visitor at the home of the Langs.

One day Enid suddenly learned that her conclusions were all wrong. Faith excitedly told her that Walter had proposed and that she had refused him.

But while the proposal had not met with an affirmative answer, the very ardor of Farley had awakened in the young girl something that before had been slumbering.

"Mother, father," she said eagerly, "I am quite well now and you must take me back to thank Mr. Stevens. Won't you? Walter will show us the way."

They agreed to do what she asked, and the next day they found themselves at the door of Steve's cabin.

They knocked, but there was no answer.

Eagerly Faith pushed open the woor. The room was empty.

"You go in," she cried, "and I'll go find him." With a bound she was off into the woods.

She came upon him standing on a cliff, looking out over the sea.

"I've come back," she said with a sob, when she had reached his side. "I've come back to you again."

Steve followed the great desire of his heart and gathered the girl close in his arms.

"Little girl," he said, "my little girl."

They returned to the cabin hand in hand.

"Steve!"

"Lyman!"

The father and mother spoke at once.

"Oh, why didn't you let us know who it was?" exclaimed Enid tearfully. "Faith said 'Mr. Stevens,' and I never thought it could be you."

Mr. Lang took Steve by the hand.

"Thank you," he said huskily. "How in the world can we repay you?"

Steve took Faith's hand and drew her to him. "There is just one way," he said. "Not now, but when she is a little older."

"She is yours by right. You saved her life," answered the father.

"Enid," said Steve gently, "I love her with the love I gave to you long ago. But now it is not the hot, unreasoning love of a boy. I have been faithful to my love for you until your daughter came. You are willing to trust her with me?"

"Yes, gladly. Perhaps you were right, after all, to leave the world. I believe God has been preparing you for my little girl."

KINEMA

This is one of the words there is no escaping from. Distorted, misspelled, mispronounced, debased by unholy conjunctions and alliances, it has nevertheless, in the sacred phrase of banality, "come to stay"; and with the gramophone and the piano-player, to share the doubtful distinction of being one of the wonders of this age. The kinematograph has worked itself into the life of the people in a way that I, for my part, never suspected until I took up an important-looking book the other day and found that it was entirely devoted to the study of the rise, progress, philosophy and anatomy of the kinematograph. Thus the thing even has its literature. And I feel bound in honesty to say that this book[1] is an extremely honest and competent piece of work, in which is modestly and clearly set forth a complete history of this very remarkable business, with abundant photographs and diagrams for the mechanically minded, and containing certain statistics which I venture to think would stagger most readers. The work appears in Mr. Heinemann's "Conquest of Science Series"; and the title itself suggests some curious reflections. Are we really conquering science or is science conquering us? That marvelous monster of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, which in its infancy we led as one might lead a lion cub by a ribbon, which we played with and made into a parlor toy; what has it become, and what is it becoming? There is something a little grim about this title, "Conquests of Science," appearing on a large book devoted to the kinematograph.

Being always behind the times in such matters, it was only the other day that I went for the first time into a Kinema Palace, as I believe those very white and very gold buildings that diversify the squalor of the humbler thoroughfares are called. I had often been allured by their façades, but from some confusion of mind by which I associated them with those dismal halls where the entertainment consists of peering into an endless number of little metal machines, I had never ventured inside. And when at last I did succumb I was not a little surprised. I did not know that London habitually amused itself between the afternoon hours of twelve and six; but here was a crowd of people pouring into what looked like an ordinary theatre. They were not the idle rich nor yet the wealthy poor; they were people of the lower middle classes, who looked as if they ought to have been at work, but were here disbursing sums varying from a shilling to five shillings with great readiness. The prices themselves were a surprise; I had thought of threepence or sixpence as a reasonable price to pay for an hour's vision of flickering pictures with motes dancing over them, and a headache; but I think my stall cost five shillings. And there, at the high noon of the London day, in the midst of perhaps the busiest human activity in the world, some hundreds of us sat waiting in a darkened, plush-upholstered hall, like mourners at a funeral waiting for the corpse.

Presently a harmonium, violin, and a piano began some whining and twittering attempt at an overture, and the pictures appeared. We all know them; even I, who am no patron of Kinema palaces, am familiar with them in the larger world of the music hall. There was the Durbar, a dancing succession of troops marching at about fifteen miles an hour, of well-known figures walking up to you, looming nearer and nearer, and then apparently cut off in the prime of life and blotted out as though they had never been; the industrial pictures of money being coined at the Mint—tons of bullion poured out before one's eyes while someone behind the screen jingled sixpennyworth of halfpence in a tin tray; some wonderful things and some stupid things; and then, finally, the plunge into real, thick treacly sentiment, the middle-aged man brooding by the fireside (such a fireside!) and looking at the face of his sweetheart in an old album (such an album!), and seeing visions of himself and his sweetheart as children, as young man and maiden, as bride and bridegroom (such a bride and bridegroom!); and, finally, the disturbance of the gentleman's meditation by the arrival in the room of his wife, who, when she turns her face to the audience, is seen to be identical with the heroine of the old fool's meditations. This the audience liked; and I saw a stout woman, who might have been a publican's wife, wiping away an undoubted tear.

They did not give me for my five shillings what I really longed for—one of those breathlessly rapid dramas in which babies are thrown at people in the street, motor-cars fly asunder before your eyes, and long trains of people, headed by a policeman and a nursemaid, and receiving constant accretions in the shape of chimney-sweeps, clergymen, bricklayers, and school children pursue one another apparently in the full light of day across thoroughfares which are unmistakably recognizable as the Champs Elysées and the Avenue du Trocadéro. It is an unending pleasure to see men running at thirty-five miles an hour and clashing into each other at a corner and exploding in a cloud of smoke. One feels at such moments that life is really a busier and braver thing than the dull crawl of one's own experience.

But there is another side to the picture. Men have toiled and used splendid brains in order that these things should be; one cannot help asking oneself how far they are worth while. All over the world there are great theatres with stages far larger and more modern than Covent Garden or the Paris Opera, equipped with every kind of scenic effect, on which dramas are daily performed to no other spectator than the little crystal lens in front of an unrolling film; sometimes as many as two thousand people at a time are employed in a drama on one of these great stages. Is this to be the theatre of the future? We have almost abolished thinking from our theatres; are we also to abolish hearing, and seeing in any except one dimension? There is another, perhaps the greatest, evil of the kinematograph craze, the evil which it shares with the pianola-player and the gramophone. It is that these things really narrow the life and experience of men. They bring life to one's door; and it will soon be possible for people to have all the adventurous experience they want within a radius of half a mile of their own house. No journeys need be taken; you pay sixpence and sit in a chair that is mechanically rocked like a railway carriage, and look out upon the moving scenery of the Andes, the Alps, or the Rockies. You need not go through the toil and discipline of learning the technique of music; turn a handle, and all that Beethoven and Mozart and Chopin groaned in travail with, wept tears of blood for, or laughed and sang out to the world, is at your command. You need not go and hear a great oration; the very voice will issue for you from your brass-throated gramophone on the morrow. All of which is bad, and means loss of life in the fullest and most serious sense. It is not the conquest of science, but the abuse of science.

And as an historical record also the kinematograph has its legitimate use. Sometimes—very rarely—looking upon that illuminated square, one has for the moment a sense of real illusion, of looking through a glass and seeing the sea breaking on some tropical shore, or the figures of men moving and smiling in a distant land. Think if we could once see in the same way King John crossing to the little Thames island to give Englishmen their freedom, or Anne Boleyn driving through the streets of Westminster to her wedding, or Cromwell speaking in the House of Commons, or King Charles I. making his farewell on the scaffold! It would not be so much on the central figures that we should pore as upon the crowds and the people in the street, seeing actually before our eyes what men and women looked like, how they moved about, what clothes they wore, what manners they had in those dim, far-off days. Five hundred years hence the English people will in this way be able to see scenes of our life in England; we shall not be so isolated from them; they will know us really as we are, and along with the figures and faces of the great will be preserved and made familiar to our descendants of the twenty-fifth century some otherwise utterly unimportant people, who pushed to the front of crowds and took the trouble to see public shows. And perhaps the most familiar figures of our day to the people of coming days will be the figures of policemen. Thus you see even the kinematograph will not really tell the truth; for there is no such thing as mechanical truth or mechanical record of truth. And that is the crowning fault of mechanism when it takes the place of human effort and labor.—Living Age.

THANHOUSER EMPLOYEES' FIRST ANNUAL ENTERTAINMENT AND BALL

By Our "Roving Commissioner"

There was a gay time in "the old town," meaning New Rochelle, on Monday evening. The Thanhouser employees were treating their friends and acquaintances to an entertainment and ball such as gladdens the heart and makes the most unpractised foot step light as a feather.

There were no less than 1,200 persons assembled in the Germania in answer to the widespread invitation to attend the jollification.

Mr. and Mrs. Thanhouser, with the sunniest of smiles illumining their faces, led the grand march. Other film notables present in the march were George O. Nicholls, Ida Alberti, Mr. and Mrs. Lucius Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Benham, Flo La Badie, Bert Adler, Marguerite Snow and James Cruze (entertainment); President Frank L. Zimmerman and wife, Vice-president Charles J. Van Houten and wife, Treasurer John Andren and wife.

In the entertainment portion of the program, a number of non-released Thanhouser pictures were shown. One of them, which, by the way, will never be released, caused a great deal of fun, screams of daughter ringing out through the building as it unrolled itself upon the screen. The title of this picture was "The Crazy Quilt," prepared especially to get a laugh. In the title you were told that it was "joined by the new girl in the joining-room"; and, truly, it did its title proud, for positive and negative mingled with one another in the most astounding and ridiculous fashion—upside down, topsy-turvy and every other way but the right way.

The vaudeville was done by Thanhouser home talent. "Editha's Burglar," with Marie Eline, Harry Benham and David Thompson; and "The System of Dr. Tarr," with Lew Woods, Harry Marks, Larry Merton, William Harris, Carl Leviness, Bertha Blanchard, Phil Brady and Perry Horton. Leo Edwards put over a Charles K. Harris number. Harry Spear staged the vaudeville, Frank Champury saw to the scenic effects and Gerald Badgley and Charles Gercke to the electrical. As may be imagined, the receipts were large. Finally Mr. Thanhouser suggested a grand clambake as soon as the weather's right, so be on the lookout for something of that sort.

James Cruze, corking actor, was there with Peggy Snow, real artiste. I seemed to see "She" again, the full two reels of it, and Cruze became "Leo" and Miss Snow "She." Miss Snow is the most charming of conversationalists, and not the least "uppish," though she was the second most popular American picture player in a recent newspaper contest.

Bert Adler said he would show me to the prettiest player in the pictures, and then introduced me to Flo La Badie. She is! And the most wonderfully gowned girl I have ever seen at a function.

William Russell, whom I like best to remember as the Stranger in Ibsen's "Lady from the Sea," was there alone. Adler whispered that William's sweetheart, who is a leading actress in the legitimate, was playing in Chicago, while William had figured that she would be East at the time of the Thanhouser ball. But the best calculators will go wrong at times. So William was quite disconsolate.

David H. Thompson, character man in the Thanhouser pictures, played the burglar in "Editha's Burglar," the sketch in the first half of the entertainment. In this sketch, as all who are familiar with it know, a ring is used. Just before Stage Manager Spear rang up the curtain it was discovered that the "prop" ring was missing. Thompson volunteered the use of his own diamond ring, valued at $150. It was used and, later, lost. Up to the time I left Germania Hall—in the wee sma' hours—it had not been found.

Marie Eline, "The Thanhouser Kid," was the sensation of "Editha's Burglar"—and the show. I say this unreservedly. Harry Benham helped Marie put over her hit.

I was surprised to learn that Benham, whom you will remember for his "Nicholas Nickleby" in the film of that title, was a married man. I was shown a mighty pretty Mrs. Benham, and a cute Harry Benham, Jr., in one of the front boxes. Benham is to be envied! And I understand there was a little Benham girl at home—too young to "sit in" at all-night seances at Germania Hall.

I understand that the racket was also by way of commemoration of Bert Adler's birthday, and was therefore originally slated for April 14th. But since the fourteenth fell on a Sunday, the affair was put over to Monday, the fifteenth!!! That's the way Bert's press agent spins it, anyhow! All Bert would say is he doesn't believe in commemorating birthdays, since his "best girl" wouldn't commemorate his with even a kiss. Now, can Bert mean his wife? (Dayton papers, please copy.)

They say that Thanhouser's Chief Chauffeur, Arthur Miller, was holding hands with a girl in a dark corner of the ballroom when Electrician Bradley threw the spotlight on him. Miller is reported to have cranked up and gone home.

To Fred L. Zimmerman and Theodore Heise, of the Thanhouser mechanical forces, who invented the "Crazy Quilt," I herewith remove my hat and bend my knee. They are geniuses!

Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Thanhouser looked to be exactly what they were—the happiest couple in all the vast assemblage.

SOLAX FEATURE NIGHT AT NEW YORK THEATRE

Darwin Karr, of the Solax Players, gave an interesting talk to a large audience at the Star Theatre, Third avenue near Thirty-third street, New York, Wednesday night, telling in detail his experiences in the making of "The Sewer," a Solax feature shortly to be released. The talk was a revelation to his hearers, and when he told of wading through two feet of slimy ooze, not only during the making of the picture but also several times during the rehearsing of the picture play, many decided that the life of a moving picture actor was anything but roses.

Billy Quirk, of the Solax Players, entertained with funny stories and eccentric dancing, in which he was ably assisted by Mrs. Quirk.

Five feature Solax films were shown, "The Violin Makers of Nuremberg," "Parson Sue," "Billy's Grip," "God Disposes," and "The Snow Man."

Nashville, Tenn.—The Rex Theatre on Fifth avenue between Church and Union streets, will be opened to the public by April 10th.

MOVING PICTURE SHOWS, WHAT THEY SHOULD BE

Address to Mothers' Club

Port Arthur, Texas, March 16.—The following address concerning moving pictures was made before a recent meeting of the Mothers' Club in this city by Henry C. Stearns, whose familiarity with the business puts him in position to speak advisedly on this topic. The Mothers' Club makes it a feature to have an address by local talent on various subjects which are relevant to childhood. Mr. Stearn's address as taken from The Enterprise of Beaumont, Texas, follows:

Permit me while thanking you for the extreme honor you have shown me in allowing me to address your most laudable organization, that only my extreme appreciation of the great honor done me has forced me to overcome my timidity and as we say, "stage fright," and appear to speak to you this evening. That and the fact that the subject is one that is a part of my daily life, the one whose success or failure marks the success or failure of the use of any "one talent." And for that reason I dared not miss this opportunity of furthering the interests of my business. "The Photo-play House," before that court of final recourse, "The Mothers." I say the final court advisedly, because, believe me, the conduct of the photo-play house is absolutely in your hands.

You hear a great deal about salacious and immoral plays—there is only one reason for them—demand. There is a great cry against sensational pictures, but their being is absolutely dependable upon one thing, demand.

The photo-play house must show what its patrons want else it cannot live. I have shown, with extensive advertising, pictures of incomparable beauty of real worth and dramatic excellence, that cost tens of thousands of dollars to produce. I have shown that kind of picture to half the business that I have gotten for a sensational film like "Jesse James," which costs a few hundred dollars to produce, and of whose merit there is no use speaking.

We photo-play men do not like to show these pictures from a technical standpoint, not a box-office one, however, as they are nearly always faulty in construction and are consequently difficult to handle and make a great deal of trouble for us in trying to put on a good clear picture.

But if you wish to prevent the sensational picture from being shown you have to go back of the photo-play house to the manufacturer, bring the pressure to bear upon him, show him a demand for better stuff and he will be only too glad to make good pictures. As a matter of fact they are making better pictures every day. Every one connected with the business is working for its advancement and suggestions for the betterment of the business that are feasible are eagerly accepted, by real photo-play men, men who have been in the business from the time when the "moving picture show" was patronized as a curiosity, until now, when the photo-play house is patronized by people from every walk of life, people of every conceivable station and degree of education who patronize it for recreation and education—and it is a real educator, it is so accepted by the foremost teachers of the day.

Take the Pathe Weekly that is shown. This Weekly bulletin is greater than the most pretentious journal ever printed, for it shows you not a description, not a word painting, but the actual incident happening before your very eyes. As an example we show President William H. Taft actually signing the Arizona statehood bill. Surrounded by his cabinet, the President consummates the momentous act of adding another star to Old Glory.

What school child would ever forget witnessing this portentous scene. Now these are the kind of pictures you want your children to see and the kind we want to show. And the demand for these good pictures is slowly growing, but you ladies can help the growth along immensely.

Talk good pictures, patronize the theatres that show the best pictures, and take it up with the Federation of Women's Clubs, because as I said the demand must be national, for the manufacturers will hardly make pictures merely for Port Arthur if the balance of the country are demanding something different.

Of course, I presume that you ladies are aware that as far as direct vulgarity and brutality are concerned nearly all pictures usually now have been censored by the National Board of Censors at New York City and they permit no film to pass that shows a scene of vulgarity, murder or any of questionable nature.

But there is good to be accomplished locally, namely the condition of the local photo-play houses. First the matter of safety. The city should have an inspector of public safety, whose duty should be to inspect public buildings, public conveyances, etc. Picture theatres should have wide aisles, wide exits, where possible, no steps, and the projecting machine should be installed according to the specifications of the State Board of Underwriters, and where so installed there is absolutely no danger.

Permit me here to extend to each of you ladies, a cordial invitation to visit our operating booth, where we will show you the most modern methods of picture projection.

Then the question of sanitation. The theatre should not only be cleaned thoroughly every day, but should be aired and disinfected. Finally and of greater importance, ventilation. One is less apt to contract disease in a dirty theatre that is well ventilated than in a comparatively clean theatre that is not ventilated.

Please remember this, that we are striving to please you, we court criticism, we beg for suggestions, and always keeping in view the fact that children should be allowed a greater margin of safety than adults, we can—you the patrons, us the exhibitors—working together place this greatest of entertainers, this most powerful of educators, upon that exalted plane it is destined to occupy.

OBSCURED FROM VIEW

Or How a Picture Hat Disturbed the Progress of a Tragedy

By Trevelyan Baber

He was deeply engrossed in the action of a pathetic scene enacted through the medium of a motion picture film in a well-known theatre. The child had been cruelly treated by the mother, whose only aim seemed to be selfish gratification in the whirl of life in a big city. A hansom drove up to the door and quickly the mother, clothed in all her finery, stepped into the vehicle in company with a stranger. The child fell in a heap upon the couch and buried her head in a comforting pillow, eyes tear-dimmed, and heart-broken at the scolding directed at her by the mother in her haste to get away.

Just then a woman topped in a beautiful picture hat, the proportions of which extended far into space to a distance exceeding the limitations of the ordinary skypiece, dropped into a vacant seat in front of the gentleman whose sympathy for the little girl in the picture had been aroused almost to the point of rendering assistance. He twisted and lashed about in an effort to again get a glimpse of what was transpiring in the home of the little girl, but all in vain. A gentle hint failed of its purpose and still he squirmed about in a restless manner. "Surely she has some consideration for a fellow-being," he mused, but indications seemed to speak louder than words, for the hat rested serenely and securely upon a beautiful suite of chestnut hair.

At that moment a clicking sound caused the gentleman to awake to the realization that the reel had been unwound and the tragedy had been enacted while he sat obscured from view behind the picture hat. His feelings were at his tongue's point, but sad to relate, the nature of his words are unprintable.

The woman turned around at this juncture and in a bewitching way inquired: "Pardon me, but is my hat in your way?"

"No, ma'am, you may keep it on; I am going to leave now, but I pity the man who is so unfortunate as to take my seat."

Moral: (Perhaps the proprietors of the motion picture shows can best recite it.)

Nashville, Tenn.—The Tennessee Film Company, with an authorized capital of $2,000 has applied for a charter to lease, make and sell moving pictures.

Des Moines, Iowa.—The Tripoli Opera House Association filed articles of incorporation with W. C. Hayward, Secretary of State. The incorporators include Charles Franke, S. P. Hall and H. C. Moeller.

GEORGE KLEINE RELEASES

George Kleine will release on April 23rd a highly spectacular Cines drama with scenes set in Morocco, depicting in a realistic manner life in that picturesque country, and showing the wild, daring Arabian outlaws. The pictured story follows closely the ancient tale of Ali Baba and The Forty Thieves, and tells how Eunice, a beautiful slave girl, has fallen in love with Ben Ali, and how, while her master is absent one day, a bold band of outlaws in search of plunder enter the house and carry her off. Ben Ali on his return misses the beautiful Eunice, and is frantic with grief. Fortunately, however, an old woman to whom Eunice has been very kind, and who had seen the robbers carrying Eunice away, is able to guide Ben Ali to their hiding place, which proves to be a cavern hewn out of the solid rock and barred by a massive oaken door, and which Ben Ali is unable to open. Presently, however, he hears some one approaching, and, concealing himself behind a neighboring rock, he is happy to learn that it is the outlaw band, and that they have a secret password which when spoken is the signal for a slave inside the cavern to open the door. In the meanwhile, poor Eunice has been thrown into chains because of having repulsed the love of the robber chief, and is compelled to do the work of the slave door-tender. After the robbers leave, Ben Ali approaches the door and boldly gives the command to open. Eunice opens the door, recognizes her lover, and falls happily into his arms. The chains are removed, and they proceed to the house of the Chief Magistrate of the district, who summons his soldiers and marches to the cave of the outlaws, where they conceal themselves until the band returns, when they take them entirely by surprise, inflicting a terrible punishment upon them. Eunice and Ben Ali are publicly thanked by the Magistrate, and rewarded bountifully with the robbers' treasure. The scenes in the treasure cave are particularly magnificent, and the acting throughout exceptionally well done. The entire subject is about 1,000 feet long.

There is also an Eclipse split reel scheduled for release April 24th containing as the subjects, "John Milton" and "Exhibition Drill of H. M. S. Excellent Prize Gun Crew." This combination of historic incident and highly interesting topical educational subjects should prove attractive to the general public. In the drama of Milton the Eclipse Company have costumed and set the scenes in exact representation of the period. The story is full of pathos and human-heart interest, and follows quite closely the historical record. It will be recalled that John Milton, formerly secretary to Cromwell, being a Protestant, is banished by King Charles II, and exiled from England. Here the thread is taken up.

The second subject on the reel shows the prize gun crew of the British warship Excellent an extremely interesting series of remarkable gun drills, showing what results may be accomplished with efficient gunnery under the instruction of excellent drill masters.

April 27th will have for release through the same firm a very amusing Cines split reel containing two hilarious comedies, the first one treating with the interesting and topical subject, woman's suffrage, and entitled "Leah, the Suffragette." It seems that Leah becomes interested in "Woman's Rights," and after successfully training her husband in the household duties, she busies herself in politics to the exclusion of everything else. Her enthusiasm soon gains for her the leadership of her party, and after an exciting meeting at their club, the suffragettes proceed to the mayor's office and demand that he champion their cause. Discussion soon becomes so heated that a riot is barely averted, and the ladies are arrested. In her cell in prison, Leah has ample opportunity for calm reflection, and quite rapidly her political ardor cools, and later, when her patient and long-suffering husband appears on the scene, she is more than willing to abandon her political career and return home. The action is lively throughout, and often excruciatingly funny.

The second subject on the same reel is also a very laughable farce and relates a comedy of errors resulting from the use of the same name by two young men who insert different advertisements in the same newspaper, and which gives the story the appropriate title of "Confusion."

There is excellent comedy in both these subjects, and they will without doubt draw many laughs before the thousand feet have been finished.

LIONS AND HAND-COLOREDS

The latest dub given the Gaumont Company is one which characterizes its present policy most aptly, namely the firm of Lions and Hand-Coloreds. Of course, the reason is very apparent when one recalls such master releases as "Christian Martyrs" and "Calino and His Boarders," in which lions occupy the feature role. The first mentioned of these was also hand-colored, as is also "Heaven's Messenger" and the "Margrave's Daughter," which last-named film has proven the greatest success of recent Independent offerings.

On Sunday, April 28th, the Gaumont Company will combine both a hand-colored feature and the lions in a historical production entitled "Heliogabalus, Tyrant of Rome," which will faithfully depict the profligacy and licentiousness that characterized the regime of the infamous Heliogabalus on the Roman throne.

On Thursday, May 16th, this European manufacturer promises the most remarkable of all its productions, "Attacked by a Lion." D. W. McKinney, traveling representative for the Sales Company, is at present exhibiting this picture to the exhibitors throughout the Middle West, and the exchange men who are co-operating with Mr. McKinney in the converting of Trust houses to the Independent field compliment this Lion picture most strongly on the aid it has given them in their endeavors. The climax of this picture is reached when a lion is shot in the very act of springing upon a horse, by its rider, who has taken a rapid but sure aim from the elevation to which he fled in order to escape the mad feline.

Another hand-colored picture is promised the market on Sunday, May 12th, in "The Lost Ring" and "Upper Bavaria," the first colored split to make its appearance.

On Thursday, the 30th of May, Gaumont will put out another hand-colored entitled "Zanetto's Marriage."

The two latter productions were one of the biggest successes that were ever exhibited in Europe.

A large supply of posters is being arranged for all these pictures, in particular "Attacked by a Lion," the unusuality of which justifies a colossal and attractive eight-sheet poster.

Revival of a Powers Feature

The Powers Picture Plays have again secured the services of the director who formerly produced the comedy and "kid" split-reel pictures for which this company was noted. In addition to this man, they have also engaged another capable director to work in conjunction with him and the Powers concern will thus have the benefit of two distinct companies of players in the production of split-reel subjects for their regular Tuesday releases. These Tuesday split reels will all consist of comedies or child pictures. Realizing the scarcity of good comedies, the Powers people are working every effort to provide unique comedies and comedy dramas for their regular Saturday release also.

PAUL RAINEY PICTURES

By M. I. MacDonald

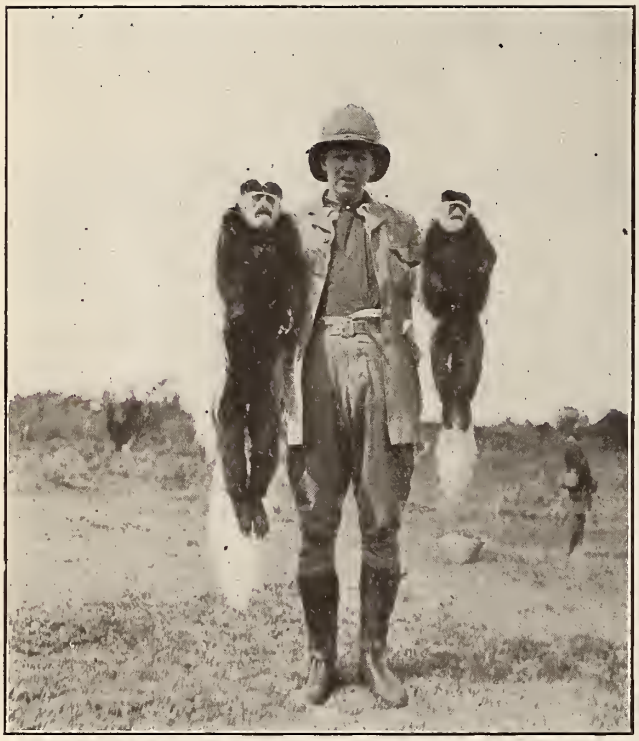
The most remarkable motion pictures of animal life that have ever been taken were exhibited at a matinee given by Mr. Daniel Frohman, at the Lyceum Theatre, on Monday afternoon, April 15th, for the benefit of the press.

Some months ago the story of the sojourn of the Rainey party in British East Africa was told in the columns of The News. At that time we had only seen still pictures of scenes and incidents which occurred during the eventful trip of Mr. Rainey and his party. But we have now to say that anything more wonderful or interesting in connection with the portrayal of animal life than is represented in the motion pictures protographed by Mr. John C. Hemment, of New York City, in the interests of Mr. Rainey, could scarcely be imagined.

From the unloading of the dogs and horses at Nairobi, and the starting off of the Safari, with provisions and supplies of all sorts to the hunting grounds in the jungle, until the last shot is fired, and the last indistinct note of the jungle chorus echoes in the ear of the imagination, there is not a moment unfilled with the most intense interest.

Many scenes of great scenic beauty occur in the pictures. The Safari, composed of natives, camel trains, etc., crossing the Guase Nyiaro, with the mountains standing out against the sky in the distance and the fantastical tree settings in the foremost background, add a touch of color that in our ignorance of the African landscape we scarcely look for.

Is it not marvelous to think that one can sit quietly in a New York theatre and watch the jungle animals unconsciously living their lives in their natural haunts, while a thousand eyes look on in silent amazement?



In Mr. Rainey's pictures we can see the trapping of the jackal and the ferocious hyena, which, by the way, was done in such a careful manner that outside of exhausting the strength of the animals in their attempts to escape, no harm was done to body or limb. The cheeta mounts to the tree-top to escape the cruel fangs of the hunting dogs; followed thence, it takes a wondrous flying leap above their heads to the ground. The lion is hunted in like manner. The one point of the picture which is not pleasant to dwell upon is the death; but suffice it to say that only for these brave men who risked their lives in the forest jungles to bring us these wonderful pictures, our knowledge of the jungle beasts in their natural haunts would be as limited as heretofore.

The most fascinating and remarkable scene of all is that of the water hole, where the denizens of the jungle, great and small, meet in peace to drink and bathe. Here are seen the elephant, the rhino, the baboon, the zebra, the giraffe, and numberless other animals pursuing their natural customs, totally unconscious of the presence of the camera man, who, hidden behind a blind built for the purpose, and who, all unawares to these simple wild things, recorded upon the motion picture film their every action.

Mr. John C. Hemment very ably explained each picture as it appeared upon the screen to a delighted audience of "pencil pushers." The bringing of these pictures of true African animal life is one of the greatest aids that the student of natural history has ever known.

The projecting end of the Paul Rainey films is now in the hands of Mr. Frank Hemment, therefore there will be no more failures in connection with the proejction of same.

The state rights of the Rainey Jungle Pictures will be handled by the Jungle Film Co., 100 West 101st street, New York City.

Syracuse, N. Y.—William F. Rafferty awarded contract to Delmonico Bros. and Syracuse Bridge Company to build a moving picture theatre at 464-466 North Salina street. Cost, about $15,000.

Bayonne, N. J.—The Lyceum Co. of New Jersey is going to erect a fireproof moving picture theatre at the corner of Broadway and Thirty-eighth street. Theatre will cover a plot of 100 x 100 feet, and seat about 1,400 people.

Bedford, Mass.—Mr. Cannon will open a moving picture house in Cannon's Block on Easter Monday. Seating capacity 450.

New York, N. Y.—United States Moving Picture Co., capital $250,000. Incorporators: C. J. Callahan, E. M. Dowling, N. Y., and J. J. LaMarsh, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Cincinnati, Ohio.—A motion picture theatre with a large capacity is to be erected at Ninth avenue and Baymiller by I. Frankel, Thos. A. Reilly and E. T. Bernard.

Brooklyn, N. Y.—The open-air motion picture place at Bushwick avenue and Hancock street has changed hands.

Corning, N. Y.—The Empire has been leased to L. S. Brown, of Oneida.

Courtland, N. Y.—The Courtland Theatre has changed to moving pictures.

Troy, N. Y.—Fire Marshal Haynes has issued an order permitting the operation of a moving picture at the northwest corner of Madison and Second streets. It will be conducted by Wm. McLaughlin and will accommodate 295.

"The big theatrical syndicates are under great obligations to the moving picture men," said Carl Laemmle to the writer at the Dayton convention. "Instead of the moving picture hurting the 'legitimate' theatrical business, it will benefit that business," continued Mr. Laemmle.

His statement was made in answer to a query as to his views on a subject that has been discussed pro and con. It was believed that such an authority as Carl Laemmle would have something worthy to say on the question. He did.

"The moving pictures are educating an entirely new audience for the big theatres," continued Laemmle. "People who never acquired the 'theatre-going' habit are unconsciously being educated by the moving picture to a desire to attend other theatrical amusements.

"The cry that the moving picture shows are hurting other theatrical enterprises is unjust. There may be a slump in the big theatrical enterprises just at present, but the business will recover, and the moving pictures will help along the action.

"There is room enough for all sides of the theatrical business to prosper. The picture manufacturer does not wish to intrude on the field of other producers, and so far as I know, there is no ill feeling between the two branches of the theatrical industry. That is between the far-sighted managers, film concerns and exhibitors who appreciate that only mutual prosperity and advantages will result from the new energy and capital being placed in the theatrical amusement field."

Mr. Laemmle's view of the situation is interesting. His arguments that an immense new field is being cultivated by the picture shows to the advantage of the big theatrical managers are well taken. Instead of condemning the picture show, the "legitimate theatre," so-called, should be thankful because of the educating process being conducted that will ultimately bring another class of people in as theatrical patrons to succeed the blase audiences growing smaller and smaller and more critical all the while. "There is room for all the shows," asserts Mr. Laemmle. and time will prove the truthfulness of his assertion.

Hon. John J. Lentz, of Columbus, Ohio, former Congressman, and a jurist of national reputation, in his brilliant address delivered to the Exhibitors at the Dayton meeting, said a moving picture machine should be installed in every school room in the land, and he promised that if such a policy is adopted that the future child of 10 years will be wiser than the present young man and woman of 20. He declared that the doctor, lawyer, the architect, the artist and newspaper man would soon be less important to the world than the man who flashes the picture on the screen.

Exceptions have been taken in some circles to Judge Lentz's assertions, and the above statements have been criticised in the press in various sections of the country. We think, however, that Judge Lentz's statements are conservative. The moving picture has a great educational scope—one not yet realized by many.

"We have gone to Athens for culture and architecture, and we have gone to Rome for many of our laws," said Judge Lentz, "but what care we about the foundation of laws in these days when we have the automobile, the telegraph and cinematography?"

Mr. Lentz said the moving picture man would dethrone prejudice by showing all the good that is in the world, and all the religious systems of the world, to all the world.

"There is not a man in the moving picture business today who cannot in a brief period obtain a better education than was ever enjoyed by Daniel Webster or Joseph Choate," said the Judge. "Few of us can go to all the world, but the moving picture camera can bring all the world to us. Disease will be cured by eliminating prejudice, for diseases of the mind are the worst we have to contend with. The chief business of a man is to live so that he will be fit for heaven, and you exhibitors will help prepare him for that place if you perform your duty conscientiously," concluded the speaker.

The above statements only go to prove the rapid uplift of the moving picture and its elevation in the minds of the refined and intelligent classes. When such distinguished men as Hon. John J. Lentz make such statements as those quoted herewith, statements not made hastily, but after thought and study, it should be impressed upon the minds of all that the uplift of cinematography is not a visionary theory but a fact.

The Exhibitors' convention at Dayton was attended by manufacturers, exhibitors and others, from all sections of this country, and sentiment there can be considered as sentiment universal. That is the reason why we continue to devote considerable space to ideas expressed at that gathering. Not the least sentiment was that found against vaudeville in its connection with the moving picture theatre. It was freely stated that cheap vaudeville was a detriment instead of an aide to the picture show. Exhibitors in some instances claimed they were compelled to run vaudeville because of competition. One leading exhibitor expressed the thought that the Exhibitors' League should rule against the vaudeville practice and thus solidify the sentiment against it, and bring every member into concerted and objective action.

President M. A. Neff said vaudeville attachments should be eliminated from moving picture shows wherever practicable. He said vaudeville often detracted from the merit of the entertainment.

Cheap vaudeville and first-class pictures will never be given together consistently. Slap-stick comedy, and suggestive songs and monologue have no place in a refined moving picture show, catering to women and children. The uplift of the picture and the dignity and refinement of the moving picture theatre will be enhanced considerably when cheap vaudeville is tabooed.

The Associated Press, in a story sent to all parts of the United States, tells how another tragedy was enacted at the Hillsville, Va., court house after the Allen gang of outlaws murdered court officials in the little Southern village's temple of justice. The story as it was widely published follows:

"Another troop of mountain outlaws rode in and shot the judge off the bench and duplicated the gruesome assassination—but this time it was only for the moving pictures. The actors did more real firing and made more racket and caused almost as much fuss as the real outlaws did."

It is unfortunate for both the moving picture industry and the public that some makers of films and some owners of theatres insist upon reproducing the scenes of sensational crime for the edification of their patrons, many of them boys and girls. The sooner such performances are abandoned by the moving picture manufacturers, the sooner will the educational uplift of the picture become an established fact. The National Board of Censorship should refuse to pass such pictures. The shooting down of an aged judge, serving his God and his country, was horrible enough to read in print, without the moving pictures being utilized to rehearse the crime. Such pictures are not proper, either, for juveniles or adults to witness.

The Cincinnati Times-Star editorially says: "In the main, the moving picture standards have been growing better, but occasionally it is made evident that there are men connected with the business who are only too ready to try and make a profit out of the morbid curiosity of a certain section of the public. It is encouraging to note that indignant protests against such pictures are coming from all parts of the country. The best sentiment is strongly against the rehearsing of an atrocious crime."

True, every word of it. Enough harm has been done in the past by the dramatization of the careers of famous criminals. But that harm is as nothing to be compared with the greater harm to public morals and the detriment of the industry, when moving pictures blossom out with such horrid murderous details. Jesse James and other pictures of like ilk have done great harm to cinematography in the past. The lesson should be heeded. The entire industry suffers when such pictures as the Hillsville, Va., outrage are released for the picture screen.

FOR THOSE WHO WORRY O'ER PLOTS AND PLAYS

By William Lord Wright

Another "School" Heard From

From New York City there is being sent out a form letter to scenario writers, several copies of which have been forwarded to this department. The letter addressed to "Dear Scenario Writer" follows, in part:

"You are a scenario writer, and have some original, salable ideas that should be turned into cash. Your work does not sell, that is to say, it is not available for production by any of the manufacturers. Why spend so much time on this work, unless you receive some returns for your efforts. The writer has a plan that will bring together scenario writers and film makers. Here it is:

"For a fee of $2 I will read, correct, and revise your work. Will put it, not you, in touch with the market. If the submitted scenario contains any merit at all I will guarantee to arrange it so that you will have no difficulty putting it in a marketable condition.

"The writer is now connected with one of the foremost film manufacturers in this country, and is in a position to know just exactly what sort of stories their different policies demand. And I'm ready to beat your work into such shape as to enable you to sell it."

With the above offer to read, correct and revise work for a fee of $2 we take no exceptions. It is worth $2 for an expert to read, correct and revise a scenario and do it properly. There are other assertions in the above letter that we cannot approve. In the first place, if the writer is connected with one of the foremost film manufacturers in this country, he has no business conducting a so-called school. The action is certain to make trouble for the manufacturer, and first-class manufacturers will not stand for any such side-lines in their editorial departments. Editorial labors belong to the employer. This fact is proven in the case of the Lubin Manufacturing Company, which recently put the quietus on a correspondence school for writers conducted by a member of the Lubin Editorial Department. "I am ready to beat out your work into such shape as to enable you to sell it" is a strong promise. In other words, this editor promises for a fee of $2 to take every script submitted to him and revise it so that it will meet a ready sale. No matter what the idea, story or plot, it can be revised and sold. We don't believe any writer on the face of the earth will put confidence in this statement. It causes us to class this proposition with that of others treated heretofore in this department, and we advise our interrogators to read, criticise and revise their own scripts and spend the $2 in postage.

THE FAVORED WRITER QUESTION

Morristown, N. J., sends the Editor two more communications on "The Favored Writer" question, as he views it: "I read with interest your comment in the issue of March 23d, regarding my view of returned scripts sent to large producers. Permit me to state that from actual experience your theoretical opinion about the "old war-cry" does not apply in my particular case. For illustration, I forwarded at different times three scenarios to a large producer. The last two were mailed on Saturday morning and returned on Monday evening marked 'carefully considered, not available,' yet those same scripts were accepted by other companies without question. There are are only two companies in the market who have ever returned my scripts, and I repeat again that one of those companies must have favored writers; at any rate, my scripts could not have been carefully considered in so short a time. In addition, permit me to say that I am no copyist or plagiarist. All my work is of an entirely original character."

In his second communication, Morristown writes: "Since writing to you under date of March 25th, I have received a letter from one of the companies I claimed must have favored writers. They stated that my scenarios were returned not because they were not good, but because 'We have three or four people writing solely for us.' Does this not corroborate my opinion. Now, who should forget it?"

We are giving considerable space to Morristown this week because dozens of other writers have been querying on the same subject, and our comment on Morristown's communications will prove of interest to many others of our author friends. First, we take it that Morristown in writing on the "Favored Writer," does not refer to the members of the editorial staff of the producer, or to the staff contributors. These writers are "favored writers" in one sense of the word, just as the members of the editorial staff of a newspaper, or special correspondents; or staff contributors of certain magazines are "favored writers." When we repeat, once for all, that in our honest opinion every scenario editor to-day is as ready to consider and buy a meritorious script from Squedunk as he is from Gotham, we know we are stating a fact. If Morristown, or any other writer can furnish us convincing proof of discrimination premeditated and aforethought, this department is ready and willing to submit the facts to the readers after proper investigation. This page is for the benefit of the great army of struggling writers and we propose to protect them fearlessly.

Where would be the business or artistic judgment of an editor and director in turning down a corking good comedy or drama, just suited to their needs, for a passe script submitted by some author perhaps better known? Even if the known author's work were accepted, why should the fresh idea submitted by the obscure author be refused? Editors as well as authors have reputations to sustain. They wish to be known to the trade as discoverers of talent, as men able to winnow the wheat from the chaff. The director also has his reputation to look after, and an artistic pride. Do you suppose he is going to let go a script that proves a source of inspiration, just because the writer was heretofore unknown? Not at all. Novel plots and themes are at a premium, and if you've got the goods, you will find the market.

Morristown illustrates his theory by stating that he mailed scripts on a Saturday morning and they were returned Monday evening, marked "carefully considered, not available." Several things may have interfered with their acceptance. Similar stories may have been hit upon by others; the scripts may not have appealed to the directors, a second or third reader may have got his or her hands on the stories and returned them without consulting the editor. This would have been unfortunate for the author. But this does not prove that particular editor was favoring any particular writer. Morristown asserts that the same scripts were accepted without question by other companies, which proves that they appealed to other editors and were meritorious.

Thanhouser is not in the market for scripts and Essanay is not buying scripts at present. Biograph is partial to staff contributors. Perhaps Morristown submitted his stories to those companies. We wish that Morristown would send us along the name of the company informing him that scenarios are returned because "we have three or four people writing solely for us." If it is not one of the companies that have honestly announced they are not in the market, we think other writers would be benefited by having the name of the company in question published.

If a writer is "favored," it is because he delivers the "dope" favored by editor, director, and manufacturer. There isn't a script writer in the business to-day that does not know what it is to draw a rejection. Forget the "favored writer" theory, and send out your scripts. If they possess freshness in plot, and are convincing in theme and action, your checks will be more frequent than rejection slips.

Come again, Morristown, and bring along your friends. We like to hear from you, and want you to feel free to use this page.

Letter From Niles, Mich.

Niles, Mich., writes: "Recently I submitted three scenarios, supposedly in a prize contest. All were returned marked 'unavailable,' without having been entered in the contest. A letter to the editor brought back the explanation, 'Returned simply because unavailable.' Was it fair to writers to do this with Mss. when their ad said nothing of the fact that scenarios that did not precisely suit the editor would be rejected and not entered? As a proof that the scripts were not without merit, I advise you that one of them was accepted later by another firm."

Stories that suit one producer are ofttimes turned down by another. No two persons are alike, and the rule applies to editors, who are human. Scenarios for this contest were received by the wagon load. They came from almost every civilized country. Probably the scripts were not deemed available for the contest proper, and were not considered as being submitted other than in the prize contest. We had the identical experience narrated by Niles, Mich. However, we marketed the script elsewhere, and have judiciously expended the amount of the check. Cheer up and try again, Niles!

THE REFORMATION OF MARY

Convincing Solax Thesis on Prison Reform To Be Released Wednesday, May 1

Mary, a female crook.....Blanche Cornwall
James Van Brunt, cashier.....Darwin Karr
Little Frances, his daughter.....Solax Kid
"Red" Burns, a forger.....Lee Beggs
George Harding, a bank president, George Paxton

In this country there are about seven or eight hundred political organizations, all fighting for reform. "Down with the grafters" is the cry. Legislators are sent to assemblies after reform campaigns all fired up and scared into advocating more stringent measures for the punishment of criminals—the poor, weak criminals. Nothing is ever done, however, to punish millionaire criminals or to prevent crime. Nothing is ever done by the "reformers" to help the convicts after they are released from prison, and thus prevent future crime.

After a criminal is released he passes through a sort of period of transition. Either he turns straight or else becomes further steeped and immersed in crime and other excesses. Such is the fate of Mary Bramwell in the Solax production of "The Reformation of Mary." She is released from prison, but society offers her no helping hand. Her weak criminal nature gets no support from the strongly organized elite. She is confronted by a hard fight and has to choose between starvation and the path of least resistance. She is not healthy and strong enough to fight out this battle. She succumbs to temptation, joins her old pals in one of their jobs, and gets away with it.

But nature had not intended that Mary should remain a criminal. A little girl enters her life, the child of a cashier of a bank. The cashier is accused on circumstantial evidence of Mary's crime. Mary has a redeeming moment. She answers the irresistible cry of conscience and confesses that she and not the cashier is the real criminal. She returns the stolen goods and as her reward she is given a Bible and a good home in a convent, for

"Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow.

"Though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."
—Isaiah 1: xviii.

DON'T BECOME FAMOUS

Don't get gay—or famous! There's nothing to it! Thanhouser Company shows why. Of course, it's in a reel, by name, "Miss Arabella Snaith," but a good reel is like a good sermon. And this sermon is in a comedy film, too! It pictures the comedy efforts of Harold Hargreaves, writer of a "best seller," to evade the foolish who follow the famous. One of the "foolish," though, was wise enough to rope Hargreaves into matrimony. What happened to the famous man you see Friday, May 3d, when the film is released.

NOTES OF THE WEEK

In an article in the Goshen, Ind., News-Tribune, entitled "Living Cost Explained," we find the following quotation:

"There is also an enormous increase in the variety of expenditure for unproductive consumption. There are the moving picture shows and the vaudeville shows and the amusement parks, with their opportunities for dropping nickels and dimes for monetary gratification. There are crowds who ride on trolley cars for pleasure; the summer vacation has become a fixture; every Sunday and holiday has its excursions by boat or rail, while clothing makes greater demands than formerly.

"All in all, it is about time for the consumer to stop playing the part of a man with a grievance. If he will reduce unproductive consumption, by so much he will reduce a great burden that now oppresses the family."

Many of the "nickels and dimes" may be productive of nothing beyond "monetary gratification." We will agree that there are numerous "nickel-in-the-slot" devices which are productive of no good, but the pleasure ride on the trolley car, the summer vacation, or the moving picture show help in their way to ameliorate tired nerves, enlarge the view-point and educate in a thousand different ways, helping man to continue to improve the product of his labors.

Houston is to have a municipal band and a municipal moving picture show. Both features will be in the pay of the city, and their services will be free to the public at large. May 1st the two innovations go into effect. The municipal band will consist of thirty pieces, both band and orchestra. The band will play nightly in the summer in the parks, while in the winter the band and orchestra will play free concerts in the new $400,000 municipal auditorium. In the winter two vocalists will be added to the music equipment of the city. The band also will be available for trade excursions and for boosting delegations to other cities when Houston goes in quest of conventions.

The moving picture show will be installed in the auditorium. Films will be shown Sunday afternoons and nights, both summer and winter. The doors will be open free to everyone and it is believed the seating capacity of 8,000 will be generally filled. Lectures and other forms of entertainment will be provided by the city free of cost.

In place of bringing the prospective buyer to their lands, many real estate dealers are bringing their land to the buyer by means of moving pictures. Such is the wonderful advancement of the times.

Among the films made under the direction of the National Association of the Deaf, and which are going the rounds of the schools for the deaf of the United States, are views of the pupils of the New York school in their military drill, and also a film of a short lecture by Dr. E. M. Gallaudet on the sign language.

A company was recently formed at Hammond, La., that has for its object the operation of a circuit of ten moving picture shows. The promoters are H. P. and Vitor Mollere and Charles Lohman. The new circuit, besides Hammond, Hattiesburg and McComb, will include Laurel, Natchez, Brookhaven and other cities, and will give to these places a circuit as strong as that operated in the larger cities of the South. The new company will be capitalized at $40,000.

The convicts at the Kansas State prison at Lansing are being entertained once each week by a moving picture show. Picture plays are given every Saturday afternoon in the chapel. A convict electrician operates the machine, which has been purchased by the prison authorities, and regular film service has been arranged for.

The following is an interesting reminiscence taken from the Montreal Daily Star:

The first moving picture exhibition in North America was given in Montreal. This was about twenty-odd years ago. The theatre was just south of what is now the Majestic Hotel, on St. Lawrence Boulevard, a door or two above Vitre street. The picture machine came from France, and was called the Luminiere. The inventor was present and gave a private exhibition one afternoon to an audience of exactly four people. One of these was Mr. Remi Bauset, now Assistant City Clerk, another the late Raymond Prefontaine, then an alderman. This was followed by public exhibitions which were deemed wonderful. The audience were charged 25 cents admission, and were given a showing of fifty feet of film. The most successful picture was one of waves washing up over a sand beach and undermining a stone wall. The building where this exhibition was given, in a red-fronted shop-theatre, was afterwards burned. At one time it was known as Smith's Museum.

Sunday moving picture shows have been barred at Niagara Falls. Exhibitors of that city threaten to see that the Sunday law is put into force to the very limit, which, if such should happen, will close up on Sundays every place of business in Niagara Falls.

The varied industrial and civic activities of Buffalo will soon be shown throughout the world in Kinemacolor.

An educational campaign along the line of social work and its capacity for accomplishment of good work among girls and boys is to be carried on all through the country by means of motion pictures.

The Reliance Company has made another progressive move, this time in securing the services of Mr. Hal Reid, who will hereafter direct all of the Reliance productions. Mr. Reid, besides being a director of note, having written and directed such well-known picture-plays as "Human Hearts" and "Jim and Joe" for Selig and "The Red Cross Martyr," "The Seventh Son," "At Scrogginses Corners," "Old Love Letters," "War," "The Woman Haters," "The Victoria Cross," "Love in the Ghetto" and "A Rich Man's Son" for the Vitagraph, is also a dramatic playwright of international fame. Among his greatest successes will be found "The Confession," "Human Hearts," "The Night Before Christmas," "At Cripple Creek," "The Street Singer," "A Midnight Marriage" and one hundred and eleven others. Mr. Reid has the honor of being the only director who has ever filmed the President of the United States and royalty of the reigning family, by written consent. Among the prominent members supporting him in his new stock company will be Gertrude Robinson, Edith Lyle, Virginia Westbrook, Susan Balfour, Lola Lieferman, Wallace Reid, Charles Herman, Sigman and Robert Tabor. The first Reid releases will be "Father Beauclaire" under date of May 25th. These Reliance Reid releases may be relied upon and should be eagerly looked forward to.

At Duluth, Minn., the censor board of the amusement committee from the Woman's Council is considering a novel plan of boosting for the moving picture houses whose managers co-operate with the board in its effort to restrain the reproduction of objectionable reels.

It is proposed to publish each week a list of the shows where films approved by the committee are shown. In this way they hope to drive out the objectionable features.

The old Herald building, 255 Washington street, Boston, Mass., which was vacated six years ago, has been leased for a period of thirty years. The building is to be made over into one of the most up-to-date moving picture houses in the country. It has been leased by the same management which runs the Beacon Theatre on Tremont street.

In California, says the New York Sun, the kinetoscope and the phonograph have been firmly established as agencies of public education. In other states experiments are being made. Everywhere the verdict is the same. This leads to the conclusion that motion pictures will figure prominently in educational work in the future.

In the United States there are 20,000 motion picture theatres, and their total annual box office receipts are estimated at more than $300,000,000.

Greater New York has more than 700 motion picture theatres. Their total seating capacity is 261,838, and if each of these theatres gave three shows to capacity daily they would entertain every 24 hours more than 780,000 people.

In one week recently 34 of the leading moving picture manufacturers released for their first public showing no less than 100 new sets of pictures. As the average length of each picture is 1,000 feet—a film requiring about 20 minutes to show—this was a total of nearly 20 miles of new film produced in America in a single week.

Moving picture films are fast assuming an important position in America's export trade.

A plan is now afloat for the fitting up of a great ocean liner with the products of American mills and factories. This ship will visit every important port of South America. The booth exhibits will be supplemented by machinery in action, moving pictures, lectures and advertising matter, all designed to show South American buyers what this country has to sell them, and why it is to their advantage to buy of us.

The enterprise is under the patronage of the American Manufacturers' Export Association, and has the official indorsement of President Taft and of the departments of state and of commerce and labor.

Vancouver, B. C., which has now nineteen moving picture theatres, has refused a license for the twentieth.

The latest thing in signs, we are told, is the moving picture sign for trolley cars. According to the Poughkeepsie, N. Y., News, the moving signs for street cars consist of two moving signs for each car, one on either side occupying the same relative position in the cars that the two rows of stationary advertisements ordinarily occupy. But instead of being stationary, the advertising cards are inclosed in a very neat and attractive frame which has a glass front and the signs are so constructed that by means of a series of inelastic belts which run over rollers in the front and rear ends of the car the advertisements fastened to these belts are made to travel slowly and continuously from on end of the car to the other. In this way every advertisement is made to pass every passenger in every part of the car every few minutes. This device gives the advertiser the advantage of having his signs pass before the gaze of each passenger in the car.

The signs are made to travel by means of a small motor in the front end of the car in the motorman's vestibule and the power is transmitted from this motor to the two moving signs by means of flexible shafting run through small, suitably curved steel tubes to the signs themselves.

Says Yu Hsi Sung, secretary of the Y. M. C. A. in Northern China, "The Chinese are quick to adopt the Occidental ideas, and among the things which seem to have made the greatest advance in the Orient are moving pictures. They have been shown there for a year."

Although all modern methods of entertainment have been adopted for the amusement of the insane at the Oklahoma Sanitarium Company's hospital at Norman, Okla., the moving picture, according to L. H. Selsor, of Guthrie, the company's president, surpasses them all. Only comic and scenic subjects are shown the patients.

MANUFACTURERS' NOTES

Reports from New Bedford, Mass., say that H. A. Chenoweth, of the Comique Theatre of that city, has been playing to big crowds with the following splendid bill: Bison, "101"—"The Deserter"; Imp, "Shamus O'Brien," "The Lie" and "The Emigrant's Violin"; also Powers' "The Power Behind the Throne." The Independent films are furnished by the W. E. Greene Film Exchange, Boston, Mass.

A moving picture firm for Nashville was chartered Monday, April 1st, with the county register under the name of the Tennessee Film Company. The company will lease, make, and sell moving pictures, conduct theatres, and otherwise transact moving picture business.

The capital stock of the company is placed at $2,000. The incorporators are: R. W. Olsen, Robert White, Ella Weimer, Will Myers, and C. M. Silberman.

Motion pictures are expected to be an important feature of the Southern Sociological Congress to be held in Nashville, Tenn., May 7 to 10. Governor Ben W. Hooper has issued a call to the governors of sixteen Southern states to send delegates to a congress and exhibition "to study and improve social, civic and economic conditions in the South." The program will be made up of an array of the strongest speakers on social welfare topics from various parts of the country. In addition there will be exhibits and a special showing of graphic methods in teaching and interesting people. For this purpose national organizations possessing motion pictures have been invited to co-operate. The committee desires to learn of high-grade films treating of health, play, children, prisons, summer babies, child labor, flies, and any other subject interesting to public officials and social workers. Correspondence may be addressed to E. G. Routzahn, Southern Sociological Congress, Nashville. Express packages can be addressed the same way.

EXHIBITORS' NOTES

Joe Cantes, of Pleasantville, N. Y., is engaged in the largest building project now in operation in that borough. His combination theatre, lodge room, stores and apartments, described in detail in the last issue of The Pleasantville Press, will be a handsome addition to the business section of Pleasantville. Crosta & Fry, of Atlantic City, are the contractors, and they are employing a large force of men. It is expected to have the theatre open for business on Memorial Day. It is Mr. Cantes' intention to run it as a first-class moving picture parlor, to which vaudeville will be added if the patronage demands it. The lower floor will seat 700 people, to which the admission will be 5 cents, while the balcony and gallery, which will take care of 300 more, will be reserved at a charge of 10 cents. In addition to the main entrance, there will be five exits on either side of the theatre, and the plans call for a playhouse complete in every detail and second to none in South Jersey.

* * * * * *

The new Bijou Theatre, Bangor, Me., will, when it is completed, rank favorably with some of the best in New England. The entire plan for the decorations, which has been accepted, and will soon be put into effect by a crew of professional decorators from the studios of William Eckhart, of New York and Chicago, is one which will be wonderfully artistic. One of the most striking features of the interior will be the proscenium arch painting, a magnificent painting with five figures from some appropriate subject, which is to be done on silk at the Eckhart studio, and will be put in place above the proscenium arch. It will almost cover the sounding board, which extends from the proscenium arch to an outer arch, and the colors of the walls surrounding it will be blended to conform with it.

Gustave Holmberg, manager of the Omaha Film Company, died at his home, 3421 Florence boulevard, Omaha, Neb., Sunday morning, March 31st, following a short attack of acute indigestion. Mr. Holmberg was the first man to open a moving picture house in the city of Chicago, and was well known throughout the West. Not only did Mr. Holmberg inaugurate the innovation in the moving picture business, but he opened the first film exchange in the state of Nebraska, nine years ago. It was with the assistance of Mr. Holmberg that Edison was able to put the moving picture machine before the public in a practical way.

The new Melbourne Theatre, which was opened in Seattle, Wash., on April 3d, has been pronounced the handsomest in Seattle. The Melbourne Amusement Company, of which Herman J. Brown is manager, has spent $35,000 on the house and $10,000 for a splendid pipe organ. Architecturally the interior is exceedingly handsome. Max Umbrecht, the architect, has followed the Italian Renaissance in his design. The colors are old gold and ivory.

An invisible lighting system floods the theatre with light, but does not throw any glare, because of the ingenious masking of the bulbs. The seats are comfortably upholstered and the aisles wide. A ventilation system changes the air every three minutes. The building is fireproof and, besides, is equipped with ample emergency exits.

A $3,000 glass curtain, on which the pictures are projected, is a special feature of the theatre. This screen is a great improvement over the ordinary screen.

A clever device of the pipe organ, which is invisible, carries the various notes to different angles of the house, producing a flood of music which sweeps the auditorium. In addition to the organ, Wagner's orchestra will furnish music, and musical vaudeville has been added to the moving picture program.

The latest addition to the list of moving picture houses at Nashville, Tenn., is the Rex Theatre, on Fifth avenue. This pretty house was designed and erected under the personal supervision of Marr & Holman, local architects, and is certainly a great compliment to their skill. The Rex has a splendid location, being first on the east side of Fifth avenue, between Church and Union, in a block having five other show houses and already famed for its amusement enterprises. The color scheme is white and gold and tan. The indirect lighting system is used, and the house is seated with the latest and most comfortable red leather upholstered folding opera chairs. A wealth of electric globes illuminate the tile and mahogany lobby, and a handsome clock inside at the top of the screen warns all visitors of the hour. This theatre has a seating capacity of 850, and was erected at a cost of about $60,000.

A company to be known as the Automatic Stereopticon Company, of Salt Lake City, Utah, have organized and incorporated under a capital of $50,000 in shares of $1 each. The object of the company will be the manufacture of a device which will revolutionize the present methods of operating moving picture and stereopticon machines. It is claimed that the device will make it possible to do away with an operator, by automatically shifting and regulating the wheels. The inventor of the device is Herman Faulkner, of Salt Lake City.

CHAS. K. HALL, CAMERA MAN, SCORES FOR ANIMATED WEEKLY

First of the Photographers to Reach the Wreck of the $10,000,000 Gigantic Titanic

With a single stroke of enterprise, and in having a camera man who knew his business, The Animated Weekly has scored a singular triumph in beating its rivals to the biggest news story of the day—the Titanic, wrecked by an iceberg off the coast of Newfoundland.

Possibly some luck held the cards for Hall, but his quick wit and daring came in for their share of the glory, permitting The Animated Weekly—which is called "The most famous film in the whole world"—to score the biggest kind of a scoop on the newspaper photographers of Boston and New York.

Hall had been sent to Sydney, Cape Breton, there to await a steamer that would take him to St. Johns, Newfoundland, where certain inaugural ceremonies were to be motion pictured. There was a delay and in order to reach St. Johns in time Hall had to charter a big seagoing tug. He was about to start for St. Johns when news of the Titanic wreck was flashed to Sydney—Hall heard of it and within twenty minutes his tug was pounding the high seas, nosing its way to the disabled Titanic. From a wireless received by Hall to-day it appears that he started within a few minutes of the time that New York heard the news. As it takes thirty-six hours to reach Halifax from New York, it is expected that Hall's films will reach New York by the time the press and other photographers get to the vessel's side at sea. This film should create a sensation the country over. Clamors for news of the wreck and the pictures first to be shown on the Animated Weekly will probably score the biggest of any scene in months.

With this latest scoop in "getting there" first, The Animated Weekly adds further honors to its short career—the recent wreck of the New York Central train at Poughkeepsie and the burning of the steamer Ontario were also shown first by the Animated. In almost every corner of the globe there are Animated Weekly camera men, and there is still room for a few more of the best ones. The Animated Weekly proved popular from the beginning—its subjects selected from over the entire world are most interesting and timely. Over eight thousand exhibitors are showing The Animated Weekly.

Another New Powers Director

The Powers Motion Picture Company has just secured the services of Mr. Frank Powell in the capacity of director, in addition to their already large production staff.

Mr. Powell made a most enviable record for himself during the two years he was with the Biograph Company, and has only recently returned from a protracted engagement in England with the Pathe Freres, having been general director of their London studio. Mr. Powell's large experience has given him a thorough and comprehensive knowledge of the requirements of the moving picture business, and he will, no doubt, prove a most valuable acquisition to the Powers forces.

THE DEATH SHIP, OR "THE WRECK OF THE AURORA"

(World's Best Film Co. Release.)

At this time of great sorrow to the nation the minds of the masses have turned toward the sea, and the frigid lorelei which lured on to destruction that giantess of the seas, the Titanic, has not yet ceased to flutter her pale garments over the spot where her sea nymphs gathered in their clammy arms the great ship with her precious cargo of more than a thousand souls, to lay them to their last rest in the ocean fastnesses—in valleys paved with shells and seaweed.

It was a happening such as rarely occurs that the World's Best Film Co., of which Mr. W. L. Brind has recently become manager, had for release a film which touches the sympathetic chord that is vibrant throughout the land.

"The Death Ship, or The Wreck of the Aurora," is a European production of the best caliber. The photography, the tinting, the action of the piece, the settings, and, in fact, everything connected with the making of this picture, is of the very best.

The story is that of a ship owner who, finding himself ruined financially, conspires with the captain of the Aurora to wreck her, promising the captain a percentage of her insurance money when the deed has been satisfactorily accomplished. The ship owner's son, who has practically sacrificed three years of his life away from his sweetheart and all whom he loves in the world, to save his father the disgrace of being branded as a forger, taking both blame and sentence upon himself, finds work upon this very ship on its outward voyage, unrecognized. The captain of the vessel, in an intoxicated state, falls from a ladder and is killed, and the position of chief navigator falls to the ship owner's son. After the realistic dynamiting of the lighthouse, which is shown in the film, we see the floundering of the Aurora on the rocks, and eventually her sinking.

The work of the life-saving crew is shown up in fine style, giving the picture an educational tone as well as plenty of sensationalism The second reel is full of thrills. The plot of the story is splendidly worked out, and is rampant with side lines of human interest.

Avesta Kinetograph Co.

In another column of this issue will be found an ad of the Avesta Kinetograph Co., formed for the purpose of manufacturing motion pictures. Their plant is fully equipped and ready for immediate business. Operators are men of wide experience in the field of motion photography. Mr. Harry A. Durst, known to the trade, will superintend all photographic work, and Mr. R. H. Bryan will attend to the business end. The object of the company is the manufacture of educational, scientific and industrial pictures, as well as special feature work. They hope to have some exhibits of their work in the very near future.

HIS LOVE OF CHILDREN

Reliance Release, May 4th

John Hedden is a middle-aged man, who is passionately fond of children. He spends a great deal of his time at the home of a widow friend who is happily blessed with three beautiful children. He meets there Helen Knox, who is acting as governess to the three children. Realizing that she could create the happy home life that he so craves, he asks her to marry him. She willingly assents, but after the marriage greatly disappoints him by turning from the beautiful home he has made for her to the allurements of society. In order to offset his loneliness he steals away, while his wife goes out to society affairs, to the companionship of the widow's children. Finally one Sunday morning, again compelled to eat a lonely breakfast, he decided to take the children up to the Zoo without his wife's knowledge. He leaves her a letter, saying that he was called away on an important engagement, and goes to the widow's house, where he prevails upon her to accompany him and the children. While at the Zoo he is seen by a gossipy friend of his wife's. She goes at once to the wife, and tells her of what she has seen. The wife, already mystified by her husband's letter, is quite ready to believe the friend's gossip. She goes at once to the widow's home, and there finds that her husband has already returned with the children. She accuses the widow of trying to steal her husband, and the widow in turn tells her how she has disappointed her husband in his ideal of home life. In order to prove her assertion she leads the wife to the nursery door, and there shows her the children with her husband. He is having the time of his life, telling them stories. The wife realizes what a failure she has made of her married life. She begs her friend's pardon, and steals quietly away.

KING BAGGOTT, OF IMP PLAYERS, PRESENTED WITH LOVING CUP

Although the employees of the Montauk Arcade moving picture theatre, of Pitkin avenue, Brooklyn, had never seen King Baggott, of the Imp Players, in the flesh, knowing him only through the medium of the moving picture film, they presented him on Saturday night with a beautiful solid silver loving cup as a testimonial of their regard for his ability as an actor. The presentation took place at the first annual dance of the Montauk employees at Congress Hall, Brooklyn.

Accompanying Mr. Baggott, also as a guest of honor, was William R. Daly, who has splendidly portrayed many old characters in the Imp films.

The dance had been in progress some time before Mr.

Baggott and Mr. Daly arrived, and they were greeted with cheers and cries of "Oh, you King" as they entered the hall. The dancers crowded around the two actors and were presented in turn.

The presentation of the cup was made by Clifton A. Fulmer, standard bearer of the Montauk Association, amid cheers from the spectators. Mr. Baggott was at a loss for words, as the presentation was a complete surprise to him. In a few words he told the spectators that he was an actor, not a speaker, and that the best way he knew of showing his appreciation of the gift was to use it in one of the scenes of his next picture, and that when the film was shown and they saw him holding up the cup, they would know he was thanking them for the testimonial.

Although the first dance of the Montauk employees, the affair was a huge success and was well attended. The hall was prettily decorated with flags and bunting and colored electric bulbs.

The officers of the Montauk Association are: Clifton A. Fulmer, standard bearer; Charles F. Chabot, president; Harold Fulmer, vice-president and treasurer; Frank J. Howard, secretary and Duane L. Simmons, sergeant-at-arms.

THREE OF A KIND
(Nestor)

The saying "There is a fool born every minute" is brought to one's mind when "Three of a Kind," a comedy by the Nestor Film Co., is thrown on the screen, and evidently Violet Reynolds thought so, for she certainly did get away with her little ruse to get rich quick. Miss Vivian Rich, the new leading lady of the Nestor Film Co., very effectively plays the part of this wise young woman who, on her arrival in the little village of Glendale, observes the admiring glances of the village cut-ups and decides on a plan to make her visit worth while.

Tearfully, she tells the station agent of the loss of a ten dollar bill which had one corner torn off and, apparently heartbroken over her failure to find it, she departs. On learning the cause of the pretty young lady's grief, three of the boys are moved to pity. Having also a desire to meet the young lady and try to make an impression, each lad tries to think up a way to make a hit.

Lee Moran, who plays the part of "Bud Hoover," one of the easy marks, runs a close race with John McDonald and Dick Dewell for the honors in this screamingly funny play. "Bud" is the first one to think up the wonderful idea of tearing a corner off one of his own bills, and he makes his way to the hotel where the young lady is staying. He presents her with the bill, saying he found it, and Violet's pleasure is unbounded as she offers the young man a flower which he, with joy in his heart, accepts, and she pins it on his coat.

On his departure, Violet admits Ned, who has also lit on the same brilliant plan of gaining the favor of the young lady and he also receives a flower, and leaves, walking on air. And last, but not least, comes Silas with his bill, which also has a torn corner and he, too, gets a flower in return.

"Bud" immediately goes to the station agent to inform him of his good luck and to show the flower which has been bestowed upon him. Ned arrives with the same story and Silas brings up the rear. They are all dumbfounded to observe the same kind of flower on each other's coats, and when the awful truth dawns upon them, they make a bee-line for the hotel, but arrive too late, for Violet has made good her getaway. Not giving up hope entirely, they dash for the station in time to see Violet boarding the train and waving them a fond farewell. After deep contemplation, they decide the joke is on them and the humor of the situation strikes them and smiles, though not particularly joyful, break over their countenances.

On the same reel with "Three of a Kind" is a splendid panoramic view of the American Lumber Mill, at Albuquerque, N. M. This is the largest lumber mill in the world and the scenes showing the different processes through which the wood is put are intensely interesting. This especially worth-while split reel is to be released on Saturday, April 27.

Marion Heights, Pa.—Antonio Vichacki has opened a moving picture show.

Mt. Pleasant, Ia.—D. Morony has leased the Auditorium to J. D. King for moving picture shows.

Muscatine, Ia.—Flaegle and Spelman, of Fairfield, have purchased the Family Theatre.

SCENE FROM "CRY OF CHILDREN"
Thanhouser Release.

"JESS" FOLLOWS "CRY OF CHILDREN"

Bang! Bang! One after another! Thanhouser gives "Cry of Children" on Tuesday, April 30th, and now they push over an announcement of "Jess," by H. Rider Haggard, for Tuesday, May 28th. Three-sheets for "Cry of the Children" are going fast at the Independent exchanges, also the two varieties of one-sheets. Prices of booklets are supplied by Thanhouser Company on request. Exhibitors, in their advertising, are advised to use the words of Theodore Roosevelt on "cry of the children" to this effect:

"When I plead the cause of the overworked girl in a factory, of the stunted child toiling at inhuman labor, of all who work excessively long hours, or in unhealthy surroundings, of the family dwelling in the squalor of a noisome tenement; when I protest against the unfair profit of unscrupulous and conscienceless men or against the greedy exploitations of the helpless by the beneficiary of privilege, I am not only fighting for the weak, I am fighting also for the strong."

"THE MYTH OF JAMASHA PASS"
(American Film Mfg. Co.)

The American Film Co. will release on Thursday, May 9, one of the most unique subjects it has ever issued. The title of the picture is "The Myth of Jamasha Pass." The tale itself is of a mystical character, and the general trend of the story is explained by the first sub-title which reads: "In the gloomy depths of the Sierras, superstitious old men were wont to tell of the mystical maid who lived in the Pass of Jamasha." This mystical maid, so the story goes, "oft appeared at sundown seeking the souls of men."

Miss Von Trump, the clever ingenue who has been making good in American pictures for the past four months, plays the leading role, which is most difficult of interpretation, but to whose histrionic requirements Miss Von Trump has proved herself quite equal.

OUR LONDON LETTER

London, April 2, 1912.

Producers, buyers and exhibitors alike are anticipating a very busy time this Easter. Three days only now remain before the holiday commences, and all picturedom will be hustling to catch the merry-makers. The great coal strike has not yet reached a settlement and the disastrous consequences are now being felt on every hand. Transportation, of course, is stagnated, and the great industrial concerns are at a standstill. The film business is not exempt from this serious state of paralysis, and the approaching holiday brings with it a widespread feeling of depression. The Easter trade will, of course, be materially affected, and general disappointment is occasioned by the threatening delay in the transport of films. At the time of writing, however, the situation appears perhaps a little more hopeful; the country is now demanding an immediate truce between the conflicting parties, and miners are rapidly returning to their work.

At the commencement of the strike those theatres that were fortunately situated in the affected areas did record business. Almost every picture hall was crowded with the idle miners. But now the inevitable reaction has set in; money is spent, and business has suffered an alarming slump.

A decrease in the usual amount of visitors to London this Easter is certain, but we can only hope that within a few weeks the checked tide of patronage will once again flow and matters will be adjusted.

The representative organ of the film trade in London —The Bioscope—publishes an interesting account of an interview with Mr. Israel Zangwill, the great novelist and dramatist. In my last article under "Side Lights on the Cinematograph," I made passing reference to the opinions expressed by Mr. Zangwill as to the relation between the photoplay and the "legitimate" drama.

In the course of the interview with The Bioscope representative, Mr. Zangwill said: "It seems to me that the bioscope should certainly be used in every school in the country. I think there is little doubt that it will eventually revolutionize the teaching of such subjects as History, Geography and Natural Science. The child will be fed with experience in place of words; it will be given realism in place of abstractions; and in brief, lessons will be changed from a torture to a treat. The cinematograph will pluck out knowledge from the dead matter of the text-book and set it flamingly alive before the pupil's eyes!"

Now, this is very high praise from such a source and is from the lips of one perhaps who is more able to give a really true criticism than any other man in the country.

The great Easter attraction is undoubtedly to be Selig's "Christopher Columbus." The publicity given to this film in this city is certainly excellent, as is also the subject matter. The owners of the exclusive rights for Great Britain—the New Century Film Service—have prepared a manual of instructions, which deals in the most comprehensive manner with the question of showing the film with choral, orchestral and stage effects, in the most economic way. This helpful little brochure is supplied free to all exhibitors showing the film.

WASHINGTON (D. C.) LETTER

The Animated Weekly has become exceedingly popular. It is a weekly visitor on the day of release at the Empress and on such occasions brings additional visitors to this playhouse. Manager Notes, who was the first to show this motion newspaper, is always on the lookout for the topnotch of progress. Certainly the display of French fashions by the Gaumont Company is more artistic and less stilted than in the Pathé Weekly, which has a decidedly "show room" atmosphere. The Independents and their patrons welcome this reel of the world's news.

* * * *

The local operators of the motion picture houses recently paid a visit to Baltimore where they were entertained by the operators of that city. Shortly the compliment will be returned by a smoker offered by the Washington operators to their Baltimore co-workers. When this happens this will be an event worth talking about, so the boys say.

* * * *

Owing to the popularity of motion pictures, it is remarkable to note the various organizations that are using projection machines, with slides or reels, for entertainment, teaching, or the furtherance of the object of the society. Those interested in the suffragette movement are being kept informed by exhibitions in private houses. The Christ Child Society entertains some of our alien residents with pictures of Biblical teaching, accompanied by appropriate remarks. The promoters of the movement for the prevention of child labor are effectually fostering their cause by the use of the reel and slides. The events of the age in science, engineering, geography, etc., are being thrown upon the screen by several societies in the Capital City. One of the most recent of these was the stupendous work of the Panama Canal. Owing to the strict fire regulations here, asbestos booths are readily procurable for the use of motion pictures. The free lectures and exhibition of pictures which take place weekly on Saturday morning at the Pastime have become exceedingly popular. While primarily for school children, these exhibitions are sought by grown folks as well. The recent lecture at this theatre by E. P. Cowell, of the Bureau of Mines, on "Accidents in Mines and How Many of Them May Be Avoided" was exceptionally interesting.

* * * *

The recent event in Washington of the arrival of the remains from the Maine, the cortège of caissons along Pennsylvania avenue, the address of President Taft and others at the State, War and Navy Department Building, the naval escort of these remains to Arlington Cemetery, and the final burial, was the cause of many motion picture cameras being focused along the line of march. As usual, there were some disasters, schemes and competition. One man hired a naphtha launch on the Potomac, placed his camera on its roof, and secured an excellent view of the ceremony in the Navy Yard, which he had no permit to enter for picture-making. Good views of the latter part of the procession and the burial were hindered by the rain. Even to Washingtonians this event will find interest when thrown upon the screen.

* * * *

Mr. Marinette, of the Washington Film Exchange, has accepted the position as manager of the Consolidated Film Company at Atlanta, Ga. He has the good wishes of his many friends in Washington in his new undertaking. Mr. William Mack is again in the city, now associated with Manager Lucas, of the Washington Film Exchange. Mr. Mack was formerly closely connected with the Moore Film Exchange when Tom Moore was in the exchange business, and lately he has been in Wilkes-Barre, Pa. From his experience in watching the development of the motion picture industry in this particular district, Mr. Mack is a valuable acquisition to the Washington office of the Independents.

The following, an editorial appearing in the Washington Star, the most conservative paper of the city, will bear reprinting:

Real and Imitation Motion Pictures

There is a peculiar and perhaps a subtle difference between the use of motion pictures for entertainment purposes in the depiction of obvious and unmistakable fiction and the purported reproduction of an actual happening such as that attempted in the case of the Hillsville tragedy. Also, there is a difference between the reproduction of an actual event photographed by this process from the event itself and a fictitious representation of the happening.

Thus in one case there can be no especial objection to the rendering on a biographic screen of a lively "Western" photoplay, apart from the question of taste, but a very decided objection to a pretended presentation of a fact. The Hillsville tragedy has become history, and if by chance a photographic machine had been on the ground and used successfully, the film would probably have had an immense value, not merely for entertainment purposes, but as evidence.

The other day motion pictures were taken of the burial of the Maine off the coast of Cuba, and these films have a certain high intrinsic value. But any suggestion of "faking" about them would ruin them even for entertainment purposes. The whole motion picture business depends for its success upon good faith in this matter of the representation of actual occurrences, and it is to the credit of the public intelligence that the patrons of the nickel theatres resent attempts to foist imitations upon them.

The Majestic, recently opened by Tom Moore, uses motion pictures in connection with its vaudeville acts. During the hours from 5 to 7 o'clock in the evening, an all-picture show is scheduled, which has become quite popular. Realizing that the moving pictures have lowered the price of public entertainment, Mr. Moore is offering an exceptional vaudeville show for five cents for matinees and ten cents at night. Theatrical men told him it would be a losing business, but Manager Moore has demonstrated even in a few weeks that it can be a financial success. The Moore Amusement Company operates several picture houses in Washington, and it is well realized that the organization is not desirous of working or losing for the fun of it.

The Maryland has been using a number of big historical subjects recently with increase in door receipts. The posting of the musical program outside the Maryland has proved an attraction. Manager Noonan is always on the outlook for something different from his competitors on Ninth street.

* * * *

Much regret has been expressed in Washington in moving picture circles at the sudden death of J. P. Chalmers, editor of the Moving Picture World. Many of the exhibitors here knew him personally, while all acknowledge what an assistance and source of information the Moving Picture World has been to this industry and the public as well.

Manager Airey, of the Alhambra, has changed from the licensed to the independent service.

NOVELTY FILM EXCHANGE DOING BIG BUSINESS

The Novelty Film Exchange, of which C. B. Purdy is manager, since moving into their new quarters at 32 Union square, New York, have been doing a wonderful business, exhibitors all over the country being attracted by their offer of twelve reels a week of first-class film for $12. Their film is of A1 quality and in many cases is practically new.

They are also handling new and second-hand machines, and will make a specialty of equipping open-air theatres at moderate prices. Their present quarters, although new, will be enlarged shortly to take care of the increasing business.

THE HORSE THIEVES OF BAR X RANCH
Champion Release, April 29

Out on the Bar X, the boys were seated one day near the corral when long Harry came on the scene. They made fun of him, led on by hurly Jim, the domineering foreman of the ranch, but Harry wasn't the sort to stand too much nonsense, so he gave the foreman a clout over the ear that sent him to grass. What might have happened then and there, there's no telling, had not the proprietor and his daughter Bess just then arrived and put a stop to further proceedings—Harry being engaged to punch cattle, that being his calling.

Now Burly Jim swore to get even and with a few of the boys he set about his dirty work in a systematic manner. First he stole Harry's hat from his bunk house and placed it near the stable; next he stole a couple of horses from the same stable and tethered them in the woods. He then arranged to have himself tied hand and foot in the stable so that he could claim that Harry had done the deed, and he, Jim, would be evidence of the fact. Before this he had drawn the ranch-owner's attention to Harry's hat at the barn door; just before the discovery had been made of the horse-theft. This made it look bad for Harry.

Now everything would have worked out fine had not Harry overheard part of the plot. He had then laid in wait at the barn and seen the fake arrangements made to entrap him. In the meantime he had caught and located the spot where the horses were tied which were supposed to be stolen. Now when the time came to make the charge Jim's pals worked out the game according to schedule and Jim was brought forth. But somehow Jim's bold statement went for naught. The trick was laid bare, the horses recovered and the whole plot to ruin Harry frustrated.

Harry's lovemaking with Bess and her acceptance of him is a pretty part of the story that is beautifully interwoven. The repulse of Jim in his attempt at lovemaking is also well worked out in the story. It is a Western story of lively action.

AN ITALIAN ROMANCE
Champion Release, May 1

Marianina is a daughter of Sunny Italy, living with her old father, a shoemaker in the Italian colony. We see the old shoemaker pegging away at his shoes down in the cellar basement. A letter comes to Marianina from her lover in Italy, pleading to be sent for and protesting to her his undying devotion. She gets the money from her father and sends for her lover. In the meantime Giussepi, a foreman in a sweat-shop, falls in love with the girl and desires to marry her; but while she appreciates his devotion, she is loyal to her sweetheart, Gamholio, in the far-away Southern clime.

Gamholio arrives in America, but when six months have scarcely gone by he proves himself a perfidious wretch to the girl who has been so loyal to him; flirting shamelessly with other signorinas. Marianina discovers this and vents her righteous wrath upon him. Then she casts him from her as she would a viper, and accepts the better man, the foreman Giussepi. A year later, Gambolio shows himself to be the unconscionable scoundrel that he is. He tries to renew for himself the infatuation Marianina once felt for him. But she is a true wife and a noble woman and scornfully repulses the fellow's advances.

The scoundrel foiled, swears vengeance on her devoted head. He steals her photograph and later boasts a conquest of the woman in the teeth of her husband. The lie is given the wretch with a dash of wine in the face—an immediate duello is here prevented by friends of both parties, but is later arranged for. At Giussepi's home his faithful wife is made to suffer the agony of wrongful accusation on the part of her husband, but overhearing the arrangements, she decides a plan to prove her love for Giussepi.

Drugging his wine, she dresses in his clothes and betakes herself to the field of honor, and there she fights a fierce battle with her traducer. The latter is wounded dangerously, just as Giussepi, who has recovered from the stupor, rushes on the field, and realizing everything in its true light, hugs Marianina to his breast.

TOMMY BECOMES TOREADOR
Gaumont Release, May 23

Tommy the ambitious butcher-boy has been spending a most busy life but an advertisement of a pretty young girl desiring to marry a toreador, in order to inherit her uncle's huge sums, left her provided she marry a bull-fighter, quite makes further drudgery impossible. He forthwith pretends to be a noted bull-fighter, wins the girl's consent to marriage and accepts the generous hospitality of her relatives who give a large banquet in honor of the engaged couple. During the festivities, Tommy is asked to pantomine some of his arenic strokes, during which demonstration he accidentally whirls up against a stranger at one of the other café tables. The stranger resents the accident, and asks Tommy where he learned bull-fighting, at the same time presenting his card, which at once discloses him the noted local bull-fighter. A match in which both are to exhibit their skill is arranged. Tommy enters the arena with shaking knees, is tossed most brutally by the bull. Of course, he is discovered as a faker, loses his fiancée, who marries the real toreador, while Tommy is forced to continue working as a butcher-boy and even forced to deliver meat to the home of the young toreador and his rich wife.

THE SHADE OF AUTUMN
Gaumont Release, May 19

Innocent little baby of five summers that he is, Bobby believes the literal meaning of the doctor's words to his father when he says "She (Bobby's mother) will die with the last of the falling leaves." The words pall the sweet little youngster, and vigorously does he resent the sure approach of the end of autumn. While tenderly nursing his mother, Bobby ventures a peep into the garden and sees to his horror, the golden brown and red tints on the stiff dry leaves, now rapidly falling and robbing the trees of all their foliage. He thinks of the doctor's warning and hurries to the thicket to pick up the leaves as they fall, fancying that by keeping them off the ground, his mother has a much greater chance for life. But alas, little Bobby finds the task impossible and with a cry of despair rushes back to the bedside of his dear mother only to find her dead.

Imp Release, April 29

Antonio Morso is a struggling artist in Rome, devoted to his attractive young wife and baby. He cannot dispose of his picture, however, and as the story opens, there is no food in the house. His wife, receiving attentions from the famous artist, Pietro Novetti, becomes discontented, and as her husband leaves to make another effort to dispose of his work, receives the more prosperous painter, who makes passionate love to her, and tempts her to desert her husband. In a weak moment she succumbs and leaves her husband and baby.

Tony is successful in obtaining a pittance for his paintings and starts home happily with a few purchases. He finds his wife gone, and a note from her, in which she tells him she loves Pietro. The poor artist breaks down over his baby's crib, and then the vengeance in his nature asserts itself and he decides to bide his time.

He leaves for America, where he hopes to find a greater measure of success, and for five years struggles against misfortune, with little or no progress. One day as he is painting in the Art Museum, he is brought face to face with a new picture entitled "Despair," which has been presented to the Museum by a wealthy society woman. In the model he recognizes his wife, and in the artist the man who has broken his life. He learns that the artist will shortly come to America and in a moment of frenzy he takes his palette knife and cuts the picture from the frame.

A great reception is arranged for the Italian painter, Pietro Novetti, and he is feted at Miss Caldwell's home. The unhappy Tony send his little daughter with a note to Pietro, telling him to follow her, and he will find "Despair," the picture, whose theft has aroused the police forces of the world. Novetti follows the child, refusing the company of the other guests. They, however, rush in automobiles to police headquarters where they secure the assistance of detectives and police.

Meantime, Pietro arrives with little Angelica, at Tony's home. In a dark corner is "Despair," carefully curtained from curious eyes. Tony faces Pietro after sending the little girl into the next room, where she seats herself at her small easel, and, oblivious to what is to follow, paints her little picture. Tony throws aside the curtains and reveals the picture to Pietro. He, of course, recognizes Tony as the man he has wronged and tries to make his escape. The door is locked, however, and the moment of the unhappy artist's revenge is here. Tony seizes Pietro by the throat, and overpowering him, is about to stab him, when little Angelica rushes into the room and prevents the act. Just then the door is broken open by the police, who arrest Tony.

Pietro is seized with remorse, and to free the man whose heart he has broken, pronounces this picture "a miserable copy." The police then leave the two men alone, and the prosperous artist hands Tony a letter from his wife, Angelica, in which she writes, "You may well picture me as Despair. I have only loved one man, and I dare not return to him. This is the end." He offers his hand to the sobbing, broken-hearted Tony, but the latter refuses it, and is left alone with the one tie that binds him to life, little Angelica.

ALL FOR HER
Imp Release, May 2

Old Tom and old Will are Cronies, into whose lives a little child comes, attracted by the beautiful music of their violin and 'cello.

Little Elaine sells newspapers for an old hag with whom she lives. She treats her cruelly, driving the child out into the street because she does not bring her in sufficient money. Wandering about in the cold Elaine hears the strains of the old men's music, and following the sound enters their room, where she stands fascinated. The old men decide instantly to adopt her. They pay a visit to old Mother Lawton, who for a sum of money releases all claim on the little girl.

Years pass, the child has grown into a woman and is a great violinist. On the tenth anniversary of their meeting, after her triumphant appearance at a concert, she invites them to a dinner at a famous restaurant. The two old men are charmed with the idea and don their best clothes of fifty years ago, thinking to honor their child, but instead they imagine they humiliate her. They think they are only a burden, standing in the way of her progress, so they decide to pass from her life.

Fortune smiles on Elaine, but frowns upon old Tom and Will. Elaine marries happily and is the musical sensation of her time. Poverty overtakes the two old gentlemen and finally proves fatal to Will.

One day Tom is playing his 'cello on the street, trying to earn a few pennies, and unknowingly plays before the home of Elaine. She at once recognizes the touch of her old benefactor and rushes into the street. He is dazed at the meeting and gladly allows her to lead him into the warm firelight of her pretty home.

Just as he and old Will cared for her in the long ago, so she and her husband do for him now and the picture closes with the old gentleman fondling their baby.

This picture is out of the ordinary, being artistic in every detail. It is pathetic and will be welcomed by all who appreciate the really artistic in the picture-play.

MELODRAMA OF YESTERDAY
Imp Release, May 4

The process of evolution applied to the motion picture, in the opinion of those best qualified to judge, is the chasing of characters of conventionality off the stage.

In this film those gifted artists, Harry Pollard, Edward Lyons and Margarita Fischer are helping to bring it about.

The story is that of a burlesque on old-time melodrama. Mr. Pollard, as the villain, demands payment of a mortgage upon the house which shelters the persecuted heroine and her poor but honest parents. The machinations of the villain are defeated by the hero, who providentially discovers a large sum of money which he digs up in a field, and arriving in the nick of time is instrumental in saving the old home and winning the girl.

This is the thread of the story interwoven in which are many screamingly funny incidents, such as the attempted abduction of the heroine; the flight of the would-be-abductors; the introduction of a philosophic policeman and other "funniosities" which will no doubt raise smiles from the moving picture patrons.

mediately that is his reason for casting her off. Before they part, she vows a breach of promise suit will be started against him.

A few days later while walking on the street Michael hearing a newsboy crying "Extra," purchases one and sees that he is being sued by Miss Snodgrass for $50,000. Looking up he sees Lizzie and a constable approaching him to serve the papers. Just here there is an exciting chase between the distracted man and Lizzie and the constable. Finally, he is caught and has no alternative but to accept the papers.

Shortly afterwards his lawyers notify him that they have discovered that he is not the right Michael Thomson, and, therefore, the money is not his. Rather than face poverty again, he calls on Lizzie and pleads to renew the engagement. After much coaxing the lady consents and they go forth to find a minister.

While Michael enters a house to inquire if the reverend gentleman can perform the ceremony, Lizzie waiting for him, buys a paper, and is horrified to learn that her husband-soon-to-be is penniless. She then realizes why he returned to her. Upon emerging from the house the jubilant man is confronted by the angry woman, who denounces him bitterly and jumping into the carriage, drives off, leaving Michael tearing his hair and railing at fate.

THE CRY OF THE CHILDREN—PART I

Thanhouser Release, April 30

"Do you hear the children weeping, O my brothers, Ere the sorrow comes with years?" asks Mrs. Elizabeth Barrett Browning in her wonderful poem, which is a denunciation of child labor that will never be forgotten. And in it she tells of one little girl who died and whose tiny fellow laborers accompanied her body to the grave. They did not weep, for they loved her, for, as the poem tells, their one thought was "From the sleep wherein she lieth, none will wake her, crying, "Get up, little Alice, it is day.'"

Little Alice, more fortunate than some of the others, was not always a child slave. She was the youngest of three children, and the pet. Wages were small, but her parents and her brother and sister found it possible to feed an extra mouth, although the margin between income and expenses was pitifully scanty. So little Alice, for a time, was a happy child, and not a tiny old woman as were the other little girls in the manufacturing town.

The wife of the owner of the mill was a selfish, dissatisfied woman, who seemed to have everything but really had nothing. Driving out in her auto one day, she saw little Alice, and immediately was struck with the youth and beauty of the pretty child. A creature of impulse, she decided she wanted Alice for her own, and summoning the parents told them of the good fortune in store for them.

Much to the rich woman's surprise, they did not see it as she did. They did not want to give up the child, and said so. The mother, however, thought of the advantages that Alice would have if she accepted the offer. With true self-sacrificing mother love, she told little Alice that she could go to the home where riches awaited her, but that the decision rested entirely with her.

The child looked from the "pretty lady" to the homely, poorly dressed woman and the man and the two tattered children awaited her decision with breathless interest. On the one side was a home, certainly with plenty of money and perhaps where love also could be found. Poverty was on the other side, poverty without hope, but she knew that love was there and could never be driven away. Her choice was made, and she threw herself into her mother's arms.

The "pretty lady" watched the happy, shabby group through her lorgnette, then muttering "It is useless to try to do anything for the poor," she entered her auto and was driven back to her beautiful home, where love and self-sacrifice did not abide.

THE CRY OF THE CHILDREN—PART II

Thanhouser Release, April 30

Little Alice was an odd figure in the grimy town she called home, because, unlike the other children, she did not work in the mill. Her father, mother, brother and sister worked there many weary hours a day, and made many sacrifices so that "Baby Alice" might remain a child and d d not become an old woman before she was in her "teens." The wife of the rich mill owner had seen Alice, been struck by her appearance, and offered to adopt her, but although the parents were willing to give her up, for her own good, she delighted their hearts by declining to do so.

Later trouble came to the family, and to many others in the town. Wages in the mill were reduced, and the workers struck. It was a strike of desperation. The workers had no money, no helping hand was extended to them, and what the mill owner had predicted to them came to pass. They were starved out, and crept back to their old places at his terms, and were worse off than they had been before.

The strike made a great change in the future of little Alice. Her mother was frail, and the period of semi-starvation through which she had passed, weakened her the more. She tried to go back to work, but was unable to do so. So little Alice insisted on being a wage-earner, and her parents could not forbid it, as the money was sadly needed and every penny counted.

In her new environment little Alice speedily lost her freshness and beauty, for as the poem says, "Well may the children weep before you, they are weary as they run; they have never seen the sunshine nor the glory which is brighter than the sun." So day by day the child faded away, becoming old and haggard before her time.

The mother of Alice was also growing weaker, and the child knew that only money and rest could restore her. So her thoughts turned to the "pretty lady" who wanted to adopt her, and she decided for her mother's sake to accept the offer; but the "pretty lady" scornfully turned her away, telling Alice that she was old and ugly now, and that no one would want her. Also she had a pet, a poodle dog, that held the chief place in her affections.

Little Alice returned to the factory, and lived out her brief life there. She was stricken while at work, and died there. The other children did not grieve, they envied her, but the "pretty lady" who met the mourners returning from the funeral, shuddered, and was serious and thoughtful for once in her butterfly life.

Perhaps the last two lines of the poem described her feelings,

For the child's sob in the silence, curses deeper Than the strong man in his wrath."

This is the story of little Alice. Many believe that it was fortunate for her that she died while a child in years, even though she was a woman in sorrow.

Attacked by a Lion!!

Ask any of the Western Exchangemen who have had the good fortune of seeing this graphic feature what they think of it. You can't afford to miss the most remarkable film of the century. A lion attacks a horse only to be shot by its rider in the act of springing. All we ask you to do is to treat your exhibitor with the best, most sensational and remarkable reel feature ever offered. EVEN OUT-GAUMONTED THE ORDINARY GAUMONT STANDARD ON THIS FEATURE.

Therefore it made him unhappy to receive invitations galore, flowers and mash notes. Also to find reporters and photographers lurking on his front doorstep at all hours of the day or night. Under the circumstances he decided to take refuge in flight, and sought seclusion in a seashore hotel, where he modestly registered as "John Jones of Bayonne, N. J."

For a time he found that he was unknown, but then exposure came. A woman, once young, unmasked him, but consented to keep his secret at his earnest request. Under the circumstances he could not refuse to be polite to her, and she was his companion on many trips when he would have preferred to have been alone.

On one of these excursions they were unfortunate enough to be on an island and did not notice the rising tide until it was too late to return to the mainland. The woman wept, but really did not mind. Her name was Arabella Snaith and she would have preferred to change it to Mrs. Harold Hargreaves. Consequently when they had returned to safety she informed the unhappy man that she had been put in a false position and that only marriage could set her right in the eyes of the world.

Hardly knowing what he was doing, he consented, but later regretted it. She had told him that only death could part them, so he decided to die—but only so far as she was concerned. There was a mock funeral, and the author, in disguise, acted as his own minister. Then to his horror, he found that the fickle Arabella Snaith had transferred her affections to him in his new incarnation.

He began to fear that Arabella would annex him after all, but being a resourceful man, as all good novelists must be, he decided to hire a substitute. His choice fell upon a friend who was hard up, and ready to do anything for money, as he frequently boasted. The author gave him a chance to make good, the hardest test he could think of, but the friend "made good."

Arabella Snaith changed her name, but she is not Mrs. Hargreaves. She is the wife of his friend, and the friend was happy for a time, as Harold gave him a big sum of money for a wedding present. For the beautiful curved lines of the yellow-backed bills made him forget the lack of curves which were marked in the case of the once, perhaps, fair Arabella.

THE REFORMATION OF MARY

Solax Release, May 1

Mary Brammal, a female crook, is discharged from prison. Soon after, when she is at the end of her resources, and starving in New York, she encounters Frances Van Brunt, the six-year-old daughter of Cashier Van Brunt, of the first National Bank. Mary is being roughly moved on by a policeman, when Frances interferes and then gives poor Mary some money.

Later Mary meets some of her old pals, and as they are forming to plan to rob a bank, they induce Mary to take part and go back to her former life. She disguises herself as a boy and secures a position in a bank as a messenger. The bank is installing a new vault, equipped with a new time lock, and Mary listens while the workman is explaining to Van Brunt and Harding, the president of the bank. When their backs are turned, she moves the time lock so that it will open the vault at ten that night, as well as ten the next morning, and then conceals herself beneath the counter.

The valut opens and Mary removes the currency to a suit case. She then closes the vault and leaves by a window.

The next morning the vault is found to be empty when it is opened, and it is then discovered that the time lock his been set twice. The president suspects Van Brunt, and that evening goes with a detective to Van Brunt's home and arrests him. Frances is grief-stricken at her father being taken away, and follows the men to the street, crying bitterly. Mary is passing at the time, recognizes Frances, and inquires the cause of the trouble. Frances explains. Mary's better nature triumphs after a struggle, and she stops the arrest, explaining that she has the money in the suit case, and that she is the thief. The party who hears the whole story and Van Brunt prevails upon Harding to forego prosecution. Mary then seeks refuge in a convent.

A QUESTION OF HAIR

Solax Release, May 3

May, the cobbler's daughter, has beautiful blonde hair and plenty of it. Her father's youthful apprentice is in love with her hair. They become engaged. Billy, who has a weakness for hair, is ensnared in the wiles of another charmer who wears a great deal of store hair. He wonders why May does not fix her hair as prettily as Madge does. Madge is an artful young lady and soon has Billy tagging after her. Her hairdresser, however, gets after Madge for the hair goods she has not paid for. Madge refuses to pay because the hair dresser has turned her hair green. The case is brought into court, and by a remarkable coincidence, Billy is summoned to serve on the jury. The judge orders Madge to prove her assertion that the hairdresser had turned her hair green. She pulls off all her false hair to show him, and Billy learns a few things about girls and hair that sends him back to May, ready and willing to eat his humble pie.

ATTACKED BY A LION

Gaumont Release, May 16

In the lone vast deserts of Morocco, with his nearest neighbor more than thirty miles away, a contented hermit is passing his life. His house is fairly well concealed from the bands of marauding Arabs who traverse this desolate waste, so that he does not deem it necessary to have any connection with this neighbor, so distant, except by telephone.

One night, however, a group of Arabs discovered his hut and by means of stealth tried to gain admission for the purpose of pilfering his house and killing him. Their plan, however, is frustrated when the hermit sees them in their approach and opens fire. By virtue of his position the latter is able to withstand the enemy, despite their number. With rifle in one hand, he resorts to his telephone and attempts to notify his neighbor of his peril. The Arabs discover this means of communication with outside assistance and one of the best shots of their number directs his aim at the telephone wire with the result that he cuts it in two. Part of the message, however, has already been received by the friend over thirty miles away, and the hermit hopes, almost against reason, that his situation has been made clear.

The friend on the other end has understood the whole matter. He realizes how dangerous and short lived must be his efforts in keeping so large an enemy at bay. Without delay he mounts his swiftest and surest steed and heads for the scene of action.

On the way, however, a terrible sand storm blows up and the journey is of course impeded. Such is the delay that night even falls and once again is assistance delayed. Little did the benefactor who had pledged himself so willingly to the rescue of the hermit realize the dangers of his undertaking. While asleep, however, with his horse cautiously picketed near him, he is suddenly disturbed by the roar of the savage lion. He jumps up in dismay only to recognize one of these monstrous beasts about to spring at his horse. He grabs his rifle and without having time to aim makes a sure shot and kills the lion in the very act of pouncing on his faithful beast. After encountering several similar desert terrors the horseman finally succeeds in reaching the vicinity of his friend besieged by the Arabs. He makes his appearance in the very nick of time as the bold marauders had by their craftiness and endurance completely worn out the lonely hermit. His powder and ammunition was entirely exhausted. His water supply was also gone. Not one bit of food was left. There was nothing for him to do but surrender. The presence of the friend, however, turned the tables. The Arabs, fearing a large rescue party had come, were dismayed and were driven in confusion to the outskirts of the desert.

The two friends then sat down to recount to each other the details of their respective perils. Both had exciting stories to tell.

LOTTERY TICKET NO. 13
Nestor Release, April 22

NESTOR

The boys in Kenyon's office receive a numher of lottery tickets, which are placed in a hat; then each man draws for his number. No. 13 falls to Ben Capewell. He puts the ticket in a drawer in his desk and thinks no more of it. There is something more important on his mind. Ben is in love with Florence Smith, a pretty nurse. He calls on her, proposes, and is accepted. From then on, Ben works night and day in order to save up money enough to huy a little home for his bride-to-be. At the end of six months his health is gone and he is unahle to work. Florence breaks the engagement, her love heing of the shallow kind. She returns the ring and poor Ben's pleadings are in vain.

Following the instructions of his family doctor, Ben goes into the country to work on a farm and hires out to one James Karker. Slowly he regains his health and eventually finds himself deeply in love with Ione, the farmer's daughter. They become engaged. Some time later Ben receives a letter appraising him that lottery ticket No. 13 had won one of the grand prizes and he returns to the city for a few day.

Following Ben's departure, Ione is taken ill. A nurse is sent for. The nurse turns out to he Florence, Ben's old sweetheart. Florence finds Ben's picture, also the letter telling of his good fortune and the money he will receive. Perhaps Ben loves her yet. She will try to win him at all costs now that he has money. On the day of Ben's return to the Karker home, Florence gets Ione out of the way and is all alone when he comes. Ben lets Florence think he still loves her, and as she holds out her finger to receive the ring, Ben squares up the account. Ione gets the ring and a loving husband with a nice hank account on Lottery Ticket No. 13.

THE LITTLE NUGGET
Nestor Release, April 24

John, a miner, and Mary, his wife, are happily married. Their home is brightened by a pretty tot of five years, whom they call their "Little Nugget." Lewis, an old admirer of Mary, and Joe, another miner, call for John on their way to work. Lewis makes an excuse to return to the cahin, where he is severely repulsed by Mary. Later, however, when all work is suspended at the mines where the three men are employed, Lewis and Joe set out for a prospecting trip in the mountains, and Lewis insists upon John taking his money and putting it in John's strong iron chest. Mary objects, hut to no avail.

Two months pass. The beloved child is dangerously ill and the family on the verge of starvation. John wishes to take some of Lewis' money but Mary pleads earnestly with him not to touch that man's gold, hut get it elsewhere. John, at last agrees, secretly planning to steal the money that night to provide for his wife and sick child. Going into the hedroom, he takes the cartridges from the revolver which Mary has in the drawer, and, taking his rolled hlankets, tells her he will return the next day, and goes out to wait until night.

By night the child is better, thanks to the prompt action of the doctor, but John returns masked and attempts to open the door. Mary hears him as she sits by the child's bed, and getting the revolver, discovers it is unloaded. She promptly loads it and gains the room in which the iron chest is kept, just as John starts for the door with the money. Mary fires and faints, but John runs out unhurt. As he hesitates whether to go to his wife or hurry away before she discovers him, Lewis and Joe, who returned that afternoon after a lucky strike and were spending the evening with their friends, hear the shot and run to the cabin, capture John, and tear the mask from his face. They are dumbfounded to discover their friend.

John explains the situation to them in broken accents, and then they hasten inside to revive Mary. As John is about to tell her the truth, Lewis hastily stops him, saying, "The thief escaped, but we got the money." Then, going into the next room, Lewis puts the bag of gold on the table with a note "For Baby Nugget," and hastens away to work his claim back in the mountains.

THREE OF A KIND
Nestor Release, April 27

The town of Glendale is stirred one day by the advent of Alice Reynolds, a very pretty young lady. The village boys lounging about the station sit up and take notice when she alights from the train, and all try to flirt with her but she does not flirt. The next day she is searching about the station and, when questioned by the station agent, tells him of the loss of a ten-dollar bill, the corner of which was slightly torn. The station agent acquaints the boys of her loss and they all aid in the hunt, but to no avail. She leaves weeping and the boys' hearts are touched.

Bud Hoover, one of the boys, hits upon a scheme to try to get into the good graces of the young lady and thus beat his pals. He takes a ten-dollar bill, tears the corner of it, calls upon Alice and gives her the money, claiming to have found it. She thanks him and gives him a flower as a reward.

Bud's success sets the boys a-thinking. He is no sooner gone than Silas Gray hits upon the same plan and gives Alice a ten-dollar bill with a torn corner, telling her he had found the money. Still another boy, Cy Smith, thinks the same brilliant plan and he, too, gets a flower.

Bud proudly tells the station agent of his luck. Silas comes next and Cy brings in the rear. They all have the same tale to tell. When notes are compared, they realize that they have been stung, and start for the hotel as Alice leaves with suitcase, steps into the station bus, and tells driver she must catch the 2 p.m. train. The bus passes the boys on its way to the train, but they are not aware it contains the girl. At the hotel, the clerk informs them she has gone. They dash out and make a bee-line for the depot. The girl sees them coming and with a laugh, steps on the now moving train. The boys chase it but all they catch is the note she throws to them, reading thus: "Be good philosophers, boys. Be glad it wasn't twenty."

AMERICAN LUMBER MILL
Albuquerque, N. M.

In this film is shown operations at the largest lumber mill in the world, with a capacity of 300,000 feet of lumber per day; a panoramic view of the pond where the logs, which average 30 inches in diameter, are unloaded from the cars and stored until needed, from whence they are poled to the flume and floated to the log-jack, which automatically picks them up, carrying them to the cutting frame, where they are sawed into planks of various dimensions, thence to the sorting table which sorts the different sizes preparatory to being conveyed to the immense yards for piling, where 23,000,000 feet of white pine lumber, valued at $500,000, is stored in piles.

The creosoting of railroad ties is also shown, a process which increases the life and usefulness of the ties to fifty years, whereas, without this treatment, which is accomplished under a pressure of 175 pounds per square inch for six hours in massive sealed steel tubes, the average life would be but five years. The capacity of this plant is 1,000,000 ties per year.

HER WEDDING DRESS
American Release, May 6

The crowd swarmed out of the little Baptist church. Miss Betty Bartlett, just turned thirty-eight, hesitated, glanced timidly around among her friends, and seeing the slightly stooped form of Bob Plummer joining the throng at the foot of the step, swung hastily in the opposite direction.

Arrived at her pretty cottage, Betty stopped. She looked longingly down the shaded avenue, glanced with a sigh at the finger that had borne an engagement ring for ten long years. A vision came—a vision of herself and Bob Plummer ten years ago when he had placed that ring with a kiss on the third finger of the left hand, promising that when he had saved enough he would claim her. But, while the memory lingered in Bob's heart, the long expected ship never arrived.

There were wild scenes at the post-office the following day. Old Zeb Winters eyed with much curiosity the long, white envelope that bore the name of a prominent legal firm in the far East. He had it—"Miss Betty's an heiress" The news spread. Little Miss Williams, waving the envelope above her head, proclaimed the fact broadcast. Bob Plummer listened with wonder.

Miss Williams told the glad news. She was followed shortly by Zeb Winters, who soon found an opportunity to declare his matrimonial aspirations. The first visitors in ten years pleased and delighted Miss Betty, but it was not until Bob Plummer, hanging in the outskirts of the little cottage, arrived that she was really happy. And Bob finally proposed.

Two weeks of domestic bliss followed. Then a second envelope arrived from the legal firm. They opened it together. It read, "Thanks for your prompt reply." No mention of an heritage! Bob was dumbfounded and Betty much surprised at his strange actions. When Bob inquired about the inheritance, Betty was even more surprised. She knew nothing of a legacy. Then it suddenly dawned upon her why Bob had married her and why all these recent visitors.

Bob left the house and walked into the garden. When he returned the battle was over. He found a note of farewell from Betty, and hurried into the garden where all accounts were squared.

LEGEND OF SLEEPY HOLLOW
Eclair Release, April 23

Here is the heart-rending narrative of Ichabod Crane, the schoolmaster of Sleepy Hollow, and his strenuous courtship—the quilting bee—the village dance—the bragging of Ichabod and the true love of Katrina and Brown Bones—and finally the merry prank by which Ichabod is pursued by the Headless Horseman—with a pumpkin lantern in his hand. This is one of the most famous tales of our literature and the production, is a worthy representation.

THE EASTER BONNET
Eclair Release, April 25

Dora, a pretty little milliner, longs to own an Easter bonnet for sale in the shop where she works. Agnes Brown, a haughty heiress, buys it, however, and the milliner makes a duplicate, to wear, while the other is sent to the wrong house. She is accused of theft—and it is in the extrication of the poor girl from her troubles by Jack Barlow, a wealthy young lawyer engaged to Agnes, that the romance develops. It is the story of a rich girl who loses her sweetheart by her disdainfuiness and conceit.

MIETTE'S ADVENTURES
Eclair Release, April 28

Pierre, after a long journey, comes back home. In the midst of the rejoicing, Miette alone, a nice young working girl, is bending over her work. Nevertheless, the young man has noticed her, succeeds in attracting her attention, thus giving him a chance to tell her how beautiful she looks. Mme. Duhaime has noticed their actions, and discharges the poor girl.

The days have gone by, Miette has settled in humble lodgings. On the other hand, Pierre wants to see again the young girl; he writes her a letter. The girl comes to the appointed place, and together they traverse the plain, making future plans. An unfortunate accident happens, Pierre falls and hurts himself. Impossible to go back home, he must be carried. Miette brings him back, but remembering the severity of Mme. Duhaime, she dares not go inside.

Many days pass, the doctor cannot cure his patient. The wound on the body is a trifling matter, but there is something more serious. Braving the thundering of Mme. Duhaime, he himself goes to find the young girl, and place her in the arms of Pierre. As long as the doctor has willed it so, the mother cannot object longer, and later consents to their marriage.

On the same reel:

BOYS
Majestic Release, April 28

Doctor Andrews, a dentist, is a widower, who feels that it is not well to live alone. His son John, a lively boy of fourteen, does not share this feeling. The Doctor bestows his attentions on Mrs. Lucy Brown, a widow, who also has a son named John, of the same age and temperament as the Doctor's boy.

The widow sends her boy to the Doctor's office, telling him to call that night, and get his answer, and young Brown purloins a pair of forceps. Furthermore, when Andrews calls, and gets a favorable answer to his suit, the youngster enters, and makes fun of the lovers. But the dentist does not mind this, not knowing what is to come.

After the wedding Andrews takes his bride home, and a pleasant surprise awaits her, in the person of young John Andrews, of whom she knew nothing. The Doctor laughingly says that the two boys will make pleasant companions, and at supper the boys promptly refute this, by getting into a fight, and having to be led to bed. The parents, of course, take the parts of their respective children. A few minutes of peace follow, but when John Andrews is soundly asleep, John Brown pulls one of his teeth, with the purloined forceps, and pandemonium follows. The bride leads her son to her room, the bridegroom leads his son to his room, and so their married life begins.

The next morning the Doctor's boy is so obstreperous that he is given a letter to his school-teacher, which will insure him a whipping. Young Andrews bribes young Brown to deliver the note, and naturally the latter receives the punishment. He returns home, tells his mother, she upbraids her husband, explanations are useless, and she leaves the house, accompanied by her son.

Mrs. Andrews returns to her old home, from which her John goes forth, purchases a bag of candy, and proceeds to forget his troubles. But he is set upon by a number of boys who wish to share his candy, and is in dire straits when John Andrews happens along, and goes to his rescue. Together they vanquish the enemy, and then swear eternal friendship.

The boys now visit the lonely bride, and explain their friendly relations. Thence they go to the lonely bridegroom, with more explanations, and induce him to go to his wife. A reconciliation follows, with great hope for the future, cemented by the new-found loyalty of the boys.

THE SILENT CALL
Majestic Release, April 30

Harry, the night clerk, has become so infatuated with Nellie, the telephone girl in charge of the hotel's switchboard, that he has bought an engagement ring. Nellie does not know of this, as yet. Harry tries to break the news to her, but meets with various interruptions, the last of which is Albert Burns, a handsome traveling man. Burns is attracted by Nellie's beauty, and arouses Harry's jealousy by his attentions.

On their day off the night clerk and the telephone girl indulge in modest entertainments, visiting a moving picture theatre, and an ice-cream parlor. But at night Burns puts other ideas into Nellie's head, telling her that she should emulate the well-dressed women who frequent the hotel, and go to the opera, and higher-priced cafes. She thinks her clothes unsuited to such places, but Burns will be glad to take her out, assuring her that her appearance is suitable. Nellie's obstinacy is aroused by the further jealousy of Harry, and she goes to the opera, and to a fashionable restaurant, with Burns.

When she returns to the "night shift," with her escort, Harry, who has spent the day alone, is thoroughly angered. Burns is rather amused than otherwise by this. He gives Nellie a beautiful bouquet, and goes to his room. Harry receives her little attempt at a reconciliation with coldness, and she is piqued.

Burns has taken to his room Nellie's handbag, which she had dropped, in the restaurant, and he telephones, asking her to come for it. Harry offers to go, but is prevented by the arrival of a guest, and the girl goes herself. Arriving at the room Burns invites her to enter, she refuses, he drops the handbag, and she naturally goes in to help him pick up its contents. He locks the door, and tells her she shall not leave, until she has given him a kiss.

Nellie indignantly refuses, Burns smilingly insists, she grasps the telephone receiver from its hook, but before she can speak into the transmitter he has taken it from her, seized both her hands, and they are struggling in front of the telephone.

In the hotel office all is in darkness, except for the light over Harry's desk. He is looking sadly at the engagement ring, which he now considers useless. He bows his head in grief. The switchboard buzzes, in answer to the call from Burns' room, but Harry turns away impatiently. But the light on the switchboard—the silent call—flashes on and off, on and off. Harry raises his head, the significance of this reaches him, he runs to the switchboard, listens—and hears Nellie's voice, as she struggles with Burns, in the room above.

Harry dashes up to the man's room. He is about to break in the door, but is deterred by the thought of the injury to the girl's reputation that would ensue, should he make a noise. He runs to a window opening on a fire-escape, crawls out over the railing, and, by way of the coping, cautiously makes his way to Burns' window. In the room the girl is bending back to escape the man's kiss. Harry crashes through the window, knocks Burns down, unlocks the door, and leads Nellie out.

In the hotel office the girl is at the switchboard, weeping. Harry goes to her, to comfort her, but she does not heed him. He goes slowly away, but thinking of the engagement ring returns. Taking one of her outstretched hands, he silently places the ring on her finger. The meaning of this dawns on her, and she rises, and throws herself into his arms.

HIS LOVE OF CHILDREN
Reliance Release, May 4

John Hedden is a middle-aged man, who is passionately fond of children. He spends a great deal of his time at the home of a widow friend who is happily blest with three beautiful children. He meets there Helen Knox, who is acting as governess to the three children. Realizing that she could create the happy home life that he craves for, he asks her to marry him. She willingly assents, but after the marriage greatly disappoints him by turning from the beautiful home he made for her to the allurements of society.

In order to offset his loneliness he steals away, while his wife goes out to society affairs, to the companionship of the widow's children. Finally one Sunday morning, again compelled to eat a lonely breakfast, he decides to take the children up to the Zoo without his wife's knowledge. He leaves her a letter saying that he was called away on an important engagement, and goes to the widow's house, where he prevails upon the widow to accompany him and the children to the Zoo.

While at the Zoo he is seen by a gossipy friend of his wife's. She goes at once to the wife and tells her of what she has seen. The wife, already mystified by her husband's letter, is quite ready to believe her friend's gossip. She goes at once to the widow's home. There she finds the widow has already returned with her children. She accuses the widow of trying to steal her husband and the widow in turn tells her how she has disappointed her husband in his ideal of home life. In order to prove her assertion she leads the wife to the nursery door, and there shows her the children with her husband. He is having the time of his life telling them stories. The wife realizes what a failure she has made of her married life. She begs her friend's pardon and steals quietly away to her own home. Later her husband finds her there in tears, which leads to a complete understanding and reconciliation.

PRINCE CHARMING
Reliance Release, May 15

Little Billy, the newsboy, is having a lonesome time in the park when a rich little girl and her roller-skating friends pass by. The little girl drops her gloves and Billy hastens to pick them up and return them to her. She is so pleased that she calls over her governess and makes her give Billy her bag of cakes. Billy looks after her longingly and when she is out of sight returns to his little shack and sleepily sits down to munch his cakes.

He falls asleep and dreams that a wonderful lackey dressed in silken doublet and hose is standing before him. He hands him a letter commanding him to appear at the court of the Princess Marie and also gives him a wonderful court costume. Billy attires himself in his new costume and is soon at the court. The Count and Countess Moneybags and the Duke and Duchess Gingerbread precede him, but much to their chagrin, are refused admittance to the throne room.

When Prince Charming (Billy) arrives the jester is told to lead him at once to the Princess. The others resent the unknown being made a favorite. Prince Charming makes love to the Princess and wins her favor, which causes the other members of the court to vow immediate vengeance. They get Prince Charming while he is alone in the throne room and, notwithstanding that he puts up a splendid fight, he is overpowered by sheer numbers. They are about to evict him when the Princess appears and saves him. She commands the Jester to take him away and clothe him in cloth of gold. Upon his reappearance the Princess calls upon her court to bend the knee, and she takes Prince Charming as her royal husband.

Then Billy wakes up, but "Gee, it was a great dream."

THE TALE OF A KITE
Republic Release, April 30

REP Ada and Dick are in love with each other. The girl's father objects to Dick, but the mother approves of him and wants her daughter to marry him. Ada and Dick decide to elope. The girl writes a letter to her sweetheart, planning the elopement, telling him to be at a certain corner and have the same taxi they have used before, No. 999. Dick receives the letter and leaves it in his room, then goes out to keep his appointment. His small brother, Willie, has been trying to fly a kite of the "butterfly" variety, but without success as the kite keeps dipping down all the time. Seeing Dick, he asks him to help him; he can't stop, but suggests to Willie that he tie some paper on the tail, so it won't dip.

Dick goes on his way. Willie looks for paper and finally gets into Dick's room, takes the letter from Ada to Dick, ties it on the tail of the kite, which he then sails successfully.

Ada's father sits out in the back yard and reads his newspaper, but soon he falls asleep. We see the kite up in the air, finally the strings break and the kite sails over the village and falls on the head of Ada's father. He pulls the kite off his head, and in so doing gets hold of the letter. He calls Ada and her mother out, then locks Ada up in the woodshed, but the mother lets her out; this the father sees and takes after Ada.

The girl meets Dick and they ride off in the taxi No. 999, just as the father arrives. He gives chase in another taxi. Dick's taxi breaks down; he quickly lowers the top to change the appearance of the car, then sees the No. 999; he breaks up the part where it says New York, turns it upside down so it now reads No. 666, then they hide in the bottom of the car. The father misses them. They go back to the mother, and are just about to be married when the father comes in; he admits that he has been outwitted and forgives them.

IN THE TIDE
Republic Release, May 4

Fred Martin, a young man-about-town, pays attention to a rich young lady; his sole object is to marry her for her wealth. The past life which Fred has been leading begins to show on him and he becomes a victim of the cocaine habit. He still keeps his swell appearance and his proposal is accepted by the young lady, who dearly loves him. They are married and the time elapses—six years. Fred has been going from bad to worse. The wife begs her brother, a minister doing settlement work, to try and persuade Fred to quit his bad habits—the minister does so, but to no avail.

The minister meets a poor girl of the slums and befriends her. His sister, who is in need of a nurse for her child, acts upon the minister's suggestion and engages the poor girl as nurse. The minister's interest in the girl ripens into love and the girl appears to return his love. The husband having noticed the new nurse girl, decides on making a conquest, which is resented by the girl. This does not stop him; he becomes bold and tries to force the girl to give him a kiss; the girl, who has a furious temper, strugglies and pries herself from him. The wife, returning at this moment, is told by the girl that she is going to leave. She is too angry to give any explanation, but leaves the room. The husband does his best to poison his wife's mind against the girl. Still in anger over his failure, the husband provoked to a fit of frenzy, decides to get even with the girl; he takes his wife's jewelry and places it in the girl's grip. The girl, who has packed her things, is about to leave; the wife discovering the loss of her jewelry, informs her husband, who throws suspicion upon the girl. Her grips are searched and the jewels found. The minister arriving on the scene, champions the girl, who thanks him; seeing the minister a little doubtful, she refuses his offer to help her, declaring her innocence, she leaves the house. She takes up her life in the poor districts again.

The minister, after an elapse of time, longs for the girl, but knows she will never be his with the disgrace over her head. He meets her, but she is still firm in her decision in refusing him. The husband, who has been frequenting the lowest dives in the city in secret, is picked up by the minister in Chinatown, overcome by the effects of the drug, which he is incessantly taking. The husband's condition is serious; he makes a confession to the minister alone—the minister goes to the girl and tells her and finally all the obstacles that separated the lovers are bridged over. The husband dies, leaving the wife ignorant of the life he has lead.

THE DREAM OF DEATH
Great Northern Release, April 27

The scene opens with a young man seated in his home awaiting for his wife who has gone to a theater. The impatience of the young man suggests that she is late in returning. A sound outside attracts his attention, and he goes to the window and, looking out, he sees the approach of a motor from which his wife steps out accompanied by a man. This circumstance arouses the jealousy of the husband, and when the wife enters, he upbraids her angrily for her conduct and, refusing explanations, he suddenly throws her from him with such force that she falls upon the floor. The wife retires to her chamber in great distress and goes to bed, leaving the husband in the agonizing pangs of jealousy. Wild with rage he enters the chamber and going to the bedside makes a move as if to strangle the sleeping woman, but is turned from his purpose and leaves the room. Still greatly distressed, he sits down in a chair and goes to sleep. In his troubled dreams he sees himself approach the grave of his wife upon which he throws himself, sobbing and remorseful. Two officers come upon him and the next picture shows him in a cell with the warden reading the death sentence. Then he is taken to the place of execution, where the gullotine and the executioner stand ready to carry out the mandates of the law. Just as he is about to be decapitated, he wakes with a scream, which brings his wife from her chamber. The young man is overjoyed in discovering that it was but a dream, and embraces his wife with fervor. She then takes from her bosom a card upon which is written a message from her brother, explaining that he met her at the theatre and took her to dinner, and asking the husband's pardon for keeping her out so late.

"THE SERPENT'S EYES"
Rex Release, April 28

His eyes were a challenge—the Serpent's eyes;
They made her foolish, they made her wise,
They conquered truth and they taught her lies,—
For the things she learned were the things she spurned.
And then, when she turned from the flame that burned
She found that Fate was nowise concerned,
That the wage she was paid was the same she had earned.

The artist had a friend, a sincere person who earnestly desired to help the artist's weak finances. He knew the Serpent was interested in modern art, so he took some of the artist's work in the hope that they would be sold. The Serpent glanced casually at the paintings, but his eyes returned to and rested upon a particular portrait, the portrait of a sweet young woman, with a child's face and a woman's hopes and courage. He was interested in that face.

So he called upon the artist and questioned him as to the woman's identity. He found that she was his wife, but the man knew not that man's right and God's law were greater than millions of dollars—and perhaps they're not! All his life his whims had been the laws of others, his wishes the most important thing in the lives of thousands of his minions. Now he wanted her and determined to have her. And his eyes were the eyes of the Serpent.

He met her, and the devil's glance gleamed into her eyes. She was fascinated by the look, hypnotized by the lure. And another victory was added to the devil's list of conquests.

He invited them to a reception at his home, and there and then it was that the husband first became suspicious. One of the world's talkers came to him and told him that the Serpent and his wife were in the conservatory, but when he came there he found only the Serpent. But—he knew!

That night he declared war. He told his wife he was going to slay the Serpent, and he snatched a dagger lying near. There was a little struggle, she obtained the weapon, and rushed from the house to warn the Serpent.

The devil is an optimistic citizen, so it didn't worry him. She was there, alone, with him. Her husband and the rest of the world didn't count, so he took her in his arms. But suddenly the right and the truth in her were reinforced by some Stronger Power, and she plunged the dagger into his heart.

THE FASHION REVIEW
Rex Release, April 25

Gowns were not made for women, women were made for gowns. We think the real purpose of their creation was to provide a reason for the existence of beautiful dresses. Women may envy well-dressed women, but men love them. Of the two greatest objects of women's admiration, the first is clothes, and the second is—clothes. In the same vein, there are two times in a woman's life when she loves clothes more than anything else on earth—when she has them, and when she hasn't.

The Easter Parade, the proud pageant of Clothes, on the Boardwalk at Atlantic City, is more than an interesting exhibition of miles of style, it is a psychological study of colors and patterns and their influence and reflection on the minds and manners of their wearers. Spring hasn't dressed its new blossoms in any grander garb or with a more alluring distribution of tints than our American fathers and husbands have this year provided for the feminine percentage of the population.

After the parade itself has told its illustrated story, something like a few hundred feet of fashion-film, showing every item of apparel society will wear in 1912, from what they call hats to shoesies. Hats that are familiarly characterized as "dreams" by the women and as nightmares by the men; soft, clinging little things whose names we don't know, direct from the most fashionable and expensive shops of Paris, skirts and other relations of feminine apparel—one of the models who showed them off to such advantage here corrects us and tells us they are not "skirts," but gowns—hose so unusual and so startlingly beautiful that you really forget what's in them; shoes that are poems in leather; bathing suits that couldn't afford to get wet—a galaxy of regal raiment.

If clothes don't make the man, at least men make the clothes; and they've beaten all clothes records this well-dressed year of 1912. In color and cut the spring styles, to revert to the vernacular, are there!

What woman would care to wear the trousers this season?

IN FRIENDSHIP'S NAME
Powers Release, May 4

Ned Wright is in love with a handsome woman in Australia. She is known as Juno Temple and seems to be a wealthy member of society. She suddenly disappears and Ned learns to his consternation and sorrow that she is no other than Maud Hillis, a notorious English forger.

Some months later Ned comes to the United States and visits his old friend Jack Wentworth, a wealthy young society man. During their conversation Jack informs Ned that he is engaged to be married and proudly shows the photograph of his fiancee. Ned immediately recognizes the picture of Juno Temple, and warns Jack against her, producing a newspaper picture of her in proof of his accusations. Jack is at first hard to convince, but finally consents to having Ned confront Juno. This is done and she cringes before Ned and is bitterly denounced by Jack as a heartless adventuress. Ned withdraws, and, in the scene which follows, Juno kills Jack and informs the police that Ned has killed his friend in a jealous quarrel. Ned is arrested and convicted on testimony of Juno and her maid and is sentenced to life imprisonment. Later, Juno's maid has a vision which forcibly brings home to her the terrible consequences of her act in swearing away Ned's liberty and filled with remorse, she rushes off to the police station and confesses her complicity in the affair and accuses her mistress of the murder. Juno is arrested and convicted and Ned is released from his unjust imprisonment.

WHEN THE LILY DIED
Powers Release, April 30

Mamie Judson is a most devoted little daughter and during her few years of life has always looked after the welfare of her sick mother. One day, while out shopping, she sees some beautiful Easter lilies and craves one for her mother, but is too poor to buy one. Performing a slight service for a strange gentleman, she is rewarded with a dime and hastens to the florists and offers him the money. The lilies are a dollar and a half each, but the florist, reading the depth of the desire in the wistful little face, finally gives her a small sickly looking flower and the child hurries home with it, delighted. Her mother is delighted with it also, but that night the lily dies and Mamie is filled with despair. Then a remarkable thing happens; in dying, the lily droops to one side and out of it falls a handsome diamond. The mother and child are astounded and the mother, realizing its value, writes the florist and informs him of their discovery. Then it turns out that the diamond was lost in the florist's shop by a wealthy young lady, whose father offers a large reward for its return. Mamie receives the reward, which enables her mother to procure the necessary medical aid and other comforts, but what pleases Mamie most is the gift of a number of beautiful lilies that will not die.

THE FIVE SENSES

A little boy and a little girl go on a foraging expedition in their room; the boy goes after tobacco, while the girl seeks jam. Both of them experience five separate and distinct sensations; seeing, smelling, tasting, hearing and —last, but not least, feeling, and it is hoped that they are feeling it yet.

MISS DOROTHY GIBSON

A Survivor of the Titanic Wreck

In this cut, the girl trying on the bonnet is Miss Dorothy Gibson, the famous "Harrison Fisher" girl, who has been the star of the Eclair Company. She was one of the survivors of the terrible Titanic disaster, just returning from a two months' trip abroad for her health. Miss Gibson will have a terrible story of the privations of this awful wreck, and the details will be given to the Moving Picture News. The scene is from "The Easter Bonnet," an Eclair comedy released April 25.

OPERATORS' NOTES

By Tom Costello and James Girvan

I paid a visit to the Bronx Centre Theatre, Westchester and Prospect avenues, last Saturday night, to see what kind of a show they put up, and was greatly surprised at the grand sight that met my eyes. True for you, the pictures were run a trifle too fast for my liking. But I must say that there was a beautiful light on the sheet and the pictures were rock steady.

* * * *

While on the subject of good projection, I must give Brothers Harry Cohen, Frank Timms and Henry Shall credit for running an excellent show at the Malbin Theatre, 380 Grand street, and the Windsor at 412 Grand street. It would be a great treat to see the proprietors of the above houses show their appreciation by making their booths a little larger and ventilating them properly.

* * * *

Tom Kelly, who owns and manages the Lifeograph Company, 142 East Fourteenth street, reports business very good. As he is a pioneer in the field and a clever mechanic, he has no trouble in adding new customers to his already large clientele.

* * * *

Brother William McVey is proving himself a live wire at the Greater New York Film Exchange. He is the busiest little man in the vicinity of Fourteenth street with a pencil behind his ear. He is ever on the alert to get a new customer for his employers. When it comes to a discussion on unionism, he always has an ace up his sleeve. He has the distinction of holding a seat in the C. F. U. of Brooklyn, and on the floor he is a good parliamentarian and an earnest fighter for the local he represents.

* * * *

Fred Beck, the energetic representative of the Special Event Film Mfg. Co., of 248 West Thirty-fifth street, was on Fourteenth street the other day. We had a long chat about old times. Fred was always a hustler, and I think he placed his activity in the right place. He is getting new pupils for his School of Camera Operating every day, and he told me his business at the Special Event Film Co. was far beyond his expectations.

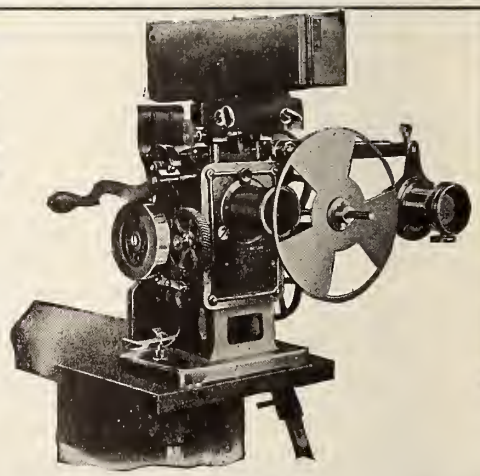
IS A REPUTATION WORTH ANYTHING?

Power's Cameragraph No. 6



HAS MADE ONE AND IS KEEPING IT.

It is easy enough to boast of your superior merit, but unless you can prove your claims, it is idle talk. We can prove that "Power's No. 6" gives absolutely perfect projection. Prof. Henry Phelps Gage, of Cornell University, after exhaustive tests, states that, run at normal speed, Power's No. 6 projects absolutely without flicker. This is the most vital point in a moving picture machine.

Our new factory, employing over 200 men, is pushed to its limit now—Why? Ask any exhibitor or operator.

Power's Adjustable Inductor is the economizer for you to use on alternating current.

AND THEY WERE WILDLY ENTHUSIASTIC

Here's the most marvelous moving picture ever made. All the other films known as "features" are child's play when compared with this

MARVEL OF CINEMATOGRAPHY!

Don't confuse this with any half-baked "feature." Here is a great big huge fortune waiting for

WIDE AWAKE STATE RIGHT BUYERS

Lion hunting with Mississippi dogs in the wildest jungles of Africa. Leopard in battle for life. The fierce rhinoceros at bay. Hundreds of wild animals actually snapped in their native haunts.

Demand Those Marvelous Yellowstone Imps!

"You can't do it. It's impossible. Others have tried to make moving pictures of the wonders of Yellowstone Park and have failed."—That's what they all said when the Imp sent two camera men to the National Park. But the results we got are simply marvelous in beauty and perfection. You must have the Split Saturday Imps in which this Yellowstone-Imp series will be released. The first 400-foot section is on the Saturday Split Imp of April 20th. It's just what the people everywhere are clamoring for. SEE THAT YOU GET IT AND ALL FUTURE YELLOWSTONE-IMPS!

THE SUNDAY QUESTION—OUR STAND

AND so there is no controversy. It is distinctly admitted that whoever operates a public show in violation of the labor and Sunday laws is a criminal, who should be dealt with by the authorities and upon whom should be visited the penalties provided for infractions of these laws.

It is as distinctly admitted that incitement to violations of the same laws is the clear and overt act of an accessory before the fact, just as the concealment of a criminal act makes one an accessory after the fact.

Regardless of our personal interest in our constituency and the great advantage thereto of the open Sunday show, it is impossible, while our statute law remains as it is, for us hereafter to be or become accessory before or after the fact by directly or inferentially advocating the opening of show places in violation of the law.

What is more, we do not regard this position as a curtailment of the right of free speech or the harnessing of the liberty of the press. If the press, in its far-reaching effect, shall prostitute its influence in behalf of the ignoring of the sovereign law of the land, and its following shall be guided thereby into acts which in and of themselves are criminal—if the result of such abasement is overt action in contravention of law then that organ of wide expression will have earned a limitation of utterance which in time must be justly impressed upon it. And we will have none of it.

Every person who, with malice aforethought, becomes a lawbreaker is a criminal, every criminal whose crime remains unexpiated is an outlaw, and every outlaw upon whom is visited the penalties of his crime is and should remain an ostracized member of society until his debt is fully paid to the State.

And we grant to these so-called reformers all of the foregoing of their contentions; in much we cannot agree with them; the place where a picture show is given is of little consequence in the purview of the law, the essential fact is the show itself; if it be rendered in a church it is as much a violation of the law as it is if rendered in a theatre, and surely equally as repugnant. Nor is the character of the show material to the issue; and of less consequence is its eventual object. In many ways the arguments of the reformers are anomalies of the most inconsistent order.

Nevertheless the inconsistency of these reformers is no justification for the wilful infraction of the statute law; nor are citizens warranted in ignoring the statute because officers charged with the administration thereof are indifferent to their duties, or have, perchance, conspired together to nullify the law as it now has existence. The paid champions of the people are not infrequently unmindful of the appropriate discharge of their public duties.

When a question of morals is up for determination and the District Attorney, in prosecuting a violation of law in which he has no personal interest, is opposed by the Corporation Counsel, who is likewise disinterested in an enforcement of the law, and neither are over-anxious to render a surplus of service to the public which employs them, the moral issue is likely to become entangled in a maze of legal technicalities from which it may never emerge, or if it is eventually released the probabilities are it will be trimmed, construed and shorn until the Legislature, its creator, would never recognize it as in any way related to the original enactment.

For present purposes the preceding paragraph may be considered supposititious. It is not our purpose to make any intimation that the recitals thereof are applicable to the present incumbent of any public office; we merely cite and open the idea as being a most useless and unworkable method for speedily procuring a construction or interpretation of the law by a court of competent jurisdiction. While we refrain from any untoward inferences, it is a fact that such instances have been known to exist; and it may not be impossible that one or more such conditions are at present pending.

In the concessions and criticisms related it is not our intention to relinquish or concede our right to warn our readers that the reformers are moving every instrument subject to their power in an effort to tighten up and make the labor and Sunday laws more stringent; that they are presenting bills to the Legislatures of the various States which, if passed, will make the Sunday show a future impossibility; that self-protection, the first law of nature, warrants the exhibitor in seeking by all lawful means to repel the onslaught of his natural arch enemy; and that as long as he conducts his fight along legitimate lines he is entitled to all the protection available to law-abiding citizens.

If the reformer may freely present proposed laws to the lawmakers, so also may the moving picture exhibitor; if the reformer appeals to his constituency for the use of personal influence in the passing of legislative enactments, the exhibitor has the same right; and since Senators and Assemblymen are most susceptible to the commands of a majority of their respective constituencies, the show man will be able to regulate to oblivion the laws to which he is opposed whenever he can satisfy these men that the public sentiment and the majority vote of each respective bailiwick is in favor of repeal of the blue law and the substitution of something more liberal. And until that time arrives the great clamor of the reformer is likely to induce the legislator to the passage of more stringent Sunday and labor laws.

Thus, while we may express an opinion as to what the law ought to be, our position must irrevocably be a strong advocacy of compliance with the law as it is written in our statute books.

Pathé Frères' Baseball Club has been organized, fully equipped and uniformed and from all accounts is some swell team. This aggregation of popular Pathé players has been out on the practice diamond for sometime now and is remarkably fast. The team is under the management of Mr. Harry Handworth and it is open to accept a challenge from any similar team of any motion picture manufacturer in the vicinity of New York. From all accounts the challenging team will have an awful run for its money. The tenth member of the team is "Mephistopheles," a goat which is the mascot of the team. Mefisto will be seen at all the games wearing his new summer blazer and bearing the slogan of the team. "You can't get our goat!" Address all communications regarding games to Mr. Harry Handworth, Pathé Frères' Studio, No. 1 Congress street, Jersey City Heights, N. J.

ERRATUM.

Sometimes We, (in the editorial chair) have to put the blame on the "Printers Devil" or the "compo." or the "proof-reader." Last week we wrote that at the Lyceum Theatre showing Paul Rainey pictures the projection machine was in charge of Frank Hammond. This got twisted round to Frank Hemment. Fred Hemment is in charge of the department showing the lantern slides while Frank Hammond (who is well known throughout the trade as being one of the most clever operators therein) has the cinematograph in charge. We write this in justice to ourselves and to the above so that the boys may know what we wrote.

WILLIAM H. HARBECK.

The above cut shows William H. Harbeck in a characteristic pose. It has been our pleasure to know Harbeck personally for a matter of fifteen or sixteen years, and we regret his loss in the Titanic disaster. He was always a cherry, jovial, progressive sort of a man, a man whom we could all appreciate for his sterling uprightness and integrity in business. Just before leaving New York on his last voyage, he called in the office and said, "Saunders, I am going to get some pictures that will make your mouth water, and I am going to get such an educational campaign that I am going to make everybody in the business sit up and take notice of what is being done." We believe he had with him some of the most startling films of an uplifting and educational character it was possible for him to procure, both by his own work with the camera and through other sources. We offer our sympathies to his family and place him on the books as another lost friend.

SOLAX NIGHTS.

Some dozen exhibitors within a short period have featured "Solax nights." Besides the Star Theatre in Easton, Pa., the Colonial of West Hoboken, the New Star of Third avenue, the Clinton Court of Clinton street, the Dixie of 116th street, and the Queens of Fifty-ninth street, all of New York, have been and still are featuring "Solax nights" with excellent Solax programs of four and five reels.

So great is the present demand for Solax releases that recently Adam Kessell of the Empire and other New York Exchange interests, said to a Solax representative "Why in the name of commonsense don't you Solax people put four-a-week. My customers are just going crazy over Solax pictures. They want a Solax every night. Now, you know I can't supply five Solax a week when only two are released?"

The Solax spirit is gaining rapidly. This is not only because Solax pictures are remarkable for their diversity of interests but because they are relatively big money makers wherever they are exhibited.

DOROTHY GIBSON TELLS HER STORY OF THE TITANIC WRECK TO

Our "Roving Commissioner"

Readers of the Moving Picture News will be glad, no doubt, to hear Miss Dorothy Gibson's story of the terrible Titanic disaster as she saw it, and felt it, and lived it.

Miss Gibson, who is the leading lady of the Eclair Moving Picture Company of America, was returning with her mother from a trip to Europe, feeling, in her own words, "like a new woman," and had taken passage aboard the great new steamship, the Titanic. The following is Miss Gibson's story as she tells it:

"I was seated on one of the upper decks with several others playing bridge whist. The steward had come to us time after time telling us that it was past time for lights to go out, but we had begged insistently to be allowed to play just one more rubber. At twenty minutes of twelve we felt the card table, and I was just at the foot of one of the magnificent staircases on my way to my stateroom when I heard that peculiar crunching sound which proved later to be the iceberg ripping open the side of the ship. My companion and I merely noted the occurrence in a passing manner, supposing that perhaps a propeller had broken, or something of that sort, for we knew that there were icebergs around us. In fact, it was impossible not to know, for they were all about. And so we continued on our way, the gentleman who was with me suggesting a certain course around the deck which would bring me closest to my stateroom.

"As we turned to come toward the stern of the ship we found ourselves, to our great surprise, walking uphill. We both remarked that it did not look right to us, and felt that something must be wrong. Inside we found the steward, who assured us that nothing was the matter. 'Why,' said he in most confident tones, 'you couldn't sink this ship if you wanted to—and supposing you could, she couldn't sink under ten hours, anyway.'

"Leaning over the deck rail, I exclaimed that there was water on the deck below, at which he assured me that the bulkheads had all been shut off and that it was not anything serious. Just at that moment the designer came rushing up the stairs, his face perfectly livid. Not until this moment was I certain that there was really anything serious the matter. I stood in front of him as he came along and asked him what the trouble was, but he pushed me aside and tried to continue on his way. I stepped again in front of him, asking the same question. Still, without receiving any reply—his face was enough, however, to make me feel real concern—and so I went immediately below and brought my mother to the deck where we were. She put on her coat suit and we each took a steamer rug with us. I had only a sweater on over my evening dress. When I went to my stateroom I had light satin slippers on, and when I came up I had on these black pumps that you see on me now, but I do not know when or how I got them on. I had a pair of gloves and mother had none.

"The passengers becoming alarmed, came one by one from their staterooms, and I shall never forget when, as we stood together there, with only three lights burning in the immense room where we were, there came to us the cry of "All passengers to the life-preservers!" Everyone went quietly without a sign of panic and did what they were told. Mr. Bruce Ismay fastened the life preserver on me. My mother was the first woman in the second boat launched and I followed. There were only twenty-six in our boat. The reason of this was that most of the people, up to this time, felt safer on the big boat than down on the open sea in a small one.

"After our boat had been let down, we found that the plug had not been put in, and then when it was put in it did not fit, and some one had to sit on it all the time to keep it down. We looked about for a lantern but there was none. Then we hunted for matches, and not a soul could find any. I happened to put my hand in my sweater pocket and found that, by some means of which I have no knowledge, a box of matches had been placed there. I may have picked them off the card table. We had neither water nor food. One man, supposed to be a French baron, gathered all the blankets to himself. This same man, when aboard the Carpathia, appropriated no less than forty-five blankets to make himself a soft bed.

"We were about a mile from the Titanic when she sank, but I will never forget the terrible cry that rang out from people who were thrown in the sea and others who were afraid for their loved ones. No one knows just how anxiously we watched for some sign of a boat. Repeatedly some eager passenger of a lifeboat would shout that there was a ship approaching, and we would all spring up to find that the light he had seen was only the twinkling of a distant star.

"At four o'clock in the morning, when we had ceased to take notice of the calls that a ship was near, the Carpathia really came. She could not come to us, however; we had to row around the icebergs to get to her. I was so tired that I slept twenty-six hours after getting on board the Carpathia. Everyone was so perfectly splendid to us. The women aboard all came and offered us their berths, and clothes, and in fact anything that they had of which we could make use."

Miss Gibson, although she assured me that it would take more than a shipwreck to knock her out, at the same time has the appearance of one whose nerves had been greatly shocked. She will, however, start work again with the Eclair Company almost immediately.

Miss Gibson speaks in the highest terms of our brave American men who took so heroic a part in one of the most terrible tragedies the sea has ever seen.

THE ST. LOUIS MOTION PICTURE COMPANY

The St. Louis Motion Picture Company, in addition to preparing their two weekly Shamrock releases are preparing a feature picture that promises to surpass anything that has been produced in this country.

It has not been decided whether this feature will be released on a state rights basis or disposed of to some feature film company.

Watch for announcement regarding the same.

Philadelphia, Pa.—The Amber Amusement Company have taken title from John W. Wilbraham to the moving picture theatre at Frankford avenue and Amber street for $20,000.

THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

The next big state meeting will be held by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of West Virginia, at Huntington, West Virginia, on the first and second of May. They will meet in the Carnegie Library, with headquarters at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, where special rates have been made and a banquet given. Every exhibitor in the State of West Virginia is urged to attend the convention, as matters vitally affecting the business of every motion picture owner in West Virginia will come up for discussion. A motion picture will be taken of the convention, the national President, M. A. Neff will be there to address the meeting, also C. M. Christenson, the national secretary, is expected to attend. Big preparations are being made to entertain the ladies and visitors.

Cincinnati Local No. 2 has an organizer in the field, new members are joining daily and since the new local organized they have held several business meetings. The Cincinnati exhibitors are impressed with the manner and way business is conducted, we expect to secure every exhibitor in Cincinnati as a member. Heretofore the local in Cincinnati did not belong to the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America; they had no affiliation, only their own local, consequently five locals failed. The new local is affiliated with the Motion Exhibitors' League of America, is in a prosperous condition and every member pulling together for the good of the cause.

Every picture theatre owner in Dayton is now a member of the Layton local, they are now in a prosperous condition and all working harmoniously and effectively. Clem Kerr, of Dayton, is now state organizer for the State of Ohio, having been appointed by the national president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Ohio, M. A. Neff. Mr. Kerr started last Thursday on the road securing new members for the State League of Ohio, which expects to have every worthy, bonafide exhibitor in the league as soon as possible.

Kentucky exhibitors will meet at Lexington on April 25, to organize a state organization. Orene Parker and two other exhibitors secured an automobile Friday night and visited every theatre in Covington, New Port, Dayton and Latonia, giving them a personal invitation to attend the Lexington convention. The committee at Lexington is doing effective work and a big convention is expected.

On the night of the 14th inst. Local No. 3, of Toledo, Ohio, affiliated with the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, gave a grand ball and banquet. The national president, M. A. Neff, was there and addressed a large audience; after the banquet a motion picture was taken of all the guests as they marched around the big dancing hall; a strong spotlight was thrown from the gallery by Mr. Herbert Griffith, who had a simplex machine in the gallery; everybody is waiting the result of this picture to see how motion pictures will look taken by spotlight. Mr. McKinney reprecenting the Sales Company was also present and made many friends. Mr. W. C. Bettis, of the Colonial Theatre, Summit street, Toledo, was master of ceremonies.

Dr. W. V. Prentice, of the Diamond Theatre was always there to extend a glad hand. Secretary G. B. Gardner, of the Empress Theatre, was very busy assisting in making everybody happy. The ball and banquet was a grand success and the first one ever held in Toledo by the exhibitors. Every Toledo exhibitor is enthusiastic over the coming Motion Picture Exhibitors' League convention to be held there on the 16th and 17th of July.

New members are coming into the State League every day. The National League has letters from Louisiana, Alabama, Kansas, South Dakota, Delaware, California, Virginia and New York, stating that they are getting ready to hold state conventions and to join the National League.

The Columbus Local met on the 9th of this month and transacted important business. The Columbus Local is being efficiently managed and are doing things for the benefit of their members. Mr. Maddox, president of the local, and Mr. Max Stearn are always on the job looking out for the interest of the members. Mr. Neff addressed the local at their headquarters at the Star Theatre on the afternoon of the 9th. Columbus is one of the solid locals of Ohio.

Cleveland Local No. 1 is always doing things. C. M. Christenson, national secretary, living in Cleveland and co-operating with the president and secretary of the local, is every ready to work in the interest of harmony with the local and assist in securing a square deal for all the exhibitors. Mr. Geo. Westley, of Cleveland, will be secured as organizer in the State of Kentucky for the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of that State.

MOTION PICTURE NEWS OF KANSAS CITY, MO.

Early in February the motion picture exhibitors of this city met at Hotel Sexton and formed an organization to be known as the Exhibitors' Association of Kansas City, Mo. At that meeting there were twenty-two exhibitors present, representing twenty-six theatres. This included both downtown and suburban houses. Since organizing the membership has increased until now it has a membership of thirty-six, representing forty-two theatres.

By-laws were adopted, and permanent officers as follows were then elected to serve one year: Geo. H. Wiley, president; William L. Shelton, vice-president; John T. Hurtt, secretary; Jos. Steimen, treasurer; Earl Alexander, sergeant-at-arms; Board of Directors, J. Ray Samuel, N. J. Flynn, G. W. Flick, C. S. Sefferd, Malcon McKay.

Several weeks ago Mr C. N. Christenson, of Cleveland Local No. 1, also National Secretary of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, visited our club room, and spent a pleasant day with several of the members

Mr. Christenson was given our application for membership to the National League, and a charter was granted to us for the State of Missouri, and permission to take in membership from Kansas at the convention held at Dayton, Ohio, on March 26th and 27th, 1912.

We are planning to hold a convention in Kansas City on July 9th and 10th, to be attended by the exhibitors from the States of Missouri and Kansas, and at that convention we will elect delegates to the National Convention in Chicago, to be held August 13th. We are preparing for an active campaign to secure every exhibitor in the State of Kansas and Missouri for membership of Kansas City Local No. 1.

We have the co-operation of all the local exchanges, who have taken a great interest in our association. We expect in a few days to be able to place in the hands of every manager of a motion picture theatre in the above States a copy of our constitution and by-laws, which is now in the hands of the printer.

We maintain club rooms at 312 Shukert Building, and visiting exhibitors are welcome. They will find on file the current issues of the Moving Picture News and other periodicals.

J. T. HURTT,
Secretary K. C. Local No. 1.

EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF PENNSYLVANIA

Philadelphia, April 20, 1912.

Moving Picture News,
New York City, N. Y.

Gentlemen:

At the meeting of the League held Friday, April 19th, the question of the State Convention was taken up, as some of the newspapers published the fact that this was to be changed to meet in Pittsburgh on June 24th.

At the time the National Convention was held last year, May 6th, at Harrisburg, was agreed and selected, and the Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania, whose headquarters are in this city, intend to hold such a convention on that date, May 6th, 1912, at Harrisburg, of which I will ask you publish notice to that effect in your paper.

Yours very truly,
GEORGE H. ROTH,
Secretary.

Topeka, Kan.—A new moving picture film exchange has been opened.

Topeka, Kan.—A permit has been granted for the construction of the Garfield Operating Amusement Co., at a cost of $3,000.

SIDE LIGHTS ON THE CINEMATOGRAPH

Daylight Exhibitions in England

By Leonard Donaldson

No little sensation has been caused in English film trade circles by the introduction of a daylight screen. It is quite refreshing for me to have to record an invention as coming from a British market. We cannot claim to be the originators—alas! we seldom can—of this new enterprise, for this idea was conceived by a German, but it has been left to us to recognize its value and to place it on the world's markets. Toward the close of last year a small company bearing the title of the Day and Night Screens, Ltd., came into being. It was then that the patent screen —which, it was claimed, would "revolutionize cinematography"—was submitted for investigation to two of our best known cinema experts, Mr. Colin N. Bennett, F.C.S., and Mr. James W. Barber, A.M.I.E.E. It was also carefully examined and tested by Mr. Charles Urban, and each of these gentlemen has now cordially assented to its practicability. Mr. Urban believes that "after many years of experiment with the cinema in broad daylight, the present device has finally 'hit it.'" This evidence has so far satisfied Messrs. Keith Prowse & Co., the agents who have along been the power behind the new company, that they have now decided to back it to the extent of their prestige and reputation of 150 years. With this guarantee the "daylight cinema" may be taken as an accomplished fact.

The device is nothing if not simple. Its chief feature is a specially treated screen, the background of scientifically prepared and dressed canvas absolutely impervious to moisture, a coating of silver-faced material, whose ingredients are a strict secret, and a "matt" surface on the outside which contrives, among other things, to give the picture a "depth" and "atmosphere" and a bold relief not hitherto obtained.

The screen is chiefly remarkable for its almost entire failure to use up light by absorption, a characteristic which results in not only making daylight pictures possible, but in an enormous saving in electric current. It is claimed that the saving will be as much as 80 per cent, and it should be mentioned that no expert has yet placed it below 50 per cent. A corollary advantage of great significance in the daylight cinema is also the final seal it puts on the fire question. The risk of ignition becomes practically negligible by the use of the new screen. Not only that, the possibility of conflagration through a sudden stoppage in the machine is also avoided. The great field for the daylight cinema, of course, is outdoors. Pictures on the beach, at the county fair, on the school playground, are sure to provide its novelty, and this year it is to be put to the test in these directions.

Inquiries for the "day and night" screen have come to the London offices of the company from all parts of the world, and foreign options have been, I believe, energetically taken up in your country cousin, America, and also in Spain, France and the West Indies. In London a screen has been installed at the Cinema de Paris in Leicester Square, although the performance is still given in the darkened house. I understand that Mr. Charles Urban, however, will soon have one installed at the Scala-Kinemacolor Theatre in a lighted auditorium, and here it will probably have its first public trial.

CAUGHT BY KINEMACOLOR—A "HOODOO"

Kinemacolor, which first caught "The Coronation," "The Durbar" and "The Burial of the Maine," then captured the popular fancy of marveling millions of theatre-goers here and abroad, has added a new achievement to its notable record by catching the "Hoodoo" which for so long has hovered over the destinies of the Garden Theatre. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been sunk in the past few years by theatrical promoters in the attempt to revive the vogue of this playhouse since George Ade's "College Widow" was the fad of the town there, and not until the transfer of the "Durbar in Kinemacolor" from Broadway to the Garden Theatre has the handsome playhouse been a paying investment. Oddly enough, too, it was during Holy Week, probably the poorest in the whole year, that Kinemacolor took up its permanent abode there, and again upset all the prognostications of the theatrical wiseacres by playing to almost capacity houses, and a handsome profit.

Surely Kinemacolor has become an established institution in New York, where it is now on the threshold of its eleventh month of continuous phenomenal success, and its third week in the Garden Theatre.

THE DURBAR IN KINEMACOLOR

By James Clarence Harvey

A riot of splendor and color!
The smoke and dust of the guns!
The brilliant red of troopers
And the setting of golden suns.
The stride of a thousand camels
And elephants, decked with gems!
A King and a Queen, on a pearl white throne,
In their royal diadems!

The shimmer and sheen of satin!
And the sombre khaki gray!
The cavalry charge of the Lancers
And a million souls at play!
The gray-beards, spared from the battle!
The Princes of proud descent
And fifty thousand British troops
In the sun-kissed Orient!

And that's the tale of the Durbar,
Too big for the rhymester's rhyme,
For it paints a wondrous picture,
As true as the hand of Time.
'Tis a thousand great Meissonnier,
With a canvas as wide as the world
And the rainbow high is torn from the sky
And into the picture hurled.

The troops are living and breathing,
The horses go galloping past.
The trees and the flowers are growing,
In a dream, made true at last.
Then a wreath of Bay for Urban
Who gathered from Nature's store,
The power to portray the things of to-day,
For the future, Forevermore.

Kinemacolor, a comparatively new word in our American vocabulary, has certainly taken a fixed and prominent place in the language, since the Kinemacolor Company of America commenced its intelligent and widespread campaign of publicity only a few weeks ago. Previous to that time few outside the trade, or those who had been fortunate enough to view the marvels of "The Coronation" and "The Durbar" in New York City, knew whether the term stood for a new breakfast food, a rat poison or a grease paint. It has been the kind of publicity that carries with it the punch of conviction and never fails, therefore, to command attention and general newspaper consideration. We quote herewith a few of the most forceful phrases that have of late come to our notice in the advertising and press stories emanating from the Kinemacolor headquarters and which are of the quality-brevity type that ever pounds the point into the public mind and which have now become familiar sights on every fence and deadwall in America.

"Kinemacolor Makes the Whole World Kin."
"Caught by Kinemacolor."
"Broadway's Biggest Hit."
"Nature's Own Necromancy."
"Deliciously Dazzling Durbar."
"The English Language Impotnet in Description."
"Gorgeous Replica of Riotous Coloring."
"Royal Pomp and Panoply of Earth's Greatest Pageant."
"Society's Newest Vogue."
"New York's Lenten Fad."
"Rainbow of Riotous Hues Run Rampant."
"The Very Imagination Outdone."
"A $30,000,000 Production."
"Urban has Caught Nature Napping."
"Kinemacolor Brings the Mountain to Mahomet."
"Outglories the Arabian Nights."
"Pictures Painted by Nature's Own Hand."

A. O. Bilodean, Seattle, Washington, writes:

Enclosed you will find one dollar for the next six months' subscription to the Moving Picture News.

I should like to read suggestions in your paper on playing for the pictures, as I am a pianist, also wish you would answer a few questions.

Do you think it proper to play old tunes that seem to fit in certain scenes over and over again, or do you think a pianist should try to fake, according to the scene? We will take for instance—a young lover flirting with a girl. Well, say I play a piece like "Beautiful Doll," do you think it proper for me to play it in the next show, should the same scene come up again, not only in that scene but in others that occur in the business?

I am working with a trap drummer that is inclined to think we should, and I don't think that we should play it over and over again.

I have been playing pictures for nearly one year and they have got my goat.

Wish you would give me a few pointers concerning them. I will look for a reply in your magazine.

* * * *

Answer: We are pleased to enter your subscription to the News and as per your request we will try to answer the questions asked.

It is proper to play old tunes or airs to fit the different scenes that occur in the picture, but do not let them fit, as you say—"seem to fit"—play the ones that DO fit, and if they don't fill in just as they should don't play them.

It is all right to play a piece such as "Beautiful Doll" in a scene such as you describe, but why need you repeat it when there are so many more you can use, and thus avoid the monotony of repetition—which is one of the things a pianist who wishes to "make good" should avoid. I might mention some of these for your guidance for a scene such as you mention: "Whistle, and I'll wait for you," "Hoo Hoo, ain't you coming out to-night," "Some of these days," "Lonesome," "Meet me to-night in Dreamland," "Let me call you sweetheart," "Somebody else will if you don't," "You'll want me back," "I don't care whose girl you were, you're my girl now," "Can't you see I love you," "Billy," "If you talk in your sleep don't mention my name," "When I'm alone I'm lonesome" and many others; with all of the popular music that is being published you need not play the pieces so often, as you can use in conjunction with them the old standard pieces for "love scenes," such as "Annie Laurie," "Love's old sweet song," "Coming through the Rye," etc.

If you will but pause and consider how many people come to the theatre you will see how vital it is to have the music and effects absolutely perfect—on this one point I might add that it is by far harder to play to the picture and do it correctly, than it is to play vaudeville, drama or burlesque.

The average musician is under the impression that to properly play to the pictures, they must change the music with each and every change of scene that occurs in the picture, but this idea is entirely wrong, for to arrange your music and have enough of it out to last for the entire production and not have any repetition would be a very difficult proposition.

To play the pictures in the proper manner you must make it a point to play the music as smoothly as possible, so as to avoid that undesirable break that is so often heard and that is entirely uncalled for. The majority of the audience appreciate good music, and you will soon realize if you study your pictures as you should that it cannot be produced by trying to fit each and every individual scene as it appears. Four out of five of the patrons of the theatre appreciate appropriate music, properly rendered, and if you study the art of playing to the pictures as you should you will soon find out that it pays, for inappropriate music only appeals to the lower class of patrons that do not care (or would not know) what kind of music you play; but why need you cater to that class of people, strive to have music at all times that will appeal to the better class of people, the other class will come no matter what you play.

An intelligent musician, one of intuitive temperament, does much to enhance the beauty or intensify the comedy of a picture. Not long ago I went into a picture show and saw a very pretty picture, cleverly worked out—by the uniting of a young couple who had been meeting with distressful circumstances, on the course of true love, that has such a rough path. Just when they were joyfully embracing each other, "Oscar Bonehead," at the piano, was playing "Ah, I have sighed to rest me deep in the quiet grave," and yet some musicians wonder why they cannot get more money for their services, and wonder why their music (?) is not appreciated as they think it should be.

The following appropriate scoring of music to accompany "Josephine," George Kleine's Cines release, for May 11, has been arranged by Mr. S. L. Rothapbel, proprietor of the Lyric Theatre, Minneapolis, Minn., and will doubtless prove interesting to readers, especially those who feel concern for the atmosphere which music is capable of weaving about a picture, and which is so often lacking:

At the opening of picture play "Sunshine and Shadow"—waltz—with spirit until Josephine's husband and children are arrested; then break into "Marsellaise." Play pianissimo until mob breaks into room, then crescendo. Continue until mob leaves room; gradually diminish as Josephine has vision of her husband's death. Crescendo again at the sub-title "After the death of Robespierre, Josephine and her two children are liberated." Play with spirit until sub-title "Josephine is introduced to Bonaparte, then a common artillery officer." Resume "Sunshine and Shadow Waltz;" continue until sub-title "The members of the French National Assembly are evicted by Bonaparte's grenadiers," then run into "Marsellaise." Play until sub-title "The religious marriage of Napoleon and Josephine on the eve of the coronation day," then play "Pomp and Circumstance," march, Elgar, very slow tempo, first movement. By repeating this movement it will just about bring you to the ceremony. Swing into second movement, play with very slow tempo until sub-title "Napoleon announces to the State Council his decision to divorce Josephine." Resume "Sunshine and Shadow," waltz, pianissimo until Napoleon hands Josephine letter. As she reads mute all strings and play with great feeling "Simple Aveu;" this is to be continued throughout the balance of the picture and can be used with crescendo where Napoleon shows the new born baby to the populace, but must diminish again as Josephine reads the letter which advises her that an heir is born.

This arrangement is made after a practical demonstration and will be found very efficient and simple, only four numbers being used in the entire picture; can be played effectively with piano, organ or orchestra of any number of pieces. The best effect will be obtained by a pipe organ, piano, two violins, cello, flute, clarinet, trombone, cornet and tympani. If lecturer is used mute all instruments.

THE MARGRAVE'S DAUGHTER

By Virginia West Adapted from Gaumont Release

THROUGHOUT the realm of the Margrave of Hess there were many fair maidens, but none was so far-famed for her beauty as Genevieve, the Margrave's own young daughter. So great was her beauty that the reports of it had been carried to distant lands, and many a handsome and gallant young knight had journeyed far to ask for her hand in marriage. Unsuccessful though they were, they went home again with no regret for the long journey, for the mere sight of one so lovely had well repaid them.

To the mind of the Margrave not even a prince was great enough for his daughter. She must mate with a king or remain a virgin.

To the maiden's mind all this seemed right, since her noble father willed it so.

The deep maiden heart of her had not then been touched, but the many knights who came to sue for her hand stirred her thoughts, and as she grew in beauty of womanhood she dreamed the long dreams. Into them would come the young and beautiful king who some day would come and claim her. Her heart responded to this dream, and she knew that when the king came for whom she waited she would know him for her lord and willingly would she lay her hand in his and ride away on her palfrey into a far-distant country, leaving even her white-haired father, whom she loved.

In a little bower in the shelter of the castle wall Genevieve loved to sit and dream. Often she would dismiss her ladies and steal to this little fairy spot at sunset and watch the afterglow in the dark water and then the bright stars come out one by one, and the whispering breeze sprang up and played among the dancing leaves around her.

So she sat on a warm summer evening. The birds twittered sleepily. The sun had gone and she sat waiting for the stars, thinking her long thoughts.

A figure stood between her and the fast darkening sky, the figure of a man, and he stood close within the entrance of her bower.

The heart of the maiden leaped within her. She sprang up and man and maid gazed into each other's eyes. He took one step toward her. Her white hands fluttered to her breasts and nestled there like frightened doves. Her eyes gazed and gazed, within their depths a thought far deeper than the thought of maiden modesty. Slowly the red lips moved and formed the words: "Thou are not a king."

"No, I am not a king. I am only a captain in thy father's army—Christian, thy servant. See, I kneel at thy feet. If thou couldst give me but the smallest portion of thy love, no king in all the world would be so rich."

The young captain touched the fair hand of Genevieve with his lips. Through her surged a warm, sweet pain. She put her hand to her eyes as though to shut out a too-great light. Christian, thinking her faint, put out his arm to sustain her. Then he folded his arms close about her. She yielded herself to his strength, half sobbing, with her lips against his: "Thou art not a king."

He answered her and said: "Let me be king of thy heart. I ask no other kingdom. Genevieve, my queen, I am unworthy, but I love thee, oh, I love thee!"

Then when she lay still in his arms and he looked down into her eyes, like two forest pools at twilight, he whispered, "Thou lovest me?" and she answered, drawing yet closer to him, "I do not understand, for thou are not a king."

Christian gently released her and stood looking at her wonderingly. "I do not understand," he said.

Then the maiden, with slender hands clasped over the full, round breasts so lately touched with love, told Christian how she had dreamed of the king who one day was to come and take her away to his own realm; how in her maiden's heart she had half known what she would feel at his coming, for her ladies had told her something of love's thrills, but she thought that only a king could bring this knowledge to her. Then with dove-soft eyes cast down, she told him, tremblingly, how the very sight of him, and, oh! how much more the touch of him, had waked that which she was keeping for the king; which she thought only the king could wake. How could this thing be?

And he answered, with his face against her hair, "It is love that wakes the soul and body to the great response, whether in king or beggar; without it the greatest king is poor. I have brought thee the love that dieth not. No king can bring thee more. Art thou content?"

"I am content."

Then he told her how he had loved her long and had watched for a chance to tell her of his love; how he had suffered when the many knights came to the castle; and how he had rejoiced in his heart when she looked with coldness on them.

Many times the lovers met in the shadow of the vines or close behind the tower wall or in the deep, embracing shade of sheltering oaks near by.

Knowing the Margrave well, Genevieve awaited a favorable opportunity for telling of her love and plead with him to give her in marriage to the brave and chivalrous captain of his army. Well she might fear, for she knew her father's pride and his inflexible will.

When the maid was bidden to the counsel chamber she knelt and kissed the Margrave's hand.

"My father."

"Thou hast desired an audience with me. What is it, child?"

"My father," she began, "I am no more a child. I am a woman now."

The Margrave looked at his daughter from under his bushy brow. Then he laughed in his thick, white beard.

"A woman! So, my maid has turned a woman? Mayhap the time has come to give the maid to wife."

The fair young head bowed low. A whispered word reached the Margrave's ears. Sharply he leaned forward and asked in a harsh voice, "Hast thou made choice?"

"I have chosen."

"What man? Speak!"

"Captain Christian, of thine own army."

The Margrave rose and towered above the kneeling maid. Rage o'erspread his features.

"My father, I love him. I care not for the rank of kings. 'Tis only love that counts."

"Thou hast forgot mine honor and thine. Where is thy pride of rank and beauty to throw away thyself on a soldier? Leave my presence ere I say what I would leave unsaid."

Genevieve, in the strength of her love, believed that she might yet show her father that her way was the best; that love must conquer in the end. This she believed until word reached her in her chamber that her lover had been ordered into exile. But two suns more could he see in his own land, then he must go away, with no hope for the future.

That night, in the leafy bower, strong arms clasped the fair body of the maiden, and mingled with the words of love were plans of escape for both that they might have eternal freedom and eternal love.

All was made ready and their hopes beat high. Genevieve was to join Christian at the postern gate as the sun sank behind the castle tower. When he held her in his arms once more, to lift her to her horse, their safety seemed assured. But, no! The sounds of hoofs were heard. Their plans had miscarried and their attempted flight discovered.

Bravely and untiringly Christian fought the well-armed knights, and only when his spear and battleaxe were broken was he taken prisoner.

Vainly Genevieve pleaded, but she was led away to her father's presence.

Enraged as was the Margrave, he soon found that his words of wrath meant nothing to his anguished daughter, so he sent her from him more strongly yet, saying that her love should never be satisfied.

Wroth as the Margrave was, he was sorely grieved. Sadly he betook himself to the tribunal chamber where stern judges sat upon the case of the unfortunate Christian.

The sentence was passed—death.

Calmly the young captain received the verdict and turned to be conducted to his cell.

"Let him see no one but his confessor," said the Margrave.

Like slowly creeping snails the hours dragged by. So quietly in her chamber the maiden sat, the Margrave thought that with her dying hope would also die her love.

The execution morning dawned, and through the slanting rays of the blood-red sun slowly walked a black-robed figure with death-black cowl drawn close about the face. Without hesitation the guards admitted the monk to the prisoner's cell. A moment he stood, listening. Then the cowl fell back, the robe dropped, and the beauteous Genevieve stood before her lover.

Forgotten was the coming hour as they stood locked in each other's arms.

As the fatal moment approached the saving woman's wit of the fair maid came to the aid of the lovers.

Quickly the change was made and they walked forth from the cell, he the monk with close-drawn cowl, and she, the condemned knight, close-hooded.

They stood beside the block, the knight and his confessor.

A blast of a trumpet proclaimed that the hour had come. The man who presumed to ask for the hand of the beauteous daughter of the Margrave of Hess must die.

The signal came back from the Margrave's guard, and the head of the victim was uncovered. The monk, too, dropped his cowl, and the eyes of the astonished crowd beheld standing before them the lovers, ready to die together.

They knelt and bowed their heads upon the same block. The axeman stayed his hand and in horror turned his staring eyes toward the Margrave, watching from his raised balcony.

Suddenly the light broke upon the Margrave's brain. Like a flood the realization of the great love of those two swept over him.

"Stay thy hand."

Deep silence reigned through a period of breathless wonder.

For a moment the white head bowed, then proudly lifted in noble resolution. The deep, clear voice rang out over the heads of the people:

"The word of the Margrave of Hess has been given, but I take it back again. Christian, noble knight, I give thee to wife my own fair daughter, Genevieve. Such love must be forgiven."

A great number of prognosticators often terrify us with visions of what will be when women shall rule the earth and the time when men shall be subordinates and adjuncts. It is rather a fine question to decide—for chival-rous men, anyway. Today, with the multiplicity of feminine activities and the constant broadening of feminine spheres, it is difficult to predict to what height women will ascend.

In the Solax production of "In the Year 2000," the release of Friday, May 17th, a serio-comic prognostication is unreeled on the screen with such magnetic force, charm and rich imaginative detail that one is compelled to accept the theories advanced on their face value.

The conditions are reversed. Women in this film are supreme, and man's destiny is presided over by woman. No attempt is made at burlesque—but the very seriousness of the purpose of the theme makes the situations ludicrous. This is one of the funniest comedies released by the Solax company in some time, and that's saying a whole lot for this picture.

TOMORROW NEVER CAME.

Sounds like an unusual story. It is.

Tomorrow is the only uncertain thing about the future. If we knew what tomorrow had in store for us, what and where we would be, whether smiles or sighs were to be our portion, the future would be a cinch, and a lot of bad poetry would have been spared us. Tomorrow has been a good thing for fortune tellers and poets.

The Rex Company has made a drama of a tragedy of tomorrow that was averted, of sorry sighs that never were breathed, of sad sorrow that never was born. You see, she loved the Gypsy. She had fallen in love with his music, the impulsive, impelling, careless notes of a wild, vagabond spirit, and when he asked her to fly with him she was just about inclined to do so. But some inner, intuitive suggestion prompted her to go to the Gypsy fortune teller and read the secrets of the future. She gazed into the crystal globe that presented the vista of tomorrow's years. She saw fate's panorama of the premature future, saw her womanhood dragged down to the level of the streets, where she sang the Gypsy songs for the miserable applause and reward of the multitude. She saw deception and the heat of Gypsy hate.

So that night when he called to take her away, he went away himself and the sorrowful future was averted.

GEORGE KLEINE'S CINES AND ECLIPSE FILMS.

For the week ending May 4th, George Kleine's program of releases covers an interesting variety of entertainment, including a Cines war drama with scenes laid on the battle fields surrounding Tripoli, showing several active engagements between the Italian soldiers and the Arabs. The action is quick, intense and very exciting throughout. Woven into the story, is a romance of real heart interest wherein a young lieutenant wins out in the love race for the hand of a beautiful Red Cross nurse in the face of the rivalry of his Colonel. The title of this story is "Twixt Love and War."

On the same reel is a beautifully colored panoramic view of the city of Genoa, Italy, showing many specialty points of interest.

The Eclipse release on Wednesday of the same week consists of a split reel of a thousand feet of continuous laughs under the titles "Percy's Visit" and "Chums."

For the Saturday Cines of this week, another unusually entertaining farce called "The Love Germ" is scheduled. This is a full reel of about a thousand feet and a fund of laughs is also furnished throughout the entire story.

The month of May promises to be exceptionally rich in splendid Kleine productions. Among them may be mentioned the romantic as well as historical story of Josephine and Napoleon.

Brooklyn, N. Y.—Jacob Cohen will construct an open air moving picture show on Fulton street, southeast corner Essex street, at a cost of $900.

The Blind Man.....Darwin Karr

A Kind Boy.....Billy Quirk

Full of sympathy and pathos is the character of the poor blind man, who imagines there is glory in light—but later when he dreams of a "sighted" existence and realizes how much more wretched he could have been, he is satisfied with his lot and is happy in the hope that since nature will not some day restore his darkened vision, it will at least not add to his afflictions.

The story is saturated with humanity, with that homely philosophy and with that heart-gripping human interest which reaches out and holds us in silent and breathless piety and reverence.

No character can entwine himscelf around one's heart's core unless he has a heart, and the old blind man, as played by Darwin Karr is all "heart."

Ralph Radnor Earle, globe-trotter for the Pacific Weekly, believes the motion picture of current events will sooner or later put the illustrated weekly newspaper out of business.

"Within a year or so," asserts Mr. Earle, "you will find that the animated weekly newspaper will be depended upon by those who now subscribe for and read the pictorial weeklies and monthlies." His views are interesting. If he is correct in his theory, it will mean a revolution in an important branch of the publishing business.

The animated weeklies of both the independents and licensed forces have undoubtedly exceeded all expectations as to popularity. They are making new patrons for the moving picture theatres, many never missing the nights when the moving pictures of current events are shown. School teachers and others are partial to the innovation. The views of the latest activities in all sections of the world are not only absorbingly interesting but instructive. The Mississippi floods, political activities, the war in Tripoli—all are pictured faithfully. The world is pictured right before one's eyes. There is truth in Mr. Earle's assertion. Women, particularly, are interested in the animated weeklies. The suffragette pictures and the fashions have made a great hit in the Middle West.

That vaudeville given in moving picture theatres has a deleterious influence, was the sentiment of the Columbus (Ohio) Council of Churches which recently held a meeting to consider the Sunday closing of the picture theatre. Dr. Washington Gladden, known nationally as the coiner of the expression "tainted money," asserted that the moving picture show is a great force for good and that, good or bad, it is a practical necessity, as it is the only institution outside of a saloon where the poor man's nickel has a significant value. Dr. Gladden is one of the foremost clergymen in this country, a close friend of Colonel Roosevelt, and an author of world-wide fame.

Dr. Gladden finds that the picture theatre has caused the gallery god to desert his former place of resort. Dr. Gladden believes that the Board of Censorship in New York is too remote and that such censors should be located in other large centers. "If libraries need supervision to see that improper books go not upon the shelves," he says, "surely an institution that is visited by so many more persons than go to a library, should have wholesome oversight."

* * * *

Certain educational forms came in for sharp criticism from one of the speakers at a recent meeting of the Michigan Academy of Sciences. "The study of classics in our schools and colleges," he said, "has, through 'dry-as-dust,' antiquated and impracticable methods of instruction, become at the present time, an almost inappreciable element in our system of education. It would be a sad day if, in the not distant future, our methods of scientific instruction should likewise be weighed in the balance and found wanting."

Enter now the moving picture. The schoolroom is darkened. Pictures are thrown upon the screen. Here we have the full chronicle, says the Toledo Blade, of the siege of Troy—a vivid, exciting picture and beyond forgetting. Then comes the Odyssey, beautiful beyond compare. Homer is no longer "dry-as-dust." No wet towels necessary now to keep the Iliad from anæstheticizing the student. The class in English literature assembles. Then come the portrayals of the masterpieces of Scott, Dickens, Thackeray, Dumas, and the poets. Again the pictures change. It is an Amazonian forest. Strange birds fly among plants of incredible variety. Insects crawl. Perhaps a large animal, driven by beaters, comes leaping across the screen, pauses momentarily, and is gone. Natural history is a different thing now from the droning and dreary recitation upon flower fertilization and the anatomy of the tumble-bug. So the pictures move—showing a ballroom at Versailles, with figures of Louis XIV and his courtiers, showing the discharge of a cargo from the Indies in the docks of London, showing the processes in a steel mill, showing the life history of a butterfly and the menace of the common housefly.

If education is to be weighed in the balance and found wanting after the evolution of the moving picture, it will be because our boys and girls are becoming suddenly a race of muddleheads.

In this day of the elaborate and spectacular feature films we have been wondering how long "Arabian Nights Entertainment" is to be passed over by the manufacturers. Not only is the "Arabian Nights" a classic and endeared to the juvenile population, but the adult, as well, would be delighted by the depiction of the Eastern stories on the picture screen. It is true that Whitney and others have utilized stories from the Arabian Nights for stageland, but, in our opinion, many of the tales are unusually adaptable for moving pictures.

"Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves," "Sinbad, the Sailor," and other stories would prove masterful productions filmed with the elaborateness that characterizes Selig and some others. A two or three-reel production of "Ali Baba" or "Sinbad" would become immediately popular and would outclass many of the costly fairy stories from a literary point of excellence and in entertaining action. What couldn't the Milano Film Company or Kinemacolor do with the story of "Sinbad, the Sailor" and its many possibilities for scenic and trick effects? Try this one, some of you.

It is now estimated that the cinematograph has created 15,000,000 new theatre-goers in the United States in the last ten years; that there are about 12,000 of these places in this country; that more than 4,000,000 of persons go to see the silent actors; that of the whole theatre-going public fully eighty per cent belong to the motion picture class. It has been said that the receipts from these shows reach $1,000,000 for every working day in the year. Some class to moving pictures, don't you think?

* * * *

The motion picture business has made more rapid strides than any other business that has been launched in the past one hundred years. It has assumed greater proportions in less time than any other. More money is invested in it, for the length of time it has been in existence, than is invested in any other industry. And more people daily attend the picture theatre than attend any other one thing on earth. Manufacturers and exhibitors speak in pictures to nearly a million people every day. In the course of a year they speak to nearly every man, woman and child in a state, for everybody attends a motion picture show at least once a year. But it tires the imagination to contemplate in the mind the vast number of persons these men are in direct touch with, giving them something they remember, placing ideas within their brains, creating desires within their minds, arousing emotions within their hearts. The motion picture is gaining more influence in this country than any one other agency, not excepting the churches.

And the exhibitors, also a majority of the manufacturers, realize their responsibility. They appreciate the influence they are having on the public mind and they desire that influence to be the best. They must respond to their own consciences, as it were, as well as respond to their financial interests.

The majority of these men have learned that it is the clean, commendable, elevating picture that is worth while and which pays in the end. Whatever tendency there may be to present unwholesome pictures, it will be sooner or later killed. Exhibitors saw even before the teacher or the preacher realized it, that moving pictures had come to stay and they will be popular only as they are clean, helpful and educational.

FOR THOSE WHO WORRY O'ER PLOTS AND PLAYS

By William Lord Wright

The Ambitious Young Man

The ambitious young man down in Alabama, according to Herbert Corey, wanted to become an author. As the first step to that end he wrote out a story, all in a round fair hand, upon wide sheets of paper, and rolled it nicely in a fashion that would reduce the copy reader to gibbering melancholia, and mailed it to the offices of the Munsey publications. He was really in earnest in his hankering. Just to make certain that his first effort at authorship would be successful, he had written over again Bret Harte's "Luck of Roaring Camp." He had not marred it even by a syllable. He had even preserved the original names of the characters. "I hope you will accept this story," he had written. "I am a young man of twenty-one, and this is the first story I have ever written. My friends think it is very good." To which the editors of Munsey's replied that it was indeed a good story. The single reason that prevented them from accepting it was that it had been copyrighted by the first author, Mr. Bret Harte, away back in 1868. Even that, they admitted, might not be considered a good reason, for the copyright had expired. "But we are powerless to take advantage of this opportunity because of Mr. Munsey's objections," they wrote. "Mr. Munsey promised Mr. Harte upon his deathbed that he would never, never publish any of Mr. Harte's stories that had ever been published before."

Another budding playwright way down in Alabama, maybe it was the same mentioned above, submitted B. M. Bowers' "Chip of the Flying U" to a certain film company. "This, I think, is a mighty good picture-play; I will be willing to accept $35 for it," he wrote. "Why be content with $35?" wrote the editor. "Street & Smith paid the original author $150 for the same idea."

Friend of the Author

A well-known scenario editor at a recent meeting of a literary club gave his audience some enlightening glimpses of the various problems which confront the occupant of the editorial chair. After refusing the seemingly popular idea that the unknown author is an unwelcome and ill-treated contributor, the speaker set forth many instances to prove that, on the contrary, the unknown playwright is cordially received and followed up with greatest interest if he shows any special sign of promise or originality. It was particularly edifying to ascertain how many times the script which had taken the public by storm, when written by an outside contributor, had been the result of some timely suggestion from the editor, who had seen in the writer possibilities quite unknown to himself, or had caused him to embark on some line other than that originally attempted. If it were generally known how many writers who have achieved success have practically been made by editors endowed with a gift of helping the young playwright to find himself, faultfinders would indeed be surprised.

"Take this script and change your climax, omitting so-and-so, which is impossible, and then resubmit your story and we will consider it," was an editorial suggestion accompanying a rejected script, one young author's first attempt. The suggestion was carefully followed and the editor bought the story. You could not convince this author that he needs to join any "protective societies" or that discrimination is being practiced to his disadvantage. To quote Epes Winthrop Sargent: "If you think your plots are stolen or favoritism is being practiced, stay out of the game." This is true. You are not compelled to write scripts and the editors are not compelled to accept them unless they meet requirements.

Like Oliver Twist, "More"

A script writer of Washington, D. C., writes more on the "knife throwers" and "hammer wielders." "The only way to win success," writes our correspondent, "is to keep right at it, if you have talent. Without ability to write and create, your case is hopeless. I have made many friends in the business since starting to write, friends whose advice I appreciate and try to observe. I take every trade journal and find much beneficial to me and I do not have to pay a big tuition fee, either. I have had lots of failures, but also occasional successes. I find that many scripts favored by editors fail to please directors, and then the poor editor has to shoulder the blame. I send along a letter for you to publish which proves to my mind that editorial departments are as anxious for you to succeed as you can possibly be." The letter dated April 5th is from A. D. Hotaling, Lubin Manufacturing Company, Jacksonville, Fla. It reads as follows:

"We are returning to-day by first-class mail your scripts. Now if you would spend the time that you write ten scripts and put it on one and make it thorough, it would be of greater advantage. Any one of the scripts that you sent in would take two days' time of our scenario writer to arrange the scenes. Each scene in a script should be laid out, and the business in that scene explained, also leaders on sub-titles, with letters, should have careful consideration. Typewrite your scripts as they command higher prices. I do not mean to say that your efforts are not without merit, but they are hard to arrange. Now try this one, take 'How She Cured His Meanness,' lay out the scenes, put the business in same, and forward it to me and I may be able to use it. In fact all your efforts may be worked into good scenarios if you will spend a little more time and brains, and work them on same. I trust you will accept this advice in the manner in which it is sent."

Here is a director who received ten scripts, none of them available, and takes the time to write a kindly letter of advice to an unknown author.

What Nestor is After

A. E. Christie, of the Nestor Film Company, writes to contributors that the Nestor Company is in the market for good, bright, up-to-date comedies, both for full and split reels. Rumors that the Nestor Company is not buying scripts is erroneous.

Short Synopsis

The Edison Company is returning many manuscripts for shorter synopsis. In order for manuscripts to be considered by this company, synopsis must not exceed 250 words. That is giving the author plenty of space, for the story of the Creation was covered in about 500 words. At least, that was the wired assertion of a telegraph editor of a newspaper when a country correspondent wired 500 words on the death of a cow. Put time and thought into the synopsis of a script. Brevity is the soul of wit, and the briefer and more attractive the synopsis, the more chance there is that the editor will read the entire script.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Tom Costello

AUX. LOCAL 35, I. A. T. S. E.

OFFICERS

John F. Stephens.....President
Sam Kaplan.....Vice-President
Gus Durkin.....Financial Secretary
Morris Klapholz.....Recording Secretary
Chas. Marnato.....Sergeant-at-Arms
Henry Weinberger.....Business Agent
Edward Phelps.....Asst. Business Agent

The auxiliary meets at Teutonia Hall, No. 66 Essex street, the first and third Monday of every month at 12 o'clock midnight. Dues can be paid to Bro. Weinberger at the Union Office, No. 133 Third avenue, or to Gus Durkin, care of Berkeley Theatre, No. 19 West Forty-fourth street.

* * * *

The regular meeting of the auxiliary was held Monday morning, April 15th, at the above meeting rooms; when Bro. John Stephens called the meeting to order he had the pleasure of facing one of the largest assemblages of moving picture operators in many moons, and Bro. Gus Durkin was kept busy supplying paid up due cards to the long line of waiting brothers. Bro. Klapholz was elected recording secretary and as the membership has increased 50 per cent. in the last six months it will keep him busy answering the correspondence and attending to the clerical duties of the organization. In the future the meetings will be held at midnight, as many of the brothers have to leave before the close of the meeting or are too tired to attend the morning session after a day's work, but the brothers that are fortunate enough to be married voted unanimously for the night meeting, as it will give them a change to get away from wifey (more ways of killing a cat than one). Brothers Daisie McVey and Ritter were elected directors, and Brother Fred Stoffregan acted as vice-chairman (pro tem). It was regularly moved and seconded that Aux. Local 35 be affiliated with the labor council of New York. So brothers don't overlook the fact that the Moving Picture News is printed by union labor, and is read by Union Operators and its editor, Mr. Saunders, is always willing to help the labor movement through the medium of the Moving Picture News.

Both business agents' reports were gratifying, and the coming week promises work for all and then some. Meeting adjourned by Bro. Stephens at 3:30 p. m.

* * * *

On Sunday afternoon, April 21st, the regular meeting of the Local 35, I. A. T. S. E., was held in the Weona Club rooms, 409 W. Forty-seventh street, to a record-breaking attendance. The meeting was called to order by Chairman John Stephens at 2 o'clock. During the course of business speeches were made by Hugh Frayne, general organizer, A. F. L., and Charles Shea, worthy grand president of the I. A. T. S. E. Meeting adjourned at 5:30 p. m.

I was lucky enough to be working at Wallack's Theatre last week, lucky to be Johnny on the (stage) during the presentation speech to Mr. Geo. Arliss by Henry Griesman after the matinee performance of "Disraeli," Wednesday, April 10, 1912. As it was Mr. Arliss' birthday, the various members of the house staff thought it the opportune time to show their appreciation to the quiet conservative man that thrills the audiences that pack Wallack's Theatre eight times a week. Mr. Arliss received as a birthday gift a handsome dressing mirror and stand inscribed with the names of donors on the back and a framed set of resolutions of thanks for the banquet tendered to them last Christmas Eve. The following is the speech by Bro. Griesman: "Mr. Arliss, I have been selected and assure you and the attachés of Wallack's Theatre I am indeed honored to present to you this slight token. It is not so much for its worth or value, but the spirit in which it is given. The boys of Wallack's Theatre learned that you are to-day blessed with a birthday and thought it the opportune time to show their appreciation towards you for last Christmas; they also wish me to express to you their sincere wishes for a long life and a merry one and success in all your future undertakings. This, Mr. Arliss, is a birthday—try as I might it was impossible for me to find out which one—but the boys of Wallack's will take your word for it.

Mr. Arliss' reply to Mr. Griesman, with apologies if I do not quote his exact words:

Mr. Arliss was usrprised, but being a brilliant tactician he stood for a moment and thought, and in his quiet way thanked the boys for their thoughtfulness, told them he would cherish and prize their gift. He said a long or short line was a mystery to him and how the ceilings were raised and lowered. The glowing fireplace and the moonlight glow, he said, seemed as though magicians were at work all the time. When it came to the age question he smiled and openly expressed that he was one of the oldest young actors; he also assured everyone that he had forty-four birthdays. The orchestra struck up, "We Won't Be Home Until Morning," and one of the pleasantest half hours I spent was on the stage of Wallack's Theatre, where good fellowship reigns supreme.

Brother Rickards and Brother Noster, who worked in vaudeville for a long time, have separated, but still are the best of friends as all good union men should be. Brother Rickards and his talented sister, Pearl Rickards, are at present working at the Dreamland Theatre, No. 4410 Third avenue, talking pictures, and to talk to the congenial manager, Mr. Chas. Riese, who only wants the best in the amusement line for his patrons, he will tell you his receipts prove conclusively that John Rickards and his sister are box office attractions for any house that appreciates good talking pictures. Brother Rickards has been posing for the Vitagraph Company, and I am waiting anxiously for the release of the French Revolution and other pictures that he has posed in.

* * * *

I paid a visit to Weber's Music Hall and sat through one of the best programs of picture plays I have seen for a long time. Six first runs from the Empire Film Company, with the burial of the Maine as a feature. Going some, ain't it, boys, but you have to give them something on Broadway, and Brothers Walker and Sollish who handle the projection are delivering the goods. The manager, Mr. Ed. C. White, has purchased two motor-driven simplex projectors, and as the two brothers are old timers at the moving picture game you can rest assured that a good show is always on tap at Weber's Music Hall.

* * * *

The Orpheum Theatre, 126 Second avenue, is turning patrons away at every performance in the evening. When I visited it the other evening it was packed to the doors. I had a long chat with the manager, Mr. Nathan E. Block, who has a personality that is bound to gain patronage and to hold them and make them steady theatregoers to the Orpheum. Mr. Block thinks there aren't any two better operators in New York than the two he has, and as they both belong to the auxiliary I share his views. The projection, the music, and in fact, everything connected with the Orpheum is A No. 1. What more can a poor, tired scribe say?

Hearing that there was a wireless outfit at Ganes' Manhattan Theatre and being curious and a doubting Thomas I made a trip up town where the bright lights glow, and got the surprise of my life. In a recent issue of The News I gave quite a lot of space to the projection and effects at Ganes' Theatre, but I'm going to write about an operator that doesn't frame pictures and push carbons, Bill (Bugs) Russel, who manipulates the wireless outfit in the lobby of the Manhattan Theatre. Bugs Russel, as his brother operators call him, has been at the key of many of our transatlantic steamers and has been placed in a precarious position many times. He has the distinction of being vice-president of the Wireless Operators' Association, and was operator of the transatlantic naval station, Key West, Florida. At the present time he is chief operator of the Mounted Scouts, National Guard, Aeroplane Service, and as he is only twenty-four years of age he certainly has an enviable reputation among his brother operators. He explained his apparatus to me and let me send and receive a message, and I can assure you it was one of the pleasantest experiences I ever had, watching the spark from the induction coil, the whir and click of the motor and the constant ticking of the instrument that meant so much to the unfortunate passengers of the ill-fated Titanic. His outfit was taken down from Morsemere, N. J., at 6 p. m. and was actually in operation at the Manhattan Theatre, receiving Government and commercial messages which were read as bulletins from the stage. Part of the set came from Paul Basmark's Casino set. This set breaks the world's record of having sent a message 585 miles. The aero which is on the flag pole and all electric connections were made by Brother Joe Mc————of Auxiliary Local 35, I. A. T. S. E. The apparatus will be on exhibition for the rest of the week, and if you come from Missouri, go up and see it, as seeing is believing, and if you want tips from a live wire, watch Manager Ganes at the Manhattan Theatre, he has his cards stacked and always has an ace in the hole.

* * * *

My congenial friend, Jack Levy, who has been identified with the William Fox Amusement enterprises for the past ten years, can be seen any day at the Greater New York Film Company, 116 E. Fourteenth street, where he holds a responsible position as booking agent. Everybody talks favorably of Jack and he deserves credit, as he is a hustler and a live wire; always smiling and happy, he bids fair to make a very bright future in the film business.

* * * *

Brother Delegate Henry Weinburger is certainly proving that he is the right man in the right place. On Sunday last he signed up the "Fair" and put two men on the job. Nothing but the best in the projection line pleases the proprietors of the "Fair," so to please them, Brother Weinburger put Brothers Youngswick and Becker to work, and I am quite sure that they will satisfy the most critical, as they are quite a few years in the business and have always made good in the past.

* * * *

Brother Weinburger tells me he has signed up nine houses since last Saturday and has six more ready to sign by Friday, and he has given out a day's work to thirty-eight men in the past week, which, to my way of thinking, is some record.

* * * *

Brother members, get wise and come to the meeting and pay up dues or "the delegate will get you if you don't pay up," and, believe me, he is bound to get what he goes after. Some of the boys claim that he is a "holy terror" and they are glad to pay all back dues just to get rid of him.

* * * *

Brother Larry Dibella is mourning the loss of a nice soft job as his boss, McAdam Richter, had to close his place, the Electric Theatre, Chrome, N. J., on account of dull business. You have my sympathy, brother. I know how hard it is when you lose a job as easy as yours was.

* * * *

Brother Jack Preiss deserves great credit for holding his present job so long. He has been at the Munroe Theatre, 158 Munroe street, for two years, and he must have an iron constitution to work in such a sweat-box for that length of time. It is the poorest booth I have ever seen. It is a good thing that the law is compelling the exhibitors to put up decent operating rooms.

* * * *

Just to show you that the operators are wideawake, let me tell you that Brother Charles Marotta certainly made a hit as lecturer on the Titanic Disaster Pictures for the past week. And he says the "velvet" came in so easy he was able to buy a complete Powers No. 5 outfit. He says, comparing the lecturing to operating, that it's a shame to take the money.

* * * *

Brothers Ridder and Marotto are about to jump into the game as real live exhibitors. They are going to open the Yorkville Airdrome at 84th street and East River, just opposite Carl Schurz' Park. May 15th is the scheduled date for the opening and if you just drop around Fourteenth street and Third avenue and hear what's doing you will believe as I do, that it will be one grand affair. Best wishes to you, Brothers, from Brothers Costella and myself.

"PRINCE CHARMING"

Scenario, Geo. W. Terwilliger—Directed by Jas. Kirkwood
Reliance Release, May 15th

The Newsboy, afterward Prince Charming "Little Billy" (Edna Foster)
The Princess .....Marie Newton
The Count and Countess Moneybags
Arthur Jacobson and Evelyn Converse
The Duke and Duchess of Gingerbread
"Dandy" Burns and Bessie Schrednecky
The Jester.....Morris Emmer

"Little Billy," the newsboy, is having a lonesome time in the park when a rich little girl and her roller-skating friends pass by. The little girl drops her gloves and Billy hastens to pick them up and return them to her. She is so pleased that she calls over her governess and makes her give Billy her bag of cakes. Billy looks after her longingly, and when she is out of sight, returns to his little shack and sleepily sits down to munch the cakes. He falls asleep and dreams that a wonderful lackey, dressed in silken doublet and hose, is standing before him. He hands him a letter commanding him to appear at the court of the Princess Marie, and also gives him a wonderful court costume. Billy attires himself in his new costume and is soon at the court. The Count and Countess Moneybags and the Duke and Duchess of Gingerbred precede him but, much to their chagrin, are refused admittance to the throne room.

When Prince Charming (Billy) arrives the jester is told to lead him at once to the Princess. The others resent the unknown being made a favorite. Prince Charming makes love to the Princess and wins her favor, which causes the other members of the court to vow immediate vengeance. They get Prince Charming while he is alone in the throne room and, notwithstanding that he puts up a splendid fight, he is overpowered by sheer numbers. They are about to evict him when the Princess appears and saves him. She commands the jester to take him away and clothe him in "cloth of gold." Upon his reappearance the Princess calls upon her court to bend the knee and she takes Prince Charming as her royal husband. Then Billy wakes up, but "Gee, it was a great dream."

ON THE SHORE

Imp Release of May 6,

There is a sharp dramatic turn in the story, "On the Shore," which will unquestionably make the film an attractive one to moving picture audiences. An old fisherman is about to be dispossessed from his home "on the shore," by the powers that be of a dock company which requires the land upon which the fisherman's cottage stands, for the purpose of making an extension.

But the fisherman is a very stubborn man, prone to insist upon his rights, prescriptive or otherwise. So he quarrels with the manager of the company, wounds him, is arrested, jailed and stands in some danger of being punished for his offence.

But the fisherman's saving possession is a pretty daughter, who assists him by mending his nets and keeping house for the old fellow and she undertakes to intercede with the wounded manager in behalf of her father. The manager is very human and very humane, not cherishing resentment, he forgives the fisherman and so arranges matters that the Dock Company will cut its extension on a piece of land removed from the fisherman's cottage.

The dramatic turn of the story consists in the eloquent pleading of the fisherman's daughter for her father's freedom. She not only succeeds in this, her immediate object, but achieves one that she probably did not contemplate when she started off to interview the handsome, wounded manager. She made him fall in love with her. And so in forgiving the father, he at the same time won a pretty young wife.

THE LAND OF PROMISE

(Imp Release of May 9, 1912)

A young Mexican couple, Jose and Juanita, left their native Mexico for Southern California, with the determination to start life anew amidst more promising conditions than those which existed in their chronically disturbed native land.

But when they arrived there they had to encounter a very natural suspicion attaching to their race, in the eyes and minds of primitive Americans.

They insalled themselves in an old shack, under a promise to pay the balance of the rent, which the owner demanded when he found they had taken possession of his property. Then the man went out to look for work, which was not forthcoming, but opportunity gave him a chance of saving the life of the old ranchero, which was threatened by a dynamite blast. He is wounded, however, and returns home, where his wife dresses the wound and puts him to bed. They have no money or food, and Juanita goes out, determined to secure the one or the other. In her Mexican innocence and ignorance she comes into casual possession of a calf. Unfortunately, just about this time the authorities were issuing a proclamation against cattle rustlers and the young Mexican couple fell under suspicion as being the culprits. Matters after a certain point look black for them, when by good chance the old ranchero recognizes in the young Mexican the savior of his life against the dynamite blast. So suspicion being removed from Jose and Juanita work was found for him, and there was a prospect of happiness and prosperity for the strangers in the land of promise.

This picture gives opportunity for the portrayal of graphic scenes of Western life to-day—not the Western life of a decade ago, the wild Western life that is rapidly becoming forgotten, but natural incidents associated with the agricultural and cattle raising in the far western States of to-day. There are some excellent and truthful characterizations in the picture—in fact, the naturalness, sentiment and action in "The Land of Promise" constitute its greatest attraction.

THE REAL KID CANFIELD

The genuine and original Kid Canfield, who posed for the moving pictures made by the Champion Film Company, wishes us to announce that any news concerning the whereabouts of the imposter who has been appropriating his name would be much appreciated. The original is with The Queens of the Folies Bergere Company who have been playing at the Century Theatre, Kansas City, Missouri, since April 22d, and will be at the Standard Theatre, St. Louis, the week beginning April 29th. Any correspondence addressed to Kid Canfield of this company will be received by him O. K.

ABOUT "JESS" (THANHOUSER)

Concerning "Jess," the next adaption by Thanhouser Company (released Tuesday, May 28), that concern has this to say:

"'Jess,' as filmed by us, is in two reels.

"It was written by H. Rider Haggard, who wrote 'She,' the 1911 Thanhouser star effort.

"The strength of 'She' in mystery effects is paralleled by the strength of 'Jess' in sensational effects.

"The burning of Silas Croft's home alone is worth going many miles to see.

"The special paper and booklets that are issued for all Thanhouser features, will certainly be issued for this. The advertising exhibitor will make good easily with 'Jess,' since it is a big production, founded on a big, well-known story, by a big, well-known author."

THANHOUSER'S $40,000 FASHION FILM.

"The Saleslady," the film for which real models posed, all the 1912 spring and summer creations of Worth, Paquin, Louise and Redfern for the Thanhouser cameras —$40,000 worth all told—will be released Tuesday, May 7th. It is likely the most pretentious thing in the way of a "fashions film" that has ever been attempted. While the creations are the main feature, because of the way they appeal to women, there is a bright story woven around them involving the misguided efforts of "The Saleslady" to advance the interests of her sweetheart, who is employed in the same establishment. The whole subject is a graphic study of department store conditions, and as the department store is a well-known and interesting institution the reel should "draw" on this feature, too.

NESTOR RELEASES

"The Impostor" is a very interesting drama which is to be released by Nestor on Monday, April 29. This picture has been given very splendid settings, and the plot of the story is good. It is the story of a deception

Edited by Esau Shindler

Well, boys, here is a small clipping I found in the Kinetogram, a bi-monthly published by Thomas A. Edison, Inc., Orange, N. J. As this piece seemed to interest me very much, I believed it a good thing to take up a little space in this week's page and let all our fellow-brothers take a peep at it.

The article read as follows:

Breaks World's Record for Changing Reels

"The world's record for changing reels on a motion picture machine, formerly held by a Mr. Jones, of Chicago Local No. 2, I. A. T. S. E., was broken here yesterday when Roger H. Neal, in the presence of a Journal man, changed reels at the Amuzu Theatre in exactly nineteen seconds. This seems remarkable, but the Journal can vouch for the fact that it was done. Mr. Neal is by all means the most expert operator ever in Winston-Salem, and is a thorough gentleman withal."—Winston-Salem Journal.

Here is one of the most remarkable performances which has ever come to our attention. When one considers that it usually takes about one full minute to change reels, this nineteen-second shift is little short of marvelous. Mr. Neal, however, in a letter to the company, assures us that two stop watches timed the trick, and that it was a complete and accurate change.

The performance took place upon an Edison Kinetoscope, and is cited by Mr. Neal as an instance of the great possibilities of our machine, which is unconsciously praised by another Southern newspaper which, in commenting on this remarkable feat, says:

"The efficiency of the operator is manifesting itself to the patrons of the Amuzu in a clear and distinct picture, with regular light, and dispatch in changing from one picture to another. 'Forty seconds to change reels' the sign reads, and it is very seldom that a longer time is consumed. This service, with other features inaugurated by the management, tends to make the Amuzu a mighty popular place, and its patronage is growing steadily."

We are publishing the account of this record-breaking change in the hope that other operators will become interested in an endeavor to break this new record—though we do not believe it can be done.—The Kinetogram.

What do you say about this, fellows? There is something to this, isn't there? Let us all wake up and see if we can break this record. I don't think I could. If there is any fellow who thinks he can, then let him try it. Good for you, Mr. Neal!

* * * * * *

I dropped into the Jolliette Theatre again the other day, to see my friends, the good operators there. I can say that their operating still stands up to the 100 per cent mark. There was only one fault I found and that was the sound effects in one picture. Well, one of the operators was running off a railroad picture, which was supposed to illustrate two locomotives in a collision, etc. In one scene the engine was running full speed and the engineer is seen pulling the string of the bell with all his might, but no noise or sound of a bell was heard in the theatre. Then the engine comes to a standstill and the engineer is not touching the bell, and here is where Mr. Drummer wakes up to hammer his bell effect. And, by gosh! It did not sound like a locomotive bell at all, to me; it rather sounded like a dinner bell or a carfare ringer. There also was another scene in which are seen two engines racing over a bridge to meet themselves in a head-on collision; the engineer and fireman are seen jumping into a nearby river, and Mr. Drummer is pounding on his car gong as strongly as he can. I do not know how the bell on the engine could ever ring, when no one is in charge, unless they had a storage battery connected to the bell. I think if the drummer should purchase a real bell or gong it would make the picture seem more realistic and it would sound much better, unless he has not got the price. I'm very sorry; I'd lend him a few dollars, but these days my pocket is kind of empty. As I said before, the picture was a real treat and the projection was O.K. I af glad to see my old pals keeping up their good work in the operating-room. Chief Operator George L. Grotl and Henry W. Shumaker are still there, and also another good fellow. I should say that he is a good fellow! His name is Rufus Lubao, the assistant, the man who never projected a slide on the screen upside down, and also Mr. Lubao has got a good patent; that is, he believes that when lighting an arc and bringing the carbons so close together that they nearly freeze and not separating them saves a lot of trouble of feeding them every once in a while. He does not mind the tackheads on the carbons, for you can easily knock them off. The Jolliette is a pretty little picture house; its seating capacity holds about 300. It also has one of the largest booths in Boston, as I hear, and has a 65-foot throw. Mr. Meyer Shapiro, the man behind the gun, has the management duty in his hands. They also have a dainty little sweet-voiced singer; her name is Miss Julia Dicyntha, and, fellows, she comes from Missouri and she can show you the goods. The classy music for the house is furnished by pianists, Misses Jennie Fountain and Dora Landerville, Miss Jennie Fountain being musical director. They also have a good drummer, but I have forgotten his name; he can play the drums and bells all right, but I think he does not know much about train gongs. Don't get discouraged about this, Mr. Drummer, because I am doing this in order to wake up other drummers who are asleep. As I was speaking about the house before, I shall finish my statement by saying that it is making out pretty fair, by giving a good show of five reels of pictures and two illustrated songs, with the able assistance of Manager Shapiro.

* * * * * *

I ran across an operator the other day who advanced to me an idea, which is 'way ahead of my time; he is operating on direct current and he did not like the idea of wasting all the current in the rheostat. He has introduced a unique device which, according to him, saves this waste. He has placed an ordinary electric fan over his rheostat, so that the wind blows down on it; and his contention is that the wind cools the coils in the rheostat, thereby offering more resistance and saving the electricity which is wasted in heat. Does this strike you? Well, it does strike me. If that fellow is wise he ought to get a patent out for that scheme. Very marvelous and foolish. I should think that he would be wasting more current by having the fan running.

* * * * * * *

While tramping around a few weeks ago, having scarcely anything to do, I thought I would take a little stroll to the uptown district and take a peep at the other houses situated there. Well I stepped into the National Theatre on Berkely street, one of Boston's newest vaudeville houses; also claiming to be the largest house in America for vaudeville, and is owned by the B. F. Keith interests. The house is a pretty large one and is very neatly built. This house offers high-class vaudeville and pictures and is making a great success. I sat down, waiting for the asbestos curtain to rise, and finally it rose and Mr. Motion Picture Machine Operator began to turn the crank of his projector. Talking about projection, it was the poorest I've ever seen. The first reel was started off and the entire screen was out of focus for about two minutes, till some one woke the operator up, I suppose. But for the sub-titles now used on films, the people would not know what they were seeing. After a little while the picture was focused and then came a frame-down, Mr. Operator not paying attention to this; must have said to himself, "Why should I mind this? It is nothing at all." But the picture remained this way for about three minutes. He also had a beautiful light on the magazine, but the only light that could be seen on the screen was mostly half of the picture yellow and the other half white, so I am positive that the spot was not on the aperture plate hardly at all. Then, looking at the right-hand side of the picture, it seemed kind of blurry, and the bottom corner could not be seen at all, as the shutter must have been out of adjustment. Next came the projection of slides, which seemed to interest me a great deal; they have a dissolver, as it looked and worked like one, but one thing it could not dissolve, and that was the dirt on the slides.

Take it for dirt, it looked more like mud to me, or as if they had a mud bath. Mr. Operator did not mind whether they were straight, clean, dirty or crooked, just so long as he had a light on the screen. Well, boys, I do not like to go hard on a fellow, but, to tell the truth, a man ought to know more than to operate in such a manner. It seems kind of strange that the theatres downtown have very good operators and most of the houses around the wealthy neighborhood have poor operators.

THE LUBIN CHILD WONDER

Master Roswell "Buster" Johnson is probably the most wonderful 25 pounds of intelligence and dramatic ability in the profession. Born in New York, he is now scarcely three and a half years old, 2 feet 9 inches high, and has been working for the Lubin Manufacturing Company since he was two years of age. Many children are used in the Lubin stock companies, but Buster is always the star kiddie. He plays girls or boys with equal intelligence, and the more mischief required in the role the better. In a recent picture-play, called the "Kiddies' Christmas," five children were used, four of them were brought from New York City on account of their ability. They ranged from five to nine years of age, and had appeared in many of the Broadway productions, but on the animated screen not one of them stood a chance against little Roswell Johnson. He is an unusually handsome blonde, well built and as robust as a fawn. Among the patrons of the moving picture houses "Buster" is well known, and a big favorite.

FEATURE AND EDUCATIONAL FILM CO.

The F. & E. Film Company has purchased rights on "The Land of Darkness" for the state of Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois and Kentucky. The bookings in Illinois and Wisconsin will be handled through the F. & E. Film Co., 721 Caswell Building, Milwaukee; for Michigan through the F. & E. Film Co., 305 Equity Building, Detroit; and for Ohio, through the F. & E. Film Co., 104 Prospect street, Cleveland.

CAPTAIN LESLIE T. PEACOCKE

Captain Leslie T. Peacocke, whose likeness appears above, is a well-known writer. His short stories are very much in demand. The Captain is a pioneer scenario writer, his specialty being comedies, and we understand him to be one of the highest paid men in the scenario field. Mr. David Horsley, who has long admired Captain Peacocke's writings, lately made him a tempting offer with the result that this gifted writer is now in the folds of the Nestor Film Company. Mr. Horsley, Captain Peacocke and the Nsetor company are to be highly congratulated.

CHAMPION NOTES

It is understood that Gertrude Shipman, who has been termed the Bernhardt of America, will appear for the Champion Film Company in their two-reel production of "Camille." She has played from coast to coast in many of the great productions of the past few seasons, and has distinguished herself by her remarkable portrayal of the title role of the Dumas drama, "Camille."

Miss Shipman possesses a fire and genius which makes her stand apart in a class by herself, and to this peculiar talent she adds beauty and grace of form and figure, which, with a youthful charm, is possessed by few who rank as high, either in the film or theatrical world.

Another release of Champion now ready for the market is "Brothers," a most highly commendable film from a moral and artistic standpoint. The atmosphere and environment are what they should be, as is also the action of the piece. With only one character who is not a Roman Catholic, the staging of this strictly Romanist play is exceedingly good. "The Horse Thieves of Bar X" and "An Italian Romance" are also good.

Webster, Mass.—The St. Jean Theatre is to be remodeled this Summer.

Worcester, Mass.—S. Z. Poli, of New Haven, has taken over the Lincoln Theatre.

TITANIC WRECK PICTURES AMAZE BROADWAY THRONGS

Weber's Theatre, New York, Shows Animated Weekly to Immense Crowds

Exactly one week from the time that the greatest vessel in the world, the Titanic, struck an iceberg, moving pictures showing the rescue boat Carpathia, survivors and incidental scenes were shown to tremendous crowds at Weber's Theatre on Broadway.

It was a remarkable achievement and opens a new thought of how records for future generations will be preserved.

The Sales Company's Animated Weekly, a compilation in moving pictures of the world's current events, was first on the scene with specially chartered tugboats and an extra relay of camera men.

The pictures were taken under the most difficult and trying circumstances, but the effort was more than worth while, as was demonstrated at Weber's Theatre.

The first scene shows the laying of the Titanic's keel in Belfast, Ireland; then follows her launching—a noteworthy feature—one showing to excellent advantage her tremendous size in comparison with the workmen nearby.

The hero skipper is shown in realistic poses; then follows a series of views showing icebergs taken three days before the Titanic struck by one of the Animated Weekly men who was returning from Europe.

Several of the survivors who were present declare these icebergs to be identical with the one which foundered the Titanic. The screen is darkened for a minute and the "C. Q. D." is flashed on in vivid reality. This is followed by views in several harbor cities showing the rescue activities. From Halifax, Nova Scotia, the Mackay-Bennett cable boat is seen to start loaded with coffins to pick up the dead. The Animated Weekly's sea-going tug, the Mary Scully, with Jack Binns and camera men, leaves from Providence, R. I. The scene shifts back to the White Star offices in Broadway, where crowds await the news of relatives and friends—and then the docks where society ladies in private automobiles are bringing clothes and supplies to the relief of the rescued, when the Carpathia arrives.

The next view is of the Carpathia—"heroine of the sea"—bearing the 705 men and women who were saved from death. The Animated Weekly draws close to her side. The survivors are plainly seen on deck. There are scenes of Captain Rostron of the Carpathia, Robert Hichens, quartermaster of the Titanic, who was at the wheel when the vessel struck. Many views of the survivors; of Signor William Marconi, who invented the wireless; of the lifeboats and life preservers; the Carpathia at dock and more—all of which will live in memory as long as man exists. It is a truly wonderful film, and the Animated Weekly, with its staff, come in for credit for getting the biggest picture scoop the world has ever known.

HALLBERG EQUIPPING THEM COMPLETELY

Mr. J. H. Hallberg, "the economizer man," reports a splendid increase in business during the past week. Has order from Imperial Amusement Company, Paterson, N. J., for one Simplex M. P. machine, Hallberg 220 volt D. C. economizer, and full line of supplies. W. J. Ward, 186th and Washington avenue, The Bronx, two Edison model B. M. P. machines, Hallberg A. C. economizer, and full line of supplies. W. J. Waters, Milford, N. J., Edison model B., with Hallberg economizer, Skidmore's Imperial Theatre, Bridgeport, Conn., one Edison model B. Collingwood Opera House, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., one Hallberg special 60 ampere A. C. to D. C. economizer.

GREAT NORTHERN FEATURE FILM CO. COMPLIMENTED ON "A VICTIM OF THE MORMONS"

A number of telegfams have been received recently by the Great Northern Feature Film Co., containing such complimentary statements as the following: "It is a grand production and feel sure it will be a big money getter." "Think it is more than what you claim and that I will have a moneymaker." "Film pleased large audiences from early morning till eleven P. M."

We also notice that an innovation in lobby frames is introduced by this company, which in our judgment, is an improvement on anything ever put out in the way of a lobby display.

NOTES OF THE WEEK

MANAGER JACK GARRITY, of the Schubert Masonic Theatre, Louisville, Ky., evidently thinks that there is nothing too good for the boys. He has also evidenced his good faith in the value of evolutionary methods by means of the moving picture, as well as his faith in the Louisville newsboys' faculty of appreciation, when he treated them to an evening's entertainment of Bernhardt and Rejane pictures. It is the same old story, so difficult of comprehension, it would seem, by many connected with the industry; a picture is a picture, and whether it is a Bernhardt or a bowery tough, so long as it moves and expresses emotion, as in real life, it is just the same. Then why not always a Bernhardt or a Rejane or someone of even semi-equal talent and proficiency in the dramatic art?

According to the Boston, Mass., Evening American Mrs. Eva V. White, who is in charge of the New Elizabeth Peabody Settlement House to be built on Charles street, Boston, has made the following statement with regard to the moving picture, and the theatre that is to form a part of the settlement house:

"The theatre will be the main feature of the New Elizabeth Peabody Settlement House to be built on Charles street," said Mrs. Eva W. White before the Twentieth Century Club.

"It is a tremendous force of getting at people. I have gone around for three years studying moving picture shows and I feel that they, too, along with the theatre, play a helpful part in the entertainment of the average person."

Working girls of Minneapolis are to have new quarters. These new quarters will accommodate 200 of them, and will have the usual equipment of small bedrooms, dining-room and sewing room.

But there will be a difference. The new home will contain seven or eight small reception rooms for use when the girls have callers. It will contain a large gymnasium, which can be used for dances and entertainments and parties of all sorts; and it will contain a moving picture show.

The moving picture as an educator has had many successful trials, says the Politische Korrespondent (Berlin), and in proof of the assertion refers to the pictures on sanitation, natural history, botany, anatomy, etc. The latest step in that direction was made recently by Dr. Ludwig Munch, of Darmstadt, who employed the motion picture to demonstrate mathematical problems, "and by this means enabled those students who were unable to grasp the questions and methods of solution in their original form to thoroughly understand the work."

The Cincinnati, O., Times-Star has the following joke on the actor:

"We've eaten our white bread," said a very prominent theatrical manager the other day. "We have taken a little more from the theatrical traffic than it would bear. That's the why of the pictures—and it's why a lot of downtown theatres will be turned into moving picture houses before long. As for the actors: Well, I heard the other day of an actor who begged all his friends to save trading stamps for him. One friend turned in a huge mess. 'Fine,' said the actor, with genuine enthusiasm. 'Bully. As soon as I get enough of these stamps I'm going to get a kit of tools with them and go to work.'"

James Q. Clemmer's $100,000 exclusive picture-play theatre, which was opened in Seattle, Wash., a short time ago, is, according to the following account, a credit to the industry:

From a decorative point of view, it is beautiful in its simplicity or artistic richness. The attractive canopy over the sidewalk invites one into the entrance finished in marble, with a ceiling of ornamental plastering, resplendent with electric lights. In the auditorium the old Roman style of architecture is used, plain columns being set off by flaming electric torches. The color scheme of French gray, with trimmings of ivory and gold, is followed in all the decorations. The curtains and draperies are golden brown.

Beneath the dome is a frieze representing the Washington forests, while in the background are the snow-capped mountains. A group of allegorical figures adorns the top of the proscenium frame.

In niches on either side of the proscenium arch will be placed the pipes of the massive organ which will be installed some time during this month. This will be one of the largest as well as finest pipe organs in the West. Oliver G. Wallace, recognized for his ability in the interpretation of picture-plays on the pipe organ and piano, will be the player.

Heating and ventilation are perfect, the air of the house being renewed every three minutes. This theatre will seat 1,200 persons.

Says the Des Moines "Tribune":

Musicians in the old world have already appropriated motion picture films for throwing the score before an audience when giving an interpretative lecture

The device suggests many possibilities for instructing the general public and helping them to visualize as well as memorize by ear the succession of notes which characterize a particular production.

The practice of using films for this purpose has not become common in this country as yet, but probably will be used in the near future.

Meanwhile, psychologists are objecting to the over-emphasis of the visual at the expense of the contemplative conception. We are learning to grasp externals, they insist, to demand that we see rather than that we understand and perceive with the eye of the mind alone.

It is possible that there may be an excessive use of the motion films especially where the training of young children is concerned. But used with discrimination and moderately they are certainly a means in education which cannot be wisely ignored.

Instructors in physiology at the Ohio State University have adopted a novel plan of teaching this study. Arrangements have been made with a moving picture show located near the university to run rolls of films illustrating the subject of physiology and which are made especially for teaching purposes.

Harry Whitney, the sportsman of note, has sailed in company with Captain Robert A. Bartlett on a sealing trip, carrying with him aboard the Neptune, which has a capacity for a cargo of 35,000 seals, 20,000 feet of moving picture film. Mr. Whitney expects to bring back with him some fine moving pictures of scenes in the ice.

That the moving picture has become a power in the world of medicine and scientific research, as an instrument of demonstration can no longer be denied. In Germany there have been exhibited recently, moving pictures of the stomach of human beings and animals in the process of digestion, which have been made possible by X-ray experiments, and which have thrown considerable light on the digestive process.

Experiments were made first on cats, according to the Philadelphia Press. By adding a little subnitrate of bismuth, a harmless powder, to the food of the felines, the contents of the stomach became visible to the X-ray apparatus. By taking X-ray photographs in rapid succession, it became possible to secure a moving picture showing the exact motions the stomach goes through when digesting a meal.

The old idea that the stomach is divided practically into two parts, one being used as a sort of reservoir and the other doing the digestion, is fully disproved by the pictures. The whole stomach works.

Soon after the food enters the stomach begins to churn and knead back and forth. This churning movement takes the form of regular waves, which succeed one another at intervals of twenty seconds. As the food becomes thoroughly digested it advances to the "pylorus," or "gatekeeper," which allows it to pass on. So long as there are undigested masses in the stomach the kneading action continues and the pylorus remains obdurate.

It is plainly shown by the moving pictures that worry, anger or other excitement causes digestive action to stop. Observation on cats and other animals prove that when they are teased, or even when they have been asleep, and have had bad dreams, there is a cessation of the stomach movements.

It is believed that a careful study of this subject will throw much new light on the digestive processes and aid in the treatment of disease.

At Wichita, Kansas, the First Methodist Church has made a most commendable move toward solving the entertainment problem among the young hopefuls of the church. Each Wednesday evening hereafter the church will put up as fine an entertainment with moving pictures and music as is shown at any of the best theatres. They have put in a fireproof booth and the Edison type B machine. Every child who is on time at Sunday school will be given a ticket to the Wednesday evening moving picture show, and they are trying this scheme as an inducement to get the children to come to Sunday school. Their first program consisted of "Naval Review," "Human Sacrifice," and "Current Events." They are going after it in first class style and will run the Sales Company's Animated Weekly every Wednesday together with all the big features of the day as soon as they come out. They have engaged a large orchestra to play during intermission and will also have a pipe organ solo.

Dr. Heppe, the pastor, in a short talk on the subject, said:

"All of our play should be of such a high order that God will bless us in our play as well as in our work. There is no harm in giving moving pictures of educational and uplifting value in a church. People once considered it horrible to bring organs into churches, and violins were regarded as instruments of the devil. There has come a time when we hope to redeem many things the world is using."

The Wichita Film & Supply Company, Inc., are supplying the films used at these entertainments.

Rochester, N. Y.—The Rochester Hippodrome Company, capitalized at $25,000, has filed a certificate of incorporation.

MANUFACTURERS' NOTES

Says the Portland, Ore., Oregonian:

"Ralph R. Earle, of New York, one of the prominent moving-picture artists of the world, is in Portland and for the next two months will be busy securing material is Portland and Oregon for the Pathe Weekly, a motion-picture record of current events which is shown in every part of the civilized world. Mr. Earle is the operator who took the now famous moving pictures of the Equitable fire in New York, the great flood in Austin and other important events that have happened in different parts of the United States during the past few months."

Mr. Edwin B. Hessor, of the Kinemacolor Company of America, has made arrangements for the taking of a number of pictures of Ithaca, N. Y.

These scenes will be selected in such a manner as to be characteristic of the University City. The films will be arranged in a forty-minute series and will be exhibited first at the Lyceum Theatre, Ithaca.

Cornell University will figure largely in these films, and is the first university in the world to be shown in kinemacolor.

The Globe Amusement Company, of Los Angeles, of which the progressive and well known showman W. H. Nixon is general manager, propose to build within the next few months a circuit of fifteen beautiful suburban houses, each with a seating capacity in the neighborhood of 1,000.

* * * *

L. F. Spaulding, the well known real estate owner and builder, is even now erecting a magnificent theatre to be known as Globe Theatre No. 4, for this company on his lot situated near Eighteenth street on Main. This theatre, when completed, will undoubtedly be the largest and most perfectly equipped motion picture theatre west of Chicago, and will cost $75,000, with a capacity of 1,000.

* * * *

The Globe Theatre at Fifth and Los Angeles streets is in active operation, and the other Theatre buildings under process of construction. The side walls of the Globe Theatre No. 3 at Sunset Boulevard and Echo Park avenue have already reached a height of sixteen feet and the house will undoubtedly be completed and ready for opening within sixty days. This house will have a capacity of over 800 and will cost something over $35,000.

The Olympia theatre, Cleveland, Ohio, one of the largest exclusive moving picture theatres in the United States, opened to the public Saturday evening, April 14th. It is a beautiful playhouse, provided with stage and equipment for any class of theatrical attraction, and is to open with an entertainment of the same nature that has made the Alhambra so popular, and is to be operated in connection with the Alhambra, the Grand and the Globe, under the general management of J. H. Michael.

The theatre seats 2,000 persons. It is absolutely fireproof and embraces every modern idea in theatre construction. The decorations are rich and every comfort of patrons has been well looked after. The $10,000 Moeller concealed pipe organ and chimes are to be in charge of Herbert Sisson and selections will form a part of every entertainment, in addition to orchestral music as accompaniment for the photo plays. The decorations throughout were furnished by the Sterling & Welch Company and draperies by The May Company.

The building includes eight ground floor stores and thirty suites, fronting 200 feet on E. 55th street and 250 feet on Hamlet street.

MAJESTIC RELEASES

Majestic's release for Sunday, May 5th, is an excellent comedy. Majestic's comedies are always good, therefore the public are never surprised to find bobbing up once in a while one better than another. This is the case with "His Wedding Day." It is a dandy, and is produced in the smoothest, most clean-cut manner. The groom in this instance attended a bachelor supper the night previous to his wedding day, and in consequence his memory, not being as brilliant as usual on the day of all days for him, he forgot the ring. A series of funny happenings is the result.

"Redeemed," Majestic release for Tuesday, May 7, is a well worked out drama. The young wife of a French fisherman, stands on the shore, her baby in her arms, and watches her husband go out to sea. The sea claims him, the baby falls ill and dies, and Jeanne, the wife, accepts the offer of an artist, to pose for him. She goes to Paris and becomes the idol of the studios. In a riotous life, hardened by her surroundings, she forgets her gentler feelings and emotions.

A poor artist, in whose mind Jeanne is a Madonna, asks her to pose as the mother of a child. She consents, laughing cynically, but when she takes the baby in her arms a vision of her own child comes to her. She fights the softening influence, but further posing with the baby renews it.

The child's mother dies, leaving it to Jeanne. Her former companions come and ask her to join their carousals, but Jeanne, redeemed by the tender pressure of a baby's arms, renounces them.

THE DUCK HUNT

Champion

This is certainly a very entertaining and novel natural subject, showing the manner of decoying ducks, some exciting sharp-shooting, the largest flock of ducks in the world; also a scene of a hunter with the day's haul. The picture was taken in the Northwest and gives some very fine, scenic views which are bound to elicit admiration.

WHAT MIGHT HAVE BEEN

Champion

After congratulating a girl friend upon her approaching marriage, Miss Celia Rill, a woman of thirty-five, realizes for the first time that she is growing old. As she sits by the fire-side, she goes through her treasure box, and begins to read over the love letters sent her from former admirers. As she reads each letter, we behold a scene showing the present state of each admirer; none of whom has turned out to be a fit husband as they had pledged they would. She comes to one letter, however, written by the only one whom she had loved. A trick of fate had separated them, and as she sits weeping over his letter, in softly steps her beloved. The passing of time had only served to strengthen his love, and thus both are rewarded for their constancy. This release is for May 13th.

HIS WEDDING DAY

Majestic Release, May 5

On the night before the wedding the groom kisses the bride, and goes to a bachelor supper. He makes merry with his men friends, who present him with babies' shoes, a rattle, a toothing ring and so on, ending with a baby carriage, which is rolled on the table, among the many wine bottles. When the party breaks up, the groom generously empties his purse, for the benefit of the waiters, and unsteadily seeks his homeward way.

The bride, meanwhile, has been receiving her girl friends, displaying her presents, and indulging in all the sweet sentimentality that a woman feels at such a time. She finally retires, kissing the groom's picture, and putting it under her pillow.

Contrast the wobbly groom, who cannot find the keyhole, and has recourse to a window to enter his house. His careful placing of his shoes under his pillow. His hanging his hat and coat on the chandelier, and depositing his collar in the water pitcher.

The next morning his alarm clock does its duty, but he smothers its sounds, sleeps again, and when he does awake he is three hours late. Added embarassment, he has forgotten the wedding ring. Hurriedly dressing he rushes to a jeweler's. He has forgotten his purse, "no credit" is the jeweler's motto, and out goes the distracted groom. He enters a cafe, where two of his friends are drinking, and his appeals for cash bring him nothing but an invitation to drink, and roars of laughter from his friends, at his predicament. The highly indignant groom goes to a pawnshop. But his watch is in his evening clothes, he has forgotten his pin, and the pawnbroker is not a humanitarian. He rushes back to his room, and there his empty purse reminds him of his ill-advised generosity of the night before. He gets his watch, and again seeks the pawnbroker.

The bride has arisen promptly. Arrayed in her wedding finery, the minister and guests assembled, she awaits the groom, who is rushing out of the pawnshop, the price of the ring in his grasp. Again to the jeweler's. He secures the precious token, hurries out, and hales an automobile. After the occasional manner of automobiles, this one breaks down. An ash cart carries out the "any port in a storm" idea. The ash man is willing, and he and the groom belabor the surprised and indignant old horse, which draws them speedily to the bride's house. But further disaster awaits. There is no money to satisfy the ash cart driver's demands, he decides to take it out on the groom and a fight ensues.

Wonder, impatience, fear and despair have succeeded one another in the bride's mind. Hysterics are about to follow, as the guests are preparing to leave. Sounds of conflict are heard outside, the bride's father investigates, and advances money to pay the belligerent driver. The groom joins the wedding party, and explains. He starts to produce the trouble-making ring, but cannot find it. A frantie search, however, reveals it in an unexpected pocket, and his troubles are over, for the day.

REDEEMED

Majestic Release, May 7

Jeanne is the young wife of a French fisherman. He goes to sea, with his comrades, leaving her watching from the shore, her baby in her arms. The sea claims the husband, illness and death take the baby, and Jeanne is heartsick and hopeless.

Attracted by her beauty a visiting artist has asked her to pose for him, and, thinking to escape her memories, Jeanne goes to his studio, in Paris. She finds herself overwhelmed with attention, and soon falls into the easy-going, lax life of the Latin Quarter. Her bitter memories are gone, replaced by a reckless coldness and cynicism that see nothing of beauty or idealism in the life about her. She becomes hardened, and indifferent to the gentler emotions.

Raoul, a poor artist, is painting a picture of a mother with her child in her arms. His model becomes ill, and cannot pose longer. Raoul sees in Jeanne's beauty the ideal of the Madonna and child. He asks her to pose for him. She laughingly consents, the idea appealing to her satirical sense of humor.

But when the baby is given to her, and its arms tighten around her neck, a vision comes to her of herself, in her home by the sea, with her own child. Half hysterical she relinquishes the child, dashes out, and once more with her companions, tries to forget the vision in dissipation.

But the memory will not down. Again she seeks Raoul's studio, and poses with the baby until the picture is finished, and the softening influence grows stronger and stronger. The child's mother dies, intrusting her baby to Jeanne, and this touch of confidence, and the love for the child, complete Jeanne's redemption. Her friends go to her room, to get her to join their carousals, but she sends them away. With the baby in her arms, Jeanne has found an old and a new life.

THE VOICE OF THE PAST

Eclair Release May 5

Grandmother, watchful of her servants, surprises her valet talking with her granddaughter Jeannette. To punish the obstinate young girl, she locks her in the garret. Jeannette inspects her prison and notices a large trunk. She opens it, and finds the wedding garments of her grandparents. A few minutes later the girls employed on the farm, rush into the garret, Jeannette and Lucien are donning their grandparents wedding garments, and they all descend with great precaution, preceded by a violinist in imitation of a real wedding procession. Grandmother, asleep near the fireplace is dreaming of her younger days, she sees again her marriage, the procession passing in front of the church, while the wedding bells are ringing. She awakens, rubs her eyes, hears the music of the violin, which is playing in a low tone; she follows the movements of the music, with her head, all absorbed by the feeling of the past. Is it really a dream? She turns to find her children kneeling at her feet! Jeanette's tricks have succeeded, and grandmother consents to a union, which is the desire of everyone present.

TWO FOOLS THERE WERE

Gaumont Release, May 26

Two brothers live peaceably together until a motor accident happens to bring to the house a woman with whom they at once fall in love. She is a flirt, and encourages their attentions, with the result that they are soon at enmity with one another. As a matter of fact she is already engaged and her lover and father call and fetch her away whilst the brothers are out. The father leaves a letter stating that they have all gone to America, and the brothers, realizing that the girl has been duping them, resume their friendly relations and pursue the even tenor of their way, at peace with themselves and the world in general.

ZAMETTO'S MARRIAGE

Gaumont Release May 30

The Duke's Discomfiture.

This is a beautiful colored film, which tells us a love history of bygone times, wherein the gorgeous costumes, artistic setting, and superb acting combine together to give us one of the finest productions yet put before the public.

A handsome young Minstrel has passed the night, wrapped in his mantle, beneath the twinkling stars. Awaking with the dawn, the youth looks to his guitar with fond affection, and prepares to leave his erstwhile resting place.

But suddenly the musician's attention is arrested by an equipage standing some little distance away. Two attendants are observed dosing on either side of a magnificent sedan chair, and so sound is their sleep that an idea suggests itself to the adventurer. Approaching quietly, he opens the door and quickly conceals himself within its luxurious embrace. The valets are awakened, and thinking their master has given the order, they hurriedly take up the chair and start on their journey. Shortly after the little party has left the mansion, several waiting men emerge from the entrance, one of whom calls for the Duke's chair. The rheumatic old dandy appears at the door, and his rage may be imagined on finding that his equipage has disappeared. Impatient to fulfil his appointment, he starts away on foot to see the pretty Phyllis to whom he is paying his court.

Meanwhile the carriers have transported Zametto to Phyllis's beautiful residence. The beauty who is impatiently awaiting the Duke's visit, is stupefied at the unexpected apparition which alights from the sedan—an apparition so handsome and gallant that he soon gains favor with the charming lady. Poet and musician, Zametto wins the heart of his pretty hostess, and a delicious love scene takes place in the embowered garden, fragrant with flowers and foliage.

Whilst thus agreeably engaged, the fiery old Duke surprises them, and seeks to run the musician through with his rapier; but Zametto disarms the enraged nobleman with his guitar, and the old coxcomb collapses on his seat. However, he will not yet acknowledge defeat, and writes laying his title and fortune at the feet of the fair Phyllis, who replies, "What matters fortune, when one has youth and love. I love and shall marry my Minstrel."

COMING A tender, touching two-reel story radiant with the delicacy of maternity, showing a sympathetic angle of the relation of daughter to mother. A tale of love that will better your box office.

THE BABY'S SHOES
Republic Release, May 7

REP Frank Fenton and wife are mourning the death of their first born. It preys so on tbe mind of the young father that he drinks to drown his sorrow, neglecting wife and home until she can endure it no longer and seeks relief in the divorce courts, and a few years later she becomes the wife of William Brown.

In the meantime, Frank Fenton goes from bad to worse and becomes a burglar. One night he enters Brown's house, not knowing it is the home of his former wife. Safe in his rookery, he looks over his haul—in a little cabinet box he finds a tiny pair of baby's shoes with a card attached, and in his own handwriting, the name of his own infant, date of birth, and death.

Braving all dangers of being arrested he writes to the lady of the house which he bad robbed stating that if not molested he will return certain articles be has stolen from tbe house. In due time comes a reply stating tbat the lady of the house will be pleased to receive him. In the meantime, she has sent to headquarters for a detective. The thief is usbered in; he recognizes the woman, but she does not recognize her former husband. He takes from under his coat the small cabinet and hands it to her—she opens it and takes out the tiny baby's shoes, looks at them, bows her head over them and kisses them. Frank wipes his eyes with his coat sleeves, and turns as if to go. She talks to him and asks him why he took these above all things. He replies, "Only to bring back the saddest memory of my miserable life." She then recognizes her former husband.

Frank looks at her "Am I now free to go?" She nods yes, he holds out his hand and says, "Won't you take it for old time's sake?" She slowly looks up and extends her band—he takes it and kisses it, holds it for a moment, shows deep emotion and lets it drop and slowly starts for the door. She looks up, calls softly to him, he turns, and she takes the pair of shoes, breaks the ribbon that holds them together and extends one of the shoes to him.

FROM THE PATH DIRECT
Republic Release, May 11

Rufus and Jobn Meredith, two brothers, are in love with Mary Warren. Rufus proposes and is rejected. Jobn, being the favored one, later marries Mary. Rufus takes the wrong path while John becomes a prosperous man. Rufus is continually borrowing money from his brother, which he squanders. His brother becomes aware of Rufus' dissipated habits and upbraids him. Rufus resents his brother's interference, then John declares he need expect no more money from him.

Rufus is threatened with imprisonment for a debt and realizing that he can ask his brother's assistance he goes to his brother's home and asks for a loan, not telling him the trouble he is in. John refuses him help and a quarrel ensues in which Rufus is ordered from the house. Rufus, thinking that bis brother's wife can help him, writes her a note asking her to meet him; she does so, and when she learns of Rufus' request she expresses her regret that she cannot help him. While they are talking, John sees his wife and brother together, and when his wife returns to the house he questions her about being with Rufus. She resents his attitude toward her and refuses explanation.

John leaves on a business trip and Rufus, becoming desperate, decides to obtain money from his brother's strong box. He enters the house and being surprised by John's wife, he holds her up with a revolver, shielding his face with a cloak. John, while on the way, discovers the absence of some valuable papers, which he recalls having left on the table during his quarrel with his wife. He starts back toward the house. John's sudden arrival prevents Rufus from leaving the house and he conceals himself in a clock and John, entering, is told by his wife of the intruder. John is aware of no one passing him in the hall but is attracted by the clock being stopped. He infers that there is some one in the clock; he orders the person to come out and, not being obeyed, he fires through the door of the clock. John then opens the door and his brother Rufus falls on the floor wounded.

John, believing that the reason his brother is in the house is because he is his wife's lover, refuses to listen to his wife's explanation. Later, when Rufus regains consciousness, he explains everything to John's satisfaction, showing the letter which prompted him to enter the house in order to rob his brother. Rufus is forgiven and John pays the debt. Rufus promises to mend his ways, thankful that his wound was not serious.

REALIZATION OF A CHILD'S DREAM
Champion Release, May 6

Horace Winton, his wife, and their only child, Eva, composed a very happy group one fine morning. Just as Mr. Winton is about to start for his office, little Eva comes to him with tears in her eyes. She has broken a favorite toy. The proud father consoles her with a promise of a new one on his return that evening. Unable to secure a duplicate, Mr. Winton, knowing Eva's love for animals, buys her a toy dog, of which she soon becomes very fond.

One night she takes the toy to bed with her and in her childish dreams the toy comes to life. Her dreamland adventures take her and her dog to the pantry, where she feeds the dog on milk and cakes; thence to the street, where a candy store is visited, and in the meantime meeting many of her playmates. In the possession of her beautiful doggie she is both proud and happy. But, alas! dreams must end. The next morning she awakens to find not the frisky, playful dog of her dreams, but merely the wooden, fur-covered toy.

Her childish disappointment is so great that she cries out in agony, and in her frantic scramble to tell her woes to her mother she falls from her bed, striking her head on the up-turned leg of her toy, thus rendering her unconscious. The parents come in and anxiously behold the situation. The doctor is immediately called for, and he dressed the wound, giving them assurance that it is nothing serious, and that she will soon be well again.

Two weeks pass by and little Eva is restored to health, but her mind is a blank. The shock, together with her vivid dream, has unbalanced her mind. The doctor puzzles over the strange case, and decides to experiment upon a remedy. In her delirium little Eva imagines her toy is alive, so they secure a living dog and replace the toy. Eva will not accept it, however, for it is a white dog, while her toy is black. Not until they have secured an exact duplicate of the black toy dog are they able to make the exchange. And then Eva's joy on beholding her dreams come true restores her shattered mind.

LUCKY JIM
Champion Release, May 8

In the first place Jim Baldwin has earned the sobriquet of Lucky Jim. Jim is a fine fellow, yet the sort that doesn't find favor with the boys. The ranchman's daughter, Bess, comes to the ranch and all the boys are introduced to her, except Jim. "Jim,"—he stands apart,—yet is the first to reach her heart." Later on, the ranchman takes Bess out, accompanied by all the boys, except Jim. The boys laugh at him as they go out, and he is left alone; but presently the girl returns for some reason or other, and in geting off her horse, hurts a foot or seems to. "Thus she soothes her love's alarms, and hurts her foot to reach his arms." Jim picks her up in his arms, and carries her off—Lucky Jim.

Later on the girl's father is bitten by a snake. The boys run for a doctor, but Jim remains and draws out the venom with his lips. "Thus he saves the ranchman's life and wins his favor and a wife." Soon, again, an old Indian is rescued from the clutches of a disreputable character by Bess. The gratitude is shown when he gives her gold and also the right to a claim. But Jim is also a sharer on this deal, accompanying Bess to the old Indian "dug-out." The latter gives him an equal interest with Bess, rightly judging that one day she'll be his squaw. "Thus, again, we see Lucky Jim, and how all things come to him."

It is a screening of a remarkable story, depicting Western life in its best estate.

THE END OF THE FEUD

American Release, May 2

Old man Jackson was born in Kentucky. So was his father and his only son, Bruce. Hence it was not surprising that Bruce's grandfather began a feud with George Perriwell which his son had sworn to carry forward. But Perriwell moved to a remote part of Kentucky, and Jackson was never able to execute his promise.

When Jackson lay on his death-bed the memory of his promise to his father recurred to him. He called Bruce, told him of the feud, gave him the family enemy's name, and swore his son to avenge the parental honor. This Bruce, crying over his father's death-bed, promised to do.

When Jackson had been buried Bruce packed his belongings, swung them over his shoulder, mounted his horse, and started Westward. Carefully, he treasured the badly scrawled name, "George Perriwell," in his pocket.

In the desert, Bruce's horse died. The lad staggered bravely forward, until, water gone, and with dry, parched throat, his exhausted frame gave way. Two hours later a prairie schooner appeared. Its proprietor found him near death and, with the aid of his pretty daughter, Margaret, nursed him back to life. In the days that followed the pair grew to love each other deeply, and one day asked the father's sonsent. The emigrant slapped Bruce heartily on the back and bade him welcome to the family.

Then came a day, when, the caravan stopping for lunch, Bruce was left alone about the wagon. The wind blew a flap of the canvas cover, exposing a name. Suddenly it occurred to him that he had never heard his benefactor's last name. In Western fashion, it had been "George" and "Bruce" with them. He had called her "Margaret," because her father did. The truth flashed over him, dashing his new-found happiness to death, for there on the inside canvas cover was the name, "George Perriwell."

Perriwell appeared. He beckoned him to a distant grove of trees, told his name, and, with tears running down his cheeks, fired straight at Perriwell. The gun missed fire. Perriwell, meantime, took careful aim at his antagonist. Then, suddenly Margaret hurled herself into her father's arms. Perriwell hesitated, then, seeing the outstretched hand of Bruce, clasped it with his own, thus ending a feud that threatened to wreck three lives.

HER WEDDING DRESS

American Release, May 6

The crowd swarmed out of the little Baptist church. Miss Betty Bartlett, just turned 38, hesitated, glanced timidly around among her friends, and, seeing the slightly stooped form of Bob Plummer joining the throng at the foot of the step, swung hastily in the opposite direction.

Arrived at her pretty cottage, Betty stopped. She looked longingly down the shaded avenue, glanced with a sigh at the finger that had borne an engagement ring for ten long years. A vision came—a vision of herself and Bob Plummer, ten years ago, when he had placed that ring with a kiss on the third finger of the left hand, promising that when he had saved enough he would claim her. But, while the memory lingered in Bob's heart, the long-expected ship never arrived.

There were wild scenes at the post-office the following day. Old Zeb Winters eyed with much curiosity the long, white envelope that bore the name of a prominent legal firm in the far East. He had it—"Miss Betty's an heiress!" The news spread. Little Miss Williams, waving the envelope above her head, proclaimed the fact broadcast. Bob Plummer listened with wonder.

Miss Williams told the glad news. She was followed shortly by Zeb Winters, who soon found an opportunity to declare his matrimonial aspirations. The first visitors in ten years pleased and delighted Miss Betty, but it was not until Bob Plummer, hanging in the outskirts of the little cottage, arrived, that she was really happy. And Bob finally proposed.

Two weeks of domestic bliss followed. Then a second envelope arrived from the legal firm. They opened it together. It read: "Thanks for your prompt reply." No mention of an heritage! Bob was dumfounded, and Betty much surprised at his strange actions. When Bob inquired about the inheritance, Betty was even more surprised. She knew nothing of a legacy. Then it suddenly dawned upon her why Bob had married her, and why all those recent visitors.

Bob left the house and walked into the garden. When he returned the battle was over. He found a note of farewell from Betty, and hurried into the garden, where all accounts were squared.

THE IMPOSTER

Nestor Release, April 29

John Sanborn, a fine young fellow, is on his way to visit the family and take charge of the estate of his best friend, Ned Miller, who has recently died. Mrs. Miller and daughter are looking forward to the visit of Sanborn, whom they have never seen.

Sanborn stops in a park for a moment's rest. From a wallet he extracts the cordial letter he had received from Ned's mother and re-reads it with great satisfaction. Arising from the bench, he suddenly faints and tumbles down in a heap. Henry Vincent, a poor, struggling young author, goes to the fallen man's assistance. After Sanborn is taken away in an ambulance, Vincent finds the wallet and attempts to return it, but without success.

The next day, reading that there is no hope of Sanborn recovering his mind and probably his life, and being in desperate circumstances, Vincent yields to temptation, and with the money and the letter, he goes to the home of Mrs. Miller, where he impersonates Sanborn. Being brilliant and attractive, he finds no difficulty in making Mrs. Miller and her daughter believe that the best friend of Ned has come to protect them.

He suffers much, as he falls in love with Rita Miller and, being a decent fellow, he

THE EVERLASTING JUDY

Nestor Release, May 1

Poor, henpecked Jed is left to sweep the floor and wash the dishes while his wife, Judy, goes to the village to shop. No sooner is she gone, however, than Jed seats himself to have a good smoke, a forbidden pleasure in the house. Judy, returning unexpectedly, surprises her frightened husband and, taking him by the ear, marches him into the kitchen to wash the dishes, while she sits calmly in the sitting-room to wait until he has finished. As he is carrying the dishpan to the sink it falls, breaking his wife's hest china. With one glance toward the sitting-room door, Jed dives through the window, and when Judy gets to the kitchen Jed is already half way down the street.

Arriving at the village, two of his friends take him to the nearest har to give him a little "courage," but, after spending an hour with them, Jed decides it would be hest to take a quiet little nap before approaching his loving wife, and accordingly climbs into an empty hox car, which is soon hearing the sleeping Jed to the glorious West.

Some time elapses. Judy, not having heard from her husband, has accepted an offer from a Western mining camp to act as cook, and is accordingly met with due deference by the foreman. His gallantry and that of the hoys is entirely lost on Judy, and she at once starts in to rule the camp with an iron rod. It is at this point that Jed, who is in the vicinity looking for work, meets the foreman and is offered a joh. He meets his wife face to face when he enters for dinner and, terror-stricken, he makes a dash for the door, overturning table and chairs as he goes. The boys, however, soon overtake him and listen in sympathy to his explanation. Taking their lariats, they rig them up as though to hang Jed, believing it will excite the compassion of Judy, but, instead, she snatches up a whip and proceeds to wield it with all her strength until the boys succeed in roping her and getting her to the house.

The next day Judy sets out hag and haggage with her husband in tow, bent upon returning to their little town. At the railroad station Jed dutifully helps his wife upon the train, but just as it starts to gather speed, Jed swings off, to the glee of the waiting hoys and the utter consternation of Judy. Then, lest she should return, the boys hurry him upon a horse with the advice "to keep right on a-ridin'."

THE SALESLADY

Thanhouser Release, May 7

They said in the big department store that "nothing could please Nora Grady." She was a saleslady, hard working, hut with plenty of heart, and, her enemies whispered, a hit of temper. She didn't love her daily grind, but the father and mother and the little sister needed the money, so she kept at it.

Love had never entered her life, she was too husy, but they say that pity is akin to love, and that was how her funny litle romance started. A gawky country boy applied for work, and he was so helpless that Nora felt sorry for him, guided him to the proper department and aided materially in landing him in the wrapping room.

The ruralite was very grateful. He thanked Nora and she invited him to dinner. She advised him how he could make his work count, and he followed her suggestions as hest he could. hut he never was nor would he ever be the "capahle" hand that the girl was.

The owner of the store was a man who helieved in developing talent. He offered a cash reward and promotion for the employee who suggested the best way to display the spring fashions, and many men and women entered as competitors. When the ideas were examined there was one that stood out, head and shoulders over the rest, and the superintendent candidly expressed surprise that "the country yawp in the wrapping room had real ideas." For the man that Nora helped was the prize winner.

The firm didn't break faith with him. He was taken out of the lowly position, given a frock coat at cost, and told that from then on he was a floorwalker. He was a happy little floorwalker too, for the joh suited him, hut the superintendent would occasionally look at him in a worried manner, and remark, "He seems all right, hut who would ever imagine he could think?"

The floorwalker grew more haughty as the days passed. He ignored the girl who had first brought him into the store, and for once Nora had nothing to say. In this case, little sister, also employed in the store, did the talking for the family.

She went to the superintendent and told him that the prize winning idea was Nora's, but that she felt sorry for the meek little man from the country, and wanted to hoost him along. And the superintendent swore bitterly and sent for the floorwalker to come on the run.

The messenger found the floorwalker, who was in the seventh heaven of delight. He had just escorted the boss's daughter about the storc and to her auto, and dreamed of the day when she would he his bride. Then he tripped into the office and met his Waterloo.

Tearfully he confessed. Savagely the superintendent rebuked him. Happily, little sister laughed. Then sentence was pronounced.

He wasn't fired. That was because Nora interceded for him, but he ceased to be a floorwalker and was restored to the wrapping room. It is said they offered to put his frock coat back in stock. hut he held to it as the only remaining sign of his once grandeur. Nora was promoted, but "the Ingrate" stuck to his cord and twine to the end of the chapter, and probably never realized what a weak man he really was.

LOVE'S MIRACLE

Thanhouser Release, May 10

Wealth does not always hring happiness. The girl was young, rich, but an invalid, and the noted physicians who cared for her shook their heads wisely and gravely pronounced her case as one of general ill health, a gradual wasting away.

Her one trouble, although the physicians did not suspect it, was that the girl did not really care whether she lived or died. Life was tiresome, she had no one to care for, nothing to be interested in, and whether the end came sooner or later did not seem to her to be a matter of much concern.

Then there came a startling change.

The girl, in her invalid's chair, was seated on the beach one pleasant morning, when a convict, hunted hy dogs and men, swam ashore at her feet. He first threatened her, then begged her protection. The girl listened with interest. She realized that here was a fellow invalid, for while her ailment was physical, his was moral, and it struck her that while no one apparently could cure her, she could and would cure him.

So she provided a hiding place for him, supplied him with food, clothing and money, and aided him to elude his pursuers. All she asked of him was that he lead a new life, and this he solemnly promised that he would do.

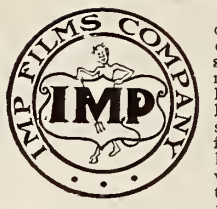
Time passed on, and much to her surprise, she heard from her "patient." He was not as bad as she thought, in fact he had heen sent to jail for another's crime and was able later to establish his innocence. Other letters told of his making a new place in the world and steadily forging ahead, and each breathed a message that he owed everything he had or expected to have to her.

Not many months after the hunted and disheartened convict had stolen from her presence, the girl met him again. But this time, he came to her a free man, his head erect, and the joy of living in his eyes. He told her he had come to pay his debt of gratitude for the new life she had placed within his hands, by showing her that the future held nothing but happiness for them both. He asked her to become his wife, but the girl, feeling she was a confirmed invalid, refused him, although he had grown to he her whole life.

Then the miracle transpired. With her hands clasped in his, and his eyes looking into hers, he told her she was no longer ill, that she was to grow well and strong for his sake. Standing a few paces away he held out his arms to her, breathing the one word, "Come." Scarcely realizing what she was doing, the girl struggled tremhling to her feet, and stood alone, as she had not done for years. Then smiling and confident of her power to conquer death, she walked into the arms of love.

ON THE SHORE

Imp Release, May 6



Old Tom Morgan had occupied his little shack on the shore it almost seemed from time immemorial. He was happy there; he made his living out of the sea, which was visible from his door, and the least of his thoughts was that he was likely to be evicted while life remained to him.

His pretty daughter, Bess, who was his helper, mended his nets, etc., was in the same way of thinking as regarded the tenure of possession of the shack.

But the march of improvement could not be withstood. So it fell that one day a new dock was projected and Morgan was given notice of eviction. Refusing to go, means were taken to force him out. There was a quarrel, and the manager of the steamship company was wounded. Of course Tom Morgan was arrested.

Bess intervened in behalf of her father and made such a pretty and convincing speech to the dock manager, that the latter wounded though he was, readily forgave Tom, fell in love with the daughter, and left the old man in undisputed possession of his home.

The steamship company decided to lengthen an existing dock instead of huilding a new one.

THE LAND OF PROMISE

Imp Release, May 9

José and his wife having found conditions poor in their own country, Mexico, emigrate to Southern California. They enter the land of promise full of hope and joyful anticipation even though they are almost at the end of their resources. They are seen by some of the native sons taking possession of an old adohe shack without the formality of asking permission. The men thereupon advise the owner of the shack of the trespass of the unwelcome and despised Mexicans. The owner goes to see them and demands rent; Jose gives him all he has which is short of the sum demanded. José is downhearted and discouraged when he finds himself without money, food, or work.

His wife, however, cheers him with words of encouragement and Jose' leaves in search of work. He applies at a ranch hut fails to obtain employment. Wandering disconsolate ahout he comes upon the foreman of a road grading gang, who has just set a mine for a blast. He applies to him for work, hut is again disappointed. The foreman has just lighted the fuse and they run for cover. Just then José sees the ranchowner riding by the set mine. He shouts but the ranchowner does not hear. José then darts forward, grabs the horse hy the bridle, turns him and runs him out of danger. The foreman calls to José to save himself hut he is too late. The blast explodes and fragments strike José. He insists upon going home without assistance. His wife meets him at the door, leads him in, handages the wound then soothes him to sleep.

Finding nothing nourishing in the house for José in his weakened condition and no money to purchase food, she becomes desperate and determines to secure one or the other.

In the meantime, reward notices have been posted in an effort to affect the capture of cattle rustlers, who have been operating in the vicinity.

The wife starts out and seeing a calf tied in a corral and nohody in sight, she decides to take it. One of the boys sees her, and notifying the others, they follow her. She deserts the calf in the road and half dead from fright hurries home. The ranchowner and the boys reach the house and are about to treat her roughly, when the former recognizes in José the man who saved his life. Explanations are forthcoming and when the ranchowner learns that hunger prompted the deed, he starts a subscription and turns the amount over to José; then offers him work on his ranch. They then depart, leaving husband and wife to rejoice over the turn of the tide of their fortunes.

LÈT WILLIE DO IT

Imp Release, May 11

Willie promises to give up smoking, and other evil hahits, in order to win the affections of his sweetheart, but unfortunately does not keep his promise, and falls into disrepute.

The cook heing reprimanded by her mistress leaves and matters in the house are all awry when in the emergency Willie is appealed to in his office to come and straighten out matters. He encounters more than he bargained for being set to do the cooking, dishwashing and cleaning work from which he would escape were it not that company was expected.

He, however, stuck to his joh and in tbe end placates his fiancee and her mother hy his willingness to atone for his smoking habit hy his domestic inclinations.

J. R. Cumpson and Grace Lewis play the lead in this hright little comedy.

On tbe same reel:

THE STAFF OF AGE

Picturesque old Lawrence Shea was quite a figure in his district. He was crippled as well as venerable and he peddled shoe laces and other trifles for a living. His only possession of any consequence in this world was a small hut precocious grandson who tended the old man as best he could, and was himself tended in return.

The little hoy was thrifty, frugal and persevering and so it fell that when one day old Lawrence was arrtsted for peddling without a license, the boy was ahle to come to the assistance of his grandfather by going to court and proffering payment of the fine, which the kindly judge refused to accept, and released the poor old man.

So the aged derelict and the small boy, so full of promise, returned home to work out their respective destinies in accordance with prohabilities.

Tbe picture depicts graphically the life of the poor as it is lived in all large cities. The characters of the grandfather and the hoy are picturesque and there is opportunity for some pathetic acting by both characters as well as the realistic representation of one of those humane police court scenes that are, alas, unfortunately of too common occurrence.

THE WOOING OF ALICE
Solax Release, May 8

Now and then, in literature, as well as in real life, one comes across a character who is absolutely repulsive and ohnoxious, hut has a certain uncanny attraction, a certain fascination, an intangible magnetism, that a weaker person will find difficult to defy. Such a character is "Bull" Hicks. He is burly and rough-necked, and is feared hy his evil associates, as a leopard fears the tiger. "The Bull," as Hicks is called by his pals, has every one "bluffed." Meek and poor Alice is also under tbe spell of his domineering personality.

Soon, however, a new influence comes into the life of Alice. Geoffrey Hall, a young clubman, and his friends, go slumming, and find themselves in a dance hall of questionahle repute. A number of typical characters of the neighhorhood are enjoying themselves in the ploce. "The Bull" and his "gal," Alice, are also amongst the crowd. As soon as Hall sees Alice, he sees that she does not belong in such an environment. Somehow she stands out strikingly and hy contrast, attracts attention.

Of course, the inevitahle happens. Geoffrey becomes interested in Alice, and thus incurs the displeasure of "The Bull." There is a fight, after wbich Alice goes to the house of Hall, where she is looked after hy Hall's mother. "The Bull" comes to claim Alice, and in one of the most remarkahle scenes in pictures, and exhihitions of acting, "Tbe Bull" shows that at last he has lost his power. The struggle is hard. There is a hattle royal of good with evil, and good finally conquers. Alice, hy a supreme effort, casts off the spell in which "The Bull" has had her enveloped.

THE MUSICIAN'S LOVE
Great Northern Release, May 4

Irma, the village belle, is loved by Errol, a young musician, and she returns his love, although forbidden hy her mother, for Erroll is poor, and the mother has higher aspirations, for tbe girl, convinced that her heauty should bring her riches. Andrew, the son of a wealthy merchant, loves the girl, hut is in every way unworthy, heing a boor and a bully. There is a gay dance on the village green, and Errol is engaged to play. Irma wishes to mingle with the merry-makers, but is forhidden by her mother as a punishment for meeting Errol against her wisbes. Irma wanders down by a pretty brook, and Andrew, missing her from the gay party, sets out in quest of the girl. He finds her in her sorrow and forces his attentions upon her. She repulses him and, in his rage, he throws her to the ground, where she is found by a hunter and taken to his cabin, the hunter chastising tbe ruffian. Andrew is taken into the presence of his father by the hunter, and the matter explained. The father is grieved at the action of the son. Andrew visits the dance and attacks Errol, and in the struggle the precious violin is broken, and Errol is disconsolate. Irma tries to cheer him, but to no avail. He will never he happy again. The father of Andrew purchases a violin, a sweet-toned Cremona, and presents it to Errol, apologizing for the actions of the son. Errol attunes the instrument and plays with his mother and Irma as listeners. The effect is marvelous, and the young musician is happy in the love of the girl and the possession of the priceless violin.

On the same reel:

NORWEGIAN MOUNTAIN CLEFTS

About 350 feet of marvelously beautiful scenery, photographed in the mountains of Norway, which cannot fail to interest. The pictures are clear and sharp, and the splendor of the towering mountains, with the winding roads and beautiful waterfalls, are a parorama of picturesque and gorgeous scenes which will enrapture and delight.

HER CORNER ON HEARTS
Nestor Release, May 4

Alice is Jack's girl. Calling at her home to take her to a party, he makes her promise not to flirt with the boys, for Jack is the jealous kid.

At the party Alice forgets the promise and flirts freely. The lovers quarrel; Alice finally throws Jack's houquet at his feet and walks away to join pleasanter company. She now flirts more outrageously than ever and three young men separately promise to take her home. They soon realize that Alice is using them as catspaws and conclude to teach her a lesson by letting her go home unescorted. Even Jack deserts her.

Alice refuses to let the butler accompany her home and starts on her way alone. She is accosted hy a young dude hut the timely appearance of a working man returning from his night shift saves her from further annoyance. The working man, going in the same direction as Alice, accompanies her to her corner.

Jack, meantime, has taken another girl home. Feeling that he has wronged Alice, he hurries to overtake her. Near her home the lovers meet; he pleads and she is unforgiving. The honest working man is husy lighting his pipe; glancing hack, he sees, as he supposes, another dude annoying the young lady. Swiftly he comes upon them and with one blow fells Jack to the ground. Alice screams, then hastens to explain matters. Jack gives his assailant a cigar and the man with the mighty fist departs in peace.

At the gate the estranged twain linger after the most approved fashion of lovers, kiss and make up.

On the same reel:

ISLETA, N. M., INDIAN CITY

A complete panoramic view of Isleta, the Indian city, built about A.D. 1500, transports the no-looker to a forgotten age, for the picture fails to show anything approaching modern times. The only structure linking the past to the present is the Church of San Felipe, which is more than four hundred years old, and is the house of worship for the entire population of this strange and quaint town numbering some ten hundred or more Pueblo Indians. A saintly French priest ministers to the spiritual wants of these interesting people, who are very devout Catholics. Twenty per cent of the population speaks English and the remainder Spanish.

The Pueblo Indian, his abode and his mode of living are graphically shown. Mr. and Mrs. Juan P. Lente and their educated daughter, Marie, trained at the Alburquerque Indian School, form but one of the many interesting and picturesque groups.

A BRIDEGROOM'S TROUBLES
Powers' Release, May 7

Jemison is not a particularly young man, but is a very ardent lover, and when his wedding day arrives he is the happiest man alive. Alas for the stability of human hopes; Jemison starts off for the house of his intended in an automobile, and his troubles begin. The machine is run by an irascible chauffeur, who disagrees with Jemison regarding the fare, and the result of the argument leaves Jemison with a badly damaged wardrobe. Jemison's efforts, in the house of his expected bride, to obtain the proper habiliments of a bridegroom form a series of incidents and accidents that are pleasanter to witness than experience. The ceremony is finally performed, however, just in the nick of time to catch the train, and Mr. and Mrs. Jemison escape from a land of troubles to a world of married bliss.

RETRIBUTION
Powers' Release, May 11

Horace Marsden is an ambitious young chemist who, while poor in this world's goods, is blessed by the love of lovely Ethel Martin, whom he expects to make his wife. He, alas, has a sworn friend, Edward Marshall.

Horace discovers a wonderful germ killer for the purification of water, and hastens to inform Ethel and his friend, to both of whom he gives a demonstration of his discovery. Marshall, who is a promoter, sees a great opportunity in the germ killer, and proposes celebrating his friend's success, at the same time offering to assist him in a financial way. They go to Marshall's apartment and Marshall induces Horace to drink until he becomes intoxicated. He then ships Horace aboard a tramp steamer bound for a foreign port, first making a copy of the formula for the germ killer, which he immediately has patented. He then makes Ethel and her mother believe that Horace has eloped with another woman. Later on, aided by her mother, he persuades Ethel to marry him, and they go West, where he begins the manufacture of a germ killer.

Horace works his way back on another steamer, and lands in a destitute condition. Unable to find Ethel or his friend, Marshall, and having no money with which to place his discovery on the market, he gives up the struggle, and hopeless and ambitionless, he becomes an aimless wanderer.

Six years later, Horace accidentally arrives in the town where Marshall lives, and noticing a poster advertising the germ killer, under Marshall's name, he goes to Marshall's home to demand a settlement. Here, to his astonishment, he meets Ethel and her child, and learns for the first time the full extent of Marshall's treachery. Ethel is astonished at meeting Horace and naturally upbraids him for having deceived her so cruelly. Horace defends himself, explaining most fully Marshall's infamy. Ethel, shocked and disillusioned, sends for Marshall, and the men have a terrible scene, and only the intervention of Ethel prevents Horace from shooting his enemy. Then Ethel bids Morshall farewell forever, and in spite of his pleadings for forgiveness, she takes her child and leaves him, crushed with shame and remorse. Horace, feeling that his revenge is complete, also departs, leaving his revolver on the floor. Then Marshall, picking up the weapon, sits gazing at it, realizing that he has lost all that is worth living for; the love of his wife and child, and the respect of the community.

A GYPSY'S LOVE
Shamrock Release, May 7

Leila, a gypsy maiden, is in love with a handsome youth who came to her rescue when she was attacked by a couple of ruffians. An innocent flirtation follows, and the ardent blood of the gypsy becomes inflamed; she takes the attentions of the youth seriously. He later marries a young woman of his choice, and after an interval of a few years they have a beautiful child. This little one, left in charge of a careless maid, wanders away across the fields and is soon lost to view in a meadow of golden rod. The child becomes weary, seats itself in the midst of the flowers. It so transpires that the band of gypsies passes. Leila, the gypsy maiden, is among them. They see the child; thinking that they will receive a reward for finding it, they carry the little one away. The distracted parents, after a vain search, believe their darling dead, yet continue the search, heart-broken, with hope abandoned. Through a newspaper, inadvertently dropped, Leila learns the identity of the child, and in a spirit of vengeance concludes to keep it. She places the litle girl in a fashionable seminary, and toils for years for its maintenance and education. Eleven years later, Leila visits the child, who has now grown to girlhood, and, remorseful, tells her story to one of the good Sisters, who persuades her to return the little girl to its parents. Accompanied by one of the Sisters, she visits the home of her former sweetheart, and makes a full and complete confession, and disappeared in a maze of memories, friendless, abandoned, and alone.

AUTO SUGGESTION
Solax Release, May 10

Billy takes his friend Tom out for a drive in his new car. Tom gets off to make a purchase, and while Billy is waiting, along comes Marian, beautifully clad. Billy wishes to himself that she would come into his car. Somehow his wish is immediately fulfilled—for Marian—thinking that he is a public chauffeur, hires him. Billy blissfully drives Marian on, and at his journey's end, tells Marian that she may always have his car at cut rates, if she 'phones him at the garage.

Billy rides off in high spirits. He is rich in imagination, and already sees himself embroiled in a temptuous love affair. After a series of auto complications and fun, with mistaken identities worked out in an entirely new way, and in an atmosphere absolutely original, mirth-provoking Billy boldly captures his pretty maid and rides off—but the car breaks down, and so we see them both in the end fixing the car amidst besmudged and begreased bliss.

FATE'S WARNING
Rex Release, May 2

The woof that is woven int the warp of to-morrow is a strange fabric. In its meshes is concealed all the history and mystery of the future hours that will sometime be to-day. To-morrow is the only institution that can lay any plans for the future and get away with it. Yesterday and to-day are pikers compared with to-morrow. Until the last clock ticks away the last hour, to-morrow is the only thing in the world that is really eternal. To-morrow is always the newest thing on earth. If we could see the secrets of the days still in the womb of time, if we could read the message of the unborn years, many a sorry sob of the soul, many a bitter throb of the heart, would be spared. That's just what happens presently.

The woman was a countess, and just because all the countesses you've known were "proud and haughty" you must not think she was that kind of a lady. On the contrary, in spite of all fate did to prevent it, she was a human being—a sweet, sympathetic, pulsating heart-woman. She loved the world and the things and the beings thereof; she was five feet five of humanity and humility.

So naturally she loved music. Often she went to a little Gypsy music garden—this happened in Europe—to see and hear life as it pushed by with its songs and throngs, to drink wine and in the red forgetfulness still remember that she was lonesome, to listen to the haunting, seductive Gypsy music that interprets life as a rushing, roaring sea, with the sweet low murmur of a lazy brook thrilling its way throughout. Those nights her soul was swept away with the exotic, ecstatic songs of the sentimental Gypsy maids and the strong, bold Gypsy men.

And there her soul began to hunger for the arms and lips of the Gypsy.

Often she met him, and in his kisses was the strife of senses, and in his arms her troubled heart found peace. Then he urged her to fly with him.

With a suggestion that could not be stifled, with a premonition of impending and imminent disaster, she went to a Gypsy fortune teller to gaze into the vale of veiled years. And she looked into the crystal ball—and she saw.

She saw her womanhood dragged down to the level of the lost, saw herself wending the streets with her Gypsy, singing his songs for a coin and a laugh. She saw his love change into the realization of possession, into despotic mastery, into brute tyranny. She saw tears and sneers, pain and stain, hunger and hate.

That night when he came she told him that which avoided the future and averted its sorrows.

THE THORN IN VENGEANCE
Rex Release, May 5

For woman's love is mystery,
And woman's ways are dark;
That is the hopeless history
That's left its dreary mark
And weary stain on hungry hearts
Through all the years that died;
They've sold their hearts on moneyed marts,
The while their kisses lied.

Yet we who cry of their deceit
May search our hidden souls
And find a record there replete
With sins and dastard roles—
A record red with honor dead,
A story black and bleak;
So when the hearts that we have bled
Their hunger vengeance wreak
Shall we cry out and have it said
The weaker made us weak?

If you've read this far, we'll spare your feelings and proceed to tell the tale in prose. When he met the other woman, and the lies he told were on record in the heart of the first, he followed the law of least resistance, as most men do under similar cirmumstances, and retreated. He wrote the first woman a note, telling her he desired never to see her again, and became engaged to the innocent young thing whose charms had captivated him.

The first woman was not so very helpless. She had spoken to the world, and she had heard its answer. She may not even have loved him enough to excuse her act, but her piqued vanity, if you want to call it that, impelled her to go to him and conquer his impulse. If only to have the right to acknowledge to herself that she had vanquished his love for the other woman, if only for the sweet right to possess the victory, she would make him admit his love for her, for her only, and always.

She played with him. She made him hate and love, detest and respect her. But love and respect were stronger and longer. So he wrote the second woman what before he had written the first.

The girl and the father called for an explanation. In the manner of men, the father denounced and renounced him; but the girl was only silent, yet her silence was a greater reproof than her father's boisterous reprimand. So they left.

And the other woman heard the call of the sex, and fought the battle of her sister.

OUR WESTERN CORRESPONDENT

Hot Springs, Ark., April 25.—Of all the features in the line of motion photography that have ever been shown in Hot Springs, there is none that awakened so much genuine interest as the Selig reel, "The Last Rites of the Maine," which came to the New Central Theatre for a two days' run.

The reason that so much interest was manifested in this special picture was due to the fact that the press agent of the New Central, seeing a chance to take advantage of a good opportunity to put over some excellent advertising, pointed out that those who had read of the sinking of the steamship Titanic off the New Foundland banks could gain some idea of how that great vessel went down by seeing the Maine take the last and final dive. The result was that thousands of persons visited the New Central theatre, and the picture was most excellent.

I studied the crowd closely and have never seen any one feature that held the attention as this one did. It was not alone awe-inspiring, but the memory of the catastrophe of the Titanic was so fresh in the minds of all that one could not but recall that terrible horror when they saw the picture of the old battleship dipping and sinking in the waters of the gulf, and finally, dip low and go to the bottom. It was a picture that all will remember for years.

And here's a funny incident in connection with this reel. The New Central theatre had advertised it extensively in advance, and the management of this house was surprised to see on the day that it was shown there that the Lyceum also had a copy of the same picture. I learned later how this came to pass; also how near the Lyceum came to overlooking the best bet of the season. It appears that the exchange that the Lyceum does business with had sent them a big shipment of reels in advance, so that if anything should go wrong with their program, or if there should be any "repeaters" in the day's run, they could pick out something different from the big advance stock held in reserve. Well, the boys at the Lyceum never took the opportunity to look over these reels. Just received them and placed them away in a safe place, and it was not until the day the New Central theatre showed the "Last Rites of the Maine" that the Lyceum discovered that it had this picture in storage several days and did not know it. Can you beat it? There was a chance to get a "scoop" that would have broken the hearts of the New Central force, but the best that the Lyceum could do was to show it the same day the New Central did, which was done. I understand that an edict has been issued by the Lyceum management to have its operators make a note of all pictures sent in in advance, and this is done in the hope that the next time a competitor makes a play for a special that some of the other houses may get to it just a little beforehand.

The floods in the eastern part of the state are certainly playing "hob" with the motion picture people in this state, especially the houses doing business with Memphis exchanges. As I write this, it looks that the situation is getting worse instead of better. It is quite impossible, I have been informed, for them to get service out of Memphis, owing to the floods there. Mail and passengers are sent to Helena, Ark., by boat, and from there to this city and other points. The flood swill also injure the business of Hot Springs this summer, for it will delay, if not entirely ruin crops, and the farmers in the eastern part of the state, together with the wealthy planters, were wont to come to Hot Springs during the summer. They will be so busy recuperating from their loss because of the flood that they will have little time, much less money, to spend, and this resort will lose, as a result of the deluge, a vast amount of ready cash that was spent here each summer. Those in the cast have no idea of the extent of the floods, but could you be in touch with the situation, realize that five and ten counties in Arkansas and Mississippi and some in Missouri are under water five to ten feet deep; that towns are buried for the time being, and that thousands have lost their household effects; that the great levee is practically ruined and that it will cost millions to repair the same, you will have some adequate conception of what this torrent means to the people in this section of the country.

Word has been received by Secretary George Belding, of the Business Men's League, that the pictures taken of this city will soon be ready for release, and if there is one feature that will get a good run for its money it is this special, for the entire city, as I stated before, is interested in this production. King Baggot has also written his friends here that he is hard at work in the Imp studio and that he has not forgotten his pleasant trip to "the valley of vapors." Incidentally, we might remark that we have not forgotten the King, and only wish that he could take time to make us another visit.

And speaking of the floods reminds me of another incident. The entire show at the Princess, the whole five acts, missed the Monday matinee because they could not make train connections. Finally, along about 7 o'clock three of the acts arrived, careworn and weary, after a journey about twice as long as it should have been if the water had not busted up the railroad tracks. Manager Frank Head was wondering if he would have a show for his people. Well, he gave them the three acts and managed to meet a gentleman who proved a "life saver." This man had in his possession a reel of pictures of the Jeffreys-Johnson battle and he turned the same over to Mr. Head. That covered a multitude of sins and the crowd seemed satisfied, which proves that one should never give up hope.

The best independent feature of the week was the third of a series of the "101 Ranch" pictures, which were put out by the Bison company, entitled "War on the Plains," which came to the photo play. These pictures have been much enjoyed and the management of the Photo Play has been greatly complimented on securing the same.

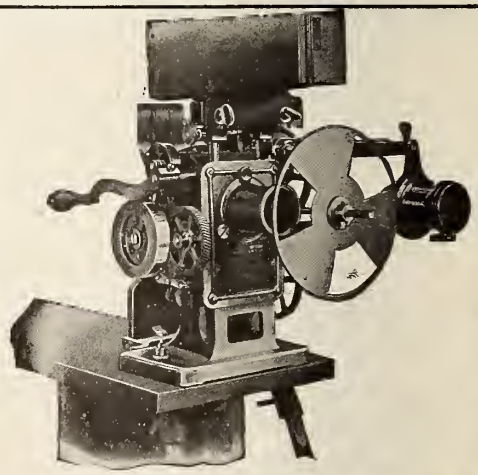
IS A REPUTATION WORTH ANYTHING?

Power's Cameragraph No. 6

HAS MADE ONE AND IS KEEPING IT.



It is easy enough to boast of your superior merit, but unless you can prove your claims, it is idle talk. We can prove that "Power's No. 6" gives absolutely perfect projection. Prof. Henry Phelps Gage, of Cornell University, after exhaustive tests, states that, run at normal speed, Power's No. 6 projects absolutely without flicker. This is the most vital point in a moving picture machine.

Our new factory, employing over 200 men, is pushed to its limit now—Why? Ask any exhibitor or operator.

Power's Adjustable Inductor is the economizer for you to use on alternating current.

A Warning to Moving Picture Theatre Owners

Word has come to me that some one else other than myself and posing as the original Kid Canfield is now making the Moving Picture Theatres and small Vaudeville houses thruout the Eastern part of Canada with Moving Pictures portraying myself as taken by the Champion Film Company.

This notice is to give all Moving Picture Theatre and Vaudeville houses warning against the showing of my act by any Faker, and will be prosecuted the full extent of the law.

A reward will be given to any person giving me the address care of this paper of the last Theatre that this so-called Kid Canfield has appeared with my act.

Am now meeting with great success, being featured with the "Queen of the Follies of Bergere Co.," now playing at the Century Theatre, at Kansas City.

Yours very truly,
KID CANFIELD,
Permanent Address: 444 Madison St.,

DIRECTORS, ACTORS AND ACTRESSES

WHEN we wrote our article in the April 20th issue we little thought we should have so many communications in reply thereto, but it seems to have hit the nail right on the head and driven it home. We have received from certain parties rather adverse criticisms to our editorial. The following two will more than counterbalance any of the adverse ones we have. One friend writes:

"Dear Mr. Saunders:

"Congratulations on the right-to-the-point editorial, 'Directors, Actors and Actresses,' in last week's issue of News just received and editorial read. There are too many of the amorous, coarse individuals posing as directors in the business to-day, and, no matter how refined the actress, she is oftentimes forced to submit to humiliation and insult. Keep up the good work."

We felt that this letter was worth all the space we could give it, hence its reproduction. We hope the point will go home to some of those who need it.

One great fault of the manufacturers is the fact that they are too avaricious, stealing away directors of other companies. These same directors have reached a low mark on the ladder, practically fallen from the top to the last three or four rungs. They are eagerly snapped up by unsuspecting companies who know very little of their antecedents. Needless to say, the old companies with whom they have been employed are mighty glad to get rid of them. One great trouble with these directors is the fact that they upset conditions existing in the new companies. They turn out well-tried employees and foist their own favorites into the places, taking them from the company they have left. This is unjust, not only to their old employer, but also to their new one and to the rank and file with whom they have to work with, and so fail to get the best results.

Directors should always be gentlemen and endeavor as such to obtain the full confidence of those with whom they are thrown in contact, and be above petty spite and jealousies.

Another point with some of these directors (?) is they have many scenarios submitted to them and they always write their own scenarios and put them on. After leaving the old firm they rehash up the old stories for the new firm, under slight alteration, of course, yet old at that. One director we have in mind stole three good military subjects, put them on for one firm, altered slightly, and put them on for another.

Another letter to the point is as follows:

"Dear Mr. Saunders:

"Your recent editorial addressed to 'Directors, Actors and Actresses' was a cheerful surprise to me, I never having read in a professional paper a confession so to the point.

"Every honest director and actor will agree with you that our need is such a critic as your editorial performs—frank and unbiased and fearless enough to unveil defects, not to cover them up or smooth them over. This latter tendency is most damaging to screen productions as well as to productions on the legitimate stage, but is widely prevalent.

"Let me cite, in illustration, this personal experience. On a certain occasion, after taking a scene, I noticed where I could have made improvements, and I so informed the other stage directors. But they indignantly explained: 'We stage directors are never at fault. If we are not furnished with better actors and camera men we cannot produce better results. We cannot be held responsible.' Why, if not the stage director, who, in God's name, is responsible? The charwoman? The call-boy?

"And, regarding the actors, how many, or, rather, how few, possess the needed ability to portray emotions by the glance of the eye, by mobility of feature, by movements of the head and hands? Many 'favorites' own but the one identical expression for all occasions, and they employ it whether depicting joy, sorrow, life or death. We get the same glance in every scene, through all the picture—there is no escaping it. I think I make no mistake in asserting that 60 per cent. of the actors belong to the above category. Whether the actress intends to represent a typewriter girl or a cultured society woman, we see always only Miss So and So. The female of the species doesn't bother about characterization; she is content to be only herself. And the masculine element is not much better. Whether Mr. So and So plays a cowboy, a dancing master or a clubman, the carriage of the body, gait, manners, all remain unchanged—the character is inevitably Mr. So and So.

"If the manufacturers would take your suggestions to heart, they would be the gainers, and would thereby elevate the keynote of the picture play, thus furnishing the managers with better sellers. To accomplish this requires in the artists more than mere 'pull' or personal pulchritude, more even than experience; it can be produced only by in-born ability and gift possessed by the actresses, actors and stage directors.

"Permit me to assure you that I admire your courage of attack which, if followed up, must result in raising the standard of the photo play to a real artistic height: Magna est veritas, et prevalebit!"

The above letter, from a well-knwon director, is so much to the point that we have given it in full. Our only object in publishing the above letters is that, with the writers who know, we may endeavor to elevate the tone of the moving picture. We take to ourselves some of the credit during the last six years of having elevated the business to the condition it is to-day, and if we can only help elevate the tone of the studios and all employed therein we shall have accomplished a good work, and our writing will not be in vain.

LINEN LEADERS

A WESTERN correspondent at Wichita, Kan., sent us the original of the above cut, and when we saw it we thought it was the very latest rediscovery in cinematography. Our correspondent wrote: "There is no longer any need of film exchanges paying from 1 to 2 cents a foot for a leader, as Mr. John Boob, at Latham, Kan., has a new invention. We are enclosing you one of the unbreakable, sprocketless leaders. You have to hand it to the 'Boobs' in Kansas to invent things."

Indeed we have, Friend Kansas, and as such we have given it all due publicity. If any of our readers can beat it, we will be glad to give them all the publicity they desire for stringing on leaders where they are needed. If Mr. Boob will send us his experience with the sprocketless, pliable leader we will give him a column all to himself.

At the same time we want to point out that this device was in use ten years ago, only it was tape the width of the film that was used and not linen.

FIRE! FIRE! FIRE!

CELLULOID burns—burns rapidly—and when once it gets a start, if there is a large quantity stored, it is a very difficult matter to stop it. Witness the Vitagraph fire, the Pittsburgh fire, Klein Optical Co.'s fire, the Western Film Exchange fire, Milwaukee, and others of like nature. We, in the interests of our readers, have been seeking som means of fire prevention, or, if a fire breaks out in a flm factory or exchange, it can be put out immediately. With this end in view, we have been witnessing some tests that we believe will answer the purpose, and on Tuesday, May 21st, we are arranging for a demonstration for the whole trade to witness. Manufacturers, exchange men, exhibitors, operators—everybody—interested in seeing 7,000 or 8,000 feet of celluloid film set on fire and—INSTANTLY PUT OUT. Don't believe it! I thought you would say that. Come and see. Write for a ticket of invitation, if you are interested, and we will give you the biggest Moving Picture Show you ever saw in your life. Manufacturers, bring your camera men and take a negative. It will do more to reassure your patrons—The Public—than anything you could write or say. Don't forget the date—May 21st, 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Send us your name and we will send the card of admission.

GIGGLING WOMEN FOR CENSORS

The Censorship of moving pictures has become almost as much a matter of business as a matter of duty. Therefore it should, we hold, be conducted on a serious, businesslike basis. There is, according to reports which we have no reason to disbelieve, a fund provided as payment to those good people who give their services to the betterment of the cause on the National Board of Censorship. The members of this Board of Censorship, who are appointed by the People's Institute at the request of the manufacturers and exhibitors of moving pictures, giving their time, which in this rapid age means money, from their various professional duties, are entitled to just compensation for time spent in the interests of the moving picture. But they have at the same time a right to discharge their duties in a businesslike manner.

According to echoes which have slipped through unguarded chinks in the projecting rooms where this body of censors sits in judgment on the product of the various moving picture plants, it is impossible for any normal individual to properly concentrate on the moral adaptability of a film, which often lies too deep to make itself evident above the silly giggle and idiotic remarks of some of the female members of the National Board of Censorship.

Are there not enough sensible, solid-brained, well-rounded women in New York City capable of sitting silently for the space of fifteen or twenty minutes, allowing others about them the privilege of quiet meditation on the work which is being placed before them for serious consideration, without filling up the ranks with women who have not as yet progressed far enough along the road of good breeding and advancement to have become thoroughly cognizant of their duty to society?

Northampton, Conn—Goldstein Brothers' Amusement Company have opened a moving picture theatre.

ARTISTIC BLUR.

It seems to me that there is one thing overlooked in the contention about artistic diffusion of focus in photographic pictures; at least I have not noticed any one making use of this point in the argument of the artistic value and necessity of blur or diffusion—and that is the diametrical distinction between artistic blurring and photographic blurring—between the kind of blurring made by the lens put out of commission as a lens and the softening of outline and blending of contiguous areas practiced by painters.

The inability of the lens to present any but one plane distinctly, all in front of this optical sharpness as well as all in the rear rapidly passing into blur, obliterating all form, relief and outline. This blurring is, of course, more pronounced in the case of pictures taken with a portrait lens, on account of the optical construction.

The portrait lens, unlike our eyes, sees single objects from too many points of view, bunched together within its own circumference.

The picture made by the painter is nothing like that produced by the lens. The painter has different degrees of sharpness in different parts of the same plane, near or distant, where he consciously, deliberately and purposely brings some particular feature into more prominence to emphasize the effect.

What the painter tries to do, and what, in proportion to his skill he does effect, is a presentation in his picture of what our normal vision actually experiences. It is incorrect to assert that our eyes see things as in a diffusion of focus. To be sure, vision has the power to focus upon any desired plane and to perceive it with all its absoluteness, but, at the same time, in ordinary viewing, especially where we wish to derive artistic pleasure from our contemplation, we make use of the power of accommodation possessed by our eyes.

In other words, we have a sort of cinematographic view of the subject. At very short intervals, indeed, before the impression from one plane is entirely liberated, an impression from some other area is superimposed and we have the effect produced not only by modification of color, but also modification of form and outline. This is the true artistic blur, and that practiced or attempted by the painter, and is related more to aerial perspective than to optics. The visual blurring is the effect, therefore, of superimposed impression, each impression or a short interval being absolutely in focus. For this very reason the painting by a genuine impressionist does not affect us as a mass of blur when viewed at the proper distance, whereas a blurred, out-of-focus, diffused, or whatever you may call it, photograph is blurred and indistinct at any point of view.

In the painting we get the impression the eye gets when it gives itself up to the esthetic contemplation of the subject. In the photograph we get only the imitation of the effect the painter has presented on his canvas.—Frank V. Chambers in Bulletin of Photography.

(Good for you Friend Chambers. We are glad to see such an article from your pen. We like to see good, clear, sharp pictures in photography. The apeing after effects that cannot be obtained with the camera, as by the artistic results in mediocre fuzzygraphs. We see no art, or anything in such stuff. Our youngsters are fully capable of producing fuzzygraphs, and they say, when we tell them they are not sharp: But father look here, look at these pictures, ours are quite as good. Yes, we reply, but we want to see you do better. No out of focus pictures for us either in genre or cinematographic photography, thank you.

ROSES AND THORNS.

Eclair Comedy

The tale of a youth who would a-wooing go—with an unknown young lady, pledged to arrive on a certain train, wearing a white rose in her coat lapel—and the adventures of a prim aggregation of picknicking schoolmarms, who return on the same train, each wearing a rose; such is the theme of "Roses and Thorns" which is released on May 16. Jack Adolfi plays the unfortunate youth with tear-provoking drollery; the scenic effects are very gardenesque.

"HAL" REID, NEW RELIANCE DIRECTOR

The most important individual in the moving picture studio, the one upon whom all the responsibility for the conception and artistic production falls, is the director.

Reliance has made a most excellent choice in appointing to that responsible position Mr. Hal Reid, who is well known as a proficient director, and also as a writer of moving picture scenarios and dramatic plays. Among his successes appear 'Human Hearts" and "Jim and Joe" (Selig); "The Red Cross Martyr," "At Scrogginses Corners," "The Woman Haters," "Love in the Ghetto," and others produced by Vitagraph.

The first of the Reid releases will be "Father Beauclaire," on May 25th. Mr. Reid will be supported by Gertrude Robinson, Edith Lyle, Virginia Westbrook, Susan Balfour, Lula Lieferman, Wallace Reid, Charles Herman Sigman, and Robert Tabor.

H. A. MACKIE'S WHEREABOUTS

Mr. H. A. Mackie, who was formerly connected with H. A. Mackie, Inc., has opened up a suite of offices in the Commercial Trust Building, 1451 Broadway, corner of Forty-first street. Mr. Mackie has been occupying these offices since April 1st, and is at the present time engaged chiefly in buying and selling theatres. He expects, however, in a couple of weeks' time to have perfected an organization for operating both motion picture and vaudeville theatres. It is Mr. Mackie's intention to build up a strong patronage through square dealing, and we extend to him our heartiest good wishes for success in his venture for the handling of amusement enterprises.

AMERICAN TO PRODUCE HISTORICAL SERIES.

Responding to the ever increasing demand for historical subjects, The American Film Company announces for the near future a series of elaborate two-reel historical subjects. The subjects will be Western in character, in accordance with the American's policy, and promise some astounding effects in the matter of large aggregations of performers. Plans have been perfected that assure the use of 300 trained horsemen.

THE THESPIAN BANDIT.

Nestor.

In "The Thespian Bandit," the exceedingly worthwhile Nestor release of Wednesday, May 8, we have a Western photoplay that is new in more ways than one.

The story deals with Harry, Dick and Tom, three impecunious actors, who, though at liberty, are under the eagle-eyed surveillance of Mrs. Sharp, the landlady. Tom and Dick are the wise boys, and Harry has to face the music unaided and alone. A newspaper item acquaints the disengaged trio of the fact that actors are wanted for motion pictures, but the place is Los Angeles, California, and that's more than three thousand miles from "home." Harry pooh-poohs the idea, but his companions are not to be denied. They appropriate his jewelry and exchange it for the solid stuff to supply the inner man en route to California, position, prosperity and fame.

Mrs. Sharp is not sharp enough to prevent the boys from deserting her roof to occupy that of a Westbound freight Pullman. All goes well until a burly brakeman brutally demands "Fare" and Harry is cleaned out of all his loose change. Tom and Dick are jubilant because, like them, he has nothing more to lose.

After an eventful journey, the Golden West is reached, and, though Los Angeles is still many miles away, the Thespians are obliged to come off their high perch and foot it across the hills in a rather precipitous and undignified manner. This enforced exploration of the country brings the panting trinity face to face with a post bearing the legend: $1,000 reward for the capture of Black Bill, the bandit." Here's Dame Fortune smiling upon them. Will they overlook the golden smile? Nay! Nay! They must capture the reward, but how can they without first capturing Black Bill? While thus pondering, they are regaled with a look at the fierce-looking bandit as he rides by, giving the merry "Ha-ha" to the pursuing sheriff and the posse, which convinces Tom, Dick and Harry of the utter impossibility of subduing the awe-inspiring outlaw. Nevertheless, it is hard to let one thousand dollars in real money go without making an attempt at halting it. Eureka! The boys have their "make-up" paraphernalia handy, and reluctant Harry is soon transformed into a perfect likeness of Black Bill. By foisting him as the bandit on the Sheriff, the reward will be theirs. All might have gone as planned but for the bad man's unexpected appearance. Black Bill likes the boys' idea and utilizes it for himself. Tom and Dick receive a warm send-off while Harry is conducted to the sheriff's. At the critical moment, Fate intervenes. Black Bill gets his deserts and Harry becomes a "thousandaire." With so much money in his possession, Broadway looks good to him and we soon find him on his way East, traveling in true regal style. Tom and Harry vainly try to fasten themselves upon their fortunate companion. There's nothing for them to do but resort to the familiar tie-counting process.

This refreshingly novel Western comedy abounds with humorous situations that are capitally handled by a select company of players. Jack Conway as "Harry" wins unprecedented success; William Clifford as "Tom" is in his proper element, and Eugenia Forde makes an honest-to-God landlady. The backgrounds are especially beautiful and were selected with apparent care. The photography is, if anything, even more witching than is usual with the Nestor Company.

CHAMPION SPLIT REELS.

Attention is requested to the following releases which have been changed to Split subjects. "The Duck Hunt," released May 15, carries another subject entitled "The Indian's Gratitude." "Lucky Jim." to be released May 8, carries with it a four-hundred foot comedy, entitled "Henpecko," Western and military productions are again being taken up by the Champion Company. The releases for May 27 and 29, Monday and Wednesday, are Western and Military subjects respectively, namely, "The Ranch Woman" and "Heroes of the Blue and Gray." The last-mentioned release is a Decoration Day offering.

MOVING PICTURE LEAGUE OF AMERICA

The motion picture exhibitors of the State of Kentucky met in convention in Lexington at the Phœnix Hotel on Thursday, April 25, 1912. The convention was called to order by the chairman of the local committee, Mr. L. H. Ramsey. Mr. A. B. Tracy was selected as temporary secretary. The temporary chairman introduced Mr. M. A. Neff, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, who addressed the convention in part as follows:

"Ladies and gentlemen, we have met here to-day for the purpose of organizing the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Kentucky, which will affiliate with the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. The aims and objects of our organization are to uplift, promote and assist in every way possible, to advance cinematography and everybody's interest engaged in our line of business, more especially our own, asking for nothing only a square deal for each and every exhibitor throughout the country.

"Themotion picture exhibitors and cinematography have been ridiculed and abused, and in many cases misrepresented. When the business first started it was looked upon as amusement for children, but as the business grew and the picture plays became more popular, naturally business men and the educators began to take notice. From humble beginning cinematography has grown until to-day it is educating and amusing more people and has more patrons than any other business in the world. Millions of dollars are invested and thousands of people engaged in the business and the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America are doing everything in their power to educate the public and to advance cinematography to the high standard to which it is entitled.

"The cornerstone that was rejected and thrown away in the rubbish was found and became the chief cornerstone of the building. Just so with cinematography. It has been looked upon, and is to-day by many looked upon as nothing only a passing fancy to amuse children, but, to the most advanced thinkers and educators cinematography is the cornerstone to our modern civilazation and education. In fact, it is the philosopher stone. It is here to stay and to-day is in its infancy.

"It has grown more rapidly than any other line of business ever discovered. Millions of dollars are being invested, and from the ticket-taker at the door to the most celebrated actor or actress, it gives employment. In fact, it is advancing at such a rate, that even those of us who are engaged in the business are often surprised at the wonderful progress it is now making. Kentucky needs organization, not only of the exhibitors, but all the people of Kentucky. Through our organization, we are going to advance cinematography to the high plane which it so richly deserves.

"We need every exhibitor in America and every exhibitor needs us.

"You will find the national organization ever ready to assist you in bringing about a condition that will benefit all of us."

After Mr. Neff had addressed the convention, all present were asked to join the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Kentucky and every exhibitor came forward and paid his initiation fee of five dollars and became a member. The next order of business was the electing of officers. J. H. Stamper, Jr., of Lexington, and L. J. Dittmar, of Louisville, were placed in nomination. J. H. Stamper, Jr., receiving two votes more than Mr. Dittmar, was declared elected president; L. J. Dittmar was elected first vice-president; Sherman Arn, of Maysville, was elected second vice-president; L. H. Ramsey, of Lexington, was elected secretary, and A. J. Wellman, of Cattletsburg, was elected treasurer. Orrene Parker, Colonial Theatre, Covington, Ky., was elected national vice-president, to represent the state of Kentucky in the national board of directors.

After the election of this committee the following committee on the Constitution and By-laws was appointed: L. J. Dittmar, Orrene Parker, H. B. Struble, J. M. Perkins, M. H. Nave.

The following committees were appointed: Legislation—J. M. Perkins, J. C. Taylor, Max L. Simons, E. C. Tarvin, Joseph J. Ciarlo. Grievance—George A. Duncan, S. C. Stephens, C. S. Graves, H. M. Hacker, F. Dolle.

After the delegates had lunch they assembled in front of the new Orpheum Theatre, where a photograph was taken, and also a motion picture by the Gaumont Company.

Automobiles were in waiting to take the delegates sightseeing. On arriving at the noted Hagan stock farm, Gaumont's camera was again in waiting to take a motion picture. The delegates then visited the Hagan dairy, where another picture was taken, and from there visited several of the largest racing stables of the United States, where noted horses were shown and their pedigrees explained.

The beautiful scenery and the grand old country homes continually reminded all of that grand old song, "My Old Kentucky Home." The flowers in bloom, the trees budding, the sweet perfume of the flowers and the green waving blue stem, reminded all that they were visiting the garden spot where, it is said, the richest soil in the world is to be found.

All arrived safe but one automobile, which L. D. McKinney, of the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company of New York; C. Lang Cobb, of the Reliance Company of New York; E. D. Powell, of the Inventors Specialty Company of Chicago; George M. Wesley, of Cleveland, were in. The automobile punctured a tire and the boys were left behind. Covered with dust, but content, all arrived at the hotel without further accident.

At 7 p.m. the convention reconvened and received a few more members, who were late in arriving, adopted by-laws and resolutions, and selected Lexington as the next place of meeting, to meet on the second day of July, 1912. The motion was made and carried to employ G. M. Wesley, of Cleveland, to organize the state. A resolution was also passed thanking the editors and proprietors of newspapers in Kentucky who assisted Mr. Neff in bringing about the success of the convention.

After listening to a business speech and instructions from the national president, Mr. M. A. Neff, they adjourned to the spacious banquet hall in the Phoenix Hotel, where the following menu was served:

MENU

Tomato Soup

Celery Olives Pickles

Cutlet of Sole Tartar Sauce

Saratoga Potatoes

Roast Phoenix Birds

Rissole Potatoes French Peas

Lettuce and Tomato Salad

Ice Cream and Cake

Coffee

During the banquet selections were rendered by the following: Stamper and Lyons, character singers; Miss Katherine Johnson, soprano; Arthur M. Siebrecht, pianist; Miss Mattie West, pianist of the Orpheum Theatre; Ertz and Frankel, character singers; Miss Nellie Brennan, pianist; Misses Buchignani, pianists of the Colonial Theatre; Vertner P. Saxton, tenor; Miss Julia Hogarty, pianist of the Princess Theatre; Miss Florence Talbot, ragtime; Miss Florence Sheriff, pianist of the Star Theatre; entire vaudeville cast, with orchestra from Hippodrome.

Motion pictures were shown in the banquet room and a general good time was had. Everybody enjoyed themselves while hundreds of people in the big lobby of the Phoenix Hotel looked through the windows, with wide open eyes, at the grand banquet being given in honor of the motion picture exhibitors of Kentucky. Over fifty exhibitors attended the banquet. Everybody was enthusiastic and it was predicted for Kentucky that they will secure every exhibitor in the state. Louisville was represented the strongest of any city, the local committee at Lexington and the citizens of Lexington showing that they have not forgotten the traditional hospitality of the grand old commonwealth of Kentucky.

Editor, Moving Picture News.

Dear Sir: The motion picture exhibitors of Pennsylvania please take notice: The state convention that was called to meet at Harrisburg, May 6, 1912, has been called off and will be held in Pittsburgh, June 24th and 25th, 1912.

Every motion picture exhibitor in the State of Pennsylvania is not only invited to attend the convention at Pittsburgh, but is urged to do so, as matters of great importance to every exhibitor will come before the convention.

MAJESTIC RELEASES.

"Tomboy," which makes its debut on May 12, follows up the lead of previous majestic comedies. It is a real, bubbling comedy—the story of the pranks of a school girl and her elopement under extraordinary difficulties from boarding school. In order to escape detection Tomboy dresses in the chauffeur's clothes and Bob, her sweetheart, in the cook's. They go to her father, who is a minister, and nearsighted, and are married by him while Bob's father from across the way is called in to act as witness. This makes a funny complication as the parents have previously parted the pair.

"Buncoed" is another good comedy from the same firm. The story runs thus:

Nettie is a very clever girl, but she is without funds, in a country hotel. So she announces that she has lost a five dollar bill with the corner torn off, and five rural admirers help her to search for it.

Of course the bill is not found, but the smartest countryman conceives a plan. He tears the corner off a five dollar bill, presents it to Nettie, and tells her he has found it. She is delighted, and invites him to call for a walk, at three.

One after another the five carry out this idea, each concealing it from the others. The second has to pawn his watch, the third and fourth work at carrying baggage and sawing wood, and the last, a "tightwad," yields with great reluctance.

At three o'clock all call at the hotel, dressed in their best, but Nettie has gone. A horrible suspicion comes to them. They dash down to the station in time to see the three-ten train depart, with Nettie aboard.

But they receive a note, which reads: "Boys—aren't you glad it wasn't a ten dollar bill?"

LYNCHBURG, VA.

The leading motion picture theatres in the city have all undergone material changes within the past few weeks, and now the city has several of the finest and best-equipped places of amusement to be found in the South. The Belvedere, operated by Dr. P. H. Casey, has been changed considerably, and instead of having singers appear in spot-light, a stage has been erected and the attractions are presented in full view before the footlights. Only singers are booked at this house, and with high class films shown daily, the patronage is strictly the best in the city.

The Majestic, operated by Dr. P. H. Cassey, has been renovated and new seats provided to accommodate the public. Largely independent service is employed here and the theatre caters to the working class, mostly.

The Gayety, which was formerly owned by J. B. Trent, was sold some time ago to Roanoke interests, who operate it now. A mirroroid screen has been placed in the theatre and this has proven very popular with the patrons.

The Trenton theatre, owned and operated by the Trent Brothers, and managed by J. F. Jackson, is a new house, which has met with favor since the opening day. Pictures are shown daily in conection with four Keith vaudeville acts, and judging from the crowds at each performance, the owners are making money. It is the intention of the management to remodel the house soon as the summer season comes, and when this is done, the Trenton will be one of the finest vaudeville houses in the country.

"JESS'" FIRE SCENES SUCCESS.

Thanhouser burned down a house in New Rochelle last May for the film "Flames and Fortune" and Tuesday of this week they repeated the stunt, this time in New Jersey, for "Jess." Of course, the destruction of the home of Silas Croft, Jess' uncle, is the item for which the Tuesday house was fired. The conflagration was a huge success and should give a lot of thrill to the story. Thanhouser Company say they are filming "Jess" the way H. Rider Haggard wrote it and that it will prove even more popular than their "She" by the same author. They release "Jess" in two reels Tuesday, May 28.

THE TEN OF DIAMONDS.

A gripping, graphic drama, showing the evil of gambling and teaching a most salutary lesson, is "The Ten of Diamonds," which the Nestor Company is to release on Monday, May 6. The story told is that of a father who cures his only son of the card mania by vividly recounting to him the painful history of his past life, wherein gambling had nearly caused a tragedy. The novel and artistic manner in which this fine sermon picture has been handled is quite refreshing and reflects credit upon Thomas Ricketts, who supervised the production. Sidney Ayres, as the father, is especially strong in a role requiring unusual strength, while Miss Vivian Rich, as the mother, does creditable work in a highly emotional part. "The Ten of Diamonds" is a rare dramatic treat that will be enjoyed by audiences everywhere.

HALLBERG EQUIPPING POUGHKEEPSIE THEATRES.

The old adage, "Nothing succeeds like success," is aptly verified in the matter of Hallberg A. C. to D. C. Economizers. Mr. J. H. Hallberg sold one of these large 60 ampere outfits to one theatre in Poughkeepsie several months ago, and now two other theatres in the same town have ordered duplicate equipments in order to compete successfully in the matter of brilliant clear picture projection.

Newark, N. J.—Permit has been issued to the Elgin Realty Company to erect a moving picture theatre at 459 Orange street.

Richmond, Va.—A moving picture house will be opened at 711 East Broad street.

Birmingham, Ala.—The Lyric will be erected on eighteenth street and Third avenue, and have a seating capacity of 1,583.

Wheeling, W. Va.—The new Majestic Theatre at Elm Grove has opened.

JOHN C. HEMMENT

J. C. Hemment, the well-known instantaneous photographer, war correspondent and artist-author, has had a career both remarkable and adventurous.

Born at the pretty English village of Benwick, Cambridgeshire, in 1862, he received his education at Peterborough College and came to the United States in 1879.

His first employment was as a designer, but being a born athlete, for the first few years in this country young Hemment "went in" for sports, securing many medals and making records in many branches of sport, and still retains the 200-yard skating record of the world. Having been satiated with muscular success, in 1885 he took up amateur photography, and in 1888 joined the staff of Leslie's Weekly as a profession, and the compliment, before his retiring from that publication, was accorded him of publishing one edition in which no other picture than those made by himself appeared.

Not satisfied with partial success, he introduced one idea after another in order to make photography more interesting and took all kinds of risks in securing unique pictures, being the first man in New York to take the picture of the city from a balloon.

For twenty years his race-track pictures with their remarkable finishes were the result of a determination to be without a peer on the turf. His experiments led to wonderful developments of the instantaneous processes by sunlight and flashlight, and being recognized as a leader in his line, business came in large volume until probably no studio in the United States contains so marvellous a collection of pictures covering every conceivable subject in photography.

Among the most famous of the thousands of pictures that Mr. Hemment's studio contains is the International yacht races at Cowes, International athletic games between Yale and Oxford in London, rowing races at Henley, and the series of International cup races off Sandy Hook, where his pictures showing the Defender and Valkyrie, considered a classic, was secured.

There is hardly a horse or its jockey, a prominent athlete, a yacht, or a dog that has a claim to fame but you can find same at the Fulton street studio.

Not, however, until the tocsin of war was sounded between Spain and the United States did the opportunity arise that was to bring him the recognition he deserved. When the battleship "Maine" was sunk in the harbor of Havana, Mr. Hemment was sent to Cuba as an artist-correspondent, and he was at once engaged by the Board of Inquiry to take photographs of the wreck and the scenes attending subsequent official investigation of that historic event. Returning to the United States just before the opening of the hostilities, Mr. Hemment accompanied the American Army to Guantanamo Bay, and landed with the advance of General Shafter's troops at Siboney.

Enduring all the hardships of a soldier, he carried his camera knapsack fashion and shouldered his tripod in place of a musket. His strong physique enabled him to keep his place among the headquarters staff, and his photographs of scenes on the march and the battlefield are realistic to a degree, especially those showing the Spanish troops at San Juan and El Caney and the destroyed ships of Cervera's fleet.

His success in Cuba led to his being sent to meet Admiral Dewey on his return from Manila. He was warmly received by Admiral George Dewey. His interview with the Admiral on the possibilities of his being a candidate for the presidency (and although not intended) this interview, on being printed, forever barred the door to the presidency for the hero of Manila Bay.

The outbreak of the Boxers in northern China in 1900 gave Mr. Hemment another signal opportunity for displaying his courage and dash.

He entered the City of Pekin on August 14, 1900, when it was relieved by the allied formes and, besides securing all the exciting scenes identified with that campaign, Mr. Hemment succeeded in interviewing the astute Li Hung Chang, after communication with the legations had ceased for nineteen days. This interview was an exclusive story for a New York daily and was prevised by an authoritative statement that Minister Conger and his fellow diplomats were alive and safe, this being the first reliable statement that the previous accounts of horrible murders and torture were incorrect.

In interviewing Mr. Hemment regarding the most pleasing memories he retains in picture-making, he divides the honors between his trip across the continent with President McKinley and his recent trip to Africa with Mr. Paul J. Rainey.

When Mr. Rainey decided to make his Arctic expedition, Hemment was engaged and now one of the most popular attractions of New York City is the famous Paul J. Rainey's African Hunt Pictures, where Mr. Hemment fills a role seldom met with, to wit: not only did he take the pictures but he gives a most entertaining and lucid description of the films, thereby showing his versatility.

These African pictures must be seen to be appreciated, and they are the most conclusive argument that John C. Hemment never before had the test of tests in his photographic career.

Charged by a lion at forty yards, which dropped dead under the deadly fire of three hunters of unerring aim only forty inches in front of his tripod, one must place J. C. Hemment right at the top of the men who dare and win.

Mr. Hemment has another journey to Africa in contemplation—still further into the jungle—and he expects to make this the effort of his life, believing that his enterprise will be rewarded not only financially but that a chapter will be added above mere monetary value to the cause of education.

A thousand well wishers bid him God speed.

Philadelphia, Pa.—The moving picture theatre at 5206 Market street has been sold to Emil H. Ratzburg.

Schenectady, N. Y.—Henry Pitney has resumed and opened his moving picture theatre in Main street.

Hattiesburg, La.—The Lomo Circuit capitalized at $50,000 has filed incorporation papers to operate moving picture shows.

LITTLE HANDS

BY VIRGINIA WEST.

Adapted from Eclair Release

IN the shadow of the prison wall crept a man. He stopped with almost mechanical regularity and listened. Then he crept on a few steps.

He wore the hideous stripes of the prison. Under his arm he hugged close a bundle of dark clothes. Always when he slipped on the sharp stones at the base of the wall he grasped the bundle closer, as though his very life depended upon that.

And, indeed, he was right. The success of his daring attempt lay almost entirely in a change of clothing. At least, without that, success was impossible.

A step sounded on the road below him. He flung himself close against the wall, in the deep shadow, scarcely daring to breathe.

When all was still again, save for the night noises around him, the man began swiftly and silently to change his clothes. This accomplished, he buried the discarded ones beneath a pile of stones. Then he crept on again.

All night long he walked, keeping away from the roads as much as possible.

At dawn he found himself on the edge of a small lake, near which were a few summer cottages, not yet opened for the season. Into an outbuilding of one of these he cautiously peeped. Assured that all was safe, he entered and stretched himself wearily upon the rough boards.

Miles from the prison, the man felt reasonably safe and soon fell into a sleep of utter exhaustion.

Toward twilight he awoke and lay reflecting. He felt very hungry and finally decided to go in search of food.

Looking from his hiding place, he saw a light in a cottage window not far away. He quickly made his way to it and knocked on the back door of the house.

"Come in."

The voice was sweet and clear.

The man hesitated and the door opened, disclosing an old lady with a little girl clinging to her skirts.

"Who is it, grandma?"

The old lady stood for a moment straining her eyes into the half-light.

"Do you wish to see me?" she asked.

"I have been traveling a long distance and am chilled and hungry," came the answer.

"Why, come in and get warm by the stove and I'll get you something to eat."

The man came in, trying not to seem too anxious.

After he had sat by the fire and eaten the warm food prepared for him he began to think. Thoughts of the future came to his mind with unpleasant insistence. After all, what kind of a life would he have, continually trying to keep his secret? His chin dropped upon his breast as he gazed sorrowfully into the fire.

He had determined to lead a useful life if it lay within his power.

The man felt a soft pressure against his knee and a tiny hand slipped into his. He raised his head. The little girl stood gazing into his face.

"What's the matter, man?" she asked.

The tears came to his eyes with a rush. He lifted the child to his lap and laid his face against her hair. A sob broke from him.

"What makes you cry?" came the next question.

The man gained control of himself and sat silent, hugging the child close to him.

When he raised his head his eyes looked into those of the old lady, who sat on the other side of the fire. So steady were they, for a moment he could not lower his own. It seemed that the old lady looked straight into his soul.

"You are in trouble?" she asked softly.

"Yes."

"I do not ask what your trouble is, but if I can help you tell me."

"Thank you. You have helped me."

The man sat silent for a moment, stroking the little girl's hair. Then he asked with almost studied indifference, "Do you live here all the year?"

"Oh, no," said the grandmother. "We have never been here before, but my little granddaughter was not well all winter, so I brought her here early. She is an orphan."

The man looked down at the child. Her head now rested upon his shoulder and her eyes were fast closed.

"She usually doesn't make up with strangers."

"I am very proud," said the man in a low voice.

Soon he arose and laid the little girl gently, almost reluctantly, in the grandmother's lap.

"Good-night," he said. "Thank you. You've helped me a lot and the kiddie."

The woman arose and followed him to the door, carrying the child.

"Whatever your trouble may be," she said, "I hope it will soon leave you. Good-night."

The child raised her head sleepily. "Good-night, man," she murmured.

The man pressed a hasty kiss on the little one's head and disappeared into the darkness.

By midnight he was fortunate enough to reach a railroad and get aboard a freight car unseen. By the second day he felt reasonably safe and began looking for work.

He was not long before finding something to do, but the poison of prejudice soon began to work.

True, his employers and fellow employees knew nothing of his past, but in some subtle way he must have betrayed himself. He would see them furtively watching him and shaking their heads wisely. Then he would get notice that his services were no longer required. Upon asking if his work was not satisfactory, he was always told that it was, but for other reasons they thought it best to make a change.

So it went on from month to month, until at the end of six months he had held and lost as many places.

It is not an easy thing for a man to fight the world under the best conditions, and to this man, who had a dark secret to hide, it came to seem almost impossible.

One day, when he was sitting in a public park, wondering whether it were any use to try again, he heard his name spoken. He turned and came face to face with two old friends.

It is said that the Devil awaits his opportunity. The two "friends" saw the condition the man was in and subtly went to work to make it worse. So well did they succeed that at the end of two hours' conversation he was thoroughly convinced that the ex-prisoner has no chance but to return to his crime.

There was a house, they said, that was just too absurdly easy. There were no men, and they would have no trouble at all.

When midnight had passed the trial was made. The man was desperate now, and nothing seemed to matter much. He was chosen to go over the upstairs of the house and inform them of conditions. Stealthily he crept up the steps, feeling as strangely as he did six months before as he crept along the prison wall.

There was a dim light in one room. Softly he stole to the door and waited, scarcely breathing. No sound. He went into the room. Suddenly he stopped short. A child sat up in its bed and stared at him. He waited for a scream, but none came. A light broke over the baby face and two little hands were held out to him:

"Man," she cried joyfully, "you come again! Grandma!"

The man stood for a moment, rooted to the spot. Then he dropped on his knees by the child's bed and buried his face in the little lap.

"Grandma, my man's come back," called the child, and the old lady hurried into the room.

"You!" she cried. "Was that your trouble?"

"Yes," he answered hoarsely. "I was in trouble when you saw me before, but I am in far greater trouble now. No matter, you had better telephone the police. I came to rob your house, but I did not know it was yours. I swear that!"

The old lady stood looking at the man.

The child had fallen back on the bed again and was fast asleep with her hand on the big, rough one beside her.

"What have you been doing since you came to the cottage?" asked the grandmother.

Then the man told her the whole story. When he had finished the kind old lady's eyes were filled with tears.

"I have trusted you from the first," she said. "This child loves you, and if you care to live with me I shall be very happy. I believe you only need a chance."

"Indeed, I do, lady. I thank God I came here to-night. He must have used the Devil as a means to good."

A long, low whistle sounded outside. The man still knelt by the bed and a gentle hand lay on his bowed head. Another whistle. Then stealthy, hastening footsteps, and all was still.

MUCH ADO ABOUT FEET.

Think of a story on feet—and an interesting one! Impossible, you declare? Well, almost but not quite—if it's by a picture producer. Especially if Thanhouser is the one. "The Little Shut-In," released by that producer Friday, May 17, tells how a tiny cripple living in a basement watched the passers-by without. Or watched their feet would be more apropos. His cellar window only permitted that—he could only see passing shoes. He came to know the shoes, or feet: one pair he got to call "Little Feet," another "Manly Feet," another "Cruel Feet." He didn't like "Cruel Feet," but resolved to bring "Little Feet" and "Manly Feet" together. The whole story is a very novel one.

A GAME OF BLUFF.

Nestor Release.

One of the prettiest, cleanest, jolliest and best acted comedies ever shown on the screen answers to the name of "A Game of Bluff" and will be released by the Nestor Company Saturday, May 11. Russell Bassett and Lee Moran enact the two bluffers and the way they bluff one another is a caution. Miss Vivian Rich cleverly plays the role of the girl who is the innocent cause of the game of bluff. Papa, (Mr. Bassett), a poor bookkeeper, palms himself off as a retired capitalist in the hope of getting a rich husband for his daughter, (Miss Rich). Aleck, (Mr. Moran), a young clerk, is looking for a good catch and, taking a tip from her papa, he poses as an active capitalist. Engagement, wedding, etc., follows in rapid succession. The young people are happy though married and papa is compelled to take a philosophical view of the affair. There are numerous smaller parts in this snappy comedy and all are in capable hands. The splendid work of Messrs. Bassett and Moran and Miss Rich, however, stands out in bold relief, and contributes greatly to the success of this beautifully photographed Nestor gem.

ED. ROSENBERG, OF SUPERIOR FEATURE COMPANY, HOME FROM NEW ENGLAND

Edward Rosenberg, of the Superior Feature Film Company, 62 Union Square, New York, has returned from a trip through the New England States, selling the state rights for "Dante's Paradise and Purgatory." Mr. Rosenberg disposed of the entire New England States in less than seven days, which speaks well of the selling qualities of Paradise.

THE PEER OF ALL MOVING PICTURE MACHINES

NEW YORK MANAGERS SAY

The machine has given entire satisfaction, and we will soon need more machines for our other theatres.
Arthur S. White, Manager Moving Picture Department, Percy G. Williams Circuit of theatres.

I am so pleased with the result that I shall install another Simplex machine in place of one of another make.
Wm. J. Gane, Manhattan Theatre.

We consider it far ahead of any other machine, and have since put them in our other theatres.
Walter Rosenberg, Savoy Theatre.

So well pleased am I with our "Simplex" that I would not give one screw of it for any other entire machine on the market.
Harry Levine, Manager, Riverside Theatre.

Its precision in construction is such that it stands up to the excessive hard work, and we have no more annoying breakdowns.
E. Stern, Proprietor, Bleecker Theatre.

The new "Simplex" projector is undoubtedly the best machine we have ever operated.
E. J. Crane, Eden Musee.

After using the other machines, I cheerfully state that the "Simplex" is decidedly the best.
W. D. Kolle, Prospect Hall, Brooklyn.

It is the best we have ever used and we have ordered two more for our other theatres.

Brother Johnny Thompson, of Local No. 1, I. A. T. S. E., who was connected with the New York Hippodrome, the largest playhouse in the world, and held the responsible position of Master of Hydraulics, and I can say without fear of contradiction, one of the cleverest stage electricians in the show business. We had a long talk, and, brother operators, what I would give to be able to talk on the unseen powers of electricity like Brother Thompson! He had the distinction of handling the first electric contract and running the first wires to carry current for commercial purposes in New York. And many of our most startling stage effects were created by Bro. Thompson. In his conversation he said theory was very good when it was coupled with practical, experience, he also said the more you know about electricity the less you know, and believe me, coming from a man of his wide experience, dating back to the time that incandescent lamps were only experiments and picture machines were unheard of, when gas was used for lighting purposes on the Bon Ton stages of New York to the present day with the third rail electric elevators to save climbing the stairs, machinery of every description run by motors, wireless, the telephone, the X-ray and the thousand other uses that the unseen force electricty, keeps in motion, it is truly wonderful and it is still in its infancy. Wonderful, is it not? Brother Thompson has thirty or more patents for various electric devices that he is always willing to show and demonstrtae. He has retired from activities to spend the rest of his days at his country home at Rockland Lake. The creative genius is still in his blood, always experimenting to find something new in the field of electric achievement.

Brother John Clarke is a busy boy these days at the Empire Film Company, where he holds a responsible position. He has been connected with the above firm for four years and was with Miles Brothers for a period of five years. Johnny, as the boys call him, is one of the boys, and all the exhibitors that have dealings with him hold him high in their esteem He was recording secretary of Auxiliary Local 35, I. A. T. S. E., and bids fair to make a reputation in labor and business circles.

* * * * * *

Last Sunday I got a glimpse of Chas. C. Shay from a street car and immediately got up but he was lost in the crowd at Times Square and I lost the opportunity of interviewing one of the greatest men in organized labor. Only 35 years of age, Mr. Shay has filled every position in Local No. 00, I. A. T. S. E., but being a man of more than the average intellectual powers, a convincing talker, a tireless worker, a man that holds unionism sacred, can look a man square in the face and talks straight from the shoulder. To meet him will convince you that the International Alliance Theatrical Stage Employers could not have picked a better man for president than Chas. C. Shay and on behalf of Auxiliary Local 35, I. A. T. S. E., through the medium of the Moving Picture News we wish him a long and prosperous life.

Mr. Henry Lacey,
Secretary Local 165, I. A. T. S. E.,
Cincinnati, Ohio.

Dear Sir and Brother: Your letter of April 17th inst. to hand, with the election of officers of Local 165 enclosed received by me, and brothers, I am very sorry I did not have an opportunity to publish your welcome letter sooner as I was very busy, for boys you know the village of New York keeps a fellow on the jump, but you can tell all the members of No. 165 that the New York boys think Cincinnati has one of the strongest locals in the good old U. S. A. The following is a list of the lucky brothers that were elected at the last meeting of local 165 I. A. T. S. E.:

Harry Schwartz.....President
William Newman.....Vice-president
Henry Lacy.....Recording Secretary
Walter Kinney.....Financial Secretary
William Thornton .....Trustee
William Flodter.....Trustee

Harry Schwartz.....Delegate to District Conference

Now boys, hoping you won't forget the Moving Picture News, I beg to remain, Fraternally yours,

TOM COSTELLO.

While in the vicinity of Eighth avenue and Cathedral Parkway the other evening I took a notion to visit the Parkway Theatre just to see what the projection was like and you can believe me it certainly was worth while. I watched the pictures for an hour and a half and not once in that time could I find any fault. The pictures were all run without a hitch, no frames, and never once did the light get low enough to give the picture a brown finish on the edges. After the show was over I happened to meet the operator and on questioning him I learned that he has been at the "Parkway" for a little over two years. As the house was closed from 5 until 6:30 o'clock I asked him to show me the operating room and, believe me, he has a classy place. Everything is so placed that he can lay his hands on it the minute he wants it. Brother Dan Donohue is certainly one of the class "A" boys in the projection line and deserves great credit for his good work.

* * * *

Brother J. R. MacDougall seems to be very busy just at present taking orders. No, no, he's not sick because he has the grip. I should say not! That grip is full of supplies, such as film cement, tension springs, aperture plates, etc., and once he gets hold of anyone in need of above supplies you can bet your last $ that they don't get away until J. R. gets the order.

* * * *

Talk about holding a job down, just look at "Big John" up at Weiss's on Sixth avenue and Fourteenth street. He has been there a little over four years, and it can easily be seen that he delivers the goods or he would not be there. Stick to it, John, that's the only way to get the "moss."

* * * *

Met Brother Morris Simon the other night at the Greater New York Film Company after the rush was over and had quite a chat with him. He is doing some bookkeeping I believe. He only works about twelve hours per day. Pretty Soft. (I don't think.) Now Brother Simon tells me that he is not compelled to work for a living, he only wants to wear out his old clothes. Seriously speaking, he says if anyone comes in with a nice easy night job in an airdome at a large salary, he wouldn't have the heart to refuse the job. When it comes to operating Brother Simon is right there with both hands, and let me tell you that he is able to deliver the goods every time.

* * * *

Speaking about obliging employees of the Greater New York Film Company, I hardly think you could find a more pleasant and obliging party than Miss Minnie Weisberger. Every day you will find her at her desk, always ready to give any information on any picture you want, and you don't have to wait all day to get it either. She is quite a favorite and has a host of friends among the operators and exhibitors.

* * * *

A word of thanks to our brothers (across the pond) in Local No. 59, Jersey City, for their kind assistance. Any time we can return the favor we will be only too glad to do so.

J. G.

IT is a question whether the continued filming of weird and wild detective stories tends to uplift and refine the moving picture. Protests have been voiced in certain dignified circles recently that the reason the youngster has turned away from the Penny Dreadful is that he can find his heart's desire in certain detective stories flashed on the screen. It is a fact that some of the detective stories released outdo in sensationalism the most strenuous adventures of "Old Sleuth." To the credit of the Sales Company and Patents Company, it can be stated that many of the more exciting detective plots come to us in the nature of feature films. A good detective story, occasionally, adds to the joy of living. But the impossible sleuth who chases the fiendish criminal through 3,000 feet of film to the accompaniment of hardware, dynamite, kidnapping and safe-robbing, is to be condemned.

Thanks to the efforts of the French writers of sensational fiction, the world long ago came to entertain a high idea of the abilities of the Parisian police. No crime was so mysterious that they could not solve, and no criminal so clever that they could not run to earth with promptness and ease. More recently another school of fiction has been developed by French writers, a school that glorifies the criminal and puts his natural enemy, the detective, in a rather ridiculous light. This modern school is having its effect on the moving picture. These modern criminal heroes have not measured up to the high ideals that the admirers of that fine old detective of fiction, M. Lecocq, had formed. Lecocq has been hoodwinked, outwitted and clearly beaten by the new Arsene Lupins. This may do for the six best sellers in fiction, but it is not conducive to the moral welfare of the youthful patron of the moving picture theatre. Edgar Allan Poe was the founder of the modern detective story. Even Conan Doyle's "Sherlock Holmes," with his theories of deduction, savors very much of Poe. If detective stories are deemed necessary for the picture screen, it is suggested that the glorification of the master criminal be left for the library shelves and that the producer stick to the good old method of having Hawkshaw triumph in behalf of the law.

We'd set up in de gal-ry dere, upon a Sunday night,
An' sometimes Mag's old man would come when he was feelin right,
Which made Mag's ma so cheery—why it made de old dame feel
Just as happy as a hobo as she sat an' watched de reel.

All what I see wit' me own eyes I knows an' understan's,
When I sees movin' pictures of de far-off furrin lan's.
Where de Hunks an' Ginnies come from—yer can betcher life I knows
Dat of all de lan's an' countries, 'tain't no matter where yer goes—
Dis here countrie's got 'em faded—take from me, dat ain't no kid—
'Cause we learned it from th' movies, me an' my gal Maggie did.

—Shakespeare.

We may now anticipate a flood of playlets based on the wrecking of the Titanic. Jack Binns and his wireless "C. D. Q.," have finally been outdone by the heroism displayed by those Anglo-Saxons who went into the Valley of Death, calm and unafraid. The animated weeklies have released pictures bearing on the Titanic disaster, and the enterprise shown by them is marvelous and a credit to the field of cinematography. A number of impressive and convincing picture plays will undoubtedly be released based on experiences of the shipwrecked and upon the calm, cool courage displayed by those men "who remained with the ship."

"Tell her," said Millionaire Guggenheim," that no woman remained on this ship because Ben Guggenheim was a coward."

"Goodbye," smiled Major Butt, as he tucked a woman into a lifeboat, ascended again to the doomed ship and smilingly waved his hat.

"Don't worry, dear," said John Jacob Astor, as he lit a cigar and smiled down at his bride.

"Be British, my men," called out Captain Smith.

To the strains of "Nearer My God To Thee," Jew and Gentile, Britisher and American sank with the stricken leviathan to an Atlantic grave. Cinematography, through convincing stories, can give a lesson to the world in showing the steadfast bravery of Jew and Gentile.

The Animated Weekly has come rapidly to the front and Frank Winch, energetic and experienced manager of this Independent feature, has dispatched camera men to every part of the world to gather the strange and startling subjects for the Animated. The dispatch shown in releasing the Titanic pictures was a "scoop' in itself for Winch and all the newspaper boys will extend to him the admiring and glad hand. Winch in speaking of the Animated, pride of the Independent forces, says: "Human nature is curious to see things and that is what gives the animated its popularity. For a small sum, within a few minutes walk of your home, you can see the world's doings just as they occurred."

Winch is the right man in the right place. He can detect a good feature news story—or picture—even before it "breaks" and members of the newspaper fraternity are pleased over the success he is making in a new and difficult field.

Here, Winch, put this in your scrap book:

I know just who has found the pole,
And whether England's short of coal,
Or if that fighting suffrage band
Breaks all the windows in the land;
I can hear, and see and know
What's going on in Mexico.
I pay a dime, in joy and peace,
And view the Animate release.

An interest in that Chinese muss,
In Knox's trip to quell a fuss,
I want to look when Morgan buys;
And see how high the airship flies,
And worry, I am sure I shan't,
About the hapless case of Brandt—
The Animated's out, I ween,
Latest for the picture screen!

The moving picture theatre has Big Business guessing.

* * * *

The latest use to which the moving picture theatre is being applied is the locating of lost persons or criminals. In England, the police are running slides on the screens showing photographs of missing persons, and it often leads to the location of the person wanted. In Prague, they are utilizing moving pictures to portray the likeness of criminals "wanted by the police." It has been commented upon by police headquarters in every country. Thomas McQuade, superintendent of police of Pittsburgh, believes the moving picture will ultimately become a great aid to the police but does not believe the flashing of the faces of criminals on theatre screens in this country practicable. We agree with him. The moving picture theatre is a place of innocent amusement, not a place to advertise criminals or an adjunct to some detective bureau.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

The Townsend Bill

The Townsend Infringement Immunity bill, the Picture Patents Company is endeavoring to "put over," should be strenuously protested against by every script writer. Write or wire your Congressman asking him to oppose this bill if you are in favor of preserving the copyright privilege. Instead of providing for the copyrighting of picture-play manuscripts, it specifically provides that they shall not be so received. The bill is known as H. R. 22,350.

Other than the injustice to script writers on the copyright question according to Epes Winthrop Sargent, author of "Technique of the Photoplay," the bill seems to be introduced purely in the interest of the Licensed forces as is evidenced by the fact that while immunity for unknowing infringement must necessarily extend to the Independents, one section of the bill seems framed solely in favor of Licensed productions, since it provides that unpublished motion pictures may be copyrighted by entry of the scenario and identifying frames, one from each scene of a picture-play. Mr. Sargent pertinently states: "As the constituent members of the Motion Picture Patents Company alone lease their product while the others sell or publish it, it will be seen that the licensed films may procure copyright protection for a sum not exceeding five dollars each, while the film alone for two thousand foot prints required to gain protection for an Independent picture represents an outlay of sixty dollars." The new Townsend bill expressly provides against accepting scenarios for copyright, discriminates against Independent pictures and manifestly is unfair. Not only the script writers, but also the Sales Company should get busy.

Much Ado About Nothing.

"Spectator," of the Mirror, and Epes Winthrop Sargent, of the World, are getting right down to fine tacks and have individually and collectively decided to taboo that much abused term "scenario." Mr. Sargent has invited us to come into the water while the wading is good. According to present indications, the word "scenario" will be about as popular in another year as is the song, "Marching Through Georgia," in the city of Atlanta. As the majority rules, and we wish to dwell in peace and amity, we shall agree to use "photoplaywright." However, we receive the privilege to compromise occasionally on, "Pictureplay Author," "Dope Artists," and "Script Writer." Whether the Powers-That-Be will ever have the courage to put "Photoplaywright Editor" after their signatures remains to be seen by the "Photoplaywrights," themselves.

Powers In Line.

Editor Warren, of the Powers Picture Play Company, has abolished the custom of acknowledging scripts. Where is the need? Magazine editors do not acknowledge manuscripts so why should the pictureplay editor? Within the short time, none of the editors will acknowledge scripts. Enclose your self-addressed stamped envelope and, if unavailable, your script will safely return to you.

It's a Good Idea

A number of pictureplaywrights have written us complimenting the personal letters written to them by Editor Schulberg, of the Rex Company, whenever this editor rejects a script of merit, which for reasons is not suited to the needs of Rex, he proceeds to tell the author the whys and wherefores in a heart-to-heart letter. Not a form letter, mind you—nor one with the reasons checked off, but a real for sure nice letter. The Epistle of Paul to the Ephesians cannot hold a candle to some of the word paintings handed out by Editor Schulberg. "Mighty nice," "encouraging," "am going to send him more," are some of the phrases contained in letters from writers sent to us together with the Rex rejection letters. It's a good idea, this personal letter practice. Authors who do good work appreciate the recognition and all the sting of the rejection is withdrawn.

Come Over into Macedonia and Help Us!

"Come over into Macedonia and help us!" is the tenor of the wail that has gone to high heaven from sundry script writers who cry for surcease from the many circular letters and diploma offers from correspondence schools that profess not only to teach photoplaywriting, but also to market scripts. There seems to be a regular deluge, according to advices we receive, and new ones are popping up every week or so. The protest from one writer is significant.

Indianapolis, Ind., writes: "Two weeks ago I wrote and submitted to a certain film concern my first effort. It was later returned to me. But listen here! Before I got the script back from that concern, I got a letter from a St. Louis correspondence school, carrying the same address as was written on the upper right hand of my script. I am not making any charges, but I would like to discover how that school got my name and address so promptly? I was never known before to any script editor because I had never before written a playlet. How about it?"

Yes, how about it? Others would be pleased to discover how this and that correspondence school, schools not connected with any film manufacturing company, either, get names and addresses of writers and then pester them with all kinds of impossible and impracticable offers. When a writer conforms to all rules and submits a script in good faith, his name should be protected by every editorial department. The editor, probably in the majority of cases, is not to blame, but it behooves him to be vigilant and to see that someone around the office is not copying the names of contributors and sending them out to some "school" or "professor."

Objections along this line are becoming numerous and are legitimate. Lists of writers are valuable to schools, so-called. They are also valuable to the script editor and should be held in strictest confidence. Indianapolis sends along the proposition of this new school which found him out with such astonishing quickness. It's a new stunt. It's not really a "school," it's a "company." They offer "big prizes for moving picture plays and, according to the prospectus sent out, there is an astonishing dearth of ideas and a dearth of moving picture play writers."

The advertising matter states that "the field is the most lucrative ever offered to the average man or woman" and "you can tell a story—who cannot?" This course runs four weeks and the tuition is only $10. In the final lesson you take up pictureplaywriting based on your own plots, "and we will assist you with it to the end that it, your first effort, may be sold and your course more than paid for at once." Great!

MISLEADING ADVERTISEMENTS

It is interesting to take up certain of the current popular magazines and read the advertisements, long lists of them being published to catch the money of the unwary pictureplaywright. Here is a list found in one magazine of this month:

> Motion Picture Plays Wanted. You can write them. We teach you by mail. No experience needed. Big demand and good pay.
> Wanted—Moving Picture Plays. You can write them. We show you how. Free book. For single ideas manufacturers pay $100.
> Write Ideas for Moving Picture Plays. Make $50 weekly in spare time. No experience or literary excellence necessary. Easy, fascinating work. We'll show you how.
> Wanted—Motion Picture Play Writers. You can easily write a moving picture play. Great demand. Big pay. Easy to learn. We teach you how. Send your address.
> Do your MSS. Come Back? Motion picture scenarios criticised, revised and sold. Send for folder.
> It's Easy When You Know How. Let us teach you to write moving picture plays. Our diploma a guarantee of your worth. Make $50 to $100 weekly at home. Write quick.

Honestly, it is a sin and a shame that some magazines boasting of the reliability of their advertising columns, permit such misleading advertisements to be published. Hundreds of dollars have been taken from the unsuspecting through advertisements reading like the above. The moving picture trade journals will help the struggling author at the price of a year's subscription. The majority of these schools do the beginner more harm than good. "No experience needed," "$50 weekly in spare time," "$100 for single ideas," sound tempting. Such statements are not only misleading but are false in every respect.

TOO LONG A "STRING"

"I am not at all discouraged by not selling my scripts, I know one writer who has one hundred on his string," writes a New York contributor to this journal.

There is too much haste in getting a string of stories started and not enough time and thought spent on the scripts. We believe that is one important reason for the many impossible plots and plays that have been flooding editorial offices lately. It is better to have one script, carefully and thoughtfully developed and written, than to have a hundred crude efforts making the rounds and eating up postage. Some of the authors having the longest "string" of scripts out, are the very ones who are putting up the loudest howls about "favoritism," "lack of careful consideration," etc. One script weekly or monthly, written and then sold, is more profitable than one hundred hastily written scripts unsold, some of them probably salable if sufficient time and brains were put into them.

SUDDEN ILLNESS OF MR. CHARLES URBAN.

We learn with great regret that Mr. Charles Urban, famous in every part of the civilized globe as the pioneer of kinematography in the actual hues of nature, and proprietor and producer of the delightful "Kinemacolor" entertainment now running at the Scala Theatre, was on Monday evening last (which by a grim coincidence happened to be his birthday) overtaken by a serious illness while at his studios in Wardour street. Though to all appearances in the best of health, he was suddenly prostrated by violent internal spasms, and the nearest medical man, Dr. Jehan Barlet, of the French Hospital, unhesitatingly pronouncing it to be a case of perforated gastric ulcer, ordered Mr. Urban's immediate removal to his residence in Ashley Gardens, whither he also summoned two English specialists, Dr. W. H. Clayton Greene, of Queen Anne street, and Dr. Ernest Miles, of the Cancer Hospital. These gentlemen promptly confirmed Dr. Barlet's diagnosis, and an immediate operation to relieve the peritoneal cavity was performed before midnight by Dr. Clayton Greene. Though Mr. Urban can scarcely be said to be quite out of danger at this early date, all his present symptoms are favourable to his recovery, a matter to be devoutly desired no less by his hosts of personal friends than by the whole of the scientific world interested in the wonderful "Kinemacolor" which has entirely revolutionized the art of kinematography.

THE TIGER BANDITS OF PARIS.

A Film Scoop.

The American Eclair offices have just received a cable from their Paris studio that the thrilling capture of the auto-bandit gang which culminated in a siege by the police, artillery and detectives in Choissy, one of the Paris suburbs, has been filmed in a startling three-reel feature.

The cabled accounts have mentioned the gallantry of the moving picture men who had advanced in the hail of bullets, to take close-range pictures of the terrible adventure. But it was a delightful surprise to the Eclair people to receive the word that it was their own camera squad who had performed the feat. The Bonnot gang has been terrorizing Paris for over a year, murdering, maiming, robbing with the most dreadful impunity in the heart of the city. From the cabled report, the camera men have been following up the work of the police in the various steps of rounding the villains up, and every detail has been "scooped" by the enterprising Eclair directors. An unusual feature of the advancement of this history-thriller is that Maurice Le Blanc, brother-in-law of Edmonde Rostand, and the author of the sensational "Arsene Lupin" stories, is cabling a 10,000 word story of the desperate battle, with a description of the cinematographic operators' daring work, as well as the secret history of the terrible gangsters. The Eclair people have made arrangements to distribute this remarkable story to their patrons. Eclair has been stirring up things with typical American strenuosity during the last few weeks: "Poe's Raven," "Dorothy Gibson, the Titanic heroine, in a shipwreck play of her own, "Sherlock Holmes" in a two-reel exclusive feature, and this final sensation, the two latter being announced by cable as the News goes to press.

INSURE YOURSELF BY MOVING PICTURES—IS THE NEWEST STUNT

Animated Weekly Management Espouses a Scheme that Is Meeting with Nation-wide Favor

Life insurance by moving pictures! That is the latest—something new under the sun at last. It remained for the fertile minds of those connected with the Sales Company's Animated Weekly to evolve a scheme that not only has wondrous intrinsic merit, but which, for novelty of conception, has hardly been equalled, and it will give the public a lot to think about—and more to talk about.

James J. Hill, the railroad magnate, and hundreds of industrial kings, have taken to the idea. George Beban, the well-known actor, with hosts of others prominent in histronic circles, are espousing the Animated Weekly's latest efforts at progressiveness.

The scheme is simple. Have moving pictures made of yourself, and at death your estate benefits by the income.

The arrangement, as it is made, is this: the Animated Weekly takes moving pictures of men and women prominent in business and social circles. The subjects are intimately gone into—characteristic poses—in business or pleasure—at office or home—on yacht or automobile. The pictures, when completed, are shown in private for approval by the subject. Then they are sealed, and put in fireproof vaults. A condition of the agreement made by the Animated Weekly is that they will never be shown publicly except under one of two circumstances. The first—by express and written consent of the subject during his lifetime, or after his death.

The latter phase concerns the insurance element. After the death of, for instance, a prominent man, these pictures, one set of them, is turned over to the family, the other is released for showing. From the revenue of the pictures, the estate of the deceased derives a certain percentage. Other than the angle of life insurance, this project of the Animated Weekly offers inducements of a world-wide interest.

For instance, future generations one hundred or five hundred years from now, will know the world and its principal factors as they exist to-day. Had the science of yesterday developed motion photography, we of to-day would have been able to look upon Michael Angelo, or Napoleon, Wagner, Columbus, Mahomet, or, even going back further, we might have been privileged to sit in awe and worship the sacred images of the Apostles and the Savior. All this would have been possible had science been advanced in the particular lines of motion photography.

Coming to a more recent incident—the Titanic disaster—but few, very few of the noble hearts that braved a heroe's death in the catastrophe remain to us, except in inanimate pictures.

The Animated Weekly has worked out in its details this latest innovation in picture history. The undertaking is gigantic, involving an expenditure of a million dollars or over—but the Sales Company is willing to foster the project, which eventually will result in a genuine benefit and blessing to humanity to this, and in generations to come.

NOTES OF THE WEEK

Rather an amusing scheme of getting around the Sunday law was devised and carried out by three of the Dallas, Tex., moving picture theatres recently. Above a box made for the occasion was pasted the following: "Free motion pictures. Put donation in the box if you wish to help pay running expenses. If not, pass in."

In the last six months of the year 1911, the United States exported to England 37,000,000 linear feet of motion picture films. During the same period we exported to Canada 3,000,000 linear feet. France and Brazil each took a half million feet. Smaller quantities were sent to the Philippines, Australia, Japan, Newfoundland, Bermuda and other countries. Ours is the leading film manufacturing country of the world.

During the same period, 6,500,000 linear feet of films were imported into the United States from foreign countries. France supplied most of it, England, Italy, Denmark, Germany, Mexico, Scotland, Canada, Panama and the Philippines furnishing the rest.

Under the auspices of the senior class of the University of California a moving picture show invaded the classic confines of the Hearst Greek Theatre not long ago. The scenes were shown of campus events of the past term. The intercollegiate regatta on Oakland estuary, "The Parthenia," Tetrazzini in "Stabat Mater," the California, Stanford baseball game and other university happenings were thrown on the screen. Copies of the films were presented to the University Library as a memorial of the class.

A novelty, in the shape of a stereopticon exhibition, was introduced in the Special Term of the Queens County Supreme Court recently, when the suit brought by the Long Island Railroad to have commissioners of condemnation appointed to take the small tract of land at Dunton, near Van Wyck avenue, Jamaica, belonging to J. K. O. Sherwood, was called for trial. Pictures taken of the properties in the immediate vicinity of the Sherwood tract were thrown on the white wall of the courtroom for the information of Justice Crane. The odd display was also witnessed by an interested audience of spectators.

It has been stated that the National Plant, Flower and Fruit Guild will request the superintendents of schools throughout the United States to include moving picture lectures showing the growth and care of plants and flowers in the regular school course in the near future.

If anyone should be able to judge correctly of the effect of influences good and bad upon children surely a mother should. The following statement from a mother of ten to a reporter of the New York World is no doubt but the echo of the prevailing sentiment among mothers with regard to the influence of the moving picture theatre as it is to-day:

"I am the mother of ten children, and I ought to know by this time what does them harm and what does them good," spoke up Mrs. Harry C. Arthur of No. 690 Union avenue in the Bronx. "The moving pictures that are being shown in New York have been a splendid thing for my children. I know this because I have gone to the pictures with them and have witnessed their effect. One of our greatest difficulties arises from the fact that we try to keep from our children all knowledge of crime and wrongdoing, and when they grow up they are not prepared to meet it when it is forced into their paths of life. The character of moving pictures has so improved during the last three years that it is safe to let children go to nearly any of them."

* * * * * *

An ingenious, if cumbersome, invention has been offered to the Paris police authorities for the detection of crime committed in the streets. In fact, it could be applied to accidents. The proposal is to install in the clock towers in the various streets a cinematograph apparatus directed by wireless.

Miss Dorothy Gibson, of the Eclair Moving Picture Company, spent the past week in Atlantic City. Although Miss Gibson worked with her usual vim, completing a very splendid picture to be released in the near future, she felt that a few days' rest and change was necessary after her recent trying experiences in the wreck of the Titanic.

David Horsley, president of the Nestor Film Company, has again left for the Pacific Coast. His stay at the Nestor studios, Hollywood, California, will be a brief one, as some important business here in the East requires Mr. Horsley's presence early in June. Wesley Gray Gilmour, comptroller of the Nestor Company, and who is to take charge of the Nestor studios in the West, accompanied Mr. Horsley on his transcontinental trip.

Mr. L. H. Cohen, who has resigned from the secretaryship of the General Film Publicity and Sales Company, has been succeeded in that office by Mr. Joseph H. Strouse.

* * * * * *

The strong demand made upon the Nestor Company to produce more Western pictures caused Mr. Horsley and his associates to change the Nestor policy and release three Westerns a week. Charles Simone, the Nestor manager, informs us that, owing to the unexpected strength shown by the Nestor dramatic pictures as produced by Director Thomas Ricketts, the Nestor people have finally decided to continue releasing the Monday domestic drama and put out two Western pictures a week.

Powers Picture Plays have still on hand a number of 8x11 sepia toned photographs of their players. Any exhibitor who is not yet supplied with them, may have same upon the payment of twenty-five cents to cover the cost of mailing.

The Nestor Film Company, through its manager, Charles Simone, most emphatically denies the various reports connecting it with the Mutual Film Company. Mr. Simone positively states that no one has offered to buy the Nestor Company, and adds that, if an offer were made, no matter how flattering, it would be instantly refused. Exchanges and exhibitors are requested to place no credence in any rumor touching upon the purchase of the Nestor Company by the Mutual or any other concern. The Nestor Film Company is not for sale.

BIG SOLAX NIGHT SUCCESS.

Dixie Theatre Crowded to Doors.

The little five-cent Dixie on 116th street and Seventh avenue was transformed into a real theatre on Friday, April 26th. The familiar sign "Admission 5c" had disappeared from its wonted place in front of the box-office and in its place there stood, boldly—defiantly—recklessly—the unusual legend:

Admission—Adults 15c. Children 10c.

The patriotic display of flags and bunting, in addition to the fascinating three-sheets and one-sheets and home-made sheets, attracted the passer-by. The combination of lights, flags and posters had a magnetism, a mystic drawing power that beckoned to the passing pedestrian to come in and behold the wonders of picturedom. The attraction was irresistible. They came to the window of the box-office with a nickel in their hands, read the astounding message, and dug down for ten cents more.

The proprietor's cherub-faced daughter, who presided over the box-office strong box, wore an inviting smile. Her deft fingers made the change and handed out the tickets with an expert's nonchalance. Behind this nonchalance, however, there lurked a nervous expectancy—an anticipation of good things to come. This sudden influx of prosperity kindled her imagination and in her mind's eye she saw new spring bonnets, spring clothes and "spring beaux!" What little girl wouldn't smile, laugh or cry with joyous expectancy.

The people came! Every available seat—every foot of floor space held an expectant spectator. And still they came! The aisles and passageways were crowded. Women, children and men. Wives, husbands and sweethearts. All were in that surging body, craning their necks toward the stage. The owner and manager walked excitedly up and down the lobby. The house was jammed in violation of fire rules. They were making money—they couldn't manage the people that clamored for admission. There wasn't a prospect of getting the crowds out for some time. They were orderly enough but—the management was short-sighted enough not to have provided for this emergency. With a little foresight the management could have packed their theatre for three shows. Because of his lack of preparation for big crowds, the manager let slip out of his reach some fifty dollars or more. It was astonishing—his utter helplessness in the face of this box-office onslaught. Another showman, with more experience, would have reaped a rich harvest.

The program for the evening consisted of the exhibition of The Sewer—two reels—and Billy's Grip. Darwin Karr, who is the Solax's leading man and who plays the leading role in this feature production, personally appeared and told of his picture experience, his trips to Flushing and his adventures on the Flushing cars. Among other things, he said that when he starts out in the morning with a clean shave, he usually looks like Rip Van Winkle when he arrives in Flushing. He made a hit with the audience with some camera business. He told them he would like their picture, and while fussing with the focus he let drop some gems of motion picture information. Billy Quirk, our inimitable comedian, also appeared and was a hit from start to finish. He has an entertaining act and keeps the audience in a merry mood every minute of the time he is on the stage. He was given a fine reception. There were other members of the Solax Stock Company present and each one was most cordially received.

The small boys in the audience felt for Billy the air and reverence they usually feel for ball players or prize-fighters. A number of them volunteered to carry his coat and cane. They wagered with each other on his height—his weight—the number of pictures he poses in each week—whether he was a greater man than Roosevelt or whether he made more money than Taft.

Mr. Karr received the same attentions from the youngsters. They marvelled at his heroism in facing the onslaught of rats in "The Sewer" and worshipped him for his kindness to young Oliver in the story. He made a hit with them by explaining how terrible was his ordeal in the staggering and nauseating sewer environs

Mr. Curian, the manager of the theatre, said that they cleared $169.00 above the average daily receipts.

SIMPLEX PROGRESS

On and after May 1st, the Simplex Agency office in Fourteenth street will be discontinued, and all business will be transacted from the factory.

Owing to the great success of the Simplex, double the space has been taken in the factory building and splendid offices have been constructed adjoining the factory.

Reception rooms, exhibition rooms, experimental rooms, etc., together with a larger space for office help, makes it much more convenient to consolidate the sales agency with the factory.

All correspondence from now on should be addressed to THE PRECISION MACHINE COMPANY, INC.,
317-323 East Thirty-fourth Street,
New York City.

MGR. EDWARD C. WHITE OF WEBER'S ENTERTAINS CHILD LABOR ENTHUSIASTS.

On Tuesday April 30, Manager Edward C. White, of Weber's New York theatre, extended the courtesy of this popular playhouse to the social workers and others interested in the abolition of child labor on the occasion of the first run of the Thanhouser two-reel production, "The Cry of the Children." Over one thousand tickets were distributed among the members of the Big Sister and Big Brother movements, the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and the Children's Aid Society.

"The Cry of the Children" is one of the best films that has been produced in some time and the effect on the audience was so startling and the acting so realistic and true to life that there was scarcely a dry eye in the house. The Thanhouser Kid so takes the leading part in the mill scene that much comment was occasioned and the management of the house was repeatedly questioned as to whether or not the scene was taken from real life.

In addition to "The Cry of the Children" several other independent films were run, namely "The Tail of a Kite," (Republic), "The Five Senses," and "When the Lily Died," (Powers), "The Silent Call" (Majestic), and "The Revenge of the Silk Masks," Series II, (Eclair).

Manager White has aimed to make the theatre of which he is in charge, one of the "talked abouts" of New York and he is succeeding admirably. His pianist, Fred E. Alherp, is well fitted to occupy a place among the virtuosos and the manner in which he adapts the works of old masters, yclept Chopin, Rachmaninoff, Grieg, Beethoven and others is a revelation to the Weber audience and a delight to the music lover.

Miss McCrostie, a vocalist of merit, sings every evening and earns the plaudits of her audience.

The box party is beginning to be the "real thing" among the elite of New York Society at those playhouses adapted to moving pictures, which afford the opportunity. Weber's is admirably adapted for this purpose, having a circle of mezzanine boxes in place of the regular balcony.

These boxes contain six chairs and are so arranged that the pictures can be seen as well from the boxes nearest the stage as those farther back. The low price of 25 cents a chair or $1.50 for the entire box brings the box party within reach of the masses and allows the matron of comfortable means to entertain her friends at the theatre for a nominal sum.

Friday night last was Solax night at Weber's and several of the players, including Darwin Karr and Billy Quirk were present and put on many stunts.

THE THUMB-PRINT VICTORY

When Bertillon made his startling discovery that no two thumb-prints are alike and that criminals can be detected by the thumb-prints left on any object in the vicinity in which they operated, he never dreamed he had created the foundation for a thrilling motion picture, and incidentally made possible for the acquiring of the clue that first brought happy triumph and later bitter defeat to a girl reporter.

The means by which the unusual tale is told is "The Eternal Conflict," a Rex production of Sunday, May 12th.

It's a newspaper story teeming with intense interest—as well as principle. In fact, just as in a more material sense, it's the principle that starts the interest. The city editor of the Daily Leader knows of the corruption that is victimizing the city, and he determines to expose and wipe out the political conspiracy. He assigns some of his best men to obtain the necessary information and evidence to further his purpose, and after serious and strenuous effort, they are forced to admit failure. He then assigns the girl reporter, Marion Leonard.

How she obtains the salient facts in the premises by means of a thumb-print trick that is at once novel and thrilling, how she obtains access to the home of the political boss, who is the ringleader of the corrupt gang, how she secretes herself in the clothes-closet and overhears the details of the illegal plot to pilfer the civic funds, form thrilling details of the plot.

But the heart-breaking climax comes when, her story obtained and written, the editor-in-chief suppresses the expose, as editors-in-chief are apt to do when they're not carrying enough advertising. And thenceforth, forever, the girl always spoke the word "man" with a queer little inflection that was not exactly flattering to the species in question.

TITANIC DISASTER SLIDES POPULAR.

W. Lindsay Gordon's lecture set of slides illustrating the great sea disaster, the wreck of the Titanic, are in such demand that it has been found necessary to put on extra help in order to fill orders promptly. When the Moving Picture News man called on Mr. Gordon he saw a desk full of telegrams from managers and lecturers all over who wanted the slides. Mr. Gordon claims the demand for this particular set is due to the fact that he has arranged it in sets of 15 and 30 slides, all of which are intensely interesting, and beautifully colored, each set having a strong lecture, and special lithos. The special price is another feature of the set, as managers find that they can purchase it as cheap as renting. Mr. Gordon's other big feature lecture sets are: Dante's Inferno, Paradise Lost, White Slave Traffic, and others all with special paper.

UNWHOLESOME DESIRE

Contentment is the greatest fun in life. It may have been discontent that has civilized us, but it's also made us mighty, mighty unhappy at times. Take the type of woman, as the Rex Company did in its release of Thursday, May 9th, "Drawing the Line," who has money and the unwholesome desire it inherits. Money is primarily a medium of exchange and she intends literally to exchange some of it for a title for her sweet little daughter who is really too fine a girlie to deserve such a fate, and sell her son to an heiress who was worth her weight in gold but wasn't worth a copper elsewise. The son liked his sister, and what's more, he didn't exactly hate himself, so he didn't endorse his mother's proposition with howling enthusiasm.

In fact, to hand you the frank confidence, that's why there's a story. Somehow or other, the son wandered away on a business journey, and met an actress. She was a good woman, let us tell you; a woman who had seen the tears of life and knew how to smile so that it didn't look as though it could be blown off her face by a zephyr. It would take a wholesale storm to do it—maybe. Don't tax your imagination; we'll tell you what happens. He falls in love with the actress.

Mother raises more or less warm climate about the affair. Son leaves the house and marries the girl. Goes away to New York with her. Happy—happier than the word.

And poor little daughter marries the earl. Many, many times, pitying reader, she sat in the lonesome twilight, eagerly but vainly waiting for the return of the earl. Invariably the earl returned early—next morning. Sometimes he spoke to her as he shouldn't to any woman, sometimes he acted only as drunken, arrogant earls can act. Poor little kid fool, she got her title, but she paid for it with a dearer coin than money, paid for it with the coin of her soul and the wealth of her health.

When, broken in health and spirit and hope, she returned to the home of her mother, with the story of the miserable glory of nobility, when her mother saw the pain and shame of the years concealed in the dulled, once bright eyes, she saw the truth hiding under the surface of circumstances, and her heart cried in her defeat.

WESTERN CORRESPONDENCE

Hot Springs, Ark., May 3.—Perhaps the weather is not the most interesting topic to open a weekly communication, but there is weather and weather, and whether the weather we have been having here lately is of the old hackneyed brand for lack of something better to mention, we are willing to wager that nine out of the traditional ten, when placed in possession of the facts in the case, will be willing to accept the statements of local picture managers that the Hot Springs variety the past week was enough to drive the average dispenser of motion photography to a padded cell.

I once heard a German vaudeville comedian get something like this out of his system:

"Vether it's cold or vether it's hot,
Ve got to have vether—vetter or not."

And, take it from me, we have been having it—the rainy kind, too. In spite of the deluge, however, business hasn't been so awful bad, but the rain has been fierce. Not in recent years has the city witnessed such a literal exemplification and illustration of "April showers" as has been slipped to us the past month, and we are yelling for help. We appreciate the condition of the flood sufferers. It has put a damper on the show business generally.

* * * * * *

Were it not for the incessant rain it is more than likely that the wonderful production of "The Odyssey" of Homer, by the Milano film company, which came to the big Auditorium last week, would have played to capacity business, for nothing more worthy in the moving picture line has been seen here in months. It was a startling surprise the patrons got, and is by far one of the most notable efforts in this line that has ever been given the people of this city. It attracted a great deal of attention from all classes, but, as was to be expected, received the greatest amount of praise from the "highbrows," who were there in large numbers. The agent of "The Odyssey" reels tells an interesting story on a Little Rock manager, a man very prominent in the theatrical world in these parts. He wanted to know what "show" he was getting and stated that he had not seen any criticisms of the company in the dramatic papers and didn't know "this man Homer who had this 'odd' trick out."

* * * * * *

Pity the poor picture manufacturer! The State Federation of Women's Clubs has just concluded a very interesting session in Little Rock, the result of which is a series of resolutions aimed at "present-day evils," and among them the moving picture did not escape. Likewise the Sunday supplement of the big newspapers are respectfully but none the less emphatically ordered to "get hence and come no more," and ye editor is plainly told to relegate criminal news to inside pages and not to "play up" sensations with "scare heads." Regarding the pictures, the good ladies who "resoluted" so strenuously admit that they are a great and important factor in the education of the young and call upon manufacturers to produce only such films as will make for the moral uplift of the young minds, eliminating anything and everything of a sexual nature and advising that a strict board of censorship be established in every city, town and hamlet where there is hung a picture curtain. How dost thou like that wallop, Mr. Manufacturer? And then they adjourned to meet in this beautiful vale of vapors next year.

* * * * * *

The Princess Theatre put one over on its competitors the last half of the present week, when there was shown for the first time in this city slides depicting scenes of the rescue of the "Titanic" passengers. There were about thirty illustrations of this nature, the pictures having been taken by a vaudeville team who happened to be aboard the "Carpathia" when that good vessel rescued the Titanic survivors. The slides attracted a great deal of attention and were a big drawing card. Included in the same were pictures of the principle men and women who were saved from the wreck, together with scenes aboard the Carpathia. It is said that the pictures are the only genuine ones of the great disaster. A Little Rock manager, as well as one in Pine Bluff, I am informed, undertook to show slides supposed to be genuine of this disaster, but they were such plain "fakes" that they were only given for one day to the public, but the Princess did a big business with them. This feature at the Princess was illustrated by Walter M. Ebel, and there were several of the slides that were made more clear by his lecture on the same.

Not to be outdone in special features the Photo Play was also very much in the running and "scooped" the other houses by a reel depicting the scenes of the present flood in the eastern part of the state and the city of Memphis. We had been awaiting the "flood pictures" with a great deal of interest and were not disappointed in what we saw. It was a good reel and gave the people of this city an idea of the extent of damage that had been done. Hot Springs has raised a goodly sum for relief of the residents in the eastern part of the state and local citizens appreciated the picture. The Photo Play also offered the latest Bison special of the "101 Ranch" series, "Blazing the Trail," and it would be hard to tell which of these great western subjects were the most popular. It is my opinion that every one of these series should be preserved, for it gives one a better idea of what the pioneers of the early days had to go through than all the histories ever written. The pictures drew capacity houses.

* * * * * *

The New Central maintained its programme of excellence the past week and as a special attraction called upon Miss Elsie Ray, a petite and very talented mandolin and guitar player, to "specialize" between reels, and what Elsie did to her two instruments was a wonder to the New Central patronage. She handled the classic and ragtime with the same artistic interpretation, and her work was a decided treat.

I understand that Harry Hale, of the Lyric, is dickering with the management of Whittington park for a lease during the Summer season of the theatre at that place and that the deal may be closed this week. I do not know whether this is because work on the new Lyric and airdome, which I mentioned some time ago, is to start or whether Mr. Hale is going to run his present theatre and the one at the Park. The park house is an ideal Summer theatre, with a big stage and great seating capacity and with a good show should do a big Summer business.

* * * * * *

Rumors are again circulating up and down Central avenue that a syndicate has purchased the old Grand Opera House and intends to rebuild the theatre into a palatial house for big attractions. It is said that it will have a ground floor entrance and that those who are to undertake this project have already had an understanding with New York booking offices whereby they will get the best shows that formerly went to the Auditorium. There is something to all these rumors and the cork is liable to pop out of the bottle before many days. When it does, watch one J. Frank Head make things lively for New York agents. Mr. Head has control of the Auditorium, and he and his manager at the Auditorium, Fred Pennel, have been giving Hot Springs better attractions the past season than the city has ever had. Take it from one who believes he knows whereof he speaks, these boys are not asleep at the switch.

ECLAIR'S NEW DRAMATIC STAR.

Miss Barbara Tennant, a winsome English girl famous on two continents for her brunette beauty, has been engaged to play some unusually strong leading roles with the Eclair's new spring productions. Miss Tennant played the support for Mr. Charles Cherry in Charles Frohman's "Seven Sisters" last season. Before that she toured England and Canada in Shakespearean productions, and made several trips around the world giving dramatic interpretations from the English classics. The Eclair directors are specializing on the classical adaptions, believing that the American people are eager to see the very best selections from the literature visualized. Wm. H. Haddock, formerly a director with the Edison studios has been appointed on the directing staff of Eclair's studio at Fort Lee.

AMERICAN INVENTS BURNISHING MACHINE

Through the unremitting efforts of C. Ziebarth, the American's mechanic and electrician, a new device has been added to the mechanical efficiency of the American Film Manufacturing Company's new Chicago plant which bids fair to surpass old-fashioned methods in polishing or burnishing film. Mr. Ziebarth has spent a number of months on the new machine which, during the last three or four weeks has taken the place of the girls usually required to do that work .

In passing from the developing tanks film frequently shows water spots in the drying process. The new machine receives positive prints and passes them through without generating friction on the emulsion side.

SAVED FROM THE TITANIC.

Eclair.

It was a curious chance that led Miss Dorothy Gibson, of the Eclair Film Company, to take passage on the Titanic, when she had already been booked on the Hamburg-American line. As told in these columns last week, she had a wonderful escape from the dread disaster; and so impressed were the Eclair producers with her story that they decided to bring out a drama entitled "Saved From the Titanic," from Miss Gibson's own story, with that handsome young cinematic star playing the leading role. Accordingly, the work was begun and finished with such remarkable celerity that on May 14, one month from the day of the great wreck, this sensational film play will be released. In the pictures Miss Gibson is shown in the very garments in which she was rescued; a ship's wireless room, scenes on a naval vessel, and other actual details never before attempted are brought into the story to make the photographic drama one worthy its great origin. The harassing details which might offend good taste are carefully omitted, but the story of the wreck, the love interest and the effects of the bitter calamity are all depicted. It was a terrible task which Miss Gibson took upon herself, a week after her rescue. Most people would have succumbed to the nervous strain, but like the actresses before the footlights, this star of the camera play stuck to her part. and went over and over the bitter details, keeping a tight grip on her emotions. The play in its story form is that of a young girl who is returning to New York to her parents, after her studies abroad. She is to meet her betrothed, a naval officer on one of Uncle Sam's battleships, and then they are to be married. The dreadful wreck occurs, and she is given up for lost. At last the wireless announces the daughter's rescue, and the bad news turns out to be good. Yet, even after the daring rescue and her return to shore, the girl is so overcome by the thoughts of her future husband being upon the sea as a navy man, that she begs him to give up the commission. Her father comes to him, demands that he choose between the two—his marriage, or his navy life. The young man is in a bitter quandary, but he sticks to his duty; to his bewilderment the father declares that the answer had been expected, and that such was the only patrotic and manly thing to do. He calls in his charming daughter, and blesses them in their union. It is a very pretty story, and because of the nation wide interest in Miss Gibson, whose rare beauty is seen to more advantage than ever, this film will be a sensation. In Miss Gibson's support is a strong cast, among whom are Alex Francis, the father, Miss Stuart, the mother, Jack Adolfi, the ensign and William Dunn and Guy Oliver in strong characterizations.

WHAT MIGHT HAVE BEEN

(Champion)

The dream of a woman, who has passed the attractive period of life, fulfilled as her romance is lived over again, forms the theme for a beautiful and charming story that will soon be released by the Champion Film Company.

After Miss Celia Rill, who is nearing forty, congratulates her young girl friend o nher approaching marriage, Her mind reverts to her own condition in life and it dawns on her suddenly that she begins to show the marks of time. She meditates and then, seating herself before the open grate, she opens a box containing treasured love letters. It reveals her life's history as to her romances. The missives are all from men she has jilted. There is a visualization that lends interest as she reads.

First comes the protestations of love from Albert. He was rich and offered to share his fortune. The scene reverts to his condition. He is poor and is working hard to support a large family.

She reads several, one showing the gentle Howard, a tyrant in his home, and she breathes a sigh of relief. Will, who was nearly her ideal, is a drunkard. The last one is from Jack. He was the only man she had ever loved, and she had driven him from her by her coquetry and predilection to play fast and loose with his affections. She had finally written him a letter giving him the longed-for answer "yes," but the maid failed to post the letter. Jack, in despair, went to the gold fields of Alaska and she had lost all trace of him, although true to his memory.

As she gazes into the fire tears well up in her eyes. It is all brought home to her—unloved, approaching old age—nothing to live for. The door opens and Jack steals in and contemplates his former sweetheart, and he comes to her with outstretched arms. It is Jack in reality, and she can scarcely believe her eyes. Her head is nestled on his bosom and her trials are over, for he has returned from the gold country rich.

MANUFACTURERS' SYNOPSES of FILMS

JIM'S ATONEMENT
Imp Release, May 13

This is a story set around one of those little mistakes in daily life which occur with only too much frequency. People are apt to jump to conclusions on prima facie evidence without inquiring whether that evidence is really sufficient to justify their conclusions. A man sees his fiancee with another man; or a wife perceives her husband in company with another woman. The circumstances in both cases may be perfectly innocent but a false conclusion without substantiation of the apparent facts will lead to much unhappiness.

Jim and Frank were friends as well as brother surveyors. Jim was happily married to Mollie, who, one day finding an old photograph of her hubby, planned to have it enlarged as a pleasant surprise for him. Frank was an amateur photographer and Mollie consulted him on the subject. Unfortunately their consultations were rather frequent and apparently secretive and Jim, getting wise to this, rushed to the false conclusion and allowed jealousy to get possession of his mind.

The two men meet on a lonely path in the course of their surveying work, on top of a big rock. There was a quarrel; Frank accidentally falls off the cliff. The infuriated Jim went home to Mollie and demanded the photograph which he thought he saw his rival, Frank, give her, and which the girl now gives him, disclosing to her husband the fact that the photograph was that of himself. Of course, the foolish fellow was instantly repentant. Hastening back to the cliff, with help, he lowered himself by means of a rope and personally rescued Frank from his dangerous position. Explanations made the two men firmer friends than ever.

The incidents of the story are placed amidst the rocky country of Southern California, and are exceedingly thrilling.

HENPECKED IKE
Imp Release, May 18

Ike Slocum was much given to loafing, it is true, but his misfortune in this respect was due to a congenital laziness of disposition which kept him perennially averse to labor of any kind. He would not work at his job, which was that of nothing in particular, out of doors, and he evinced a strong disinclination when indoors to do anything but hang around.

Mrs. Slocum kept a boarding house and, growing tired of seeing her spouse playing the gentleman, took things into her own hands at last and gave him the alternative of helping her in the house or quitting. Ike choose the former course. He started in by waiting on the table, washing dishes, chopping wood, etc. It was a hard enough job, but the worst was yet to come: Mrs. Slocum set him to scrubbing the kitchen floor. This was too much for Ike, so he packed the "burro," Dolly, and left home with her in search of adventures. He met with so many adventures that he soon tired of them. "Dolly" deserted him; he lost his way and became hungry and footsore. In desperation he decided there was nothing for him to do but to make tracks for home.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Slocum mourned him as dead. Idle though he was, she loved him in her own way, being of the opinion that it was homelike to see a man around the house. So when Ike returned, plus "Dolly," he received a warmer welcome than he anticipated. Matters between husband and wife were patched up and there was nothing further for "Dolly" to do but to put on a sympathetic demeanor at the reconciliation.

This comedy is laid amongst far Western scenery and the two characters are peculiar to country life.

On the same reel:

ENGLISH HUNTING SCENES
Imp Release, May 18

One of the most admired phases of English life is hunting. It is not generally known that the government officially countenances stag hunting; a royal pack of dogs, royal huntsmen and a master of hounds being paid for out of the country's revenue. Hunting, indeed, enters into the life of the English people. Aristocrats and plebeians take part in the various kinds of sports on a common basis.

In this film there is shown a series of views of the hunting of the stag in rural England. All classes of society are represented; well mounted huntsmen and well trained dogs lead the field in pursuit of the stag. The quarry is ultimately run to earth in water, let it be said, and is secured for being hunted on another occasion.

The film includes some characteristic views of English country landscape, and shows the gentle sport in a very engaging aspect.

The humanitarians protest against hunting in England but the love of sport is so deeply ingrained in English people that it will never be eradicated.

Such scenes as those that are depicted in this film have been enacted for many centuries in England.

LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET
Imp Release, May 16

"Lady Audley's Secret" tells the story of a woman who, having an insatiable desire for social position, allows nothing whatsoever to impede her in order that she might attain her ends.

Sir Robert Audley, while a good and honorable man, has no social ambitions, and after a time Lady Audley's life becomes monotonous, so she devises a scheme which she believes will be of advantage to her. While her husband is away from home on a long trip, she plans to become suddenly ill and die. This is successful, and enables her to appear under another name. She next ensnares a wealthy nobleman, Sir Michael, and at last sees her dream about to be realized.

When Sir Robert returns he penetrates her disguise and threatens to expose the ruse. She, failing to persuade him to keep silent, determines to put him out of the way forever. For this purpose an old well in the Abbey Court grounds is used; there Sir Robert is supposed to have fallen to his death.

Her secret, however, is whispered about as a villager has seen the act committed. Sir Michael's son denounces her but his father is completely infatuated and, therefore, gives no credence to the rumor and orders his son from his home.

Through a chain of circumstances Lady Audley succeeds in getting her enemies under one roof—a quaint old English inn. Here the desperate creature plans to destroy them all. The dread cry of fire rings out on the still village air—and heroic rescues alone save her victims from a horrible death.

Confronted by them on the threshold of the castle, just as she fancied all evidence against her had been consigned to the flames, Lady Audley collapses and insanity mercifully closes the portals of her distorted mind. Thus dramatically is this thrilling story ended.

TWO FOOLS THERE WERE
Gaumont Release, May 26

The homely, even-tenored life of the two brothers of this story was very uncommonly interrupted by an accident which they happened to witness. While out hunting they noticed an automobile accident and ran to the assistance of its occupants. The chauffeur they found only slightly bruised, while its occupant, a very pretty young society lady, was severely stunned. They carried the fair victim to their home where their parents and friends nursed her back to health.

In the meantime the two brothers had fallen before the charms of their visitor and had daily presented her with an abundance of floral tokens and other marks of esteem. Such was their attention that their brotherly love grew to rivalry only to be followed by intense hatred and in a fit of madness both brothers set out to hunt each other with the avowed purpose of murder. Fortunately they did not meet until after they came home, only to find that the young coquette had been called for by her father, who had left a note stating that he would be only too delighted to properly thank and reward the kindness bestowed upon his daughter were it not for the fact that with her and his future son-in-law he was taking the next boat to America.

The two brothers recognize that they have both been deceived, with the result that they shake hands and enjoy their wonted relations in which Brotherhood reigned supreme.

ZANETTO'S MARRIAGE
Gaumont Release, May 30

Zanetto was a miserably poor but decidedly beautiful traveling musician, who in the mediæval days lived by way of hand to mouth, making himself useful with his song and melody at receptions of all kinds and subsisting on what little money they paid him for his tuneful services.

One evening as he had fallen asleep from exhaustion underneath a large window of a castle, Zanetto had a vision in which the most beautiful young woman was pictured to be his wife. At the departure of the stars and the early fall of the morning dew, Zanetto's dream was rudely interrupted, but to the height of his delight did he notice a sedan chair with a sleeping varlet on each shaft. Well did he realize that this equipage was the property of the wealthy Marquis who lived inside of the castle under the windows of which he had passed the night, but spurred on by the vision that dazzled his dreams Zanetto decides to play a trick and get inside the sedan chair. He pulls the string which makes known the fact that the occupant desires to be conducted to his morning's destination.

As fortune would have it the poor poet-musician is conducted to the home of the beautiful Phyllis. As he alights from the equipage the varlets realize their mistake, but it is too late, insomuch as the beautiful creature before them refuses to allow Zanetto to leave her presence. The young maker of melodies sings and plays his way to the lady's heart, much to the discomfiture of the old Marquis, who, after discovering the loss of his equipage, made all haste to reach the side of the fair Phyllis before his rival could reach there. Seeing that he is very likely to be outwitted, the Marquis offers his fortune and his title if she but be his wife. However, Phyllis has taken a deep fancy to Zanetto and responds as follows: "What means fortune and title when compared to youth? No! no! I shall marry my minstrel love." Thus it was that wealth and nobility fell before the might of youth, beauty and song.

JILTED

Thanhouser Release, May 14

When the beautiful heroine and the gallant hero are wrecked, or drift to a desert island, or are marooned, or are left behind when the others sail away, they ALWAYS get married—in story books.

Of course, it is all right in make-believe land, but in real life such a course would be very inconvenient, and so a certain young woman found.

She was pretty enough to be a heroine and the man who saved her was brave enough to be a hero, but she was very mournful when she reached her friends, and thought of the rules laid down by our most popular authors.

The young woman was a college graduate, wealthy in her own right, and a painter from choice. The "hero" was a common sailor, brave enough, yet not the kind of a man she would pick out for a life partner.

Then there was another reason.

This "reason" was a wealthy, well-bred young man, who adored her, and whom she deeply loved. They were engaged, both were perfectly happy, but the romantic young woman believed it could never be. By all the laws of literature her life belonged to the man who had saved it, so when they were rescued, she wrote two notes, one to the preserver of her life, informing him that she would marry him, and the other to her fiance, tearfully notifying him that all was over between them.

Real life differs decidedly from fiction. Men do not always wed the women whose lives they save. If they did so, a hero would go on the retired list after one act of bravery and only be eligible again when he became a widower or was freed by the divorce courts.

So, for reasons that satisfied at least four persons, this adventure did not end in the story-book way, and everybody was happy.

THE LITTLE SHUT-IN

Thanhouser Release, May 17

His home was a dreary room in a basement; he was hopelessly crippled; his widowed mother was just able to keep their home together by steady work as a washerwoman; and he had no toys or other boys to play with.

Despite his sickness and poverty the little shut-in was a cheery chap, and invented games of his own. His favorite one was weaving romances about the persons who passed his window. The window was below the level of the sidewalk, and all he could see of them was their feet.

There were three pair of feet that stood out from the others. First, there were "the Little Feet." The boy liked to see them when they passed, for they were pretty and dainty, and he knew their owner must be a charming girl. Next appeared "the Manly Feet," which seemed to be irresistibly atracted to "the Little Feet." They soon were traveling side by side, day after day. It pleased the child, for he liked both of the friends he had never seen.

Of a different calibre were "the Cruel Feet," well cared for, prosperous and arrogant. From the first the child did not like them. Then when he saw them kick an inoffensive dog he gave them the name that he never forgot.

One day, however, the child found that the romance of the Little Feet and the Manly Feet had been blighted. They went by the window as usual, but separately, and each seemed unhappy. The ordinary observer would hardly be able to learn how expressive feet are, but the child had nothing else to do, and he could tell.

It made him very, very unhappy, but he was helpless and could do nothing. Then a new sorrow came into his life, for Little Feet passed one day, and Cruel Feet was with her. The child decided that helpless or not he must interfere, and he planned a way himself.

Little Feet passed the next morning, all alone. She found an obstruction in her way, and looked down. There she saw a crutch, with a note pinned on it. She read the note, addressed to "Dear Lady with the Little Feet," and learned that a "little shut-in" wanted to see her. Peering in at the window she perceived the boy and good-naturedly went into the house to talk to him.

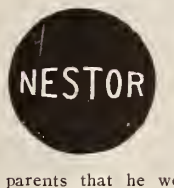
She gave him a rose, and read to him, but didn't know of his plan to bring Manly Feet back. The child was too shrewd for that. He waited with the rose in his hand, until Manly Feet came wearily by. Then he tossed the flower out into the street. Naturally it surprised Manly Feet. He located the place from which it came, bent over, looked in, and saw the girl of his dreams. Also a crippled boy, a stranger, who mysteriously beckoned him to enter.

When his two friends confronted each other the boy told them all about it, and begged the girl to keep away from Cruel Feet. The child's story touched her, and anyway the quarrel with Manly Feet was a silly affair. The result was that they made up, to the joy of the little cripple.

From his window now the child can often see Little Feet and Manly Feet as happy as he would wish them. There is one difference now. Formerly they would pass the house, now they enter it, for the child has a warm place in their hearts.

THE TEN OF DIAMONDS

Nestor Release, May 6



Robert Millard, a young man, has a penchant for clubs and cards, which fact causes his adoring mother no end of anxiety. Willard, the father, is also apprehensive and keeps a close watch upon the boy.

One evening Robert goes out after promising his parents that he would return by ten o'clock. He faithfully meant to keep his word, but at the club he plunges deeply into a game of cards and does not reach home until two A. M. His father, leisurely smoking a cigar, meets him. A card, the ten of diamonds, drops out of Robert's pocket, giving Willard the chance of reading a sermon to his offspring. He gently and graphically unfolds the story of his own life:

Twenty years before, the passion for cards had almost caused a tragedy in the then humble home of Willard Millard. He associated with ne'er-do-wells and gamblers of the lowest type. He sank so low that his young wife had to work night and day to support herself and child and furnish him with money to gamble away. It was only when his brutality had come near killing the woman he had sworn to protect that Willard's manhood asserted itself and from that day he and cards became strangers. Gradually he worked his way into the world and finally acquired a place of standing in the community.

Willard's story makes a profound impression upon Robert, who tears up the pack of cards in his possession and tearfully swears to profit by the experience of his father. The promise is kept and three people are made happy.

THE THESPIAN BANDIT

Nestor Release, May 8

Three actors, Tom, Dick and Harry, have had a tough season, but the landlady needs the money just the same and comes to their door. Tom and Dick instantly hide, leaving Harry to pacify her as best he can. A little later, when they see the following headlines in a newspaper, "Good actors are in great demand in California for Moving Pictures. Fourteen companies operating in and about Los Angeles," Tom and Dick conceive the brilliant idea of going out West. Harry objects that they have no money for food on the way, let alone railroad fare, but Tom quietly helps himself to Harry's pin, watch and ring, which he pawns to get their food, and declares they will ride in a box car.

That night they put one over on the landlady by slipping out without paying and burry to the train yards, where they conceal themselves in an empty and are soon on their way West. Early the next morning the brakeman appears and tells them unless they "come across" with a little coin he will put them off. As usual, Harry is the Patsy, handing over all of the money he has left.

They arrive in the glorious West and the yardmaster gives them a true Western welcome by seeing how near he can shoot without hitting them. As they sit beside the road to rest, they see a reward sign for the bandit "Black Bill," and, upon studying it more closely, Tom and Dick decide that with a beard they can make Harry a bandit and claim the reward, and this decision is further strengthened by getting a look at the real bandit as he rides past, cleverly eluding the sheriff and his posse. Harry strenuously objects, but to no avail, and they instantly start to make him up for the bandit. As they are doing this, Black Bill returns unobserved by the boys and, thinking the resemblance good enough, decides to use the idea himself. He chases Tom and Dick away and then marches Harry to his shack, where he quickly shaves off his beard, takes the actor's clothes and hurries Harry to the sheriff's office. Here Harry takes Bill unawares, snatches the sheriff's revolver, commands the bandit to hold up his hands, and then explains the situation to the sheriff. When the deputy enters, he recognizes Bill as the real bandit and Bill is quickly locked up. Harry receives not only his clothes but the reward and hurries to the station, where he boards the train for the East. Just as it moves out, Tom and Dick, weary and foot-sore, arrive. They attempt to catch the train upon seeing Harry, but he waves them good-bye, and the boys are forced to strike out for home by walking the railroad ties, having had quite enough of the West to last them for a while.

A GAME OF BLUFF

Nestor Release, May 11

Young Jack Russell goes to spend his two weeks' vacation at the seashore, where he meets a pretty girl chaperoned by an elderly man. He falls desperately in love with the girl, but, in picking up the old fellow's card, he realizes that the daughter of "William Smithson, Retired Capitalist," is too far above his station. Love, however, sharpens his wits and, going to a printer, has some cards made reading: "Jack Russell, Capitalist." At the hotel the two men exchange cards, and Jack soon finds himself engaged to charming Grace Smithson.

Jack's little bluff grows, for circumstances call for more bluffing. Going to town, he rents a flat; puts furniture in it at one dollar down and one dollar a week; hires servants; and returns to the seashore. Father and daughter are leaving the next day and Jack, anxious to make a ten strike, invites them to spend the night at his modest little apartment. So impressed is the old man with the beauiful home that he actually tells Jack to marry to-night, rather than wait six months, and before the young fellow knows what's doing, a minister has been called and the nuptial knot is tied.

When alone, Grace breaks down and tells hubby that father is but a poor bookkeeper in a furniture store. Jack laughingly replies that he, too, is far from being a capitalist.

The next day, while at work on the books in the furniture store, Smithson comes across the entry of his son-in-law for furniture taken on the installment plan, and the sad blow almost overpowers him. He dashes out of the office and, arriving at the grand home, finds a "To Let" sign with a note appended thereon, stating that Jack Russell had removed to the Cupid apartments.

The newlyweds are in the midst of their first meal when papa puts in an appearance. Jack admits that he has indulged in a little game of bluff and that the old man was party to the game. When shown his own misleading card, Smithson relents and the "dear children" are blessed in true parental style.

PRESIDENT INCOG

Republic Release, May 14

REP Rocky Gulch, Colorado, read in a Denver newspaper that President Wm. H. Taft is to The Republican Club of make a trip from Washington to the Pacific Coast, and that he will travel incog. The Acorn Republican Club call a meeting and decide to wire President Taft at Washington, D. C., to ask him if he will do the club a big favor by stopping off at Rocky Gulch and delivering a short political speech. The President appreciates the honor, and in a wire to the club regrets that he is unable to comply with their request.

There is a remarkable likeness between President Taft and Jasper Jones, who has mining interests around Rocky Gulch; in fact, Jasper has often been taken for the President.

While at the station one of the members of the Acorn Republican Club sees Jasper and, mistaking him for President Taft, passes the word about, and soon there is a crowd of natives fighting to shake hands with the supposed President. The train starts to go out, Jasper tries to make it, but the Republican Club is too strong for him and hang on to him while the train disappears in the distance. He is forced to go with them to a schoolhouse to deliver a speech. Seeing no way out of it, he determines to make a speech, and it was one that they will long remember—a good solid Democratic speech.

Of course there were many Democrats in the room. Can you picture the result? It is now the Democrats' turn to land Jasper, which they do in real Western fashion; not only that, but they go as a body to Goldnob and clean out the claim jumpers, send for Jasper's wife, present them with the best house in town, nominate him for congressman in the coming fall election—the betting is now ten to seven that Jasper will be elected.

Republic Release, May 18

An Indian, while attending college, meets and falls in love with Ruth Howard; he proposes to her and Ruth, although she loves him, rejects him on account of his race. The Indian, realizing the pain that the loss of Ruth has caused him, goes away to forget her and, incidentally, renounces civilization. Two years elapse and Ruth marries a wealthy man.

Ruth receives a letter from her chum to visit their ranch out West and accepts the invitation. Ruth, away from the city, becomes like a young colt and goes roaming about the wild country either on horseback or on foot.

The Indian, who has given up civilization on account of love for her, has become a nomad and has wandered around the country, seeking consolation in solitude. Ruth's face is always before him and in one of his moments of melancholy he falls asleep and dreams of his love, and upon awakening, sees Ruth upon an unmanageable horse. He springs forward and is just in time to catch her in his arms. The love flame which has remained dormant the past years is awakened—Ruth forgets all else, except her love for the Indian.

She is brought to her right senses when she sees an old Indian and his squaw, which causes her to realize what her future might be with the Indian. The Indian becomes ferocious at the thought of losing Ruth the second time. Ruth, frightened, tries to force herself from his embrace, and in the struggle the bank upon which they are standing gives way and both are hurled to the rocks at the botom of the cliff, united at last in death.

WHAT MIGHT HAVE BEEN
Champion Release, May 13

Miss Celia Rill, a woman of thirty-five, after having congratulated a young girl friend upon her approaching marriage, realizes for the first time that she is growing old. Seating herself by the fireplace, she brings out her treasure box, and taking a bundle of old love letters from former admirers, all of whom she has jilted, she begins to read them over.

As she reads the one from Albert, who had been a rich young man, offering her his hand and fortune, we see Albert as he is to-day, with a large family and in poverty. Another written by Howard reads how he swears to be kind and true, only to see him in actuality as a tyrant. Opening one signed by Will, it tells of his love and what a kind husband he would make, but in a scene of the present, he is shown as a drunken brute.

Selecting still another love missive, Celia kisses it tenderly and fondly holds it to her breast, as she thinks of the writer. It is from Jack, the one man she ever cared for, but with whom she played as with all others, until a trick of fate parted them forever. As she recalls, and as the scenes show, she answered Jack's final demand with a hurried "Yes," and the maid had lost the letter. Jack, receiving no reply, leaves for the gold fields of Alaska.

Tears of sorrow well from her eyes, and her proud spirit is broken because she realizes that she is growing old, unmated. As she weeps by the fireplace Jack, alive and well, unable to stay from the woman he loved, enters the room, tiptoes to her side and takes her into his arms. Looking up, Celia sees Jack, not in her dream, but the real lovable Jack in flesh and blood, holding her in his arms.

THE DUCK HUNT
Champion Release, May 15

The duck hunting expedition on the marshes surrounding the Great Salt Lake of Utah is one of the most remarkable picture presentations that may be well imagined.

The picture is educational in the sense that it depicts in detail the methods employed in this sporting industry.

We see the cutting and arranging of the material used in making the fluid. The making of the fluid is itself a most interesting proceeding, but to the sportsman there's a feature which this picture portrays that is peculiarly fascinating, and that is the remarkable bagging that comes to the party who are working in this expedition.

One of these gentlemen is Mr. Vincent Davis, a world's expert, who holds the much-envied record. A world beater of 142 birds for a half hour's shooting.

In conclusion it may be said this film presents to young and old one of the most interesting and entertaining of unique subjects.

TOMBOY
Majestic Release, May 12

Tomboy sits on her veranda, demurely reading a book, and occasionally throwing an apple at her young neighbor, Bob Whitman. An interview follows, and she becomes engaged to Bob. While Bob is telling his father of this, Tomboy assaults them with a beanshooter. She gets her father, a near-sighted minister, to try a shot, and he, innocently taking the bean-shooter, is promptly accused by the Whitmans of making the assault. A scene between the parents follows, the engagement is broken, and Tomboy is packed off to boarding school.

Her pranks at school are equally edifying. She decorates one girl's face with burnt cork, with the aid of pepper she sets the entire class and the principal sneezing, and finally she is sent to her room in disgrace.

But Bob has not been idle, and he sends Tomboy a note, planning an elopement. The following night he comes to the boarding school, with an automobile and a ladder. He is to throw a pebble against Tomboy's window. He throws it against the principal's window. When Bob does notify Tomboy, and they are ready to elope, the principal and a fat cook appear, and Tomboy is led ignominiously back to her room.

A period of despair is followed by a brilliant idea of Bob's. If he could get the cook's dress and Tomboy were to don the chauffeur's uniform, the elopement could be carried out successfully. Back go Bob and the chauffeur to the cook's room. She is overcome, then bribed. Bob gets the dress, the cook takes the chauffeur's clothes to Tomboy, and the chauffeur wears Bob's suit. Thus arrayed Tomboy and Bob walk boldly out, under the very nose of the deceived principal.

And now it is Tomboy's turn for an idea. They drive to her father's house. The alleged little chauffeur and big fat woman present themselves before the near-sighted minister, and ask him to marry them. He is rather surprised at the disparity of the pair, but consents to perform the ceremony. Bob's father is summoned from next door, to act as a witness. The marriage takes place.

When the identity of the couple is revealed bewilderment and consternation on the part of the parents melt into admiration. Tomboy has won her happiness, which begins for her and Bob by their receiving the blessings of both fathers.

BUNCOED
Majestic Release, May 14

Nettie, a clever girl, is without money. She reads an advertisement for a lady clerk, at the American House, Bingville, New Jersey, and goes to the town. She is received at the station by the usual train-waiting crowd, including five countrymen, who are filled with admiration for her, and follow her to the hotel. But, alas! another applicant has secured the position, and Nettie finds herself forced to remain in Bingville until the three-ten afternoon train.

Her fertile mind must save the situation. She looks out of the parlor window. The five ruralites are "camped" on the steps. She goes out, and starts back toward the station, announcing that she has lost a five dollar bill with the corner torn off! All search industriously but, of course, the bill is not found. They return to the hotel, and Nettie again to the parlor, where she awaits events.

The countrymen, on the steps, consider the matter. A plan occurs to the smartest. Unknown to the others he tears a corner from a five dollar bill, goes to the parlor, and presents the bill to Nettie, telling her he has found it. She is surprised and grateful. She decorates him with a flower, and invites him to call for a walk that afternoon at three. He leaves, proudly.

Now this same scheme occurs to a second ruralite, but he has not five dollars. He applies to another, a "tightwad," and is refused. He offers his watch as security, and the loan is made. Tearing a corner off his five dollar bill, up to the parlor goes countryman number two. More gratitude from Nettie. A flower for him, and an invitation to call for a walk at three.

The idea comes slowly but surely to the rest of the group. The third to think of it finds he has four dollars and seventy-five cents. Tightwad refuses him a loan of a quarter, nor will he take a stick pin as security. As a last resort this third admirer goes to the station, and carries a salesman's heavy suitcase to earn the coin.

The fourth countryman into whose brain the idea percolates is fat. He has four dollars. Tightwad will not advance him a cent. He tries the landlord, and is told he can saw wood for a dollar. So while one is struggling with heavy baggage, another is behind the hotel sawing wood to get Netie two more five dollar hills with the corners torn off. In time these are presented separately, and each delighted countryman receives a flower and an invitation to call for a walk at three.

Nettie now has twenty dollars, but there is one who has not yielded to her plan—Tightwad.. She goes out to search again. Her distress moves him. Reluctantly he tears a corner from a bill, and the circle is complete.

Three o'clock comes. Five countrymen present themselves at the hotel. Each is in his "Sunday best," and has a flower pinned to his coat. Nettie has gone. A horrible suspicion attacks them, as they glare at one another's clothes. They rush to the station. The three-ten train is drawing out, Nettie waving from the platform of the last car. But she has left a note: "Boys—aren't you glad it wasn't a ten dollar bill?"

throws his whole soul into sending the man to the electric chair. His wife begs him not to convict on such evidence, but he laughs at her fears. The end of the trial draws near and his wife attends the "summing up." While the jury is out she discovers the prisoner's little boy and acts as his proctor. Realizing that the verdict will be guilty she takes the boy out of the room. When Douglass comes home flushed with his triumph she again pleads with him against conviction on circumstantial evidence. Her pleas and the boy presence in his home shake his confidence but he passes it off and agrees to allow her to adopt the boy. Later, when his enthusiasm grows cold, be begins to doubt the man's guilt. He reads of his deatb in the chair still maintaining his innocence and his fears grow. The last straw is the juror, who alone of twelve held out for acquittal fully giving in to the rest. He sobs out his mental anguish to tbe District Attorney who half-heartedly tries to console him with statements that he personally is positive of the prisoner's guilt, but the juror will not be consoled. Going home he finds his wife and the boy. The former almost shrinks from him so sure is she that her husband has sent an innocent man to his death. In desperation he sends for the prisoner's counsel and tells him of his doubt and willingness to resign office and make all possible restitution. Gravely the lawyer pulls from his pocket the prisoner's last confession that he was guilty of the crime but exacting the promise of secrecy unless publicity was absolutely necessary.

FATHER BEAUCLAIRE

Reliance Release, May 25

A young murderer, Jacques Delur, after depositing the body of his victim, a young girl, on the bed in one of the rooms of the rectory, goes to Father Beauclaire to confess. While he is on his knees confessing to his crime, he sticks a bloody dirk in the cowl of the priest's garb. After having received absolution, he retires from the room, and upon reaching the exterior of the rectory, calls two gendarmes, and hastily explaining to them that a murder has been committtd, enters the house with them, where the father is discovered on his knees before the crucifix. Jacques accuses the priest of the murder, giving as evidence the bloody knife in the cowl, and leading the gendarmes and the priest to the room where the body of the dead girl lay.

The priest is tried and sentenced to death, is excommunicated, and rather than betray the confessional, goes to his death on the guillotine.

A year later, in a dilapidated house, Jacques is found surrounded only by the empty brandy and absinthe bottles and a French woman with him, whom he has requested to send for a priest, that on his deathbed he may confess to the crime for wbich an innocent man went to his deatb. The priest comes, receives his confession, and gives bim absolution and the murderer dies. Amen.

THE OTHER WISE MAN

American Release, May 13

A Jim Bangs, slick of manner and dainty of dress, made a sensation in La Mesa when he arrived and placed a sign in front of his new offices advertising stock for sale in his fire insurance venture. But he was wiscr than most promoters and took care to take into partnership an old wag about town noted for the money he had accumulated and the confidence of the town in his business ability.

Stock sold rapidly through the workings of this combination. Pretty Miss Blackwell, who kept the only boarding house in town, was interested and was frequently visited by Jim Bangs and his accomplice, Old Man Skathaway.

One day the local accommodation stopped at the little station and a handsome, debonair young man alighted. Grip in hand he strolled down the main street, finally arriving before the office of Jim Bangs. He read, with a derisive smile, the placard which adorned the front door, when his face lighted with sudden inspiration. Why, this was surely his old pal, Jim Bangs of New York, with whom he had operated many a confidence game in the past before the reformation which made of him a traveling salesman.

Smiling reminiscently, he made his way to Miss Blackwell's boarding house where he was electrified to see Jim Bangs and Miss Blackwell earnestly engaged in conversation over the proposed stock sale. The old pals exchanged a glance but did not speak.

Two weeks later the traveling salesman found himself deeply in love with Miss Blackwell. He advised her against the stock deal and told her of his past. Jim Bangs was also busy. Finding his field invaded he promptly notified old Skathaway who stirred up the populace against him. Then the traveling man spoke. The crowd, led by him, raided the office of Jim Bangs and rode Jim and his accomplice out of town on a rail. The traveling man and Miss Blackwell watched the proceedings from the office porch. Then, taking up his suit-case, the ex-confidence man bade her a sorrowful farewell despite her entreaties and left town by the next train, confident that for once in his misspent life he had done the community a good turn.

THE HATTERS
American Release, May 16

The cowboys on Day "L" ranch had sworn to bar the feminine sex from their thoughts forevermore. Jim Bradley, foreman, was particularly loud in his complaint against the fair sex; so when he fell sick with a fever, Charley Williams undertook to doctor him with whiskey. That failed, however, and when the official ranch doctor called that personage was highly alarmed and at once prescribed quiet and a trained nurse. He sent one—a dainty, pretty, little miss in the usual white cap and gown. But she only came after her aunt, also a nurse, positively refused to have anything to do with men.

The rangers noticed a change in Bradley's condition for the better. One day they were astounded on peering through a window to find the nurse's face buried in his shoulder. They swore to be revenged on him.

Meantime, Charley Williams found time to hang about the house and invite the nurse for strolls. That didn't have a beneficial effect on the injured feelings of the cow-punchers, either. Finally, the aunt became suspicious. She donned her bonnet and sallied forth to the range in quest of information as to her nieces's long absence. It happened that the couple were out for a walk, as couples often are; so this determined man-hater went in uninvited and made herself at home.

Now old Ben Griscom was one of the band of sworn woman-haters. He had found, however, that the longer he knew this pretty nurse, so in proportion changed his sentiments toward the weaker sex. In fact these sentiments changed so rapidly that he actually went to town and bought all manner of stuff. This he modestly pushed under the door. It happened at that time that the old nurse was firmly seated in an arm chair awaiting the arrival of the missing couple. She observed the offerings pushed beneath the door and finally decided to investigate. This she did by opening the door suddenly, just in time to fall fairly into old Griscom's arms. There was grand rejoicing for instantly they remembered an old love affair and a promise of long standing.

Eclair Release, May 7

A Film-Poem Founded on the Poetry and Novels of Edgar Allan Poe.

Edgar Poe — discovered asleep in his study, perhaps after a night of sinister drinking. Poe endeavors to write some story or poem by which he may pay for the pressing needs of his bitter poverty. His mind is obsessed by the memories of his brain children—scenes from his famous tales—"The Gold Bug," "The Premature Burial," "The Pit and the Pendulum," "The Descent into the Mealstrom," "The Murders of the Rue Morgue." He awakens chilled by the cold—is astonished to find lamp without oil, fire burning out from lack of fuel. The room illumined only by the feeble rays of the moon. How long has he been asleep, instead of working ao get the necessities for the relief of the sorrowful Lenore, lying in the adjoining room. Poe, ashamed of himself, goes to his dear wife's bedside, promises that he will work for her, but Lenore has lost confidence in the poet's promises, smiling sadly at the thoughts F—Moving Picture News of those so often broken before. Poe re-enters his humble and poor study, feeling an unknown courage come into his heart, invokes an inspiration with all his soul. And the poet while plunged into a dream writes the "Raven,"—that sublime plaint of sorrow which no other poet in the world has been able to surpass. The dream is over, the poem finished. Poe, though harassed and fatigued, sets out with radiant face, to take his poem to the publisher, who has the reputation of being the most generous. The publisher offers him ten dollars and not one cent more. Poe is compelled by his dire straits to accept this miserable pittance, to enable him to obtain some flowers and necessities for the relief of his sorrowing Lenore.

Awakened by the sweet perfume, Lenore finds the flowers a reality, and Poe, at her bedside. Her intuition tells her of the brave effort which prompted Poe to obtain money by the sale of a poem. She thanks her husband with an angelic smile, and calls to God to bless his love.

SOULS IN THE SHADOW
Solax Release, May 15

Alice Penryhn, the younger of two orphaned sisters, is engaged to Harry Mayne, but in a moment of girlish folly accompanies Will Mortimer, a member of the "fast set," to a somewhat rapid "Bohemian" restaurant, and promptly regrets it, being fearful that Mayne will discover her imprudence. Her elder sister, Christine, has discovered that Alice has an organic heart affection, and that she is in a dangerous condition. Christine is herself in love with Mayne, but conceals it for her sister's sake. Mortimer forces Alice to see him at midnight, and in a drunken humor tries to embrace her. In her terror and frenzy she strikes him with a heavy ornament and kills him. Christine discovers the accident and taking the burden on herself is arrested for the crime. She is placed on trial, and just as the jury is bringing in a verdict of guilty Alice staggers into court, confesses that she killed Mortimer and collapses. The judge is thereupon forced to discharge Christine.

IN THE YEAR 2000
Solax Release, May 17

A great number of prognosticators often terrify us with visions of what will be when women shall rule the earth and the time when men shall be subordinates and adjuncts. It is rather a fine question to decide—for chivalrous men, anyway. To-day, with the multiplicity of feminine activities and the constant broadening of feminine spheres, it is difficult to predict to what heights women will ascend.

In the Solax production of "In the Year 2000," the release of Friday, May 17th, a serio-comic prognostication is unreeled on the screen with such magnetic force, charm and rich imaginative detail that one is compelled to accept the theories advanced on their face value.

The conditions are reversed. Women in this film are supreme, and man's destiny is presided over by woman. No attempt is made at burlesque—but the very seriousness of the purpose of the theme makes the situations ludicrous. This is one of the funniest comedies released by the Solax Company in some time, and that's saying a whole lot for this picture.

UNCLE AND NEPHEW
Great Northern Release, May 11

Professor Steinfeldt, a scientist, is engrossed in his work and spends a greater portion of his time in his laboratory conducting experiments. He is well along in years and has a young and handsome wife, who resents his neglect and finds time hanging heavily on her hands. Carl, a nephew of the professor, returns from college to stay with his relative and spends many hours in company with the wife.

Thrown together so constantly they learn to love one another and, while the professor is poring over chemicals, they indulge in lovemaking in the parlor. Steinfeldt returns to the room in time to see his wife in the arms of his nephew and he is astonished and shocked. He withdraws quietly and returns to his workroom in despair. He is soon joined by Carl and the elder man plans to cure his wife of her mad infatuation. He shows Carl a phial which he tells him contains a deadly poison and leaves a glass of water standing on a table from which he has drunk. Once alone Carl resolves to put the uncle out of his way and pours a quantity of poison in the glass in his desperation. He is soon joined by his uncle and the wife. The professor manages to pour out the poison and substitute pure water. He drinks of the contents and Carl is stricken with remorse. He is about to confess when his uncle offers the glass to his wife. She is about to drink when the thoroughly frightened young man strikes the glass to the floor and attracts the suspicions of the wife.

SOULS IN THE SHADOW

This is a gripping and sensational drama dealing with social errors and a sister's sacrifice. A girl of breeding makes a mistake in the choice of an escort for a slumming expedition. She sends her cowardly tormentor to face his Maker while her sister assumes responsibilities. This is a vivid and human portrayal with striking complications.

Released Friday, May 17th.

The professor sternly bids Carl rid the house of his presence and the wife awakens to the nature of her perfidy and confesses her duplicity. The husband is a philosopher and of a forgiving nature. He knows from the graphic lesson that his wife is cured of all affection for the unprincipled nephew and he takes her in his arms, a fitting finale to a strong and admirably acted drama.

DRAWING THE LINE
Rex Release, May 9

Some people there are who don't think a man can be a nobleman unless he has a title. In China the son of the house is considered a more honorable personage than the father of the family because he has one more ancestor than his father. The funny fact affords a great deal of amusement to us civilized beings. But before we are quite through laughing at the ludicrous custom, we point to somebody or other, and in a respectful whisper say, "There is Count Nothing"—and we gape and gab in wonder and awe. Believe us, any fool can be a descendant, but it takes a man to be an ancestor.

She had money and the vain ambition that money inherits. Her one object in life, outside of just living, was to marry her son to an heiress and her daughter to an earl. In fact, she had the heiress and earl selected and all ready to be wrapped up and sent home. but the son had the rebellious notion that money deserved more respect than selling yourself for or with it. That's why there's this story.

Phil (Phil was the son, you know, even if you didn't until now; Cleo was the daughter, and she was even sweeter than her name) now, let's see—oh, yes! Phil went to the city on a business trip, and on the train returning home he was seated next a girl who was—rather interesting. Somehow or other, they began to talk and—altogether the ride wasn't so tedious.

They both got off at the same station, said good-bye, and the incident was quite forgotten. Phil went home, and the girl went—well, we don't know where she stayed. At any rate, at home Phil met the earl. Now, in justice to all the poor earls in captivity, let it be said that all earls are not cads and scoundrels and fortune-hunters, but—this one was.

A day or so later Phil walked into the little theatre in the town. "Romeo and Juliet" was being played, and Juliet was—the girl. See?

Of course, he met her after the show. Met her again—and word reached his aristocratic mother. After the debate, Phil left the house.

Phil married the actress, and they were mighty happy, let us tell you. Cleo married the earl—poor, little, pretty Cleo. The "nobleman" was a brutal, despicable drunkard, and he saw that she had a lot of time to herself to think bitter things and cry. At last her patience and health were exhausted and, her heart bruised and broken, she returned home, as a silly, reckless young bird who would fly to dangerous heights returns with a broken wing to the home-nest.

In sorrow and repentance the mother saw the truth, and thought—just what you're thinking now!

THE ETERNAL CONFLICT
Rex Release, May 12

The city editor of the Daily Leader knew that the city's government was not ruled on a very straight line. He assigned a few reporters to get the evidence of corruption and conspiracy, but after supreme and persevering effort their only success was failure. The city editor swore when the reporters admitted their defeat—proving thereby his right to be city editor—and assigned the girl reporter, Miss Leonard, to the task.

Ability was not the greatest newspaper asset Miss Leonard possessed, though that was more than considerable. It was her charm, the sweet, appealing charm of a "feminine" girl that cannot be analyzed or denoted, but that just, merely, simply creeps into you and influences you with a dominant impulse to confide in her. That was the reason Miss Leonard was being talked about in newspaper circles—that, and, of course, her intrinsic, native ability.

Before very long she got a clue. The clue was a card inviting the politicians at City Hall to attend a meeting "At the sign of the Thumb-print," with a thumb-print the only signature. The idea was to discover whose particular thumb-print it was. Small thing, when you have the detective genius every trained report possesses. She prepared several copies of a hogus bill, and paraded around the political circle asking each one of the poor suspects whether he knew anything about it. As each read it, he impressed his thumb-print. The thumb-print of the boss coincided with the card, and she had his number. She also had his house number, and forthwith went there.

How she obtained access to the house, how she pretended to the butler that she was a book-agent, how she suddenly became faint and asked for a glass of water, and how she dashed into the clothes-closet when the butler went to get it, how he returns dumbfounded at her absence, how she obtained the story of the illegal plot of the politicians and attained her triumph, all succeed each other in rapid and thrilling sequence.

Then the blow! The editor-in-chief destroyed the story, for the reason that only editors-in-chief and corrupt politicians know, and a little of her faith in truth and right. The girl's heart broke a little, and ever after the word "man" lost a great deal of its importance.

THE CRISIS
"101" Bison Release, May 15

The Rev. John Mason, living in Iola, Kan., whose powerful sermons had made him known and respected throughout the sparsely settled country, receives a call from a band of settlers in Medicine Bend, Wyo., and decides to accept. With his family, consisting of his wife, his daughter, Marie, and his son, Ned, he takes the train to Blue Gulch, Wyo., the stage to Laramie and prairie schooner to Medicine Bend.

The construction of the church is shown and the sending of the letter by the church committee, which is delivered via pony express riders, who change horses at full gallop, and stage coach to the railroad.

Ned Mason has caused his parents and his sister much pain by his wayward habits and his liking for liquor. While waiting for the prairie schooner in Laramie he makes the acquaintance of a number of cowboys who invite him into a saloon, and Ned becomes intoxicated. When he meets his father the parson, indignant and disgusted, disowns Ned, and goes on without him. Ned goes back to the saloon, where he spends the night, and is shown to the door when he has reached a state of helplessness.

The next day, with an aching head and slender purse, he fights a mental battle and vows to follow a straight path and to beg his father's forgiveness.

Parson Mason is warmly received by the settlers, and the Sunday service is attended by every one able to attend. Mason's pleasure at the bright future for his church is darkened by thoughts of his son. Mrs. Mason and Marie grieve over the absent son and brother, and break down at the dinner table.

The Indians had been giving evidences of unrest. To the unsophisticated Westerner the dances and harangues, lasting far into the night, boded no good. The Indian commissioner, with a view to averting an outbreak, visited the Indian village and held pow-wow with the chiefs, but his friendly advances were met by taciturnity and frowns. Knowing from previous experience that quick action must be taken by force of arms to prevent a massacre, the commissioner bade good-bye to the redskins and made haste to reach the distant fort.

Riding on a burro, Ned is nearing Medicine Bend when he comes upon one of the first victims of the Indians. With his dying breath he asks Ned to warn the settlers, and Ned rushes on. The news that the Indians are on the warpath creates the wildest alarm, and the settlers gather together for mutual protection.

The Indians had expected to surprise the white men, and their whirlwind charge is met by well-aimed rifle bullets, which deplete their ranks and cause them to withdraw. Craftier tactics are adopted, and dodging from tree to tree and rock to rock they surround the whites and play the savage game of warfare, drawing the fire of their foes and waiting patiently until their ammunition would be exhausted.

Like a shepherd protecting his flock, Parson Mason proves his caliber. The church is converted into a fort, and with bullets and arrows whistling around them the minister leads his congregation in prayer, and picking up his rifle takes command.

The coolness of his father toward him has stung Ned deeply. From the moment of his arrival the tremendous excitement prevailing has prevented a moment's private conversation with his father. Without uttering a word he takes his place at the loop-hole and many an Indian bites the dust when his rifle barks.

The uneven conflict rages until, in despair, the whites realize that their ammunition can last but a short time longer. It is the first time that Ned has had his life in jeopardy, and the crisis brings out his noble manhood. This sight of his terror-stricken mother and sister and his brave father and a realization that a horrible death awaits them all, spurs him on to a desperate undertaking.

Leaping from the window he dashes through a group of Indians, who are thunderstruck for a moment, but with a yell take after him. Ned brings down the nearest pursuers and leaping on a horse gallops away.

A troup of cavalry has left the fort and is making its way toward the Indian village. Ned hears the bugle call in the distance and turns his horse toward the sound. In a few moments the situation is explained to the captain, and a race against time is made to save the besieged settlers.

Like a hurricane the cavalry bursts upon the astonished savages. The battle is quickly over, the surviving Indians scampering away, with the soldiers at their heels.

The bravery of Ned filled Parson Mason's heart with pride, and when his son dashed through the lines the stern old man was so overjoyed at the regeneration of his son that had the outcome been different he would have met his death with resignation. As Ned came up with the captain he suddenly found himself in the embrace of his father, mother and sister. Words were unnecessary. The glad look in their faces told the story.

GRANDPA'S 'SPECS'
Powers Release, May 14

Grandpa loses his spectacles, or thinks he does, and his older granddaughter helps him look for them. Not finding them, she then starts the farm hands upon the search and even Grandma joins in. After a careful hunt they finally decide that Grandpa lost his spectacles down the well when he was drawing a bucket of water. It is then that the youngest granddaughter discovers the glasses on Grandpa's nose and—well——

A PAIR OF SUICIDES (?)

Alf and Betty have a terrible lovers' quarrel. Then Alf determines to teach Betty a lesson and Betty decides to wring Alf's heart and the troubles of this loving couple begin. Alf leaves a note saying that he is going to jump into the creek and Betty writes that she is going to drown herself in the same creek. Alf finds Betty's letter and Betty discovers Alf's note and each, filled with remorse, starts out to discover the other one's body. The two lovers are each joined by their relatives and friends, who aid in the hunt for their respective bodies. The two parties of searchers meet, beaded by the remorseful lovers. Alf is in the middle of the creek and Betty on the bank. When each discovers that the other is alive they rush into each other's arms in the middle of the flowing water of the peaceful stream and all misunderstandings are over.

HIS NEIGHBOR'S WIFE
Powers Release, May 18

Ames is ill, apparently, and his physician advises him to take outdoor exercise. He retire to his country home and, giving his gardener a holiday, he proceeds to do the man's work.

Next door, a new family have moved in, a husband and wife, little girl and the husband's charming sister. Bessie, the sister, mistakes Ames for a hired man and Ames humors her along and thus plays a joke upon her. To get even with him, Bessie leads him to think that she is her brother's wife and the mother of the little girl. This leads to the most romantic complications, especially when the child succeeds in locking Ames and Bessie in the library on the second floor of Ames' house and sends the only key to the door up into the air tied to a bunch of toy balloons. Poor Ames tries to make a martyr of himself, but is not permitted, and to his joy suddenly finds himself possessed of a blushing but rather mischievous little bride-to-be.

Protect Your Operator—and Machine

ARE YOUR REPAIR PARTS GENUINE?

Your operator is the "man behind the gun," and he must have the proper equipment to work with.

The quality of repair parts is of the greatest importance to you; it may affect the very life of your machine.

You cannot afford to experiment with imitation repair parts; they cannot be as perfect in construction as the genuine because the broad experience and knowledge is not behind them. They are sold on price and not on quality.

Consider this question, Mr. Exhibitor. ISN'T THE MAN WHO MAKES YOUR MACHINE BEST QUALIFIED TO MAKE ITS REPAIR PARTS?

POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH leads the world and a year's guarantee goes with each No. 6 mechanism; greatest care and skill is imparted to each part.

They are made by the highest class of skilled labor in the largest factory of its kind in the world, and all parts are stamped "N. POWERS CO.," which means that our reputation and guarantee are behind them.

OUR GUARANTEE

We guarantee the mechanism of every POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH No. 6 to be free from defects of workmanship or material and will replace free of charge within one year from date every part showing a defect of any character or which becomes worn out in service, provided such part is returned to us, charges prepaid, for inspection.

Your repair parts must be the best. Ours are always that. Don't overlook the value of Power's Adjustable Inductor for use on alternating current in place of the rheostat. It will pay for itself within four months and lasts a lifetime. Let us send you catalogue D with lists of parts.

LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET

"Lady Audley's Secret," the Imp Film Company's release of May 16th, is based upon, as we have already pointed out, one of the most popular novels in the English language. It was written by Miss M. E. Braddon, who is the authoress of about thirty other highly dramatic novels which were enormously successful; amongst these may be mentioned

"Joshua," "Haggard's Daughter," "Dead Sea Fruit," "Henry Dunbar," etc.

Miss Braddon was very successful in her delineation of dramatic scenes of English life. In "Lady Audley's Secret" she places the time of the story about the year 1840, shortly after Queen Victoria had ascended the English throne.

In the story, as worked out by the Imp Film Company, a successful attempt has been made to preserve the atmosphere of the period and to impart to the film all the aspects of high-class English society life about the time dealt with. Hence costumes, furniture, accessories and the general mise-en-scene will strike one as being correct.

Lady Audley was the type of ambitious woman who tired of her husband, and being ambitious of wealth, did not hesitate to ensnare a wealthy nobleman. The husband discovers her perfidy, but the relentless woman did not hesitate to put him out of the way. Her secret is discovered and a complete exposure of her sins is about to be made, when circumstances place all of her enemies together under one roof. So she seeks an escape from her dilemma by setting fire to the house. But the victims are rescued and Lady Audley pays the penalty of her attempted crime by going insane.

The play is worked out in a series of very fine interior and exterior scenes, and the burning of the house will no doubt provoke widespread wonderment.

In the picture, the part of Lady Audley is taken by Jane Fernley, a new recruit to the Imp Company's forces. King Baggot is George Talboys, and gives a very fine portrayal in the part of the gallant English gentleman. William E. Shay is Sir Robert Audley; Mr. Walsh is Sir Michael and Violet Horner has the part of Clarice.

"Lady Audley's Secret" is a two-thousand-foot subject and will unquestionably be a great success because it visualizes a great English novel and gets over the sentiment and action of the play in a clear, convincing manner.

No. 1000—A MOTIOGRAPH

BUNK VERSUS FACTS

There is quite a lot of piffle about a guarantee these days. Usually the strongest reading guarantee surrounds the cheaper and meaner product.

What you want is performance and not promise or excuse.

Were it true that the MOTIOGRAPH had no selling point other than its reputation for HIGH STANDARD QUALITY of MATERIAL and WORKMANSHIP, that one point would sell the machine.

THE MOTIOGRAPH IS GUARANTEED WITH THE MOST RELIABLE GUARANTEE ON EARTH, viz.: Free replacement of any part through defective material, or workmanship.

When you buy a MOTIOGRAPH and employ a competent operator you won't need to purchase insurance on receipts. The MOTIOGRAPH is your best and cheapest insurance.

COOKE LENSES

are imported from a European factory where lens-making is a fine art. Evidence of this is seen in the beautiful finish of each lens-mount, but PROOF lies in the rare quality of the photographs. Three-fourths of the world's photo-engravers have discovered that no other lens will stand their searching tests.

FEATURE FILM DEPARTMENT NEW YORK MOTION PICTURE CO., 251 W. 19th St., New York City

"THE PERIL"

A 1000-Foot "Imp" Feature!

The IMP'S DECORATION DAY RELEASE is totally different from any Decoration Day release you ever saw. It is a simply wonderful 1000-FOOT FEATURE called "THE PERIL" with King Baggot in the leading role. A terrific fight between the hero and the Jap spy is only one of the really great scenes in "THE PERIL," (Copyright 1912). Now go after it with all your might.

A 2000-Foot "Imp" Feature!

"LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET"

(Copyright 1912)

For THURSDAY, MAY 16th, the Imp has filmed one of the most popular stories ever written—a story that millions have read and millions have loved. The mere name "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," will pack your house when coupled with the name "Imp".

THREE MORE "IMPS"

"JIM'S ATONEMENT," (Copyright 1912), one of the very best of our California Imps. Breathless interest from start to finish. Released MONDAY, MAY 13th. On SATURDAY, MAY 18th, the Imp will release a split including "HENPECKED IKE," (Copyright 1912), a western comedy and "ENGLISH HUNTING SCENES," (Copyright 1912). Be sure you get them all!

FIRE! FIRE! FIRE!

CELLULOID burns—burns rapidly—and when once it gets a start, if there is a large quantity stored, it is a very difficult matter to stop it. Witness the Vitagraph fire, the Pittsburgh fire, Klein Optical Co.'s fire, the Western Film Exchange fire, Milwaukee, and others of like nature. We, in the interests of our readers, have been seeking some means of fire prevention, or, if a fire breaks out in a film factory or exchange, it can be put out immediately. With this end in view, we have been witnessing some tests that we believe will answer the purpose, and on Tuesday, May 21st, in the center of New York City, we are arranging for a demonstration for the whole trade to witness. Manufacturers, exchange men, exhibitors, operators—everybody interested in seeing 7,000 or 8,000 feet of celluloid film set on fire and—INSTANTLY PUT OUT. Don't believe it! I thought you would say that. Come and see. Write for a ticket of invitation, if you are interested, and we will give you the biggest Moving Picture Show you ever saw in your life. Manufacturers, bring your camera men and take a negative. It will do more to reassure your patrons—The Public—than anything you could write or say. Don't forget the date—May 21st, 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Send us your name and we will send the card of admisison. Full particulars next week.

NOT ALL OF THEM

In continuing our comments upon studio conditions we would not have our readers believe, for one minute, that license is the rule. Far from it. As in other professions and trades, we are happy to say that there is a preponderance of gentlemen and ladies engaged in the animated picture profession. Also, as in other walks of life, there are the notable exceptions. Those individuals who, by their attitudes and actions, cast odium upon us all. It is these characters that must be weeded out of all studios and companies, and we propose to wage fearless war upon them until they are eliminated. Here is a letter we received recently:

"Dear Mr. Saunders:

"I have read with interest your recent editorials on certain directors and their attitudes toward actresses and other women seeking honorable employment. From my experience as an actress with several film companies, I am glad to say that gentlemanly conduct is the general rule among the directors and those in charge of the various companies. However, there are exceptions. A year ago I applied for employment as an extra with a certain company. Ushered into the studio, I was first ogled and familiarly accosted by outside attaches. I then met the all-powerful director under whom I expected to work.

"I have a reputation for being good-looking. Evidently the director in question thought so, anyhow.

"'What's your name, my dear?' he asked and smiled knowingly. I told him.

"'How about the experience, sweetheart?' Ignoring his coarse and familiar language, I went on to narrate my experience on the stage.

"'Well, I guess I can use you; you have the looks,' said he. 'Say, kid, how much do you weigh, and is that form of yours padded or the real thing?'

"There was more to it, and a coarse invitation to take dinner with this director, before I finally impressed upon his mind that I would rather starve to death than accept employment under him. Other girls have told me that he had pursued the same tactics with them, and that he is illy regarded by those who only desire decency and right living and a chance to earn their bread honorably.

"It is these men, Mr. Saunders, who should be eliminated from a great and generally clean industry—one that is the source of livelihood to many good men and women. There is too much of insult and coarseness that must be combatted by the legitimate actress in the regular theatrical life without the same methods being taken up in the picture business.

"I have a good position with a film company where the directors are gentlemen, and the actresses and other women are always free from the odium of insult, abuse and innuendo.

"Those very few manufacturers, who have not already seen to it that the directors and other officers are gentlemen in every respect of the word, should immediately take action to put out the suggestive gentry, no matter how well qualified they seem to be in their positions of responsibility. Respect to womanhood should demand such decisiveness, if nothing else."

The above communication speaks volumes. The writer is among the leading actresses in filmworld. She speaks the gospel truth. The man who presumes on his office or position to insult a pure woman directly or indirectly should be kicked out bodily from the studio.

FAKE PICTURES

How many times within our experience since we started our moving picture journalism in March, 1906, have we had to expose fake pictures? Still they exist, still unscruplous exchanges and exhibitors, for the sake of a few paltry nickels, put on fake pictures. This was pre-eminently noticeable during the last few weeks. We were in a picture theatre in New York City where they claimed to have everything up to date with the Titanic disaster, and what was our astonishment to find the Lusitania, the Olympic and one or two scratch films of ancient days posing as pictures of the Titanic. We protested to the manager, who immediately ordered his operator to send them back to the exchange from which he had them and if possible destroy them. The following letter is also to the point:

"Los Angeles, Cal., April 26, 1912.

"Editor Moving Picture News.

"Dear Sir: As I am a constant reader of the News, I have always noticed that you have been fighting fake pictures and always striving to uplift the motion picture industry. Here in Los Angeles it seems as if the exhibitors are all money mad, and it is a certainty that they care little whether the public gets value for their money or not.

"As soon as the news of the Titanic disaster was flashed to Los Angeles, these unscruplous exhibitors immediately went to the film exchanges and rented several old reels which show the Mauretania and the Olympic steamers in action. After securing these old rainstorms they papered their lobby with fake posters and lithographs which advertised the only genuine negatives of the disaster.

"If there had been one or two of the small houses we could have understood their underhand work, but it being three of the most prominent independent theatres in the city, I fail to see why these exhibitors should stoop to such methods when the original pictures can be obtained in a few days.

Of course all of we unsuspecting picture lovers fell for the disgraceful fakes, but as soon as we saw the films it was easy to see that they were old and had been renovated. Knowing that you have the interest of the clean exhibitors at heart, I trust that you will bring this matter before the public through the columns of the News.

"Yours truly,

"Alex. Feinstein."

After reading the above we hope that every one of our readers will voice his protest against such fraudulent tactics on the part of exchange men; such actions only bring odium upon the industry. It is time for every Moving Picture Exhibitors' League to pass resolutions protesting against this faking, and not only protest, but refuse point-blank to perpetuate such stupendous frauds.

SCENARIO WRITERS

Our Scenario Department is getting to be a very popular page of reading for scenario writers, and many are the letters we receive from would-be writers and those who have had their stories rejected. Many are the scenarios that have been sent to us asking what there is wrong with them, and giving us the letters sent by the companies who reject them. Some of these scenarios are far away above the average of the so-called scenario editor. Some of these editors are no more fit to sit in the chair of a scenario editor than they are capable of flying. Many of the manufacturers ask for strong dramatic conditions without grossness, something that uplifts the industry, and yet, forsooth, when magnificent stories are sent in by writers from Indiana, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Portland, Philadelphia and other cities, and when we see these same companies putting on silly, ridiculous Western subjects, which have no story, which have no beginning and no ending, and which it is impossible to obtain any real good from, we wonder what these same companies and directors are thinking about. We have tried recently to write a story on a special Western subject, but when we have read the synopsis of this same special Western product there is nothing whatever in the plot or film that will give any thought, suggestion or condition where a story may be written around it. Why do these conditions exist? Some of the companies pay the ridiculously small sum of five and ten dollars, and the highest they pay is fifteen, and then they expect magnificent work at this price. Some of these companies expect their directors to be scenario writers as well as directors. They expect their employees, such as their clerks, and even their office boys, to write scenarios and hand them to the company. Such conditions as these are absurd, and we are awaiting the time when the scenario editors shall be men of knowledge, invested with the power to say to the directors, "I have selected this scenario and you must put it on," but when it comes to a scenario editor having to submit the same to two or three directors, who in turn have to submit it to the manager, and the manager has to submit it to the proprietor—in the name of all scenario writers, what is the good of a scenario editor? We expect, we demand, great things from the manufacturers in the uplifting tendency of the story, in the cutting out of the mediocre, silly, nonsensical Western slapjack, and to give us an elevating series of films such as can be exhibited, not only in the picture theatres, but in the drawing rooms, in the churches, in the schoolrooms of our land.

INJUNCTION DENIED

On March 29, 1912, a motion for preliminary injunction by the Motion Picture Patents Company against the Imp Films Company and the Independent Moving Pictures Company of America and Carl Laemmle, was argued in the U. S. District Court for the Southern District of New York, before Hon. E. Henry Lacombe, Circuit Judge. The case was argued on behalf of the Motion Picture Patents Company by J. Edgar Bull, Esq. (John Robert Taylor and Warren H. Small on the Brief), and by the Hon. William J. Wallace and William Houston Kenyon, Esq., on behalf of the defendants.

On May 4th the motion was denied, a short opinion being filed as follows:

United States District Court,
Southern District of New York.
Motion Picture Patents Company
vs.
Independent Moving Picture Company of America, and another.
Same
vs.
Imp Films Company and another.
Lacombe, C. J.

The additions to the "prior art" do not impress. Complainant's argument as to reissue is a strong one, but in view of what was said by the Court of Appeals in the Yankee and Steiner cases, and of Maitland vs. Goetz Mfg. Co., 86 Fed. R. 124, the application for a preliminary injunction is denied. The question is one for the Court of Appeals to determine.

NAT. C. GOODWIN TO STAR IN THE SILENT DRAMA

By M. I. MacDonald.

The wheel of evolution upon whose cogs swings the chain of events which make and control the history of the moving picture, is turning—so it seems—at so rapid a pace that the head grows dizzy, and the overwhelming fleetness with which one circumstance changes place with another almost confuses one's vision. Yesterday we grumbled at the crudeness of the pictures; today we marvel at the magnificence of production exemplified in them. A few paces back we found only the nameless actor of oftentimes mediocre talent lending his best if despised efforts to the moving picture. On the plane where momentarily we rest today we see rushing to their places in the silent drama the elite of dramatic stardom. A wealth of grace, and wit, and talent is offered at the shrine of the animated picture, and the desire for the perpetuation of personality and life work bows many a knee in humble aquiescence at the bidding of the moving picture camera.

Bernhardt and Rejane first startled the world by what seemed at the time nothing short of the most astonishing condescension by posing for moving pictures. Marlowe and Sothern, it is rumored, are slated to appear. But most startling of all to the American people because it comes suddenly and as a great surprise, is the news that one of the greatest of their dramatic stars, Nat C. Goodwin has actually signed his contract to appear as Fagin in Oliver Twist in which he has been applauded for the past sixteen weeks by New York audiences, in a three reel production of a splendidly dramatized version of the Dickens masterpiece.

It is to Mr. H. A. Spanuth, the young and enterprising president and manager of the General Film Publicity and Sales Company whose offices are at 116 West Forty-fifth street, New York City, that we are indebted for the final concentration of Nat C. Goodwin's efforts to the film stage. Mr. Spanuth's admiration and appreciation of the great character actor led him to make a personal request that he should lend his wonderful talent and magnetism to the prospective making of one of the greatest films that the world has ever known. And it should be with a spirit of thankfulness that the American public shall receive the ultimate result of a wonderfully staged production.

Nothing could be more opportune than that this great work in motion picture photography should be accomplished in this year of 1912, the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Charles Dickens. It is also a fitting accessory to the commemoration by the Leibler Company in the production of Oliver Twist, in which Mr. Goodwin has been appearing in his splendid characterization of Fagin the Jew.

A great deal of time and thought is being spent by Mr. Goodwin in the securing of one of the most splendid casts that has ever been concentrated in one group. The best resources of the dramatic world are being scoured to fit each character in the most faultless manner. Nothing, we are told, will be left undone to make this moving picture production one of the finest efforts ever made in the photographic or dramatic world.

The last great English production of this play was made by Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree at His Majesty's Theatre, London, in 1905. In the following list of the cast that appeared in that memorable production will be recognized the names of a couple of those who were Mr. Goodwin's support in the recent all-star production at the New Amsterdam and Empire Theatres in New York:

Fagin	Mr. Tree
Bill Sykes	Len Harding
Artful Dodger	Franks
Oliver Twist	Nellie Bauman
Nancy	Constance Collier

Mr. Goodwin, thoroughly familiar with all the various dramatized versions of Oliver Twist, has at his finger tips a vast store of knowledge to aid him in the version which he himself will prepare for the film production. In this production will be utilized the best situations that the book has to offer.

In dramatizing Oliver Twist it has been necessary to depart somewhat from the sequence of events in the book. For instance, Dickens chose to keep the identity of Will Monks a profound secret up to his closing chapter. The demands of an audience however prevent the dramatist from doing this; and it is specially necessary in offering a production to a moving picture audience that a certain lucidness of plot be maintained. It is necessary for example to let the audience into the secret of how it was that Will Monks used every means possible to convert Oliver into a thief. And it is also necessary to make passably clear Fagin's reason for pursuing the boy with relentless malevolence in hope of winning a reward. It is indeed a work of art in itself to properly prepare a story such as Dickens' Oliver Twist for a mute interpretation on the moving picture screen.

The Nat C. Goodwin production of Oliver Twist will be handled by the General Film Publicity and Sales Company as a state rights proposition, and will doubtless be one of the largest money makers that has yet appeared in the film game. Mr. Goodwin's entry in the field represents one of the most significant moves that has ever been made in the history of the moving picture.

LABOR TEMPLE DOES GOOD WORK WITH MOVING PICTURES

By M. I. MacDonald.

The large building at the corner of Fourteenth street and Second avenue, New York City, which for years did service as a church, and is now designated as the Labor Temple, being given up to the entertainment and social news of the laboring class in that portion of the city, is, every week, converted into a moving picture hall for the benefit of the children and adults who frequent the place.

Every Saturday afternoon three reels of film are run off for the entertainment of the children under fourteen years; and again at night for the adults and older children. Each child is given a free pass which admits him to each entertainment for children. If a child loses his ticket he must then pay an admission fee every time before he can be admitted. At the evening entertainments the adult members of the district are admitted free, an offering being taken up sometime during the performance, into which all who can may slip their mite. The program is often varied with music which serves to break the monotony of a continuous picture performance.

On Sunday afternoon the children come again at 3:30, when a short address is delivered them by Dr. J. C. Dey, superintendent of the Temple, after which pictures are again exhibited. The performance is repeated for the adults again in the evening, and it is said that on both of these days the building is packed to the limit of its seating capacity, and the offerings being almost sufficient to cover the expense of the pictures.

Every film that is shown is first passed upon by Dr. Dey and the Board of Directors. Films that have anything really objectionable in them are discarded and sent back to the exchange from whence they came, after a record has been made of the objectionable points which may be referred to at some future time if necessary.

Dr. Dey reports that the effect of different subjects on the minds of the children can be very easily ascertained by carefully taking note of the gathering while the reels of pictures are being run off. When a funny picture is shown, and he tells me they show all kinds, the children laugh with one accord; and when the picture is of a serious nature they too turn serious. Likewise when a subject is illustrative of something that they do not quite grasp the meaning of, their faces wear an expression of being nonplussed.

That a great deal is being done by good souls for the young of the nation is very evident in the existence of such institutions. That so much effort along this line is really being made is a mark of the rapid progress of a better civilization. That "The child is father of the man" was never so strongly realized as now. Never before in the history of the world has the great plan of evolution been recognized and intelligently worked upon as now. Although we are told that there are still thousands of children in America alone for whom educational accommodations are inadequate, the very fact that the public are becoming thoroughly cognizant of such a condition, and are striving to offset the difficulty, tells the story of progression.

At the Labor Temple those entrusted with the work have been putting forth their best efforts in an honest endeavor to do all that lies in their power toward educating adults as well as children who have drifted within the doors, and the moving picture has been found to be a most valuable asset. Dr. Dey is a pleasant faced man in whom one instinctively feels confidence. He is undoubtedly the right man in the right place, and it is good to know that such an influence prevails on the East Side of the great city as it found there.

DO NOT MISS THIS SERIES.

William Lord Wright is preparing a series of sprightly interviews on "Newspapermen In Filmland." The first of the series will appear in the Moving Picture News in the near future. Mr. Wright tells us that he has had a great deal of fun writing these articles and we know that our readers will enjoy these sketches of "the men behind the guns." "These men are not journalists," says Mr. Wright, "they are content to be classed as plain newspapermen." Don't miss reading these character sketches.

THE SCEPTRE SLAVE

A slave in ermine, a crowned head in the yoke of its own royalty, a royal prisoner to her own sovereignty, is a pitiable and interesting character. Sometimes, in the realm of kings and queens and princesses the people forget that their sovereigns are human, with all the human longings and yearnings and desires. And sometimes royalty itself forgets it. But sometimes it remembers, and then—it's tough!

"What Avails the Crown," the Rex release of Sunday, May 19, pictures a young princess who is mostly girl and entirely human. When her father, the old king, asks her to marry a man just because he's a prince and the alliance will furnish a good political affiliation, the girl rebels. Her father counsels her and as king commands her to obey his wish. She was just the girl to do it—so she ran away and lived in the home of an old nurse, among the people; and saw life and lived it as never a princess can; and met a man who was not a prince, but noble; and—loved him.

The king died, and the girl was proclaimed queen. After the first moment of grief over the death of her father, and the second of ecstatic, fervent delight over her mastery and monarchy as queen, the dark truth occurred to her that she owed her state and subjects a duty with which even herself and her selfish desires could not interfere. She realized that to marry the man she loved would be a traitorous act to the state over which she was sovereign, and instead of being a royal traitress, she made a royal sacrifice. She married the prince.

Wordsworth said, "It is our royal state that makes this bitterness of woe."—if we remember right. We disagree with him in that woe is less a direct result of royalty than that it is a heritage of all humanity—and kings and queens are only human.

DORA THORNE.

Mutual Feature Film. Reel One.

Roland is the only son of an English nobleman and destined on his father's death to inherit the title and estate. His parents are desirous that he make a match suitable to his prospective rank, and their choice is Lady Valentine Chartiers, who has youth, beauty, rank and wealth. They communicate their decision to the young man and are horrified when he tells them that he has fallen in love with Dora Thorne, the handsome daughter of their lodgekeeper. Roland had met her while out sketching and the charms of the young girl completely won him. He declines to give her up, and when his father threatens to disown him, Roland leaves the ancestral home with Dora, makes her his wife, and they go to Italy where he hopes to win fame and fortune as an artist.

Some years later, when privations have dulled the beauty of his wife, and poverty has taken away the romance, Roland meets Lady Valentine and cannot help contrasting her with the woman of his choice. Dora's jealousy is aroused. She feels neglected, and her only consolation is the baby whom she adores

Story of Dora Thorne. Reel Two.

Dora Thorne, who eloped with the son of a nobleman who employed her father as lodgekeeper, left him after a jealous quarrel, and returned to her old home with her infant girl. Roland's mother, at the son's request endeavored to care for the woman and child, but Dora proudly refused any assistance. In the meantime, Roland remained in Italy, where he won fame as a painter.

Sixteen years after Dora left her husband, the latter receives word that his father is dead, and that he, Roland, is now a nobleman with a large estate. He returns to England, and takes up his residence in his old home. His wife refuses to see him, and keeps his daughter out of his sight. It happens, however, that while Roland is sketching one day, that by chance he sets his easel at the place where he first met his wife, and he is overpowered by the recollections of the happy, by-gone days. Suddenly a young girl appears, and her ways and manners recall the wife he has lost. He questions her kindly and is overcome with joy when he finds that she is his daughter. Again he appeals to his wife, but again she refuses and begs him not to take from her the only joy of her lonely life, her daughter. The man sorrowfully consents.

But the daughter who has brought joy into his life is with him but a short time. She is killed by falling over a precipice. The parents meet at her bier, and their mutual sorrow over their loss ends in a mutual forgiveness. In life, the girl had failed to bring them together, but in death she reunited them, for they know that by consenting to forget the past they are fulfilling her dearest wish. And so, after many tragic years, the wife of Lord Roland enters the home that is hers of right.

THE MAID'S STRATAGEM.

Imp Comedy Release of May 25, 1912.

This is a diverting half reel comedy showing how a maid servant disguises herself as a society woman at a big function and is dismissed by her mistress for her offense. Still the girl does not mind, because she has won a rich young lover by her stratagem.

Vivian Prescott is the maid, which part gives her excellent opportunity of exhibiting her powers as a comedy actress, and H. S. Mack is the rich society man, whose heart she wins.

MAYOR GAYNOR SAYS PICTURES ARE A SOLACE AND EDUCATION

A new moving picture show ordinance similar to that which was introduced in the Board of Aldermen last year and allowed to die will probably be presented to the board soon, in compliance with the expressed wish of Mayor Gaynor. The old ordinance, which was reported by the committee appointed by Mayor Gaynor, was never voted on and died with the passing of the board of 1911.

The Committee on Laws and Legislation of the Board of Aldermen now has under consideration a letter from Mayor Gaynor, in which the Mayor wrote:

"At my suggestion the Commissioner of Accounts made a careful study of the conditions of the moving picture shows of the City of New York. This was brought about by many complaints which I had received. He submitted his report on March 22, 1911. I appointed a committee of citizens to examine carefully into the whole subject and to report a proposed ordinance for the government of these shows. They completed their work and reported the ordinance, which was duly submitted to your honorable body.

"The matter is one of such importance that I have thought it proper to address to you this special communication thereon. It seems to me that the ordinance is well thought out and should receive favorable consideration and be passed by you. I do not undertake to say that it is perfect. I dare say that you may find that it needs certain changes or amendments.

"Great Outcry of Certain Uninformed Persons"

"All that I urge is that the ordinance be considered and passed as it is, or with such wise amendments as you think proper. These shows are a great solace and the source of much entertainment and education to the whole community. They are attended by all kinds of people, and especially by those who cannot afford to attend more expensive places of amusement. The pictures shown are moral and instructive. The great outcry of certain uninformed persons against them which existed not long ago has subsided. Our part is to safeguard these shows in all respects, physical, mental and moral, by a good ordinance."

The ordinance to which the Mayor refers was attacked bitterly when first introduced, and John D. Lindsay, president of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, declared that "the enforcement of such an ordinance would result in untold harm to our young people as a whole and would mean the absolute ruin of many."

The proposed law provided that no child actually or apparently under sixteen years of age should attend such a show unaccompanied, except between 3 and 6 o'clock in the afternoon on school days and at any time before 6 in the evening on days other than school days. Unaccompanied children were to be permitted to remain not later than 7 o'clock.

It was provided further that a section of seats, three feet distant from all other seats, was to be set aside for the children, who were to be kept therein, and a matron was to be paid by the licensee of the place to watch over the children.

Mr. Lindsay contended that the ordinance would nullify the Penal law which prohibits an unattended child under sixteen from attending a picture show at any time. He spoke of it as "a vicious and unwarranted relaxation of the present State law."

VICTORY FOR THEATRE OWNERS

What is looked upon by moving picture exhibitors as a victory over the rulings of Building Commissioner Rapp was achieved when Council Committee on Public Safety, of Cincinnati, Ohio, adopted a motion recommending that existing moving picture theatres be granted a renewal of their licenses when they expire until a new ordinance regulating those places can be agreed on.

The matter under consideration was an ordinance requiring that the vent pipe in moving picture booths be enlarged from 8 inches to 16 inches, in order to permit of the installation of a fan to exhaust the bad air from the theatre, and also requiring the use of a certain patented magazine in moving picture machines, which, it is claimed, shuts automatically and prevents fires.

Building Commissioner Rapp and his deputy, Mr. Sturtevant, were present, as were also about a hundred moving picture exhibitors and operators. A number of picture machines were brought before the committee to demonstrate how they work.

Arguments against the proposed ordinance were made by M. A. Neff, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America; Charles T. Beeching, a theatre owner; Attorney Haarmeyer and others. They declared that a fan would create a draft which would be very dangerous in case of fire, and that it would endanger the health of the operator by drawing the bad air into the booth. Mr. Beeching demonstrated by lighting a film and closing the booth that the fire would be extinguished by its own smoke, which, he said, is moist steam, the same as is used in fire extinguishers.

No Danger of Fire

His experiment was a complete success, as the lighted film was at once extinguished when the door was closed. He maintained that there is no danger of fire when fireproof machines and fireproof booths are used, as is the case in all local picture houses. He suggested that a register be placed at the bottom of the booth to carry off the foul air, instead of having it sucked through a vent by means of a fan, which would cause a draft toward the booth. Mr. Rapp thought well of this suggestion.

Mr. Neff declared that an ordinance requiring the use of a patented magazine in the picture machines would be unconstitutional. He said Cincinnati has more moving picture shows than any other city in the country, that the rules here are the strictest in America, and the license the highest. Moving picture shows, he declared, are the greatest known factor in education and should be encouraged. He complained that under every new administration the moving picture shows are subjected to all kinds of orders to make changes, and as a result "they don't know where they are at."

He declared that the alleged danger of fires from films has been greatly exaggerated and that there have been but few such fires in this country. This was denied by Deputy Building Commissioner Sturtevant, who said he knows from personal experience in his present position and from his former connection with the Fire Prevention Bureau that there have been many fires in this city due to moving picture films.

Attorney Haarmeyer said that the great danger in moving picture theatres and all other theatres is due to panic rather than anything else. He charged that boys are permitted to operate moving picture machines and accused the Board of Examiners who grant licenses to operators of favoritism toward members of the Operators' Union and charged that they license incompetent young men.

Favors an Age Limit

Mr. Sturtevant emphatically denied this, and said that the regulations of the board require operators to be at least twenty years old before they can obtain a license. He said applicants examined for an operato's license are not asked whether they belong to the Union and the examiners don't know. Mr. Haarmeyer said the safety of the public demands that no one under twenty-one years of age should be licensed to operate a picture machine. Mr. Rapp said he favors an age limit.

Attorney Rockel spoke for the concern which makes the patented magazine prescribed in the ordinance.

A number of exhibitors complained of the severity of the requirements under the present building code and suggested that they ought to be modified, and also urged that some action be taken to assure them of the renewal of their licenses on theatres that have been in existence for a long time. Member Sawyer, of the committee, suggested that the exhibitors draw up an ordinance embodying their ideas for regulating moving picture houses and submit it to Building Commissioner Rapp for his approval, and when they have agreed on an ordinance it can be presented to Council for passage. He declared that picture show owners have property rights which ought to be respected, and that no ordinance should be retroactive—that it should apply only to new theatres and not to existing ones.

A motion was then made that Mr. Rapp be requested not to interfere with any of the existing picture theatres, or refuse to grant renewal of their licenses, pending the passage of a new ordinance to regulate them. Chairman Deal put this motion and it was unanimously carried. This pleased the picture exhibitors so much that on motion of Mr. Neff they at once tendered a vote of thanks to the committee.

Commissioner Rapp did not say that he would comply with the request, but rather intimated that he would be governed by the state building code.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

NOTES OF THE WEEK

Lee Schubert and Lawrence Webber are alive to the growing importance of the film game, and in anticipation of the revolution about to take place in the world of the drama and dramatic actors, they have already corralled some thirty to forty moving picture houses which will be operated by this combination in circuit.

* * * *

The Baltimore Sun has suggested a national conference to discuss the regulation of moving picture shows. That the power of the film is being felt to a tremendous extent is evident from the nature of the following quotation:

"Every state in the Union is interested, because the moving picture is everywhere. It has come to stay and can be made a blessing or a curse, as it is directed. Therefore the movement for regulating these shows should be national, so that each state would receive the benefit."

Says the North Side News:

"Whenever a boy commits a crime or a girl goes wrong, it is at once said that the erring one was led astray by moving pictures.

"Boys and girls went wrong long before moving pictures were known, and as a matter of truth the moving picture has little or nothing to do with the greater majority of the moral failure of to-day.

"Forty or fifty years ago these cases were attributed to dime novels, with an equal disregard for facts.

"Generally speaking, moving pictures do not excite those who see them to crime. Most moving picture proprietors are respectable citizens, and a large number of people make an honest living out of the moving picture business.

"Recently there was held in Omaha, Neb., a literary contest in the public schools, and the successful essays were written by those who got their themes and material from moving picture shows."

THE CHAMBER OF FORGETFULNESS.

Alex Francis, the well known romantic actor, achieves a signal success in the Eclair American drama, "The Chamber of Forgetfulness," which is released Tuesday, May 21. It is a sad story of unjust jealousy and the bitter consequences of a husband's suspicions. Years after the death of the guiltless wife, her innocence is proved when the husband returns to her room—sealed all that time, to obtain a souvenir for the son. The regret, the reconciliation and the reparation of a great wrong—these are beautifully shown and the splendid photographic qualities of the film will create unusual success for its exhibitors.

THE PEER OF ALL MOVING PICTURE MACHINES

NEW YORK MANAGERS SAY

The machine has given entire satisfaction, and we will soon need more machines for our other theatres.
Arthur S. White, Manager Moving Picture Department, Percy G. Williams Circuit of theatres.

I am so pleased with the result that I shall install another Simplex machine in place of one of another make.
Wm. J. Gane, Manhattan Theatre.

We consider it far ahead of any other machine, and have since put them in our other theatres.
Walter Rosenberg, Savoy Theatre.

So well pleased am I with our "Simplex" that I would not give one screw of it for any other entire machine on the market.
Harry Levine, Manager, Riverside Theatre.

Its precision in construction is such that it stands up to the excessive hard work, and we have no more annoying breakdowns.
E. Stern, Proprietor, Bleecker Theatre.

The new "Simplex" projector is undoubtedly the best machine we have ever operated.
E. J. Crane, Eden Musee.

After using the other machines, I cheerfully state that the "Simplex" is decidedly the best.
W. D. Kolle, Prospect Hall, Brooklyn.

It is the best we have ever used and we have ordered two more for our other theatres.

CUPID'S VICTORY

Cupid's Victory, produced by the Nestor people and to be released on May 18th, is an excellent little comedy. Vivian Rich and Donald McDonald are the main characters and do justice to the opportunities offered them to display their ability. Papa, portrayed by Mr. Russell Bassett, refuses to sanction the marriage of his daughter to a young lawyer, and the young couple are at a loss to know what course to take. The young man, however, has things all his own way, when, on temporarily taking the place of the Justice of the Peace, he is called upon to pass sentence upon the papa of his beloved. It seems that papa is a bit of a sport and, on a little joyride with some fair members of the opposite sex, he runs his car into a political meeting, and thereby causes himself to be hauled up before the judge. Of course, when asked whether he prefers to be thrown into jail or give his daughter's hand in marriage to the young lawyer, he chooses the lesser of the two evils, and the young people are made happy.

On the same reel with the dainty little comedy, "Cupid's Victory," is a splendid scenic showing the marriage place of Ramona, heroine of the great American novel of that name. A splendid view of Estudillo House is shown, where Ramona and her Indian lover were wedded. Other interesting subjects are shown in connection with this beautiful story.

MAKE-UP IN MOVING PICTURES

Managers and actresses are a long while finding out how badly make-up on the lips and eyes shows up in the pictures. A certain amount is required, no doubt, but when overdone the camera shows it up in all its horrors.

The better the picture the more it shows, and if the operator of the projection machine is a good one he certainly does not improve matters.

I notice some ladies of the studio do not use make-up—no doubt they are wise, having seen themselves on the screen, and to my mind they certainly look more natural—which is a whole lot in pictures.

It's not always the ladies though, for last week the writer saw a film of a man who looked more like a painted clown than what he was supposed to be—a waiter.

GEORGE KLEINE RELEASES

"A Contest and No Prize," for May 7th, is the story of a vivacious, fun-loving girl and her coquettish pranks with two rival suitors. The reel is completed with beautiful views of the town of Fiume, Hungary.

"The Squire's Fate," an Eclipse subject for Wednesday, May 8th, is an excellent dramatic production of more than ordinary merit. This reel is completed by an interesting nature study entitled "Tropical Creatures," showing curious stick-like creatures which inhabit trees in the tropical regions.

During the week ending May 11th Mr. Kleine has programmed two fine split reels containing an unusually mirthful Cines comedy; a beautiful travelogue; an excellently acted and staged Eclipse drama, concluding with a short but highly interesting zoological study; and for Saturday, May 11th, the extraordinarily splendid Cines historically correct, magnificently staged and acted drama of the Empire period dealing with the story of the love, marriage and divorce of Josephine and Napoleon. This exceptionally fine programme is bound to prove a popular card and meet with the approbation of the public and deserves the support of exhibitors.

BOYS

BY VIRGINIA WEST

Adapted from Majestic Release

Doctor Andrews, although the best dentist in town, on a particular morning went about his work listlessly, not caring whether his fellow-citizens had their teeth filled or not. He was thinking of more important things than teeth. He was thinking of the Widow Brown.

When twelve o'clock came, and he had an hour in which there were no appointments, he sat down to think.

The great question was: Would the widow ultimately say "yes" or "no"? Just what expression in her eyes had meant when she said: "It is a very serious question to answer quickly. I shall think it over and send for you when I am ready."

One moment his heart leaped for joy and the very next he was in the depths of despair.

A ring at the bell. The doctor slowly and disinterestedly opened the door. Then his heart stood still. There was the Widow Brown's own boy with a note in his hand.

"Come in, my boy, come in," said Doctor Andrews with a great show of unconcern.

The note told him only that he might have his answer that night.

Perhaps because the boy belonged to the lady of his heart, or perhaps because he felt the need of human companionship in his great suspense, the doctor asked John Brown to wait for him and he would go out with him.

When the doctor left the room for his hat, young John Brown made a hurried investigation. His eyes lighted upon a pair of forceps. The moment he saw them he knew why Fate had turned his footsteps in that direction. They were just the things a boy of fourteen needed. The doctor had plenty of forceps, so he really wouldn't need those. In a moment they were resting comfortably in John's trousers' pocket. He did not know just when it would be, but he knew with absolute certainty that the time would come for which those forceps were especially made. He was willing to wait.

When eight o'clock that night arrived, the dentist was standing on the porch of Mrs. Lucy Brown's house, extending a somewhat shaky hand toward the bell.

When the widow greeted him in the parlor he was somewhat reassured.

"Do not think me hasty," he said when they were seated cosily on the sofa, "I do not wish to seem so, but I do want my answer."

The widow smiled and laid her hand in his. "You have it," she said.

A snort came from under the sofa, followed by, "Oh, gee, I'm gonna have a new pa."

"John, my son," said Mrs. Brown sternly, "go to bed at once. I shall speak to you when I come upstairs."

"Never mind, dear," whispered Doctor Andrews, "I am too happy to mind. Besides, I have a ——"

The doctor stopped very suddenly.

"You have a what?"

"Why—why—why, I have a pretty good opinion of your John. We became friends to-day."

"Oh, I am very glad. I do want you to love him."

"How could I help it, when he is yours?"

The voices sank to a whisper, consequently things became very uninteresting for a fourteen-year-old boy. John crept out and disappeared.

When Doctor Andrews walked home two hours later he was the happiest man in the world. Everything had been arranged and in two months he could call Lucy Brown his wife.

As long as the days were, the time did pass finally and the quiet ceremony was performed

"I have a surprise for you, dear," the bride was told as they arrived at the groom's home. "It is this," and the doctor led forth a boy about the age of John Brown. "He is my boy, and his name is John, too. I wanted to surprise you"

"You did," said the bride. "I hope the boys will be friends."

"Oh. I am sure they will," exclaimed the doctor with confidence.

But, alas, he was obliged to change his opinion. The wedding supper was anything but harmonious. There was a howl from young Brown, and then a flying of fists toward young Andrews.

"Boys, boys!" cried both parents.

"Is this the way to begin your life together?" asked Mrs. Andrews, tearfully.

"I don't want to be together," mumbled John Brown.

"I don't, neither," growled John Andrews. "That boy's in my room at school. I guess I can lick him, all right."

"Why, son, you didn't tell me you were in the room with John Brown," exclaimed Doctor Andrews.

The boy looked disgusted. "How'd I know he belonged to her?" he said.

There was silence for a moment.

"I think," said Mrs. Andrews, "I'll take John up to his room."

The doctor agreed with his wife's judgment in the matter and led the way to John Andrews' room, that young man following close.

When the newly wedded couple were again seated at the table, the bride sighed. "Oh, dear," she said, "I am beginning to be almost afraid with those two boys in the house together."

"Don't worry, my dearest," answered the doctor tenderly. "I'm sure they will be all right when they get used to living together."

But, alas, when an hour had passed the doctor was not so sure that his prophecy would come true.

A wild yell rent the air. The fond parents sprang to their feet. Into the room rushed John Andrews, blood on his face and hands and on the front of his nightclothes.

"My boy, what is it?" cried Doctor Andrews, going to him.

Mrs. Andrews stood grasping a chair for support.

"He—he—he pulled—my—tooth!" gasped John.

Mrs. Andrews fell into a chair—relieved.

The doctor glanced at her almost sternly.

"This is rather serious behaviour," he said quietly.

"I am sure my boy must have been very severely provoked."

Mrs. Andrews' eyes snapped but tears were in her voice.

"I shall take John to my room," she said, a wee bit haughtily. "You had better call the servants if you are going up, I shall not be down again."

"Very well," answered the doctor. "Good-night."

So the new life began, and neither the man nor the woman slept, thinking of and fearing for the future.

When morning came John Brown was quiet as a lamb. A good, quiet night's rest had done him a world of good.

But John Andrews was in a different mood. Whether it was the none-too-pleasant feeling in his jaw, or a sense of having been beaten at his own game, we cannot say. But so outlandishly did he behave that when he left home for school, his father, worn out worrying about him, wrote a note to the boy's teacher. He hoped there would be an improvement in his behavior, if not in his character, when he returned.

Of course, under the circumstances, John Andrews felt it best to know the exact contents of the note. When he was well out of sight of home he discovered these words: "John has gotten beyond my control. Please punish him, as I assure you he deserves it."

That would never do, he knew very well. He thought deeply.

Suddenly John Brown appeared on the scene, having come by another route.

Young Andrews' heart stood still for very joy. It isn't often a fellow gets a chance to kill two very large birds with one small stone.

"Say," ventured the boy as the other came up on a level with him. "Say, you want to earn fifty cents?"

John Brown eyed him suspiciously. He thought of the tooth.

"How?"

"Oh, all you got to do is to take this note to the teacher. I don't want to go in yet."

"Let me see the fifty cents."

John Andrews handed it over.

John Brown dropped it on the pavement, bit it a few times, and put it in his pocket. Fifty cents would buy a good many things a fellow needed.

"Gimme the note," he said, and marched off to the school.

A half-hour later John Andrews sauntered into the schoolroom, making a too great effort to appear unconcerned.

He tried to avoid the eyes of John Brown but it was of no use. If he had known he would be killed for it, he could not have helped looking at him.

One look was enough. The expression in John Brown's eyes reminded him of the tooth-pulling episode and the resourcefulness of that young man's mind. Young Andrews was very glad his seat was on the other side of the room.

The blessed peace and quiet of the morning was broken rudely for Mrs. Andrews when her John burst in upon her with the news that he had received a whipping from the teacher in consequence of delivering a note written by Doctor Andrews.

Being excitable, and a devoted mother, the lady jumped at conclusions.

When she entered Doctor Andrews' office she was pale enough for him to exclaim: "Lucy, my dear, are you ill?"

"No. I wish to speak with you. What right have you to send a note to my boy's teacher asking him to give the boy a whipping?"

The doctor was astounded.

"I did not do such a thing."

"Then why did John receive a whipping when he delivered your note?"

A light broke over the doctor's mind.

"By Jove!" he laughed, "that boy of mine must have played a trick to get even for the tooth-pulling."

Mrs. Andrews was growing angry.

"You laugh," she cried, "you laugh because my boy has been whipped. Oh, I am beginning to see now that I made a great mistake to bring him here. I shall take him home again."

"My dear," said the doctor soothingly, "don't you see that it is no worse than what your boy did to mine? The best way is to let them fight it out until they get to be friends."

"That's right, take your boy's part against mine!" cried Mrs. Andrews tearfully. "I am going—now."

And before her husband could stop her she had dashed through one door, just as a patient entered at another.

"Ah, well," thought Doctor Andrews as he took his patient into his private office, "it's just as well I'm prevented from following her. When I see her again the storm will have blown over. Dear little wife."

But the doctor was mistaken. When he went to Lucy's room an hour later he found that she and her John had left the house, and a note explained that they did not intend to return.

In order that John's hurt feelings might to some extent be pacified, Mrs. Andrews told him he need not return to school that afternoon, and besides that she bought him a box of candy such as no boy's pocket money could ever buy.

As the time drew near for the boys to pass on their way from school, John began to be filled with a great desire to have the fellows see how well he was being treated. He hoped John Andrews would come by.

When soon a small crowd of boys turned the corner near by, John Brown leaned carelessly over the front gate, the contents of his box of candy in full view.

"Say, why'n't you come to school?" called one boy as they approached.

"I didn't have to," answered John with dignity.

"Whatcha got?" called another as they drew nearer.

"Candy."

"Say, ain't you gonna give us none?"

John quietly put the lid on the box.

"Stingy."

"Say, boys, let's make him."

With that they leapt over the fence and made for John. The boy fought desperately, but was about to be overpowered when, suddenly, something happened—for a moment he didn't know what.

"Say, John, don't give in; we'll beat 'em," yelled a familiar voice.

John Brown gained new courage and soon the boys were put to flight.

Then John Brown and John Andrews stood face to face. Andrews looked rather sheepish. Brown didn't know what to say, so he held out what remained of the candy toward his late ally.

John Andrews helped himself.

At last, when he had emptied his mouth, he said:

"Say, what made you and your mother go away from our house?"

John Brown hardly knew how to speak of the painful subject under the circumstances, so he handed his companion the candy again.

When he thought John Andrews' mouth was nearly empty again he said:

"What made you come here and help me? Why'n't you let those fellows beat me up?"

"I dunno; I—I guess when I saw 'em beatin' you I—I kind of felt like—like you was kin to me."

John Brown felt something queer the matter with his throat—as though he had swallowed a piece of candy the wrong way. He looked at the ground and wiggled his toes in the grass.

"Say," he said at last, "mother's awful miserable 'cause —cause we don't like each other."

"I guess maybe that's what's the trouble with dad. He wouldn't eat lunch and he locked himself in the office." John Andrews was looking at the ground, too.

"Say, do you hate me?" blurted out John Brown when the silence became too painful.

John Andrews didn't hesitate. "No, I don't—honest," he exclaimed. "I s'pose we're kind of brothers, ain't we?"

John Brown thought they were. So two very dirty hands, smeared with earth and candy from the late fight, were clasped in an everlasting compact of friendship.

The two boys visited the miserable bride and told her of their changed relations. She could scarcely believe her eyes. But later, when they returned after a short absence with Doctor Andrews, she was obliged to believe.

The boys discretely withdrew and left the bride and groom together.

"Say," said John Andrews, "it ain't so bad to give half a father for half a mother."

And John Brown agreed that the other way round wasn't so bad, either.

THE World of Film is adding its mite to the crusade against the loan shark. This is an action to be commended, although the kindly gentleman with the one hundred per cent interest probably doesn't thing so. In many sections of the country, notably in Chicago, Cincinnati and Cleveland, the city governments are fighting the loan shark and are endeavoring to protect the unsophisticated workingman. The Essanay and Imp Films companies have recently released convincing photoplays intended to expose the operations of certain loan agencies found in every large city, and also in many of the smaller communities. Newspapers are also combating the evil. This fact recalls a certain high class film which was released several years ago by Biograph, we believe. It was called "The Usurer." This picture is worthy of reproduction at this time, and should be shown together with the very excellent recent releases on the subject. It is believed that such pictures will do much in mitigating the evil of the one hundred per cent loan agencies, as victims of these sharks can have a lesson impressed upon them while visiting the moving picture theatre.

Theatrical writers of the various metropolitan newspapers are devoting more and more space to cinematography. The latest theatrical critic of prominence to fall into line is Sage, of the Cleveland Leader. In commenting upon the bright page devoted to the picture world, conducted by Mr. R. P. Stoddard, Sage writes: "The importance of the moving picture business is beginning to be appreciated at last by the theatrical profession. At first it was laughed at as a craze to run its course like the roller skating one, which gave the stage a bad scare for a few minutes and then petered out. It isn't the way with the film attractions, however. They grow in worth and the houses they are represented at multiply rapidly. The business has expanded to such an extent that it has its own literature, aside from the fact that all the theatrical journals devote much space to this branch of the theatre, and many newspapers throughout the land have regular Sunday moving picture departments. And yet, the industry is practically in its infancy. It is growing in many ways. With the inventions constantly being perfected, the film business is becoming every day a greater menace to the regular theatre."

Some exceptions have been taken to our scoring of the proposed reproduction of the Hillsville assassination in moving pictures. Many cities and towns will refuse to allow the pictures to be exhibited, but, of course, there will be other places in which the motion picture people will be enabled to "display" their tragedy. It is by no means agreed as to whether the displaying of such pictures is or is not a bad thing. It is argued that the final triumph of the law will naturally deter any other gang from seeking to escape justice through such bloody means. However, we reiterate our doubts as to the wisdom of allowing such pictures to be shown, from another standpoint. They are necessarily repulsive to the finer sentiments, and have no artistic value whatever. We see in this old world quite enough of the undesirable in real life, without having portrayed such scenes of brutality. There is nothing elevating, nothing inspiring in such pictures; at most, they only satisfy morbid curiosity. There is no more reason why the Allen assassination should be shown to the public than there is why an electrocution should be conducted in Central Park.

WE WONDER

We wonder if the artists who make the picture plays,
Appreciate the power that they wield in many ways.
Each has a loyal following, a staunch admiring band
That watch the stage folks' fortunes in Moving Picture Land.

We wonder if the artists who perform in picture reels,
Know the delight and wonder that o'er an audience steals
When this or that prime favorite appears in all his glory,
And foils the artful villain in Filmland's picture story.

We wonder, yes, we wonder, when the final roll is called,
And the mystery of the Great Beyond is satisfactorily solved,
If the moving picture actors won't be greeted with a smile,
And invited by St. Peter to sit down and rest awhile.

Yes, we often wonder if the actresses and actors in Picture Stageland realize the great influence they wield. The leading men and women of almost every film company has an admiring following, particularly among the women and children. Their actions on the screen are followed with absorbing interest, and every character they enact is impressed upon the minds of their admirers. These members of the film world have a great power for good. If they would refuse to appear in suggestive or sensational stories, happily becoming scarce, they would aid in no small way in the uplift movement now being propelled irresistibly onward in nearly every walk of life. Thousands swear by this and that moving picture stage favorite. A great responsibility is theirs. May they prove worthy of the confidence and esteem of the public while both on and off the screen.

He then said four brief words:

Planning to bring about the unrestricted operations of Sunday shows by contributing from their net profits $10,000 to various charitable institutions, J. A. Kramer, James Montgomery and other moving picture theatre managers in Dayton, Ohio, have incorporated the Gem City Charitable Association. While little is known of the exact plans, it is admitted by the incorporators that the object is to gain permission from the city administration to conduct Sunday moving picture theatres. Numerous efforts have been made to gain such permission but they have been futile owing to alleged protests from Sunday observance adherents.

Dayton recently entertained the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League and did nobly. It is the largest city in Ohio where the moving picture theatres are closed on Sunday. It is difficult to believe the assertion that Sunday Observance agitators would prefer the open saloon in Dayton to the open moving picture theatre. Yet that is the condition in Dayton. The saloons are wide open on Sunday while the moving picture theatres are dark. It is hinted in some quarters that it's not "objections from Sunday Observance adherents" but pressure by the saloon keepers, that causes the picture theatres to remain closed on the seventh day. Here is an object lesson for temperance workers.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

The Magazine System

Many photoplaywrights who are disclaiming against the script editor because manuscripts are not acknowledged; because so much time is taken up in consideration, etc., etc.; self-evidently are somewhat new to the literary game. You do not find the author who has served in the magazine field, before turning to script writing, protesting against editorial treatment in the world of films. He is satisfied, and has cause so to be. The magazine editor never acknowledges a manuscript and, furthermore, the magazine editor refuses to send along any criticisms, printed or otherwise, with a rejected article or story. For example, take the Frank A. Munsey Company, which publishes five periodicals. Here is their printed rejection slip:

"We thank you for your courtesy in offering us the accompanying manuscript, and regret that we cannot use it in any of our magazines."

No kindly typewritten letter from the editor, no rejection slip with the reason for rejection checked off. It's just unavailable—that's all.

The magazine editors would be glad to enter into personal communication with all those who offer contributions, but as they receive many thousands of manuscripts annually, it is impossible to do so. Nor can they undertake to give criticism upon manuscripts that are declined. So it will be seen that the Photoplaywright has decidedly the best of it.

The only item where magazine writers are the more favored is the system of the first-class magazines in paying good prices promptly on acceptance of a manuscript.

Another Country Heard From

Verily, the photoplaywright is coming into his own. His interests are being fostered as never before. Schools, professors, associations and manufacturers are all vieing for his attention. Several magazines are being published in the interest of the heretofore humble script writer, the latest being a magazine, the first copy of which has reached the editor from Massachusetts. All the trade papers of established reputation, besides several monthly story magazines, cater to the photoplaywright, but there must be room for more as witness the new entrant into the field. The aim of the publisher is as follows:

"We believe there are conditions existing at the present time between photoplaywrights and film manufacturers which are undesirable for both, and each are eager to span the breach between these two factions."

"The new magazine proposes to become the happy medium to bring about the desired condition, as the editor sees it.

Right here is where we must take exceptions to an editorial policy. There are no "factions," so called, between manufacturers and writers. The only faction noticeable in the field is that stirred up by the "walking delegate" who is looking for trouble with an eye to getting the author's hard-earned money. The editor is in the market for good scripts. If the writer can furnish them, well and good. It's a simple proposition, without any room for "factionalism."

Pages four, five and six, of the new publication, informs the photoplaywright what the manufacturers want and what they will pay. There is some valuable information here.

The final editorial explains in detail what the Associated Scenario Writers of America stands for. The editorial asserts that the "Association has no intention of fighting the film manufacturers, but it does propose to secure justice for its members." We have given our opinion of the policy of this Association previously, stating that successful photoplaywrights would do very well without "protection" other than the checks their carefully written scripts would bring them. Following pages contain reading notices for text-books published in Cincinnati and the announcement of a literary agent who will undertake to criticise and revise scripts. The old, old thesis on "plot stealing" is advanced in a communication on page ten. There is also a page advertisement informing readers that membership fee for the Associated Scenorio Writers of America is ten dollars for the first year and that the promoter "has done more for the scenario writer, than they, individually, have accomplished in ten years."

We are assured that the first issue of the magazine is not the standard by which to judge its scope. Hence we will suspend judgment until further issues are read. There are several publications of similar character on the market at present and, we believe, the ventures are prospering. We can see no reason why this latest venture cannot make good, providing the editors honestly give the photoplaywright a run for his money and not fill the pages with bids to join "protective associations" and such bunk, which advice is not to the photoplaywright's welfare, to put it mildly.

We repeat, not from a selfish motive, either, that the trade journals are proving the most efficient school for the photoplaywright. Back files of the News will give more practical information and "protection" to the writer than any school, or "protective association." Mr. Epes Winthrop Sargeant's articles in the World, and Spectator's department in the Mirror, are also recommended. A photoplaywright who has all of these journals in his home or office, week by week, will not need to seek further for the latest information and instructions of interest to his profession.

The Director

Our good friend, A. W. Thomas, in his "Photoplay Business" department of the Photoplay Magazine, writes: "Considerable complaint is made by writers because their work gets by the editor and is turned down by the director. The director is the man behind the editor in this case; he knows what will go, he knows the possibilities and the limits of camera and performer. What a spectacle would be seen were the editor or author to take the director's place. A draftsman can lay out the plans for the building, but it takes the contractor to erect it. The director is a much maligned man. If the author and editor could join hands and produce the ideas as expressed by the author, the director would be unnecessary."

The above argument is forcibly put but we cannot fully agree with the assertions. Louis Reeves Harrison, in his talented way, made some statements recently on the same subject that appealed to us. There are directors and then again, there are directors. Some claim that they cannot put on a script that does not "appeal" to them. Mr. Harrison cites the newspaper reporter and his assignment and claims that these craftsmen work up an assignment to the very best of their ability, whether it "appeals" or not.

The gospel truth. The writer has held down the city desk in his time, and the reporter or special writer who refused to cover an assignment because it did not "appeal" to him would be laughed out of any city room. Undoubtedly, many good scripts that have passed the editor have been turned down by a too temperamental director. If a script is original, timely, technically correct and attractive, the director should go ahead with it whether it "appeals" or not. We know of several photoplay editors that are capable of putting over a script and getting out all there is in it. The time is coming when the "last word" will not entirely lie within the province of the moving picture stage director.

American Wants Scenarios

The American Film Manufacturing Company, Chicago, is in the market for a new batch of scenarios in addition to those produced by its staff of writers. Strong Western subjects will receive first consideration. Omer F. Doud, manager of publicity, has assumed the duties of scenario editor for the Chicago offices.

Kankakee, Ill.—Ed. Taron and Hector Valade have purchased a building and remodeled it into a moving picture show with a seating capacity of 800.

Perryopolis, Pa.—Harrington & Eggers have erected a moving picture theatre called the Pioneer.

Middletown, Md.—The Opera House opened under the proprietorship of Mr. S. M. Kefauver.

ATTENTION OF MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS

I wish to call attention to information I have received. I am informed that an Eastern firm has purchased a large number of condensing lenses from an Ohio manufacturing firm. These lenses, it is stated on good authority, were purchased for the sum of ten cents each and are to be sold for one dollar each.

Every exhibitor is notified that these condensers are defective; too much soda was used in their manufacture, and it is claimed that after they have been used a short time, the heat turns them gray and it is impossible to get a good picture, as the light will not go through.

I advise all motion picture exhibitors when buying condensers to secure a guarantee that they will hold their color. This is only one of the many things the exhibitors outside of our organization should know.

Very respectfully yours,
M. A. NEFF,
President, M. P. E. L. of A.

WEST VIRGINIA CONVENTION OF EXHIBITORS

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of West Virginia met in Huntington, W. Va., at the Carnegie Library Hall at 2 p m., on May 1, 1912, where they held a convention and transacted a large amount of business.

The meeting was called to order by the state president, M. M. Weir, of the Colonial Hotel, Charleston, W. Va., who introduced the national president, M. A. Neff, who addressed the convention. Mr. Neff advised the elimination of immoral or suggestive pictures and explained the necessity of more educational pictures and more clean comedy. He dwelt upon the importance of an organization and the co-operation of all motion picture exhibitors. His address was enthusiastically applauded.

In the evening feature pictures and high class vaudeville was given to entertain the visiting delegates. On May 2d the delegates again met at the Carnegie Library Hall at eleven o'clock, where they transacted much important business. Members were present from all over the state and a large number of new members were taken into the organization. When the convention met at Huntington there was only one exhibitor, Mr. E. W. Waugh, who belonged to the League. Now every exhibitor in Huntington is a member of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. They quickly fell in line after meeting the large number of exhibitors present and having the aims and objects of the organization explained to them.

The organization in West Virginia is growing very rapidly. On the evening of May 2d the Reliance representative, Mr Cobb; the Gaumont Company's representative Mr Kenny; and Mr. Griffin, who exhibited the Standard machine, were present and exhibited a large number of pictures that have not been released as yet.

A large number of letters had been sent out to all the preachers of Huntington and the teachers, giving them a special invitation to attend the evening entertainment at Carnegie Hall. The invitation was accepted by a large number Mr. Neff addressed the meeting on the future and educational features of cinematography. It was a splendid entertainment and will have good effect, as many of those who attended the lecture and saw the pictures had never been in a picture show but became enthusiastic and are now friendly, whereas heretofore they had been doubtful.

At 9:30 the members of the League and the members of their families met at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, where a sumptuous banquet was given. Speeches were made by M. A. Neff, M. M. Weir, L. R. Thomas, E. W. Waugh, A. L. Cottrill, C. A. Johnson, D. B. Hagen, Mr. McCray, and others.

It is only a matter of time until every exhibitor in West Virginia will become a member of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League. Mr. G. M. Westley was secured to organize the state, and he immediately started out, going to Charleston, where he and Mr. Weir secured all the exhibitors in Charleston on Friday.

The State of Ohio is daily taking in new members and in the near future every eligible motion picture exhibitor

REPORT OF THE CONVENTION AT HUNTINGTON

A new Local Exhibitors' League was organized at Huntington, W. Va., Monday, May 6th, and the following officers were elected: Messrs. R. H. Karnes, of the Lyric Theatre, president; J. A. Burns, Grand Theatre, first vice-president; Mr. Ball, second vice-president; C. A. Johnson, It Theatre, secretary; and Haskel Atkins, Royal Theatre, treasurer. Mr. A. J. Wellman, of Catlettsburg, Ky., was made an honorary member of the Local. The Local starts out with bright prospects with every exhibitor in Hunting as a member.

The Cincinnati theatres all seem to be doing a good business. M. A. Neff, chairman of the committee, elected to write a new code governing picture shows for the city of Cincinnati, reports that the committee will be ready to submit the new code next week.

Orene Parker, of Covington, Ky., will call a meeting of the local exhibitors of Covington and Newport, together for the purpose of organizing a local in those two towns.

The report comes from Toledo Local No. 3 that big preparations are being made to entertain the Motion Picture Exhibitors of Ohio on the 16th and 17th of July, 1912, at their state convention.

The national convention, to be held at Chicago beginning the 13th of next August, will eclipse all previous efforts, and it is expected that not less than four or five thousand exhibitors will attend the convention, and preparations are being made accordingly.

Headquarters for the Pennsylvania state convention, which will be held in Pittsburg, Pa., on the 24th and 25th of June, have been established at the Monongahela House. Mr. T. J. Barbin, secretary, Millvale, Pa., states that the business men of Pittsburgh are joining in with the motion picture exhibitors to make the Pennsylvania convention a grand success, and it is claimed that if the Chicago convention surpasses Pittsburgh in attendance and entertainments, it will have to go some.

EDUCATIONAL FILMS

It was our pleasure to see at the Eden Musee on Wednesday, May 1st, one of the most delightful exhibitions of educational films it has been our province to see brought together under one roof for a very long period. It took us back to the early days of cinematography, when it was looked upon as being one of the scientific advancements of the age, before it got into the hands of what we might term, common showmen, and became prostituted to a money-getting and grabbing proposition.

When we looked around at the audience assembled at the Musee and saw among them gentlemen of note in the educational field of New York City—professors, doctors of the universities and high schools, including a number of the lesser lights of the profession of teaching, we were indeed glad, and felt that it was one of the steps in the advancement of the art of cinematography. We also saw among the audience, some there just out of curiosity to see how an educational program could be produced, and some of those who came to scoff remained to praise.

Among the items of the program were seen some beautiful films taken from the stock of Charles Urban Science Series: "The Growth of Flowers," "The Evolution of the Chicken from the Egg," "Caterpillars, Moths, Butterflies and Others." Pathe Freres—a beautiful trip on the Ganges, showing the world-renowned Ghats and scenes of Indian life. From some of the foreign producers were trips through the prominent parts of Italy, etc., the whole comprising one of the most delightful two hours' exhibition it is possible to put upon a screen. The encomiums of praise meted out by the audience at the close was well earned. One prominent professor said that he had always been opposed to moving pictures, but after this he could do nothing else but patronize them whenever he had an opportunity.

The work being done by Rich G. Hollaman in the interests of educational advancement is beyond compare. We know, as we prophesied ten years ago, there is a wonderful advancement in the art, and educational films will ultimately hold the field over such silly, idiotic, Western pictures as are being turned out by members of the Trust and Independents.

THANHOUSER'S INTERPRETATION OF H. RIDER HAGGARD'S "JESS"

Equalling in conception though vastly different in character of theme from H. Rider Haggard's "She," comes a magnificent interpretation in picture form of the same author's book entitled "Jess," in two reels, which is for release May 28th.

"Jess" is a splendid story of self-sacrifice and heroism. It is identical with that of the rebellion which freed the Transvaal from British rule. Its sentiment, as interpreted by Thanhouser, is individual, allowing the story its full flow of human interest rather than dabbling with national politics.

The atmosphere and situations adopted are most appropriate and intense. Each situation of the story is made absolutely the most of. The most admirable work has been done in this production by Miss Marguerite Snow and Miss Flo La Badie.

The story of Jess centers around Silas Croft, a kind old Englishman who, living upon a farm in South Africa, has taken upon himself the care of his two nieces, whose father is a worthless character. Finding himself growing old, he advertises for a partner. The advertisement is answered by a handsome young English gentleman, Neil Croft by name. Jess, the elder of the two girls, falls secretly in love with Neil Croft, but finding that her sister is also in love with him, and seeing that in order to secure her own happiness she must necessarily ruin her sister's, she determines to make the sacrifice, and goes to visit a school friend. While she is away, Jess receives word that her sister and Neil are engaged.

Meantime, the rebellion commences, and Neil is sent to bring Jess home. A miserable cad who is one of the leaders of the revolt, and who has been suing for Bessie, the younger sister's hand, while pretending to arrange a safe passage for Jess and Neil, turns traitor, and allows the Boers to open fire on them when they are in the middle of the river, crossing over.

Here an intensely exciting scene ensues, where a most narrow escape must have been made in reality by the actors when the wagon in which they were sitting was capsized in the stream. The two are separated. Jess reaches home first, to find their dwelling destroyed by fire and her old uncle sentenced to die at dawn. She creeps in upon the traitor, Muller, who, awaking and finding her there bending over him, thinks her a visitation from beyond. He follows her out across the plains in a daze and eventually falls over a cliff and is killed. Jess coming across Neil lying asleep on the rocks, falls dead across his body. Neil carries Jess home to her grief-stricken friends. Neil and Bess are wed and live happily afterward in an English home.

VICTORGRAPH FILM COMPANY COMMENCES RELEASES THIS WEEK

The Victorgraph Film Company, of Brooklyn, are announcing their first releases, "Too Much Suffragette" and "A Stranger in the West." The former is a very funny comedy and made a hit at Weber's Theatre, Broadway and Twenty-ninth street, New York, where it was shown for the first time, and the Western film is unique, embodying entirely new features.

A thrilling scene is where the hero, shot by a Mexican outlaw, falls headlong from his horse, landing flat on his back. Both films are winners.

The Victorgraph Company, of which N. C. Travis is president and Louis De Lorne is treasurer, are located at 152 Berriman street, Brooklyn, and have an up-to-date plant. They have their own lighting outfit, consisting of two kerosene engines and dynamos, one for the studio lights and one for the plant proper.

The developing, printing, drying and assembling rooms are completely equipped and the studio is large and well lighted. The concern has several releases coming.

THE CLOWN'S TRIUMPH

Imp Drama Release of May 23, 1912.

This is a story which is reminiscent of the pathos and tragedy of stage life. It is that of a clown who befriends a girl waif and takes something of a heart interest in her. As time goes on he is grieved to perceive that she is inclined towards a man on a higher social plane than himself.

The clown prospers, getting the opportunity of his career when another clown falls ill. There is to be a command performance before the King of England and the President of the French Republic, in London. Our clown, Ravelle, is sent for and scores a tremendous stage triumph before the distinguished audience.

Bouquets are handed to him on the stage and among them is a note from his girl protege who is very ill, and who regrets her coldness towards him. Ravelle hurries off to her bedside. She is at the crisis of her sickness, but she takes a turn for the better and when she regains consciousness is reconciled to her faithful clown.

The producer of this charming story, Mr. Robert Brenon, also plays the part of the good natured clown and infuses into it real feeling and conviction. Mr. Brenon comes of a very well known theatrical family and, consequently, his stage pictures have all the stamp of truth.

There is a theatre scene in this picture; an English harlequinade; and other phases of stage life which will immensely please any moving picture audience.

Vivian Prescott plays the part of the clown's protege. The production is exceptionally good and clever.

CLAPHAM SET OF TITANIC SLIDES A COMPLETE ONE

A. J. Clapham, who manufactures art slides at 130 West Thirty-seventh street, New York, has one of the most complete and interesting set of Titanic disaster slides on the market, all having been made from original photographs copyrighted by the National News Association, and therefore authentic. Besides showing a photograph of the ship preceding the disaster and scenes following the sinking of the vessel, Mr. Clapham obtained from a scientist an accurate drawing of an iceberg showing the proportion submerged, thereby giving the spectator an idea of the consistency of bergs. The set is accompanied by a comprehensive lecture.

KINEMACOLOR

Society Folk, comprising the elect of the Newport, New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago and Montreal 400—disporting upon the beaches and in the breakers at Palm Beach and St. Augustine, riding and driving, in the tennis courts, and upon the lawns and golf-links at Virginia Hot Springs, is the true-to-life series of Kinemacolor pictures which will be the new feature which will lend contrast to "The Durbar" presentation at the Garden Theatre for the current week. In many instances the individual subjects posed democratically and unconventionally for the color camera, with highly realistic results. Among the notables caught in the bathing scenes are, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt and her two daughters, Mrs. Reginald Vanderbilt, Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Dodge, Mr. and Mrs. Fitler, Mrs. Robt. Goelet, Mrs. Craig Biddle, Mrs. C. H. Eddy, Mr. and Mrs. Baldwin, Mr. Harry Black, Hon. W. J. ("Fingey") Connors; C. V. Brokaw and family party; the Whitney family, Mayor Fitzgerald of Boston, Miss Millspaugh, Hugh Inman, Mrs. Hall and Mr. Larry Waterbury. Other well known pleasure seekers are, A. Donovan and Mayor Fitzgerald's brother, of Boston; Bradley Campbell, Cincinnati; Charles Bingham and John Jordan and family, of Buffalo; John Nelson, Minneapolis; such tennis experts as A. Dabney, J. Reece, P. D. Siverd, J. R. Hyde and H. J. Rindle, Dr. Harbon of Washington, Mr. and Mrs. Chauncey Olcott, and the Hon. Richard Croker and Dr. Kennedy of Dublin. Daily popular price matinees will still prevail.

OUR WESTERN CORRESPONDENT.

Hot Springs, Ark., May 8.—If there was any doubt that the summer season was not upon us it was dispelled this week when Doc Owens, manager of Whittington park, entered the local newspaper offices, let out a yell for copy paper and demanded to know the best bargain prices for summer advertising, and after he had received the necessary information proceeded to write great display "ads" and call attention to the park's annual welcome to the tired and weary populace of this resort.

The street railway company didn't expect many out the first night, for the reason that there was every indication that it would rain, and the people fooled 'em. They came in droves, hanging on the side of cars like an insurance agent after a policy (and there's been one hanging on my side, first one then the other, for the past two weeks, so I know whereof I speak) and the result was the car was crowded and the park was crowded and the management then proceeded to crowd a little of the joy of living into those present.

I have visited the park many times but I can't recall any previous visitation when this popular place of amusement looked more inviting or attractive. The popular little manager certainly handed us a most pleasant surprise. To begin with, it was as clean as a new coined dollar, and the many improvements that he had added during the winter months enhanced its value. The big theatre was cool and inviting and the patrons to the park saw something that was a most pleasant surprise, an exceptionally good vaudeville and picture show—free.

"I am a firm believer in moving pictures as being the greatest source of entertainment and the one thing calculated to give the greatest general satisfaction," said Mr. Owens to me, "and the reels that we run at the park this summer will be right up to the minute. No old commercial stuff for our theatre."

Each night during the week the park has been crowded and we don't care now how hot it gets.

It won't be long before workmen are busy tearing down the big United States Hotel, in which the Lyric theatre is located and where the city's latest creation in the line of theatres and airdomes, a combination that will be hard to beat, will be erected. The plans for this theatre were first made known several months ago, but little was said about them at that time, for the reason that a great deal depended on how the recent primary would turn out. Had the reform ticket been elected there would have been no theatre, for the reason that it is the hope of the managers of the new enterprise, in the not far distant future, to give Sunday shows, and at present this is entirely out of the question.

The reform ticket went down to defeat, so the plans for the new playhouse will be carried out, and I understand that some twenty thousand good American dollars will be put into the enterprise. The Lyric at present is booking through the Hodkins circuit, and it is necessary to keep the house going so as not to lose the bookings, so Harry Hale has arranged to take over the summer theatre at Whittington park, where he will conduct his vaudeville shows, a la Lyrics method, until the new house is completed. He hopes to be back in the new theatre by the time the new administration goes into office, and when that time comes this old burg will be "right" in more ways than one.

I also hear some rumors of another theatre and roof garden, a regular Hippodrome, in fact, that may be materialized out of the present gigantic skating rink. That this would prove a good business venture I would not state, although the location could be worse and the building is certainly large enough to accommodate those who want to gather there. Skating never made much of a hit here, and the one question that those who are considering the proposition would have to figure on would be competition, which at present is a most important factor.

Isn't it funny what morbid curiosity will do to box office receipts. Take the sinking of the Titanic as an example. The Princess last week showed a series of slides, some fourteen in number. There wasn't much to them, but they drew the greatest business in the history of the house. The first show hundreds were turned away, and the second night was greater than when the slides first appeared. Over at the Auditorium, where Homer's beautiful poem was being thrown on the screen, a picture that was a masterpiece in every way, there was eight dollars in the house. Fine prospects, isn't it, while at the Princess the theatre wasn't large enough to accommodate the crowd. For the benefit of managers who contemplate booking the Titanic slides I want to offer this suggestion: Get some man who can talk them, for unless there is a good explanation with each slide, with a few sobs and tears thrown in at the finish, they are going to fall flat as a pancake. Here they went great and were a big feature of an exceptionally good show. They closed the bill.

The New Central put one over this week when it booked the Kalem military feature, "War's Havoc," and as the picture ran three days a great business was the result. It was advertised extensively and the press agent came out in one of the local papers with big headlines stating that "Two Engines Crash On High Bridge." The people read the article and way down in the "thriller" they learned that this could be seen at the New Central theatre in motion picture.

"The Margrave's Daughter" was one of the best Independent films here in weeks and the Photo Play did a great business with this worthy feature.

Selig also sent us a very apt animal creation, "The Lion and the New Woman," and I'll say this for Selig this class of pictures are a big hit in Hot Springs.

THE MAN IN THE BATHS.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

A new motion picture concern in the capital City is the Nokes Special Film Producing Company, of which R. A. Nokes and Mr. Dikeman are the organizers. Mr. Nokes will be remembered for his wonderful performing fleas which have been traveling on exhibition over the country. He is a man of great mechanical mind and has made many improvements in microscopic instruments. He is at present at work on an invention which will add both pleasure and wonder to the public. Sig. G. Boernstein, the well known camera man, has recently become associated with this concern, giving chief attention to the motion picture end. This concern will specialize in micro-cinematography, for which class of work Mr. Nokes with his personally designed instruments is excellently adapted. There should be an encouraging field for such films in the capital of the nation.

The Imperial has changed its class of amusement from comic opera to vaudeville and picture at 5 and 10 cents admission. The time for these specialties alternate the picture hours being at the first price and the vaudeville at the higher price. This is something of a new departure for a playhouse here. The Imperial is showing from four to six first-run motion pictures, changed daily. It is using the Independent service. Mr. Kirbie, who also runs The Casino, a small vaudeville houses of much popularity, is the manager of the Imperial.

Mme. Bernhardt in "Camille" and Mme. Rejane in "Sans Gene" are booked to appear at the Columbia Theatre. This has created quite a stir in literary and artistic circles, as well as those who attend only "the first class and highest priced attractions." When Bernhardt appeared here last winter, seats in the "peanut gallery" were $2.00. On this coming occasion, 50 cents will be the highest price for the combined performances of "Camille" and "Sans Gene." Of course we will be denied the wonderful charm of Bernhardt's voice, and that of Mme. Rejane as well.

The recent appearance of the Durbar pictures in Kinemacolor were highly enjoyed. As the performances were given for the Christ Child Society, a noticeable number of prominent society people were in the audience, some of them being introduced for the first time to motion pictures. The wonder of the process and the gorgeous beauty of the pictures called forth lavish compliments of praise.

"Brickbats and Bouquets," with the compliments of the Imp Company, has been received in Washington. It certainly shows an enterprising spirit on the part of Carl Laemmle to give to the industry this benefit of personal investigation in "the motion picture and the public." It should serve as an assistance to exhibitor and exchange. From a hasty perusal of "Brickbats and Bouquets," the knocks appear greatly in the minority.

A recent change at the Plaza is Guy Barrett as manager, succeeding Mr. Parsons, who is now in Baltimore.

Every picture of any description dealing with the Titanic has been eagerly sought by the public here. The local camera men of the Gaumont and Pathe weeklies have an excellent opportunity of catching some personalities of those connected with the investigation now going on here of the Titanic disaster.

Lee Crandall, manager of the Feature Film Company, has returned from a trip to New York, where he had pleasant chats with many associated with the motion picture industry there. Mr. Crandall opened his air-dome, La Grand, on May 1. This has the reputation of being the cleanest, most artistic and most inviting picture park in the city. It's the only way to get your patronage and keep it," declared Mr. Crandall. It would be well if some of the other air-domes would take pattern after La Grand during the coming Summer.

The Parent-Teacher Association is a recent organization in a section of Washington, which is interesting in a Saturday matinee exhibition of motion pictures itself for school children. These are of an educational order and several of the theatres here are giving assistance in the movement.

War's Havoc had a big run at the Colonial.

The frequenters of the Independent houses express regret at the recent death of Mace Greenleaf, whose art in character portrayal in the Reliance and Solax companies had won for him high praise.

The recent appearance of Sarah Bernhardt in the two-reel production of "Camille" was heartily welcomed in the Capital City. The great actress was applauded when introduced at the beginning and at the conclusion of each part. It is recognized by theatre-goers that "Camille" does not lend itself advantageously to the camera, for, robbed of its poetic and passionate words, this drama has lost much of its essential essence; and besides, Bernhardt's voice is more than half the soul of her art. However, the Divine Sarah presented more action than many thought her vitality was capable of, and she has succeeded in immortalizing both herself and "Camille."

As a photoplay, "Mme. Sans Gene" with Mme. Réjane in the title role, pleased the audience better. This is more adaptable to motion pictures, as it gives ample scope for action. The spectators disregarded the rule of silence at such performances and laughed spontaneously when occasion demanded. Mme. Réjane certainly captured the Washington public.

The entire casts of the two dramas deserve commendation, especially that of "Sans Gene," which strengthened the belief that no one can be a Frenchman like a Frenchman himself. The photography was exquisite, while the full length given to all figures added much to the beauty of the scenes. It is exhibitions like this that the picture plays of the future will be.

Jacob Genter, inventor and manufacturer of the mirroroid moving picture curtain, has completed a patent motor to be used in showing moving pictures. The arrangement does away with the necessity of a man having to turn the reel of films by hand. The machine is arranged so that either one of 8 reels of pictures can be applied and shown in consecutive order without stopping the motor to change reels, as is now the practice.

The motor is controlled by two push buttons, one to start and one to stop the machine.

Mr. Genter has orders for five of these motors to be built at once. One is for the Hammerstein Victoria Theatre in New York.

The work of building the motor will be done in Mr. Genter's curtain factory and when going thoroughly will require from eight to ten skilled electricians.

It is interesting to know that in Atlanta, Ga., it is possible for the manager of a 5-cent moving picture theatre to pay the sum of $30,000 per year as rental for a theatre. This is however, the case with the American Theatre in the Whitehall section, which has been leased under contract for a period of six years.

LOSING TIME

To lose time in any other than a figurative sense savors of the improbable, illogical and fanciful. To escape from the relentless yoke of the years, to skip away from time and live without heeding the transient yet eternal message of the months, is an experience thrilling and unusual enough to celebrate with a moving picture.

So that's what the Rex Motion Picture Manufacturing Company have done in "Lost Years," an unusual and film-epoch-making release of Thursday, May 16th. And they've done it as only they can do unusual things. The plot thickens and quickens with every foot, and every foot is a feat.

First of all, he loved her, but he was already wedded to the sea; he was a naval officer—and naval officers' duties and desires don't always coincide. A few days before the date of the wedding, he was commissioned to go abroad on a secret assignment, so the happy, longed-for event was postponed.

On his return trip he sent a wireless to his fiancee, advising her he would be home on the following Thursday, at two o'clock, and hinting that it would not be entirely objectionable to him if she were ready for the big occasion at that time. You can picture the happy excitement and delightful frenzy at the girl's home. Rex did!

Then fate and disaster. The ship sank, and the report had it that all on board perished. The girl, waiting in her bridal gown, heard the newsboys cry the dismal dispatch, and in a paroxysm of grief and despair, she lost her tortured, tottering senses.

There was one thought and one spark of intelligence still left on her sterile mind—the thought that he would be there at two o'clock. And every day she dressed in her bridal gown, waiting for the clock to strike the sound for sweeter bells. But her parents, fearful for the consequences should two o'clock come and go, turned the clock back. It was never two o'clock; he was never late; she never knew. But the months had passed hundreds of two o'clocks, and the years died.

The man, the sole survivor of the fated ship, had found his way on a raft to a desolate little island in the South Seas, and lived a sorrowful, solitary existence, hoping, despairing, praying, cursing, but with always a lingering longing that a ship might pass and rescue him. He threw cocoanuts into the sea, with a message of his identity and his whereabouts, in the fond, vain hope that a passing vessel might pick them up.

After dreary years this hope was realized, and he was rescued and brought home. At two o'clock he met his waiting bride, and yesterday was the present. The girl went to his arms and his lips, and ten years ago was now.

"Lost Years" is the kind of picture that makes "masterpiece" sound weak. The scene of the wireless room on board the hapless ship sending the hopeless C. Q. D., operated by a professional wireless operator, the startling scene of the blazing ship engulfed by the waves, the thrilling and tense realism of the Robinson-Crusoe existence on the desert island, the suggestive and compelling, convincing touch of real cocoanuts cast into the angry sea, all go to make this a picture that will be universally discussed and commended.

SPECIAL MESSENGER WITH WRECK PICTURES TO EUROPE

Animated Weekly Sends Western Union Man on Mauretania with Exclusive Film of the Titanic Disaster Incidents

As still another evidence of the Animated Weekly's determination to be ultra progressive, the Sales Company sent the Titanic Wreck Special by messenger aboard the Mauretania April 24th, bound for Fishguard.

The pictures, which have been playing to capacity houses at Weber's Theatre, New York, were the first shown in America; in fact, the only views incidental to the wreck that were taken. Europe, too, will see them shortly.

The package of films was placed in the hands of a special uniformed messenger. As soon as the steamer reaches Fishguard, he will board the train and proceed immediately to headquarters.

Within a day the Animated Weekly has sprung into world-wide demand. Exhibitors throughout the country are realizing the importance of this film and it is sought everywhere.

No expense is being spared to make the Weekly a record of current events wherever they happen.

Camera men were detailed this week to watch the homecoming of Harry Payne Whitney, who has been for some months seal hunting on the coast of Labrador. Another series soon to be shown are the building of the Pan-American Exposition in San Francisco, for which special exclusive rights were granted to the Weekly. Many prominent and interesting subjects taken in Europe are announced for new coming release in the Animated Weekly.

GOOD RESULTS FROM HALLBERG ECONOMIZERS BEAR FRUIT

King & Rosen, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., have just ordered from Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," one of the Hallberg A C to D C Economizers, which makes the third set for that city. Lyric Theatre, Waterbury, Conn., is installing Hallberg 220-volt D C Economizer. Thomas Lewers, Bensonhurst, L. I., bought of Hallberg two Simplex moving picture machines with Hallberg Cooper-Hewitt Mercury Arc Rectifier. Mr. Hallberg also reports sale of two Powers No. 6 moving picture machines to Charles P. Gilmore, Oswego, N. Y., and one Powers No. 6 to J. J. Ryan, Susquehanna, Pa.

Rochester, N. Y.—The Hippodrome Company, capitalized at $25,000, has filed a certificate of incorporation. Directors, M. H. Baker, D. N. Hyman and Josephine Thiel.

Cincinnati, Ohio.—Frenkel, Reilly & Bernardi will construct a motion picture house on the southeast corner of Ninth avenue and Baymiller street, at a cost of $75.000, and will have a seating capacity of 3,000.

THE CASHIER'S ORDEAL
(Champion)

In "The Cashier's Ordeal" the hero is really a chauffeur but not the central figure in the drama, which makes the story all the more interesting from its departure from the conventional. Bob McCoy runs a motor car for Jack Cummings, a cashier in a bank. Cummings loves the daughter of the bank president but his suit is frowned upon by the financier on account of Jack's lack of a plethoric bank account. The vice-president of the institution is a scoundrel at heart and he schemes to use the funds to further his own ends, and inveigles Cummings to embark with him on a proposition that looks good to the young lover. Bob takes his sweetheart out for a ride in his employer's motor and is discharged. The cashier finds himself on the verge of inevitable ruin and decides to take his own life in the solitude of his room, the scheme in which he expected to realize going wrong. Bob enters the house in the role of a burglar and arrives just in time to save his old employer from suicide, keeping him covered with a gun until morning. The sweetheart of the cashier enters the room with a newspaper which contains the announcement that the vice-president has committed suicide, after confessing his peculations, exonerating Jack from all blame. The project in which the bank officials had embarked proves to have been a fruitful one and Jack is rich. The finale can be imagined.

New York, N. Y.—Plans have been filed for a moving picture theatre on the southwest corner of Seventh avenue and 116th street for Robert Marvin.

FILM ORDINANCES SAME AS MAYOR APPROVED READY.

Proposed ordinances for the regulation of motion picture theatres, which were introduced in the Board of Aldermen by Alderman Ralph Folks, leader of the majority, were reported favorably by the Committee on Laws and Legislation, and will be up for passage at the meeting next week. These ordinances, with minor changes, are the same as presented by the special committee appointed by Mayor Gaynor after Raymond B. Fosdick, the Commissioner of Accounts, had made an exhaustive investigation of the subject.

Some of the salient features of the ordinances are:

Maximum seating capacity is increased from 300 to 600.

Strict requirements are laid down for the heating, ventilation, lighting, exit facilities and general sanitation of the theatres, and these requirements are made retroactive.

The introduction of stages is prohibited, thus doing away with cheap vaudeville.

The duty of maintaining the moral status of such places is placed upon the Mayor's Bureau of Licenses, and a corps of inspectors for the work is provided.

It is estimated that there are six hundred moving picture theatres in greater New York, with an average daily attendance of three hundred thousand, five times as many as attend the regular theatres.

"Legislation to regulate such places is thus of the greatest importance," said Alderman Folks. "At present there are no special laws to regulate the moving pictures in many respects.

"The provision increasing the maximum capacity to six hundred is of great importance, as the present limit is held accountable in many ways for the inferior character of many of the places in the city. Neither morally nor artistically can a good performance be given at a low price when the seating capacity is so small.

"Our ordinances would permit music, lectures or recitations in connection with the motion pictures, but would eliminate the vaudeville. The cheap vaudeville of these places is usually bad in the extreme.

"The ordinances establish practically a censorship by the administration to be used when conditions require. They do this by leaving with the Mayor the power to refuse, suspend or revoke licenses at his discretion and with no court review save on the ground of reasonableness. In this way the moral control of motion pictures would be much more complete than is the moral control of regular theatres, which are not subject to the arbitrary license revoking power of the Mayor."

There is a section in the ordinances which exempts educational and similar institutions from certain provisions, requiring, however, the inspection of the Bureau of Licenses and the issuance of a permit for such performances.

Everything in connection with the peculiar construction of motion picture halls is provided in the ordinances, and the proposed new building code does not interfere with these in any way.

Among the organizations that have indorsed the proposed ordinances are the Recreation Alliance, the City Club, the New York Association of Neighborhood Workers, the Brooklyn Association of Neighborhood Workers, the People's Institute, the East Side Local Needs Association and the Laity League of Social Service. It is believed that it will be passed by the Board of Aldermen and Mayor Gaynor will sign it, as he recently wrote to the board asking that it put the ordinances through at the earliest possible moment.

TRILBY

William A. Brady elsewhere issues a warning to picture houses against showing the film of "Trilby," announced for release by the Standard Theatre Film Company, of London. Mr. Brady owns the stage rights to "Trilby," and is protected by copyright in America. The work is not copyrighted in England, but Mr. Brady promises to vigorously prosecute any infringements in this country, and has notified the sentinels of the American Producing Managers' Association to keep watch for this film and prepare evidence wherever it may be exhibited.

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT RECOGNIZES WORTH OF WRECK PICTURES

Scenes Incident to Titanic Disaster Taken by the Animated Weekly to Be Filed in Congressional Library

Recognition of the worth of the Titanic wreck pictures taken by the Animated Weekly comes in substantial form. One reel will be filed in the Congressional Library, to be kept for all time. The offer was made to President Taft by the Sales Company, and the acceptance came a day or two later.

These pictures were taken at enormous expense by the Sales Company's Animated Weekly. Camera men were started in specially chartered tugs to the scene of the disaster, but were overtaken by wireless when news finally reached New York of the Titanic's sinking—the boats were then turned southward and met the steamer Carpathia, bound for New York. Many views of the rescue ship were taken. Another camera man at Halifax, Nova Scotia, took pictures of the funeral boat, Mackay-Bennett, as she started, coffin loaded, to pick up dead bodies. Other operators were at work in New York, snapping the crowds around the White Star offices and docks, and later the survivors, with life boats, etc., were taken. Different views of icebergs are also shown.

All in all, it is the most remarkable film the world has ever known, and from the fact of its being the only series of the disaster pictures taken, the film will become still more valuable as a memento in after years.

The Animated Weekly management is being warmly congratulated on the enterprise.

Courtland, N. Y.—J. F. McDonald has purchased the Pictorium of A. E. Wells.

West Hoboken, N. J.—The United States of America Motion Picture Mfg. Co. has been incorporated. The incorporators are Jos. Murphy, 18 Adelina Place, North Bergen, N. J.; H. B. Harris, 3845 Boulevard, North Bergen, N. J.; Chas J. Wilson, J. W. Harris, both of 15 W. 17th street, New York.

EXHIBITORS' NOTES

An organization of theatrical and moving picture managers of Dayton, whose sole function will be the distribution of funds to charity, has been incorporated under the name of the Gem City Charitable Association. The object of the association is to bring about the unrestricted operation of Sunday shows by splitting the profits with institutions for the needy. The incorporators say they expect to give away $10,000 annually if their plan meets with success.

The Eclair Moving Picture Company of America have almost finished a splendid new production entitled "The High Cost of Living." This film will be in two reels and will be released early in June. The subject is both unique and opportune and will be handled from both sides of the fence. It is really a satire on the present food conditions. This will be a splendid production upon which already one month of careful preparation and thought has been expended. Every exchange should book it and every exhibitor should see that it is included in his program.

The high cost of living is the poor man's problem. This film, if properly booked throughout the country, may serve to concentrate more intensely the public gaze and thought on the attitude of the greedy life-devouring trusts.

Imp has for release May 16th a startling production in "Lady Audley's secret." This film is full of thrills. The story is strong, if somewhat sensational. In this picture Jane Fernley, formerly of the Reliance Company, has done some of the finest work that this clever and beautiful actress has ever been known to do. The atmosphere surrounding the story is splendidly maintained, and the picture is rich in beautiful and appropriate settings. The most realistic fire scene that could be imagined happens at the close of the picture.

There are over 4,000 moving picture theatres in the British Isles, representing a capital of $5,000,000 and furnishing labor to 32,000 people. The daily attendance is figured to be close to 2,000,000.

THIS IS THE MAN

Everybody in the trade knows genial Tom Cochrane. He is too well known to all in the industry to need any introduction from us.

Our only reason in bringing him in at this period is to let his numerous friends in the industry know that he has received the appointment of manager of the producing end for the Kinemacolor Company of America. With his many friends in the industry we wish him every success in his new undertaking.

SUFFRAGETTES ENTHUSE OVER PICTURES MADE OF THEIR PARADE

Animated Weekly Scores Another Big Scoop on Big Turnout in New York

Fully five thousand women visited Weber's Theatre on Broadway, New York, May 8th. A feature of the program was the Suffragette parade taken on the Saturday previous. Among other views shown were the "Funeral of the Bandit Victims in Paris," a gigantic "Home Rule Demonstration in Belfast, Ireland," the "Socialistic Parade on May Day in New York," "Launching of the Torpedo Boat Destroyer Beale in Philadelphia," the "Dedication of the Bronze Tablet Given by France to the United States," also an interesting view of "Mons. Bleriot, the Famous Aviator," "A World's Championship Marathon Race," "A Party of Californians leaving San Francisco for Panama," and many other interesting scenes. The Animated Weekly is the most popular film on the market.

New York, May 9.—To the Trade: We wish to inform you that Mr. James A. Whitman is no longer in any way associated or connected with this company, either directly or indirectly, as an officer, director or stockholder.

Yours very truly,

UNITER STATES MARSHAL SEIZES FILM

A seizure of moving picture films representing scenes from "Purgatory" and "Paradise," chapters of Dante's great work, "The Divine Comedy," was made by United States Marshal Henkel Thursday at No. 124 West Houston street, New York under a writ obtained by Barnet Rosenburg and Nathan Drapkin, of the Superior Feature Film Company, in the United States District Court. The writ of seizure was issued in an action instituted in the United States District Court against the Savoy Film Exchange, No. 221 Sixth avenue., who conduct an agency for the leasing of moving picture films.

The Superior Feature Film Company, the complainants in the suit, in the papers filed by their attorney, Nathan Burkan, of No. 165 Broadway, with the court, allege that they own the American copyright in the moving picture films of "Purgatory" and "Paradise," which were made by the Helios Company and the Psyche Company at a cost of $30,000. In order to produce this film, authors, painters, sculptors and actors were engaged, and complete scenic productions were organized and each scene was staged with the proper settings, costumes, lighting and other effects and all the appropriate accessories. Film photographs of the several scenes were then taken in such manner that their projection through moving picture apparatus will show the progress of Dante through the several stations and sections of "Purgatory" and "Paradise," and the characters he meets and his experiences in the changing scenes. It is claimed by the complainants that the Savoy Film Exchange obtained copies of these films, which were infringements of the copyright of Messrs. Rosenburg and Drapkin, who ask for perpetual injunction against the use of the infringing films, for the impounding and destruction of these infringing films and for damages.

Philadelphia, Pa.—Simon & Bassett are building a moving picture theatre on 84th street, south of Eastwick avenue.

Omaha, Neb.—Brandeis Brothers are to build a new theatre at 1514 Douglas street.

Baltimore, Md.—Frederick W. Schanze will construct a two-story concrete moving picture and vaudeville theatre at 2426 Pennsylvania avenue.

Camden, N. J.—Walter L. Fisher and Horace Leedom will open the Forrest Picture Parlor, 905 Market street.

New York, N. Y.—Plans have been filed for a one-story nickelette for the Mercury Realty Company on the east side of Southern Boulevard south of Westchester avenue.

Hailey, Idaho.—L. B. Shaefer will open a motion picture theatre in the Opera House building.

Peabody, Mass.—The new theatre on Main street has opened.

SOLAX HITS BROADWAY

At Weber's Theatre, the New Independent Motion Picture Theatre where first run pictures can be seen, Solax rang in as the feature of the evening on Friday, May 3d.

Madame Alice Blache, president of the Solax Company, with a number of her friends, occupied a box. Several prominent members of the Solax Stock Company were also there, including Edward Warren, director, and his assistant, Harry Harvey. Mr. Warren addressed the audience on behalf of the Solax Company, and Billy Quirk, Darwin Karr and Blanche Cornwall tickled the audience by appearing on the stage in person. Billy Quirk and Darwin Karr gave interesting accounts of their moving picture experience which brought down the house.

The program of Solaxes rans as follows: "The Sewer," in two reels, a very splendid effort, in which Darwin Karr has attracted much attention; "Falling Leaves," "The Reformation of Mary," "The Animated Bathtub" and "A Question of Hair."

The program was in all respects an excellent one and it can be truthfully said that Solax has made a tremendous hit on Broadway. As the audience dispersed small boys were conspicuous, jostling each other in efforts to be of service to their moving picture heroes. To the youngsters the Weber Theatre had been turned for the time into the scene of a fairy tale by the appearance in real life of the people who make the pictures.

LOUIS SANGER ENTERTAINS FRIENDS AT WEBER'S

Louis Sanger, one of the stockholders of the Kill Kare Amusement Company, operating the Weber Theatre at Broadway and Twenty-ninth street as a moving picture house, entertained Henry Blossom, the playwright and author of "Checkers" and "The Red Mill," and several others at a box party Tuesday night. An excellent program was provided by Manager Edward C. White.

Those present were: H. S. Harkness and wife, Henry Blossom and wife, E. Griffith and wife, E. Holbrook and wife, David Gaines and wife, J. D. Armstrong and wife, Mrs. Thurston, Mrs. De Velie, Mrs. J. P. Droulard, Miss Edna Grouver, Clark Pichard, Blair Frazer, Newton James and Louis Sanger.

THE GLORY OF LIGHT
Solax Release, May 22

A blind man, although in comfortable surroundings, suffers mental agony because of his affliction. His kind wife and little child try their hardest to make his life happy for him, but the young blind man continually broods over his misfortunes. While sitting on the steps of a public building—and all the world passes on, seemingly happy—God reveals to the blind man, in a vision, a side of life which makes the blind man satisfied with his lot.

The young man sees, instead of a patient and good wife, a veritable shrew, a woman who is mercenary and unwifely. She sends him out with curses to earn a living. He tries hard to find employment, but an uncharitable and commercial world is impatient with hts shoricomings. He comes back to his house and finds that he is dispossessed, while his wife upbraids him. He goes out again, and tries to steal some bread, but he is caught by a mob, and as the mob pounces on him, the blind man wakes up and finds that it is growing dark and that his good wife has come to take him home. He then thanks God, while his former mental agony is alleviated.

THE KNIGHT IN ARMOR
Solax Release, May 24

The father of an heiress has objections to Billy because he (the father) wants his daughter married to a man with a title and distinction. The father has Billy rudely ejected from the house while the favored suitor is encouraged.

Billy gets an idea. He steals a suit of armor from his sweetheart's parlor and dresses up in it. The armor happens to be an antique, with a marvelous lock. Billy locks himself in it and although he creates havoc with the household—here we get a demonstration of very entertaining trick work—he later finds that he cannot get out of his plated suit.

He is taken to a blacksmith and there at the forge his coat of steel is removed, not only in the presence of the people he has tormented, but also in the presence of his sweetheart and her father. The father has a sense of humor, and gives up his daughter to the man with imagination and nerve.

THE VIRTUOUS HORSE
Gaumont Release, June 6

Mr. Foot is terribly sick. The doctor has been summoned but there is grave fear felt that he never will reach him in time. Fate has decreed otherwise and the doctor makes his appearance, much to the relief of his prostrated patient. physician diagnoses his illness as an extreme case of general anæmia and prescribes plenty of rest and nourishing food, but total abstinence from salads and absinthe. The prescription proves very distasteful to the invalid who has not the least notion of following the doctor's advice.

Mr. Foot's horse, however, happens to read the prescription as it lays upon a table in the back yard and decides to guard his master most carefully. To this end he follows him into a restaurant and seeing that the patient is partaking of salad without further delay rushes up to the table and gobbles all the greens before Mr. Foot can partake of them. The vigilance of the horse next follows Mr. Foot into a cafe where he is about to sit down to a most tasteful glass of absinthe. The beast, however, not being able to get into the cafe decides to notify Mrs. Foot, whereupon wife and horse return to the cafe, single out their master and before he is able to take a sip drive him home where they can guard him most carefully.

HE GOT THE JOB
Gaumont Release, June 6

Eccentric Algernon is a character widely known throughout his town and is regarded as one huge joke. However, he takes it into his cranium that he is exactly suited in a position of cashier and consequently he applies for the position. The bank president fears to grant him so important a job, whereupon Algernon becomes highly incensed and decides to win the position by force or by trick. To this end he grabs the banker's pocketbook from the table, the member of the establishment in hot pursuit. Unseen by all he hides the valuable purse in the bottom of a hall hat rack and successfully makes his escape. The bank president is highly excited, his business for the day is killed and there is vital danger of him going into bankruptcy because of the lack of the large sums that this pocketbook contained. In order to avoid this shame, the bank official engages the services of Detective Herlock Sholmes, who starts out upon his commission immediately. Algernon in the meantime has been caught and landed into jail. Refusing, however, to reveal the location of the pocketbook Sholmes most astutely treats the prisoner with the utmost politeness commanding in a banquet. However, even after the 'enth glass of intoxicant Algernon refuses to disclose the information but does compromise to the following extent, namely, that if the sleuth procure a signed statement from the bank president to the effect that he give him the position of cashier he would then be only too pleased to produce the pocketbook. Of course, there is nothing for Sholmes or the bank director to do but to accept the offer of eccentric Algernon. The certificate is signed and Algernon then delivers the purse. The next day Detective Sholmes receives the payment for his services from the new cashier, none other but the eccentric Algernon.

CURFEW SHALL NOT RING TO-NIGHT
Reliance Release, May 29

The poem, "Curfew Shall Not Ring To-night," has been in existence for some thirty-odd years, and its beauty and the simple telling of heroism of a young girl, who, for the sake of the man she loved, and the deed she did, has become fireside talk almost in every household in the world.

This masterpiece has been recited by school children, at churches and entertainments, as one of the highest standards of literature, and the Reliance Company is making the poem into a life motion picture, feeling assured that it will meet with unqualified approval by the picture-loving public, and prove to be of that high class which will be accomplished to the extent of making it possible for the patrons of moving picture theaters to enjoy an entertainment as entirely satisfactory as any two-dollar attraction which may be produced by any theatrical manager.

The story of the picture is the story of the poem, therefore it is not necessary to outline it here. The only remaining thing is for the exhibitor to inform the public and to wait for this great release.

Attendance and receipts will tell their own story.

THE COUNTING OF TIME
Nestor Release, May 13

With equal chances for success, the brothers, Jack and Dick Conway, leave their country home to seek employment in the city. To the annoyance of Dick, Jack insists upon their taking rooms at a cheap boarding house, and at once starts out to find work. In answer to an advertisement, the brothers find work with an importing firm, but while Jack makes himself a favorite with all and rapidly advances Dick is soon discharged through his combativeness. At night Jack hurries off to night college, while Dick frequents the athletic club.

Some time later we see Jack studying law, while Dick is training to be a fighter, and still later Jack has been admitted to the bar and is pleading his first important case, while Dick is fighting his first championship fight. Jack loses and hurries home, to the same little room that he and his brother first engaged to study. Dick wins and with a merry party of friends enters a smart buffet and later the cafe, where he meets, for the first time, the class of women who frequent such places, and in the wee small hours he is brought home to his handsome bachelor apartments.

Later—we again see Jack pleading a case and this time he wins, while Dick, who is fighting to hold the championship, loses.

A year passes. Jack is a successful lawyer of whom Dick is forced from time to time to borrow money—dissipation has done its work and those who crowded around him but a year ago now pass him by with a curt nod. At last Jack writes to his father to come and take Dick home as his health is not of the best. Dick is finally forced to submit, so after years of wasted efforts, broken in health and spirits, Dick finds himself at the starting point.

THE SHERIFF'S ROUND-UP
Nestor Release, May 15

A private banker, J. C. Rodgers, is going out of business and, knowing that his cashier, Chester Byron, is anxious to go West and that the bank out West in which he is interested is in need of a new assistant cashier, he secures the position for him, so Chester Byron, with a letter of introduction to the president of the bank, starts out.

A notice of Byron's appointment as assistant cashier and the day that he is expected to arrive in the western town is printed in a local paper and it is brought to the attention of Allen Hayden. who resides in a neighboring town. With the aid of two Mexicans,

Joe and Pete, Hayden decides to meet Byron before he arrives by boarding the train a couple of stations below. He does this, giving Byron the following note: "This will introduce to you Mr. Clay Randall, our confidential clerk, who will meet you en route regarding a private business transaction," with the signature of the president of the bank attached to it. On the strength of this note, Byron alights at the next station with Hayden and accompanies him to Hayden's house. Here Byron is offered wine. The wine has been drugged, and as soon as Byron becomes unconscious, Hayden quickly appropriates the other's letter of introduction, etc., and leaves Byron in Pete's charge. Hayden goes to the bank, representing himself as Byron, and is soon, on account of his previous record, placed in full charge whenever the cashier is out. Finding the coast clear one afternoon, he closed the safe door without setting the time lock, so that, later, when he returned to the bank, "to do some extra work," as he told the watchman, it was an easy matter to open the door, take the currency in the safe and lock the door without exciting suspicion. Byron had, in the meanwhile, been kept a prisoner by the Mexicans.

On the night that Hayden decided upon robbing the bank, he sent Joe the following note: "Everything arranged for to-night. Have Pete with horses at Dell's corner 9 o'clock. Don't fail. Big haul. Will wait for you below Eagle Rock, Brush Canyon. Signal."

It was Joe's open delight that excited Byron to strike for liberty that very night. Something was afoot, he felt sure. Pretending to be ill, he staggered from his bed to the floor, and no sooner did Joe bend down to his aid than Byron jumped, and, taking the other wholly by surprise, obtained possession of Joe's revolver, and marched him outside, where, fortunately, he found the coast clear. As they reached the moonlit road, an automobile came along. Quickly Byron explained the situation to the driver, and soon Byron and his captive were speeding toward the sheriff's office. Here the sheriff decides that Joe should be taken to Eagle Rock to act as a decoy. Accordingly, the sheriff, his posse, Byron and Joe set out on horseback and some distance from the rendezvous, drew rein and Joe was commanded to give his signal, which was promptly answered by Hayden. Then, while the posse circled around, Joe was forced to advance on foot to where Hayden was waiting, so that almost before his suspicions were aroused, the sheriff and his men had closed in upon the bank robber and his accomplice. Hayden and the Mexicans were taken into custody by the sheriff while Byron entered upon his career as assistant cashier.

CUPID'S VICTORY
Nestor Release, May 18

While on a visit to Brownsville, May Richley meets and falls in love with Bob Mayfield, a young country lawyer. They become engaged, and on May leaving for the city, Bob promises to call to meet her folks.

Bob calls; but Mr. Richley absolutely refuses to have him for a son-in-law, and Bob is politely shown the door.

Back in Brownsville, Bob accepts the invitation of the old Justice of the Peace to take his judicial post during the latter's week vacation.

May's father, a gay old boy, goes on a grand joy-ride with a friend and two chorus girls. They reach Brownsville while an open-air election meeting is in progress, and run into the platform with their car, breaking up the meeting and getting themselves arrested. The Justice is sent for. Bob arrives, and Mr. Richley does his cleverest to get frindly with the young Justice, but without success. Bob passes a note to the old man which reads: "If I can have May, put up your right hand, and you all go free on suspended sentence; if not, it's three months for you all."

When Bob calls on May the following day, he is again ordered out; this time by May's mother. Father, however, sings Bob's praises, and inveigles her out of the room, leaving the young people alone. May's feminine bump of inquisitiveness is finely developed, and Bob is obliged to make good use of his legal training to sidestep the issue. He gets the girl without having to divulge papa's little escapade.

ESTUDILLO HOUSE, CAL.

This very interesting scenic shows the marriage place of Ramona as it is to-day. "Ramona," as most book-lovers know, is the heroine of the great American novel of that name. Estudillo House is where Father Gaspara married Ramona to Alessadro, for whom Ramona had left her beautiful home to wander from town to town, happy in her great love for the handsome Indian. Beautiful views of the garden, grape arbor, wishing well, and temporary abode of Ramona are also shown, together with kitchen, oven and cart, so vividly described in the book.

A STRANGER IN THE WEST
Victograph Film Co., Release May 14

Jack Rudd arrives out West to inspect some land owned by Mr. Young. On his way to Mr. Young's house he is in time to protect a young girl from a Greaser's unwelcome declaration of love. He has a struggle with the Greaser, and knocks him down. The girl thanks the stranger and goes on her way, while the Greaser gets up from the ground and vows vengeance. Jack reaches the house and is introduced to May, Mr. Young's daughter, who, it happens, is the girl he saved from the Greaser's advances. Both are favorably impressed with each other. Later they leave the house together on horseback and are followed closely behind by the Greaser. May leaves Jack and starts for home, while he continues on his way to town. The Greaser in the meantime dismounts and takes aim at Jack, who is riding at full speed. He fires, and Jack falls off his horse into the roadway, where he lies unconscious. May, hearing the shot, rides back, and is just in time to see the Greaser riding up the road. She rides back to the house and informs the cowboys, who proceed to follow the Greaser. After a long chase the cowboys surround him, and one of them throws a rope and lassoes the Greaser. They then tell him to get out of the country, which he immediately starts to do, the cowboys firing at his feet as he runs. May and her father, in the meantime, have carried Jack to the house, where it is found he is only slightly wounded. He asks Mr. Young's consent to marry May; it is given, and May and Jack embrace.

TOO MUCH SUFFRAGETTE
Victorgraph Film Co., Release —— —

Mr. Smith's wife and cook are both suffragettes, and he is chosen by them to lead the Woman Suffrage Parade. He objects, but his wife insists, and keeps an umbrella suspended over his head so he will obey all instructions. Much to his discomfort, he leads the parade to a hall, which the suffragettes enter. He is forbidden admittance by his wife, who tells him to wait outside for her. While standing outside he carries on a flirtation with a girl and takes her to a roadhouse to dine. Later he returns to his house, and not finding his wife there he leaves a note telling her he is going to commit suicide. In the meantime, the suffragtte metting has been interrupted by a rat and all the women start for their homes. Mrs. Smith reaches home, finds her husband's note and faints. He, however, changes his mind about committing suicide, and forms a conspiracy with a policeman. They return to his home—the plan works, and Mrs. Smith decides to let the suffragette question alone, thereby adding to her husband's domestic happiness.

A CAVE MAN WOOING
Imp Release, May 20

George, our hero, falls in love with Clarice, a fascinating young girl of an athletic turn of mind. There is a rival in the field, however, one who would attract any women—a manly man, while poor George is a weakling, consequently he is decidedly out of it in the race for her hand.

At this time he reads in an article published in the papers by a famous authoress that women like cave man methods to-day, just as they did hundreds of years ago. This is a tip which he promptly takes advantage of.

He joins a class in physical culture and after many amusing and exciting experiences he finally accomplishes the end in view and becomes indeed a giant in strength. His friends and family and especially Clarice look on in amazement at the wonderful acts of strength he performs, and when at the end of the evening's surprises he picks up the unresisting girl and bears her off to a clergyman's house to be married the climax is reached.

Of course, when Clarice realizes what it all means, she does not submit passively, but such struggles are apparently unnoticed by the strong man. His destination being reached, the marriage ceremony is performed. Just then the girl knows she does care very much indeed for George and when there intrudes upon them her entire family she is indignant, and peremptorily commands them to depart; this they do forthwith, leaving the husband and wife alone in their new found happiness.

This is an unique comedy with King Baggot in the title role, and will appeal to all classes of picture fans, in virtue of its many amusing incidents besides being exceedingly well acted.

THE MAID'S STRATEGEM
Imp Release, May 25

Bridget Kelly is a very pretty Irish girl, accomplished and with a good education. She is maid to Mrs. Warner, an arrogant society woman, who is hated by all her servants.

The widow receives an invitation to a big society affair at which the governor of the state will receive, but as she is hurriedly called away by the illness of her mother she finds it impossible to attend.

Bridget desires to shine as a lady and feels that she can hold her own with any of them. She forges her mistress' name to a letter, stating that she is unable to be present, but that she is sending her niece to represent her. Bridget dons one of Mrs. Warner's gowns and attends the reception. Owing to her wit, beauty and musical accomplishments she made a decided hit. A young millionaire falls in love with her, and begs permission to call. This is granted.

Meanwhile, word is received from Mrs. Warner that all the servants are to be discharged. Before this is done, however, they agree that Bridget shall invite her friend to dinner, so they may see for themselves how well she can play the lady. This dinner promises to be a great success, but in the midst of it, to their consternation, the real mistress arrives. All the servants make a hasty retreat and leave Bridget to her fate.

Mrs. Warner denounces the girl as an imposter, but the young fellow being really in love with Bridget for herself and not her social standing proposes marriage and to Mrs. Warner's great surprise Bridget tearfully accepts. On the same reel:

VIEWS OF LOS ANGELES, CAL.

Los Angeles, Cal., is counted one of the most beautiful and progressive cities in the United States. It is fortunate in its situation, being near the Pacific and under the shadow of picturesque mountain ranges.

The picture gives a very good idea of the architectural and commercial features of the city and in panoramic form shows the beautiful residential environment. It also includes views on an ostrich farm, together with pictures of alligators on a farm devoted to the propagation of amphibians.

This film of Los Angeles should be of interest to all moving picture fans as a vast amount of moving picture making is accomplished in Los Angeles and vicinity by the various moving picture companies who have branch studios there.

THE CLOWN'S TRIUMPH
Imp Release, May 23

Ravelle, a clown with a traveling circus, is in love with Mimi, the columbine, and she with him, hut in an indiscreet moment she accepts an invitation to dinner from a gallant attending a performance. Ravelle thinks she is unfaithful and when she returns after an innocent evening's amusement he drives her away.

Penniless, Mimi wends her way along the lonely country road until, tired, she is given a lift by an old vegetable woman, who takes her to London in the wagon. There she finds a home with a fellow circus woman, and through her meets a theatrical manager who gives her an engagement at the Theatre Royal.

One night Bert Grimaldi, the famous clown, meets with an accident, and it looks as though there will be no perfomance that night. All is confusion. The manager rushes from the theatre in search of a substitute and to his delight discovers the traveling circus wagon of which Ravelle is a member. He rushes up to the clown, drags him into the dressing room and forces him on the stage. Ravelle makes a tremendous hit. Suddenly he comes face to face with the woman whom he thinks has wronged him. She leaves the stage and sobbing goes to her dressing room, where she writes Ravelle a note, and then vanishes. Ravelle on receiving it goes in search of her, but his quest is in vain.

The little actress falls ill and by chance Ravelle learns that her life is in danger. He tries to see her, but the doctor forbids this. Mimi gets sufficient strength to write, as she thinks, a farewell note, sending him a little bunch of roses. These he receives with many other floral offerings as he perfoms before the King of England and the President of Francc, and amid the plaudits of his public rushes from the theatre to the bedside of his sweetheart.

A new joy comes into her life as she sees him by her side. The crisis has passed. Mimi and Ravelle are reunited and two lives made happy again.

MRS. ALDEN'S AWAKENING
Champion Release, May 22

Mrs. Alden, a society leader, is so much taken up with club work, social gatherings, etc., that she devotes very little time to her home life. She is the mother of a son of twenty-two, and a little daughter of six. One day she realized that the colored mammy who has been in her service for years is incapable of teaching her young daughter as she should be taught. She is discharged and an advertisement inserted for a governess who speaks French and plays the piano. Her son has quarreled with her about the neglect of the child and after a heated argument Mrs. Alden orders her son from the house.

Jack takes up his abode in a respectable boarding house where he meets May Moore, a poor girl. They see the ad for governess and Jack persuades May to apply. She does so and secures the position. Mrs. Aldenn, being unaware of the plot, the child and the governess become great friends. Being busy with club work, Mrs. Alden sees very little of her child. One day the child's clothing gets afire and she is rescued by the governess, unharmed but her dress has been badly burned.

The governess is struck with the idea of using the incident to arouse the latent instinct of motherhood in Mrs. Alden. She places the child in bed after bandaging her up with much cotton and bandages, and phones the club about the accident. Mrs. Alden rushes to the bedside of her child, at last realizing her neglect. In her agony she also sees the injustice she has done her son, and expresses a desire to see him. May, who has plotted for this, now sees her opportunity to unite the divided family. She hastens to Jack and brings him to his mother. Explanations follow and Jack and May receive the mother's blessing, to the great joy of the child, who was the innocent cause of it all.

THE CASHIER'S ORDEAL
Champion Release, May 20

Bob McCoy loves his east side lassie with vim and devotion. Bob is a chauffeur and a peculiar genius, but he is not the hero of this photoplay, though he plays an important role in it. The hero is Jack Cummings, who is cashier of the First National Bank of Bacon City. Now Cummings owns a car and loves the daugbter of the bank president. The latter is not favorable to the cashier's suit as the latter is not well fixed with this world's goods. Now the vice-president schemes to get a half of the bank's funds and inveigles the cashier to come in on "a sure thing" proposition. Thus a "loan" is negotiated and the cashier's prospects look immense.

In the meantime the chauffeur takes his girl on a joy ride, and the cashier finding it out discharges him. The chauffeur pleads, but the cashier is obdurate and the chauffeur leaves, vowing vengeance. Now the bubble bursts on the "sure thing" proposition and the cashier finds himself confronted by a terrible dilemma —disgrace and ruin staring him in the face. Almost bereft of his senses, he decides to take his life. He sits down and writes a letter acknowledging his culpability.

As this juncture the chauffeur in the role of a burglar enters the room and levels his gun at the cashier. He sees the situation, however, and decides to hold the cashier so that he must take his medicine. Several hours elapse, and in the early morning the cashier's sweetheart rushes in on the scene with a newspaper in her hand. The vice-president has committed suicide and confesses his guilt, and takes upon himself the entire blame. But, stranger than this, the "sure thing" proposition has panned out good, and the cashier can meet the demands of his sweetheart's father. He is overjoyed. The chauffeur demands his old job back again, which is readily done and the incriminating letter is destroyed. Shortly after the wedding bells ring out for a double header.

THE OLD CHIEF'S DREAM, or A DAUGHTER OF THE WEST
Republic Release, May 21

Chief Patt Tyhee, the head of the almost extinct tribe of famous Bannic Indians, visits President Taft at the White House, and after a lengthy interview with the "White Father," he is slowly walking down the steps of the capitol, when, overcome by fatigue, be rests upon the steps, pulls forth his pipe, and smokes. Sleep soon overcomes him, and he sees a vision of his bygone days, when he was a young buck, and the whites were beginning to settle in his territory. He again sees the famous raid on the town of Micbellville, when he and his small band attacked the town during the absence of the male population.

Scene by scene is vividly portrayed in bis dream. The Paul Revere-like ride by one of the young girls of the town, as she went for reinforcements, the heavy rain of leaden messengers pumped into his band by the brave women of the West, the different times his band was repulsed by the white squaws, and, finally, the complete defeat of the Indians, as they were driven away by the white settlers, led by a white squaw. So real does the dream seem that he awakens with a start, gazes around as though in a trance, then realizing that he is in the capitol city, slowly continues his journey, muttering, "Injun no more bad, him papoose of White Father."

HER BIRTHDAY ROSES
Republic Release, May 25

When you have promised your sweetheart as a birthday gift a rose for every year of her life and ordered your florist to send her eighteen roses, and the florist, trying to show that he appreciates your patronage, adds twelve roses to your original order, and, unknown to you, sends the entire lot to the young lady, what can you expect but an instant breaking of all ties?

Poor Edward could not understand why he was driven from his sweetheart's door on the day of her birthday when he went to see how his present of roses was accepted. Can you imagine his rage when the florist tells him that he sent thirty roses instead of eighteen to the young lady?

MINING DISTRICT OF VICTOR

A scenic picture of exceptional educational value, showing the richest mining districts of the world, Leadville and Victor, Colo., where "gold mines can be seen in the back yards."

ON THE STROKE OF FIVE
Thanhouser Release, May 21

There was nothing particularly romantic about her love story. She was a poor girl, and had two suitors, both humble working men. The man she chose was the more worthy of the two, and loved her fondly. The other man, a brutish individual of ungovernable passions, became involved in an altercation with his foreman and savagely attacked him. Through the efforts of the successful suitor he was captured and, as his reputation was bad, was sent to states prison for a long term.

When the prisoner was set free, eight years later, his first desire was to find the woman he loved and the man he hated. With very little difficulty he located them, for they had married and settled down in the quarter where they had lived most of their lives. The ex-convict rejoiced to find that his foe had met with an accident, was helplessly paralyzed, and while he still lived could not move nor speak, only his eyes showed that he was alive.

Calling at the tiny cottage, the convict gloated over his foe, but was careful to conceal his feelings from the wife. In the presence of her or her little girl he was the sadly sympathetic friend; when alone with the helpless man he gloated over him, and whispered insults in his ear. The invalid was unable to retort or complain; he could only gaze at the man and wish that his strength might come back so that he could defend himself.

The convict found that his love for the woman still existed, and he proposed that she elope with him. She rejected his advances with scorn, and his love turned to hate. He brooded over what he regarded as his wrongs, and planned a fiendish revenge.

He called at the house, pretending great friendship, and presented the little girl with a music box. She was delighted and the mother also was pleased. Then, while the two were playing with the new toy, the convict tiptoed over to the paralytic and whispered to him that the music box really contained an infernal machine, and that it had been cunningly set by clockwork to go off "on the stroke of five." Then he pointed to the clock which marked fifteen minutes of the hour, bid a pleasant farewell to the family he designed to destroy and departed.

The woman and child suspected nothing wrong; the man who knew was powerless to say anything. He suffered mortal agony as time sped on, and he was unable to warn them. Finally his little daughter came over to "cheer up poor papa," and noticed his intense gaze. He looked from her to her blocks, which were on the table at his elbow. The two had often "played spelling." The girl would

THE RING OF A SPANISH GRANDEE

Thanhouser Release, May 24

When a man knows that there is nothing about himself of which he can he proud he sometimes tries to gain a reputation hy boasting of his ancestors. Usually it is a perfectly safe game, for ancestors are like defeated pugilists, they cannot come hack. Were it possihle for them to reappear and tell what really happened in those days of long ago many family idols would be shattered.

A romantic young girl, visiting St. Augustine, finds that she must make the choice which means happiness or misery for life. She has two suitors, one an everyday young American who has made his way in the world and is proud of it. He has money, will have more, and in every way would seem desirahle.

But the otber man had ancestors!

True he didn't apparently have mucb else except a fondness for cigarettes, but he could talk for hours of the knightly days and dazed knights. He had a wonderful ring which had been given to his great, great and a few more great grandfather, who, as governor of St. Augustine, had saved the fort and been rewarded with a ring from the fair hand of the Queen of Spain. He offered her the ring and asked her to marry him. She said yes and took the ring. It was so romantic.

And then some power tansported her to "those good old days," and she learned the true story of the ring. It ended ber infatuation and she decided to stop he ing romantic and wed a good American wbo could supply her with affection, also new gowns, opera tickets and a steam-beated bome with all modern improvements, things they did not have in the time when the ring of the Spanish grandee was simply a jewel and not a family heirloom with an ahsolutely incorrect bistory tacked on.

THE CONVICT'S SISTER
Lux Release, May 17

A merry party of guests are gathered at the home of Malcolm Fairweather. All are enjoying themselves thoroughly when suddenly an air of gloom is mysteriously cast over the party. Mrs. Fairweather becomes very silent and none can explain the reason of this mysterious gloom. Crouching outside the Mansion Gates stands Percival Reven, her degenerate brother, the knowledge of whose existence she has so far been successful in hiding from her husband. Knowing this full well, the villain has come to levy blackmail upon his sister.

During the evening the conversation turns to precious stones and Mr. Fairweather shows his guests a splendid diamond which he has recently purchased. The diamond goes from hand to hand and suddenly the lights go out and the room is plunged in total darkness. The servants enter, explaining that this was caused by a defect in the wiring and the light is soon switched on again. It is then discovered that the diamond has disappeared. A hurried search is made but no diamond can he found. The gentlemen present insist on heing searched by their host. One by one they are searched until it comes to the turn of Robert Wadbrook, who refuses to be searched and leaves the house. Naturally the suspicion falls upon him.

Later Mrs. Fairweather calls to see him and demands to know why he refused to be searched. He shows her the reason of his refusal by drawing her picture from his pocket. This he had in his pocket at the time the diamond was stolen and not wanting her husband to see his wife's picture in his pocket he refused to he searched, and risked the danger of being called a thief.

At this moment Mrs. Fairweather takes the diamond out of her muff and explains that she had taken it, showing Wadbrook a letter which she received from her brother saying that he would wreck her life unless she provided him with money. Therefore she was forced to take the diamond in order to get money for him.

That night she goes to her husband's study and there is confronted hy her brother, who has gained entrance to the house and a duel ensued. He levelled a revolver at her and a struggle takes place in which the weapon was accidentally discharged. Thus Mrs. Fairweather silences her brother forever—true she had not wilfully caused his death—but he was killed and nobody regretted it. A public apology is tendered to Wadhrook hy Mrs. Fairweather and all goes merrily again. Wadhrook alone knows the truth.

THE SMUGGLER'S DOGS
Lux Release, May 24

This is an exciting drama into which is introduced a realistic example of the use of dogs hy smugglers on the Franco-German frontier. These sagacious animals are laden with little hags of tohacco and let loose. Having heen carefully trained they easily find their way home and stand a hetter chance of evading the vigilance of the customs officers than their masters. To catch these dogs the customs officers train other dogs who track them down. The film depicts the adventures of a young smuggler who is in love with and beloved hy the daughter of a sergeant in the frontier police. One evening he induces the foolish girl to leave her home and accompany him to the mountains. Night comes on and the shadows flit silently from tree to tree as the lovers journey through the forest—these are the dogs carrying their little bags of tobacco over the frontier. Following in their wake are the police dogs. All night long this grim pantomime goes on. The lovers hurry onward and the dogs seek to evade their relentless pursuers. Finally the lovers reach the smuggler's haunt and settle down to rest. Suddenly the harried dogs come rushing breathlessly in followed by the police dogs. The smugglers, realizing that they are discovered, rush out to meet the police and a fearful fight follows. In the struggle the police sergeant accidentally shoots his daughter, who thus pays for her folly with her life. On the same reel:

ARABELLA'S FLIGHT

A really amusing short comic of the knock about order has heen founded upon the adventures of the LUX funniosity, Arabella. She goes out for a walk with her dog and is suddenly wafted unto the skies in an alarming manner. The history of her flight has been faithfully recorded by our camera man and is well worth seeing.

WHAT AVAILS THE CROWN?
Rex Release, May 19

"A crown,
Golden in show, is hut a wreath of thorns,
Brings dangers, trouhles, cares and sleepless nights,
To him who wears the regal diadem."

The bitter truth of Milton's lines has often heen written on the wrecked, wracked hearts of regal sufferers; it has been carved like a melancholy monument on the souls of royal slaves, the prisoners of their own power. As often as not, the throne has heen a morgue of hope and faith, a mausoleum of the dreams and desires of those who sat upon it; for under the ermine heat human hearts, with the hungers and yearnings of humanity. The sceptre has often heen the spectre of all this little life means.

She was the princess, and a human girl. Sincere, simple, with an earnest love for all things everywhere, she hated royal pomp with a hatred that was a passion. In her light, hright eyes was the uncopyrighted story of human struggle, of contending human emotions. You were impressed at first glance that she was composed of the purifying and preservative forces that have made civilization. For a princess, she was refreshingly real.

This, then, was the girl to he sacrificed for a political alliance. The prince selected was a jellyfish personage witn enough hlue hlood to give a girl with as much red blood as the princess the hlues. With all her stuhborn individuality, she rehelled against the selfish decree of the Court, but when her aged father, the king, sternly commanded her, as her father and sovereign, to fulfill his mandate, the girl choked down the rising lump, acceded and accepted the ring as a pledge of the hetrothal.

Then she flew to her room, and the girl conquered the princess. In a wild ahandon of grief, she sohhed her pitiful apology to herself—and felt better. And the thought was horn.

She would go to the home of her old nurse, and live among the people. She would live free from the iron fetters of regal birth, free from the slavery of royal lineage. She went out and met life, merged and mingled with its rushing tides and varied sides. And among the people, with hearts that heat with the heat of life, she found love and lost her heart.

The blow was too great for the weak heart in the old frame of the king, and he died, as he had lived, a martyr to royalty. And the girl was proclaimed queen.

For the moment the realization and appreciation that she was queen and could do as she willed and wished, surged through her, her heing filled with fervent ecstasy. Then she remembered the cost of her birth, remembered the state and the people and her duty to them, saw and realized that she had contemplated turning traitoress to the government of which she was queen; and in sadness and resignation she dismissed the man she loved, to marry the thing her nation needed.

For she was queen, to live in garish grief and wear a golden sorrow, until death emancipated her from the slavery of the throne.

HIS MOTHER'S SON
Reliance Release, June 1

This picture is an answer to Rudyard Kipling's poem "The Female of the Species." It tells how a boy is cared for all his life by his mother, when he is well and when he is ill. She comforts all the aches and pains of the hoyhood and never hecomes weary. The boy in this story returns from college a vastly superior young man who rather disappoints his parents with his newly acquired ways. He hecomes engaged to a sweet young girl. Having written some poems he hecomes quite a lion at all the social affairs he attends. He meets a great heauty. He resolves to win her and to this end he neglects his little fiancée shamefully. The heauty notices this and decided to teach him a lesson. He visits the heauty one day and shows his infatuation for her. The little sweetheart is in another room and the heauty calls her out and exposes the hoy to the girl who loves him. He sees the girl and pleads with her to forgive him. She will not, and he is ordered from the house. He returns home and his mother, seeing that he is worried, tries to comfort him, hut he pushes her away. Later he tells her the trouble and she goes to the home of the little sweetheart and pleads with her to forgive the hoy. And the girl does so.

FOR THE GOOD OF ALL
Powers Release, May 21

Essie is secretly engaged to Harry, meeting him on the sly. Her parents finally discover the love affair and in order to cure her of her infatuation send her to her aunt's home in the country. Arrived on the farm, Essie soon plays havoc with the hearts of all the men folks, who sadly neglect their various duties, in order to dance. attendance upon her. Things come to such a pass that Essie's aunt, who discovers Harry prowling ahout the farm, manages to corral him and then begs him to elope with Essie. She even furnishes him with a ladder and points out Essie's window. After the young couple have disappeared. the aunt writes Essie's parents that she did all she could to prevent the elopement, hut that after all, it is probahly the hest thing that could have happened for the good of all concerned.

THE HOUSEKEEPER
Powers Release, May 25

A miserly widower has a young and pretty daughter whom he neglects, urged on to do so hy a scheming housekeeper who has designs upon his wealth.

The housekeeper has a lover in the person of the widower's clerk, who also has designs upon the old man's money through his influence with the housekeeper. The housekeeper cajoles the widower into a promise of marriage and, thus winning his confidence, learns the comhination to his safe. The clerk then persuades the housekeeper to take the widower's money and elope, arranging that she is to place the money in the daughter's traveling bag and throw it out of the window to him.

The plan works all right excepting that the clerk hears the daughter coming around the house just as the housekeeper throws out the money and he dodges around the corner out of sight. It thus follows that the daughter is almost struck hy the bag which falls at her feet. Led by natural curiosity, the daughter stoops and opens the bag and finding therein her father's money, she quickly decides that certain suspicions she has had are correct and dropping a large stone in the bag in the place of the money, she hastens with the latter to her father. The widower then realizes the extent of his folly in permitting the housekeeper to steal not only his affections, hut his wealth, and acknowledging his error to his daughter, he hegs her pardon.

In the meantime, the clerk has returned, picked up the hag and has joined the housekeeper. The two proceed to the railroad station where they gleefully open the hag to count their ill-gotten gains. When the paving stone is hrought to light and they realize they have heen duped, the love of the clerk cools most rapidly and he climbs ahoard an outgoing freight train and disappears.

The widower and his daughter sit down to their evening meal, when to the astonishment of the old man, his daughter mischievously calls in a new housekeeper she has engaged—a large colored woman guaranteed perfectly harmless. At the same hour the former housekeeper is occupied in a foot race with an active memher of the police force.

A CLOSE CALL

Great Northern Release, May 18

Mr. Deering is blessed with the love of a dutiful wife and a loving daughter, Edith, and ought to he happy hut an unfortunate speculation has shattered his fortune and he is in despair. He resolves to end his life as a solution to the difficulty, heing a moral coward. He procures a revolver and is about to end his life when his wife enters and grasps the weapon. There is a struggle for the possession of the pistol and the daughter enters and is puzzled at the strange actions of her parents. They are confused hut explain that the struggle was only in a spirit of playfulness. Mrs. Deering takes the precaution to extract the cartridges from the gun and Edith seizes it and, facing imaginary foes, pulls the trigger, snapping the weapon in the faces of her father and mother in the exuberance of her childish spirits. The parents are horrified hut they dare not explain and the mother soon retires taking with her the girl. Left alone Deering reflects and then decides to carry out his original intention—to commit suicide. He searches among his effects and finds another cartridge which he inserts into the chamher of the weapon and then resumes writing. Mrs. Deering, hoping to distract the attention of the hushand from his business worries, sends Edith to invite him to take a walk. The girl enters the room and again seizes the revolver. She snatches it up and resumes her theatricals, pointing the gun at her father and pulling the trigger. He is horrified and attempts to wrest the pistol from her but she eludes him and finishes her mock hattle hy placing the gun to her temple and pulling the trigger. Deering falls, nearly unconscious, and the mother enters and takes the pistol from the girl, frantic from fright. The incident has a salutary effect for it makes a man of Deering and he resolves to live for his family and try and retrieve his fallen fortunes.

On the same reel:

A DOUBLE PLEASURE

This is a laughahle comedy and concerns the experience of a rounder who drew a cow in a lottery. His trials in taking the animal home are ludicrous in the extreme but he finally arrives at home and installs the bovine in his sleeping apartment, retiring to sleep off the effects of his potations. He awakens the next morning to discover that his prize has eaten the stuffing out of the mattress and has accumulated a mild jag from drinking wine. It is a scream from start to finish.

LOST YEARS

Rex Release, May 16

There are two things we we cannot escape—time and death. Just think—whether awake or asleep, whether dead or alive, whether happy or miserahle, time is cycling itself away to the realm of dead hours, joining the giant procession of old years. Even as we write this and as you read, the continuous, eternal performance is progressing, and the moment it took you to read the last sentence is already the past. To run away from time, skip a few years and then return to the jurisdiction of the clock is an experience sufficiently unusual to deserve a few more paragraphs.

She was a wealthy politician's daughter and he was a rising officer of the navy, but that wasn't the hest reason for the marriage; it was their love, a love that knew only itself and didn't care for the auxiliary whys and wherefores. The marriage date was set, but a few days before it reached the calendar, the government dispatched him on a secret mission to Europe, and the happy happenings and the tender hopes were postponed.

From the ship upon which he was returning a few weeks later he sent a wireless bidding his hride-to-be to prepare for his arrival and the wedding on Thursday, at two o'clock. The impatient longing and uneasy waiting and suspense was transformed into husy happiness; the house was arranged; the hridal gown tried on a thousand times and a few, and the million and four thousand details necessary to a wedding ceremony were prepared and arranged with delicious disorder and ardor.

Thursday came, and the news that was parent to the dark disaster that followed. The ship had caught fire, had sunk, and the dismal report conveyed the tragic tidings that all had perished. She read the news, the bride that was to he wedded to a dead man's memory, and a merciful fate robbed her tortured thoughts. She forgot, knew not—knew naught.

Every morning she dressed in her hridal attire, waiting for two o'clock and her loved one. But two o'clock never came, for always they turned the cruel clock hack and made a liar of time.

The man had drifted to a desert island, and the years that were days for the girl were eternities for him. Living a solitary, deathlike existence, hopeless, helpless, the invincihle years passed and passed; until a ship revived the dying dream.

He returned; at two o'clock he met the bride of the dead years, and her mind bridged the chasm of the buried past. It was yesterday again, the ancient yesterday; it was two o'clock, and He was there. And she was fair, as fair as on the day she had first waited, freighted with hope and happiness; time had not written its cold scroll on her heart, nor left its scar upon her soul; the lost years had left her as young and strong as when they had first dropped into the abyss of oblivion. . . . And He was there!

"Include me in with your 1,000 testimonials. MIRROROIDE is the best screen on the Market. Ship express another screen to East Lake Park—12 x 15.

"Yours very truly,
"H. SPIELBERGER."

This is order number six from Mr. Rockhill. He bought his first MIRROROIDE a year ago. We have equipped all his houses.

Roanoke, Va., 5/3/12.

"Ship at once another rollable curtain to my new Danville, Va., house."

Yours very truly,
H. D. Rockhill.

Yes!—40% of our orders are repeats. This is proof positive—screens and curtains now in use. 1600 satisfied exhibitors. Can we show you? We will send you free of all charges ⅓ yard of both A and B grades. Drop us a line.

1600 MIRROROIDE

MIRROROIDE
is used by churches, schools and colleges. The school of Agriculture, University Farm, St. Paul, Minn., has a MIRROROIDE screen. The Pittsburgh, Harmony & Butler Railway Co. are using MIRROROIDE curtains on their trolley cars.

MIRROROIDE
is sold under a positive guarantee or money refunded. It is not aluminum—it is a

MERCURY FOIL (AMALGAMATION)
applied to canvas. You cannot tear it.. Will not crack, peel or turn black.

You can project a picture 100 per cent brighter and clearer without haze, glare or eye-strain and still keep your theatre brightly illuminated. Also save ⅓ of your juice bill.

MIRROROIDE
orders shipped in three days. We have been compelled to open an additional factory running both night and day. Write now.

Does Your Machine Wear Well?

POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH No. 6

Always Does

We do not claim that a Power's will not wear ont, for you cannot eliminate friction; and that means wear and tear. But we do say that we have eliminated friction to the very last degree of scientific possibility. POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH NO. 6 has fourteen years' experience behind it, and is made by the highest priced skilled mechanics in this country in the largest factory of its kind in the world; also we state further that money cannot purchase better quality than is used in every part of our machine.

You want a machine that will stand the daily grind, that will wear well.

Power's No. 6 will outwear any machine on the market. That's one of the many reasons why we do over 60 per cent of all the moving picture machine business in the world.

Power's Adjustable Inductor is the economizer for you to use on alternating current.

Let us send you catalogue D with full details.

"THE PERIL"

Have you arranged with your exchange for a quick booking of the Imp's totally different Decoration Day release, "THE PERIL"? If not, do it this very day. It is a thousand-foot feature Imp—one that will thrill you and your patrons from head to foot. It is not like any Decoration Day release ever made by anybody. In "THE PERIL" King Baggot and a fine supporting company give you a real gem. Full particulars in "The Implet."

A 2000-foot "Imp" Feature!

"LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET"

(Copyright 1912)

For Thursday, May 16th, the Imp has filmed one of the most popular stories ever written—a story that millions have read and millions have loved. The mere name, "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," will pack your house when coupled with the name "Imp."

HERE'S A PIPPIN IMP!

The release of Monday, May 20th, "A CAVE MAN WOOING" (Copyright 1912), will give you the best laugh you ever got out of your system. It's another Baggot-Imp. Watch Baggot change from a simpering hoob to a meat-eating scrapper!

"THE CLOWN'S TRIUMPH"

(Copyright 1912)

Released Thursday, May 23rd. Another Imp drama that is clear out of the beaten path. Have you been noticing what a corking good variety the Imp has been giving you?

THE SATURDAY SPLIT IMP

Released Saturday, May 25th. One of the best "splits" the Imp ever produced. Including "VIEWS OF LOS ANGELES" and "THE MAID'S STRATAGEM." Both copyright 1912.

A QUESTION OF PATENTS

ONE day this week there came into our office a gentleman well known in the moving picture field, to ask us a pertinent question regarding patent litigation and where the motion picture industry stands to-day. He requested us to begin at the very beginning of the events leading up to patents and the present day litigation. This was such a broad field, and covered so many items that we asked his permission to put it in the form of an editorial, so that it might be useful to others who were in a like position. The question arising, was, "If I place my capital, which will go into six figures, into this industry, what protection have I, and how will the patents question effect me; will I lose it; in other words, can it be taken from me or can I be put out of business and lose what I invest therein?" Knowing the bonafides of the gentleman asking the question, we replied, "No, you will not lose your money, and there are no courts in this land who will allow any man, company or combination to take away from you what you are justly entitled to." We were then asked specifically to state the whole question from its inception to date. This took us a long way back in our memory and we offered the back files of the "Moving Picture News," commencing from March, 1906, for reference. He said, "Oh, that will take too long to delve through; give us the whole thing in a nutshell." We put on our thinking cap and harked back to the time when Eduard Muybridge paid his memorable visit to England and gave us his first pictures of the galloping horses, in 1885 and 1886. This was the first commencement of what we might term "Pictures in Motion." These were taken on glass plates; prior to this, in 1869, there was published a patent by Brown which covered the present modern cinematograph machine, both for taking and projecting. Owing to the nature of photography at that date, which, as some of our older readers may remember, was the good old wet collodion process, when we had to sensitize each plate after collodionizing it in a silver bath and make it color-correct by the insertion of eosin, blue archill and cadmium; then develop and redevelop according to what was desired. It was not until Goodwin invented his nitro-cellulose films, over which there is at present litigation between the Ansco Company of Binghamton and the Eastman Kodak Company. This base for photographic emulsion revolutionized the industry and made it possible to get a transparent negative; but, while that was being perfected, William Friese-Green, in 1886, used a bromide paper in long strips, perforated on the edges in due form for work, which is the origin of the perforated film of to-day. He also at this time used a stereoscopic camera, using large films, samples of which we still have in our possession. He then progressed to the present day film, using the so-called Latham Loop in use to-day. His camera, built in 1889, is still in existence and in New York to-day. In 1888 and 1889 Friese-Green wrote a letter at the request of Edison, enclosing working drawings and designs of a perfected camera, which Edison later patented here. All this came out in evidence in the courts some short while ago. On this evidence, the patents which had been granted to Thomas A. Edison et al, were declared of no value and the camera brought in evidence, namely, the Warwick, using a two tined fork, was no longer an infringing device on the Edison patents. The issued and the re-issued patents of Thomas A. Edison were declared null and void owing to prior art.

The patents after the last decision were again brought out in a re-issued form, and this re-issued form was made the source of litigation against the Imp Company by asking a preliminary injunction, which was denied and sent up to the Court of Appeals for their decision.

The question we have to ask many of our legal luminaries is this: "If a patent on its first application is declared to be too broad and is struck out and a re-issue on this is allowed and called into question and the courts decree it is too broad in its scope and the privilege of a re-issue is granted then within the prescribed legal time, then this time elapses and no re-issue is taken out, and on this fact being brought to the attention of the Court, the Court in its decision declares that owing to the lapse of time the patent becomes void. How is it possible for a re-issue of this void patent to be granted in the Patents Office at Washington?"

When the F. S. A. was formed in Buffalo, the question of cameras came up and we distinctly remember telling William N. Selig and George K. Spoor in the lobby of the hotel in Buffalo that the patents under which they were being formed were absolutely useless. We stated then that it was an illegal combination in the restraint of a great and growing industry. It was trying by false pretenses to gather together a body of men for the interests of one firm alone. We then stated that the camera patents would never be sustained in any Court of Justice in the whole United States, and watching the course of events we have had no reason to go back on what we then stated, and we still emphatically say that these patents will be thrown out of Court. This was more fully exemplified when a separate faction in opposition to the F. S. A. was formed and adherence licensed among this second combination.

It is well known to readers and members of the old F. S. A. and other combinations, the trend of events following rapidly in succession.

The combination of the Biograph Company with the Edison crowd corralled, or they thought that they had corralled, the whole industry to the extent of putting all others out of business. It then became with us a question of policy and principle, as we had strenuously opposed on moral grounds the amalgamation of the F. S. A. so we opposed the Motion Picture Patents Co. As the F. S. A. caused a split in our relations with one paper, we started another to help the interests of the independents, so when this company was formed it became with us again not a question of bread and cheese, or money, but a question of principle and what is right.

Answering this question as to our policy, we then declared it was a combination formed of interests purely and solely in the restraint of trade, without a patent in existence that was legally adjudicated or that was worth the paper it was written upon. This opinion we still hold, and in spite of the licensing of projecting machines and by trying in that way to prevent exhibitors using certain machines, we know of a machine which we illustrated a short while ago that is prior to every patent granted, which have not been adjudicated, and which the inventors themselves cannot bring before the Courts, except to be defeated on every point by this prior machine on which all claims are granted. Thus the question stands to-day—"Patents, or no patents; a question of force and money against brains and rights."

It is a question whether the right of the American citizen to earn a livelihood by using machines, either for taking pictures, or projecting them, and which have been used abroad for a period of twenty years or more, shall be used here to-day, or if they shall submit to what we consider an absolute violation of the Sherman Anti-trust Law; in conclusion we would like to ask what is a trust, and would request letters from our readers in reply to this question, especially answering the trust in relation to the moving picture industry, and to send us letters that will help strengthen the hands of the authorities at Washington who are now making a searching investigation of the methods, workings and so-called patents held by the Motion Picture Patents Company to-day.

It has long been contended, and we have openly stated in these pages and in conversation with the manufacturers allied to the M. P. P. Co. that they can demand and get back every penny paid in the shape of license fees from the Patents Company which have been obtained from them by so-called patents which the Courts are now throwing out.

FIRE! FIRE! FIRE!

Moving picture films when lighted generate their own oxygen, giving off poisonous vapor, and, of course, this condition makes such a fire exceedingly difficult to extinguish. It is hardly necessary to say that anything which will tend to eliminate or minimize such fires is worthy of instant attention on the part of all film manufacturers and moving picture men. In the interests of our readers we have made an investigation of the various fire extinguishing devices now on the market, and as the result of this have found one which is far superior to the others on fires in highly inflammable materials. We have arranged for a demonstration of this extinguisher and urge the attendance of all moving picture men.

The demonstration will be given at the factory of the manufacturer, where facilities are at hand for drawing an arc to represent actual conditions in a booth. They will break this arc, removing the cause of the fire without injury to the operator or danger to the moving picture apparatus. They will demonstrate the action of this extinguisher on fires in moving picture films. They will endeavor to show exactly how large a quantity of burning film can be successfully extinguished and under what conditions. They do not claim to be able to extinguish fires which have assumed great proportions. They request co-operation on the part of all moving picture men and a careful investigation of their product as the only known means of coping with this most dangerous class of fire. In addition to fires in celluloid, the manufacturers will demonstrate the effectiveness of their extinguishing compound on other classes of vicious fires met with in actual experience. These fires will include burning material saturated with gasoline, benzine, naphtha, kerosene, etc., and fires in calcium carbide.

We urge the attendance of all moving picture men to this demonstration, which will be held Tuesday, May 28th, at 10.30 a. m. The date and time were altered to suit the numerous requests from operators, who are keenly interested in this subject, and exhibitors who wish to attend and cannot make it convenient for 2.30 p. m. Tickets of admission may be secured upon application to The Moving Picture News.

THE FOLK ORDINANCE

New York exhibitors have been keenly interested in the progress of the Folk Ordinance, which will benefit them considerably if it becomes law. It is framed up from a report issued by a committee appointed by his Honor, Mayor Gaynor. The ordinance has the best wishes of the Moving Picture News for its success, and we think it is to the best interest of every exhibitor in the city to immediately get in touch with his representative on the Board of Aldermen, getting their promise or pledge to vote for this measure which makes it better for them by increasing their space, by allowing sanitary conditions to be brought into play which it has been impossible to do previously, and in every sense of the word, elevating the house where moving pictures are shown. We cannot understand why an amateur body like the so-called National Board of Censorship should oppose such a measure. It is like the fable of the dog in the manger modernized.

Who are the National Board of Censorship, pray? They are only a self-constituted unit subsidized by the motion picture industry chiefly working for the Motion Picture Patents Company and censoring for the Independents what they will not do for the Patents Company. A body which is a huge joke, and only for the money at the back of it would never be in existence. It is giggling women and the foolish way in which they censor that is open to very serious objection.

The Moving Picture News advocates a Censorship Board appointed by the Mayor with power to act, and only those placed upon it who understand the needs of the people, and their word should be authoritative and law. Their word should be above the buying of opinion. They should work in unison with other cities, and as most cities look to New York for its progress, we feel sure that if such a Censorship Board is appointed, very few silly nonenities such as we have been treated to by some members of the Patents Company would be members of the Board.

Every exhibitor in the city should write and ask for a copy of the Folk law and petition that this be passed in its entirety, especially taking into consideration the fact that it is one of the most carefully drawn up ordinances ever presented to the city of New York.

TO MANAGERS OF MOVING PICTURES AND THEATRES, AND TO THE GENERAL PUBLIC AT LARGE

I have been informed that certain individuals are offering for sale rights to produce certain character pictures of Mr. Nat C. Goodwin, claiming authority therefor.

Notice is hereby given that the General Film Publicity and Sales Company, of No. 145 West Forty-fifth street, New York City, whereof H. A. Spanuth is president, is the only film firm that has the exclusive right to produce or use the films with the character pictures of Mr. Nat C. Goodwin, in "Oliver Twist," or in any other character, and that any manager that will attempt to produce the character picture of Mr. Goodwin other than the duly authorized concern hereinbefore mentioned, will be prosecuted according to law, and that an application is about to be made to the courts for an injunction to restrain the said individuals from offering for sale or to produce and book the said character pictures of Mr. Goodwin in a play called "Nathan Hale."

Dated New York, May 11, 1912.

CAST

The "Burglar".....Henry Walthall
The Brother.....James Cooley
The Sister.....Jane Fearnley

The home of Tom and Ethel Brandon, brother and sister, on the outskirts on the village. Tom is going to town to spend the evening at his club. The two servants also go out to spend the evening, leaving Ethel alone. Tom has told her that he will be back at 11:30. Ethel spends the evening reading. At 11 o'clock she picks up the paper and reads an account of a burglar who has been breaking into houses in the village. She goes to the window, pulls down the shades, and goes and tries the front door. She returns to the room and again reads the paper. The paper describes the robber as being tall, good-looking, and quite gentlemanly appearing.

Tom is at the club playing billiards. Bob Gordon, an old friend of Tom's whom he has not seen for several years, enters and Tom invites Bob to visit him. Bob consents; as he has been traveling all day, he is quite tired and Tom tells him to go on up to the house and he will follow shortly. Tom gives Bob his key and tells him to take a car and go up to the house. Ethel hears the front door unlock and picks up an old sword and an old pistol, which are used as wall ornaments, and with assumed bravado faces the door.

Bob enters, advances towards her, and she, much afraid, backs away, dropping the weapons as she does so. She mistakes him for the robber, as she has never met Bob before and he looks very much like the man described in the papers. Ethel is so excited she does not understand who he is trying to tell her he is. Ethel goes to the dining-room to get him something to eat, as she is going to try and detain him until Tom arrives.

While she is out of the room he picks up the paper and he sees the article she has been reading. He catches on at once, and decides to play it out until Tom arrives. Ethel enters with the lunch. He eats. Ethel sits and talks with him, and decides to give him some silver and jewelry. She goes to the dining-room and, filling a tablecloth with stuff, takes it to him. She hears Tom at the front door and, fearing that Tom will be killed by her "burglar," she hustles him out of the window just as Tom enters. She rushes to him and throws herself into his arms. Tom asks her where Bob is; she tells him she has seen no one. Just then the bell rings, Tom goes to the door and a policeman enters with Bob. Tom introduces them; they both laugh. Tom demands an explanation; they tell him. Bob holds Ethel's hand. He is very much in love with her.

On the same reel is a national history subject showing how a boa constrictor is forcefully fed when it refuses its food. Also a battle between two different species of the Tarantula spider, the asp—a snake of the kind supposed to have poisoned Cleopatra, and a wonderful picturing of the timber rattlesnake striking at an enemy.

WORK FOR THE EDITOR

'Most any one can be an editor. All an editor has to do is to sit at his desk six days in the week, four weeks of the month and twelve months in the year and "edit" such stuff as this:

"Mrs. Hoffman, of Lost Creek, let a can opener slip last week and cut herself in the pantry."

"A mischievous lad of Matherton threw a stone and struck a companion in the alley last Tuesday."

"Dave Cummings climbed on the roof of his house last week, looking for a leak, and fell, striking himself on the back porch."

"While Harold Patterson was escorting Miss Anna Collins home from a church social last Saturday night a savage dog attacked them and bit Mr. Patterson on the public square."

John Carlisle, of Lebanon, was playing with a cat Friday when it scratched him on the veranda."

"Mr. Miller, while harnessing a bronco last Saturday, was kicked just south of the corn crib."—Boston Globe.

ENGLAND INVADES AMERICA

This is not a scare headline, but just something to call attention to the fact that one of the larges houses of lantern slide makers of England is opening an office in New York City at 18 East Seventeenth street, to exploit the world-renowned lantern slides of recitations and old-world songs. We have many times spoken against the mediocre character of the every-day song that is here today and gone tomorrow, with very little sense and a whole amount of ridiculousness therein, badly drawn, badly posed, and very much worse—stained with aniline dies. It has been our intention to write an article calling attention to the badness of some productions, and this now gives an opportunity to bring before our readers this well-known firm of Bamforth's of Holmfirth, England. The following editorial, written by us ten years ago, will serve to introduce the firm to our American readers.

Mr. James Bamforth, of Holmfirth, Yorks

We have spent many happy hours in Yorkshire since we first made its acquaintance in 1893, and this summer we felt we would like to furbish up old friendships and found out how things were getting on "up north," and one of our first visits were paid to the subject of this sketch.

When we arrived, somewhat in the afternoon, Mr. Bamforth was "engaged," so to while away the best part of an hour we turned into the "White Hart" for tea (we can assure our readers we didn't take anything stronger), and in neat-handed "Sissy," daughted of mine host, we recognized an old acquaintance in the "Village Beauty," whom many times we had admired on the screen. An in mentioning afterwards to Mr. Bamforth the fact, he remarked that he made good use of the neighbors for models. After refreshment we were ready for labor, making our way to the studios. We found Mr. Bamforth waiting for us, and after the usual greetings, we opened with:

"Now, Mr. Bamforth, we want you to justify yourself, and give us some evidence of the statement that you are the 'largest producer of life model slides in the world.'"

"MY IRISH MOLLY"

We must confess we were rather sceptical, and hardly prepared for such ocular demonstration that we at once received. The room we were seated in was lined with shelves filled with slides ready to be sent off to the dealers, the cupboards were packed to their full extent. Then Mr. Bamforth began to go into figures, and we got bewildered—there were some hundreds of thousands there, and in an inner room we saw three or four assistants hard at work on pile after pile of slides, masking and binding—we forget how many thousands—then, into another storeroom fitted with shelves from floor to ceiling, with just sufficient space between each shelf to accommodate the slides, on edge. This room has four tiers of shelves 52 feet long, 8 feet high, with capacity for another 1,500,000 slides. We then had to cry, 'Hold, enough!' We were next conducted through large, airy exposing rooms with attendants busily engaged in the 'black art,' and where we felt quite at home in the atmosphere of collodion. Next into the dark rooms, and shown the splendid systems of washing adopted.

"How about water, Mr. Bamforth? Your water rate must be pretty high, eh?" These queries brought forth a genial laugh and the reply: "It would be heavy if I had to pay what the folk wanted to charge, viz., 1 shilling per 1,000 gallons. That would have been ruinous, so I went one better; I found a nice run of water just behind the house, and immediately set to work in piping the water to my works, and so got this constant supply that you see. After a time, I bought the land from whence the water springs, and so secured myself against contingencies, and am now about to build larger studios thereon; also a storage tank with a capacity of 350,000 gallons, and so provide against a 'dry day.'"

Mounting up steps we were led to nook within nook, grotto after grotto, and we recognized many of the "Al fresco" scenes of the numerous slides, one of which we produce, then to a cool cranny where we were shown Winchester on Winchester, we remarked, they were all empty. "I hope not," said our guide; "if they are, that means another £30 for collodion." Forward, like the youth in Excelsior, upward and onward, we were led to a magnificent studio, well lighted, from every point. At the further end was a background, 16 feet by 10 feet (which reminded us very much of the Lakes of Killarney), in the last stage of completion.

"You paint your own backgrounds, then, Mr. Bamforth?"

"Yes, every fresh subject I work up and do it all myself. If you had let me know you were coming I would have had a canvas stretched, and you could chose your own subject, and under two hours I would have painted it for you; that subject (the Killarney Lake), took me 2¼

MOVING PICTURES

Uses

This leads to a consideration of the ever increasing number of ways the animated picture may be used.

They are always entertaining. In these times of almost unnatural activities it is very restful to get instruction and inspiration coupled with entertainment. It really saves nervous energy, so much needed by the ever hustling American.

It is highly probable that show house managers will continue to emphasize the "drawing" feature. As the public comes to demand it these very men will use the very best obtainable, and will incidentally instruct and stir within us noble aspirations.

The editor of Leslie's Weekly says "the picture show has in it immense educational possibilities, which have scarcely begun to be developed." This same weekly also says "There is a tremendous and unceasing demand for new films and in the effort to meet this comes the temptation to run in a film a little shady. Censorship boards should be composed of men and women who are not alone morally trustworthy, but who are educators as well."

A Western judge has gone so far as to say, "We cannot perceive how this sort of entertainment could possibly affect the morals or the good order of ——, or its inhabitants. It appears to us to have been an innocent amusement, having a tendency to instruct rather than to demoralize or disturb."

This judge's observation doubtless has been limited, but what he says can be true.

An editorial has the following:

"An extraordinary opportunity for popular education and legitimate amusement was opened by the genius who invented the moving picture device. At the joint convention in Auburn, N. Y., Wednesday, of the two long named anti-cruelty societies, it was declared that the invention had created 15,000,000 new theatre-goers in the United States. It has also intensified the social problems of fire protection, ventilation, public morals, and others closely related."

Dr. Josiah Strong, a man who speaks with authority on many things, has this to say regarding moving pictures:

"The world is just beginning to appreciate the eye as a medium for reaching the mind as compared with the ear. Take, for instance, the difference between a lecture and a moving picture illustration of scenes in Peru. When the vast stock-raising industries of the country, with herds of sheep and cattle are shown on the screen the mental picture received by the audience remains for a much longer period, particularly in the case of the young, than does a lecture bare of illustrations. The boy or girl, as well as the adult, is impressed with the facts as clearly placed before him because he has received them through the medium of the eye instead of through the ear. The reason for this is that the mind is more apt to retain what it has seen than what it has heard."

As to the distinct educational value of moving pictures there can be no doubt. The following shows how Brooklyn feels:

"Attention was called the other day to the educational value of motion pictures. It is immense, and is sure to be utilized by colleges and public schools. Brooklyn, N. Y., is already leading the way. Since the board of education had no fund available, a committee of citizens, of which E. W. Ordway is chairman, has raised the money needed for displays of educational pictures in the various school auditoriums, beginning next week. The same films will be used in all the schools in succession, so that considerable variety will be given, even at the beginning of the experiment. The pictures will be divided into four groups, historical, geographical, literary, and dramatic. Geography will be represented, for example, by the engineering operations at Panama, and every traveler who has crossed the isthmus will agree that in this case the importance of actually seeing the work in progress can hardly be overestimated. Reading about it makes by comparison a feeble impression."

Brooklyn's example will be generally followed in a few years.

Instruction through the medium of the eye is almost without limitation. It is surely axiomatic that a statement of truth, an exhortation for action, when emphasized by a picture, a real life picture, are rendered many times more valuable and lasting. Many public speakers have realized this, and have made use of the stereopticon. The value of Peary's lectures have been many times enhanced by the use of the stereopticon lantern; possibly it helped convince people that he really did reach the North Pole.

When, to the ordinary picture on the screen, motion, natural and clear is added, the worth is inestimable.

Manufacturers who care for the welfare and comfort of their employees are doing much in the way of providing entertainment for them. Read the following:

"In a number of silk mills in Connecticut the management has introduced motion picture shows for the entertainment of the operatives during dinner hour to relieve them from, and counteract partly, the atrophying influences of the monotony of modern industrial life. The motion pictures shown have a double object: First, to entertain, and second, to show nations and peoples, their customs and mode of living, where and how silk goods are mostly used, so that the operatives get an understanding of the relation of their work to the use of the goods they are making, and thus work more intelligently, which, while it helps to bring trade to the mill owners, helps to bring more steady work to working people of these towns."

Even business men see in the motion pictures a means of advertisement and demonstration.

"In the Iron Age of August 31 the following item may be found: 'Motion pictures for selling machinery.' 'To bring a machine to the buyer's office and to show it in action without the noise of the factory is virtually what is suggested by the Motionscope Company, Indianapolis, Ind. The company manufactures a motion picture machine of a size fitting into a salesman's traveling case, but in addition to enabling the salesman to enter a prospectve buyer's office and give a demonstration of the machine in operation, it is pointed out, films may be shipped to prospective buyers when it may not be necessary to send the entire machine. Then the films can be shown at a regular motion picture institution of the neighborhood at little cost. The possibilities of the application of the motion picture machine in the hands of a salesman are, of course, great, and the company has had such a degree of success in introducing the machine that on October 1 it expects to double the capacity of its plant for turning out slides, films, and motion picture machines."

Many a sermon has been driven home by means of illustration. Much of the Bible has been made clear by means of the lantern. Now the church sees a possibility of going deeper into Biblical life and character by means of the moving pictures. Churches will be slow to adopt this means of religious instruction. There are evidences that the beginning has been made. The following clipping is worth noting:

"The adoption of moving pictures by the church seems to be a progressive educational move. At Montclair, N. J., a church is using moving pictures with seeming good effect. The characters pictured are suggestive of religious emotions, and it has been found that many persons learn better by using their eyes than their ears.

"The mechanism of the moving pictures is fast improving, and there is no reason why the characters described in Sacred Writ should not be pictured by first-class artists and made effective for the best educational and spiritual thought. The moving picture under church guidance may be found to be a new means for accomplishing much good."

It will be a long time before the religious world will look with favor upon any effort to reproduce the life and actions of Christ. This would have to be done through actors, and the world is not ready to approve of such an attempt. It will be entirely safe and wise to leave this exceptional honor to the good people of Ober-Ammergau.

The writer is glad to say that he has visited the Gardner Theatre, and has concluded that the moving pictures are as a rule satisfactory.—Journal, Gardner, Mass.

"The time has come," the Walrus said,
"To talk of many things"—

CONSEQUENTLY, we are going to ask for your kind attention for just a few brief m-o-m-e-n-t-s while we discourse on journalists in general, and the Hon. Eugene Valentine Brewster in particular.

What, did we class the Hon. E. V. B. as a journalist? By Heck! We believe we did so! Perish the thought, likewise the classification! The Hon. E. Valentine Brewster is no "Journalist"—he's a newspaperman, first, last and all the time.

Permit us to be the first to shake your hand, Brewster!

"Journalists" are those who sit in the lower office and take in the shekels. The newspaperman is generally found upstairs, with his collar off, bending over the keys of a typewriter, and milling out the "dope" that keeps the pot boiling.

Not the least of these, my children, is E. V. Brewster. We therefore delight to do him honor.

Now let us digress a moment, as we say on the stump. By digressing, we propose to right oblique to that heavy volume, bound in red cloth, containing exactly 2436 pages of "Who's Who in America." "Who's Who" is a volume that has proven a thorn in the side of many of our fellow citizens. The ponderous volume contains chatty personal sketches of the leading (underscore leading) Americans, telling just the things every intelligent person wants to know about those who are most conspicuous in every worthy walk of life. As we are all leading, my countrymen, those whose names are not written there ofttimes become miffed. However, this is yet another digression.

MR. EUGENE VALENTINE BREWSTER

To resume: We take up "Who's Who," and turn the leaves rapidly until we arrive at page 221, and there we find the name of Eugene Valentine Brewster. To the right of him, to the left of him and volleying in front of him, we find notices of notables which, we strongly suspicion, were written by those self-same notables. We have pulled off this stunt, in our time, and so we think we know the earmarks. One notable takes up a half column to tell how many times he attended Methodist Conference as a delegate, and another notable informs a breathless public that his great-uncle was born in Virginia "of Colonial stock."

However, this is not Eugene Valentine Brewster's way. No, sir. The paragraph under that magic name is crisp, brief and to the point. Here is another one in favor of the newspaperman. We'll bet our correspondence "string" for next month, that Brewster told 'em what was what, just as briefly as possible, and it went in that way.

We discover by glancing over the short paragraph in "Who's Who" that Mr. Brewster is a lawyer and editor and was born at Bay Shore, L. I., September 7, 1869. After a collegiate education he was married May 10, 1893. He then engaged in the practice of law. Two or three more modest lines, and the paragraph is finished.

Not a word about "being a delegate to something or other"; no "to continue"; no "in conclusion"; nothing said about "Journalism."

Permit us to hand you a cigar, Brewster!

We recently had occasion to ask Eugene Valentine Brewster for his photograph and mentioned, kind of lightly and offhand that we would be pleased to receive a few details concerning his career, more or less. Did we get the details of the Brewster career? We did not. We had a difficult time in even securing the picture. It came to us between two blank rejection slips of the Motion Picture Story Magazine. We didn't care for rejection slips, having too many of them as it is, but we are glad to get the photograph. Written on the back of the photo was the sentence, "See Who's Who." We saw it. "Who's Who" proved disappointing because Mr. Brewster is too modest.

But there are other ways of getting information, Mr. Brewster. There are other ways, we repeat. To twist a trite aphorism, A Prophet is Honored in His Own Country, and so in divers ways we got additional details concerning the life of our hero.

Never in our life, did we uncover the hidden history of a journal—newspaperman, but what we put our fingers on the fact that he has dabbled in politics. More or less successfully, members in good standing in the Fourth Estate dabble in politics just as naturally as water trickles from off a duck's back. So it has been with Editor Brewster, of the Motion Picture Story Magazine. We find that Editor Brewster has been a Democratic campaign speaker and writer. We say that he was formerly a Democratic campaign speaker and writer, because this year, we presume that, following the example of other Democratic editors (excepting Marse Henry Watterson), he is anxiously scanning the political horizon to discover whether Wilson, Clark or "The Peerless One" is a-going to bag the persimmons at Baltimore before speaking and writing further. However, this is just a surmise.

We also wish to inform our valued readers that Mr.

Brewster, when not speaking and writing in the cause of the party of Jefferson, et al., has achieved an enviable reputation as a lecturer. Then just to prove beyond the question of a doubt that his hat is in the ring, Mr. Brewster has been editor of the Caldron Magazine since 1908; was legal editor of the daily column in the Brooklyn Eagle; and president of the Brooklyn Grand Opera Company. He was also nominated by two different political parties for Attorney General of New York State in 1900, and declined.

Great Scott, he declined! Now what do you know about that? Imagine a newspaperman declining anything!

Permit us to again congratulate you, friend Brewster!

To cast all jokes aside (as we say in Kokomo, Ind.), the Hon. Eugene Valentine Brewster is one of the leaders in Filmland at the present speaking. Widely and favorably known among the powers in Moving Picturedom, he has much to do with shaping the policies and aiding in the uplift and refinement of cinematography. We class him with Alfred H. Saunders, in this respect, that he frowns upon the suggestive and the sensational in moving pictures and works for the betterment of the industry. The intelligent and refined of the patrons of Nickelodia look to the men of the Saunders-Brewster class—men who are unafraid of shifting winds; men who are steadfast to principle. Mr. Brewster, as editor of the Motion Picture Story Magazine, has through his publication entered the homes of the educator and the churchman, and in so doing has materially aided in advancing the animated picture industry along broader and more intellectual lines. The Motion Picture Story Magazine in its artistic attractiveness and clean-cut text, has become a power in Filmland and only reflects the pleasing personality and the unusual ability of the man who shapes the Magazine's policies.

Mr. Brewster's home is located at 29 Monroe street, Brooklyn, N. Y. His office address is 26 Court street, Brooklyn. A newspaperman, not a "journalist"; an editor, but not hide-bound; a gentleman in every respect of the word, it is the wish of the Moving Picture News that he may continue to gladsomely wave, free and untrammeled.

Is he for Bryan again this time? Well, there is Clark, Underwood, Gaynor, Wilson and Kern, all with their hats in the ring, and we don't believe we will do any more Democratic speaking or writing until we gain a little more insight into the situation. Eh, Mr. Brewster?

HARRY A. SPEARE NOW WITH THANHOUSER

Harry A. Speare, who has had a large experience as stage manager on the Pacific Coast, will succeed Mr. Geo. O. Necholls at the Thanhouser Studio at New Rochelle in the capacity of director. Mr. Speare steps into his new position on Saturday, the day on which Mr. Necholls takes his departure.

UP AGAINST IT
Imp Comedy of June 1st

This is a story of a man who finds himself in a crowded house one evening and unable to do himself justice towards the hostess and fellow guests by reason of the unpleasant fact that he has torn his pants in a very conspicuous spot, and for the life of him cannot get them repaired. His efforts to conceal the awkward rent from the observation of the well-dressed ladies and gentlemen around about him, causes infinite amusement to them, although they are not conscious of the cause of it, and much discomfort to himself, a matter which is equally surprising to them.

In the end the poor fellow obtains access to the bedroom of a girl, and there, is about to ply needle and thread when he is discovered by the girl's father, who does not recognize him, and mistakes him for a burglar.

The unfortunate man is menaced by a pistol and has a very bad time of it for a minute or two, until he is rescued and identified by his friends.

He is then provided with a dressing gown, and the dear girl herself undertakes to repair the torn garment, by way it is presumed of practice for the future position of the young man's wife.

This Imp comedy is in the old Imp style.

It is mirthfully acted and is exhilaratingly laughable all the way through. It is a veritable Imp scream with King Baggot, William Shay and Vivian Prescott in their best comedy manners.

C. B. HOADLEY SUCCEEDS GILES R. WARREN AT POWERS

Mr. C. B. Hoadley, a well-known publicity man in the industry, has succeeded Mr. Giles R. Warren as scenario editor and publicity writer for the Powers Motion Picture Company.

Mr. Warren is soon to be connected with another Independent Company in a like capacity.

Worcester, Mass.—S. Z. Poli has purchased the Lincoln Theatre.

LAWRENCE B. McGILL REVOLUTIONIZES CHAMPION PRODUCTIONS (DUMAS' "CAMILLE")

By M. I. MacDonald

It is not so very long ago that Mark M. Dintenfass awakened to the fact that the productions of the Champion studio, the work of which he had entrusted to others, of necessity, had become more or less of a joke on the market, owing to the ruthless lack of attention to detail in the pictures, the wholesale butchery of scenarios, and the incongruous method of dramatic action.

Mr. Dintenfass, however, at the point of danger to his business, had the good sense and presence of mind to call into his service one of the most intelligent directors that is in the employ of any moving picture concern today, a man of both practical and artistic sense, Mr. Lawrence B. McGill.

"The Realization of a Child's Dream," and also a number of other Champion releases which have elicited so much admiration and so much comment on the sudden transformation of Champion production, have been due to the efforts of Mr. McGill.

It is not of these, however, but of a much greater production that it is my purpose to write. The Champion production of Dumas' "Camille" takes second place to no other that I have seen produced on this side of the water; and in fact it might put to shame many filmed stories which have come to us from across the pond.

Lawrence B. McGill is responsible for the staging of this production, and it is one that shows the master hand. Miss Gertrude Shipman's work is superb in the part of Camille; Susanne Willis hits the mark as Prudence, the milliner friend of Camille—her comedy is good; Mr. Irving Cummings as Armand, the lover of Camille, does excellent work, displaying an intelligent conception of his part, and in fact all the players fit their parts as though they had been made for them. But for all of the splendid work of the collaborators in the production of the play, to Mr. McGill is due in the largest measure the success of the Champion production of "Camille." The silent drama with even the best actors and actresses can be more easily ruined by the offices of an incompetent director than in any other way.

The settings of the American production of the Dumas drama are rich and splendid, with dainty touches where necessary. The balcony panels in the ballroom scene are not the ordinary flat, painted designs, but are fashioned of plaster of paris with the subject brought out in bold relief. The newel posts of the broad stairway are of wrought iron mounted by brilliant electric globes which shed their light amid massive bunches of beautiful blossoms. The furniture, and in fact everything that has been used to complete the splendid settings of "Camille" are of the finest and Frenchiest style that could be obtained. Even the exterior locations which have been so wisely chosen are worthy of the boulevards of "gay Paris." And against this magnificence of setting the most artistic groupings have been effected by Mr. McGill.

A point of special comment in this production is the card game which has been brought so close to the camera that even the spots on the cards are distinctly visible, while behind, scattered in artistic profusion upon and about the stairway are the other merry makers and spectators of events incident to the game. Miss Shipman's work in this scene is magnificent, as it is also in the death scene and scenes incident to it.

I must confess to having been among the number who pooh-poohed the idea of Champion producing "Camille," and not until I sat at the close of the exhibition of the picture with tears streaming down my face could I realize that it was really a Champion production that had so moved me to admiration and emotion.

Magnificently costumed, splendidly cast, and superbly staged is the Champion production of "Camille." It is a milestone in the history of drama in the American moving picture, for which we are indebted to the able efforts of Lawrence B. McGill, who not only staged it, but adapted the already dramatized version of the book of Dumas to the limitations of the moving picture stage.

"HEROES OF THE BLUE AND GRAY" (Champion)

"Heroes of the Blue and Gray," is a military drama with the spirit of Memorial Day, and a beautiful story is well told. An old soldier who fought under Lee and another who espoused the cause of the Union and served under Grant, meet at a picnic. Their children have become betrothed unknown to them and the meeting has been arranged to break the news to the veterans. Before the happy young couple can gain their attention the elders engage in "war talk," with the result that they become involved in a violent quarrel over the respective merits of their old commanders. The children are forbidden to continue their courtship and there is sadness instead of the anticipated joy.

Wearied, the old soldiers sleep, and as they sleep they dream and their visions are thrown on the screen. They are boys and engage in mimic warfare. They are leaders of their respective forces and the foes, real or imaginary, are put to rout. Then comes a change. The civil war is on and they have grown older. They enlist and go their different ways. They dream again of the battlefield and its attendant hardships and dangers. They are in front charging the enemy and the smoke of battle greets their nostrils. The young folks do not heed the admonitions of their parents and have wandered away and are happy in their love. The veterans dream on to the cessation of hostilities, one flushed with victory and the other despondent by reason of fighting for a lost cause. They awaken, stretch their benumbed limbs and walk away seeking their children.

The scene reverts to Memorial Day and the village cemetery. The occasion is being observed with fitting ceremonies. Our heroes walk to the silent city of the dead, each bearing flowers and a flag. They halt by the side of graves located near each other. As they kneel they each see a vision of their old commanders and comrades reunited in death standing with bared heads and clasped hands under one flag—all brothers. There is no longer a North nor a South, it is one country, under one ensign. The veterans arise, "Taps" are sounded. They advance with outstretched hands and all hatred has vanished. They, too, will forgive and forget, and we leave them, for it would be sacrilege to prolong the story.

THE THIRST FOR GOLD

Imp Drama Release of May 27th

The thirst for gold leads two men each independently of the other into the desert. The gold hunger takes men into all sorts of inhospitable spots on the earth's surface. Gold, you see, has been very eccentrically distributed by nature.

One of these men had been successful in his quest for the precious metal; the other had not. The successful man had not got a drop of water to drink; the unsuccessful man had.

In this crisis of life the man with water was king. He refused to part with it to the rich man. As a last resort the latter besought the man with the water to share with him out of regard for the memory of his mother.

When these two men, so strangely met in the desert, came to compare notes as to the identity of the woman in whose name one of them plead, as it were, for being allowed to live, they discovered that the woman was the mother of both of them. The men, in fact, were long separated brothers brought together in this tragic manner in the waterless desert.

Needless to say, finding they were brothers they became friends, and the story ends with the happiness and prosperity of both assured.

The story is worked out in artistic Californian settings and will make a strong appeal to moving picture audiences in virtue of its strong and powerful human interest.

Houston, Tex.—Selhaver & Shute, of Minnesota, will open a moving picture theatre on Main street.

Seattle, Wash.—The Clemmer theatre has been completed.

Philadelphia, Pa.—The J. D. Allen Company is preparing plans for a moving picture theatre at the northeast corner of Germantown avenue and Venango street.

hours to do. Yes, it was quick; these things are wanted in a hurry sometimes. The sharpest piece of work I recollect was when I got off the set for Excelsior; you know there are twelve slides in that set. Well, I had to get this done in one day. I started at 11 a. m. and by 6 p. m. I had got the backgrounds painted, posed the models and completed the negatives. No, I don't want to do that often, and I only mention it to show what can be done when a special emergency arises.

"We next visited the "lumber rooms," and saw old kitchen utensils, grates, gravestones, crosses, coffins, beds, broken chairs, and the 101 things necessary to use as accessories to the various subjects. We thought while gazing on them that had we been a collector of antiques it would have been hard to get away. In another room we found an organ case, a pulpit, choir benches, and church pews of various patterns. A little more climbing, and we came to the house, a portion of which is set aside for painting slides, and we were shown some good specimens of work. Notably, two of the latest Life Model sets, "The Firemen's Wedding," and "Paul."

"What are you introducing new this season?"

"Principally, the latest popular songs, but it is rather difficult to know before publishing a catalogue what is going to catch on with the public.

"No, I don't do much with scenery or lecture tour sets. I list a few but confine myself to the life model sets. Yes, I anticipate a very good season; there is every prospect of it at present."

"Don't you find it trying, having to cope with all branches of the work as you do?"

"Well, yes, it is very trying sometimes, but my son relieves me of most of the routine work, leaving me free to do the thinking for the model subjects."

We will have more to say concerning this firm in a short while regarding their plans to illustrate American stories, two cuts illustrating this article are samples of the careful manner this firm turns out its work. By doing away with the mediocre songs and slides, and substituting in their place good recitations and old-fashioned songs that live for aye, much will be done to elevate the entertainment part of the theatre.

NAT C. GOODWIN AS FAGIN IN "OLIVER TWIST"

THE AMERICAN PUBLIC STAR WORSHIPERS

By M. I. MacDonald

America unwittingly worships the star. As our pagan forefathers cast their eyes aloft, addressing their prayers to the Sun for all good things, so do the American public incline toward the theatrical star for the entertainment which has become almost as much of a necessity to them as meat and drink.

This history of the drama in America for the past eight years has shown very conclusively the attitude of the public toward stars. Nat Goodwin, John Drew, Maude Adams, Maxine Elliott, and other contemporary players have held the public in a magic grip which can only be properly accounted for by the one word—genius.

The vehicle through which these stars have made manifest their marvelous talents has been of comparatively small moment to the audiences which have gathered to applaud the favorites of the masses. The dramatic, comic or literary worth of the vehicle has been appreciated only by the few. Those most brilliant of their constellation made the best of the simplest and sometimes clumsiest situations, satisfying the public desire and the human instinct of the ordinary individual, and appealing to the intelligence of the individual on the higher plane in such a manner as to elicit admiration of the versatile and faultless demonstrator of the imperishable dramatic art.

This star idea has not by any means originated in America. All countries and climes have their great artists whom they favor with the fullest measure of applause; but America seems, however, to be the hotbed of the star system, as it is known in the dramatic firmament.

When Nat C. Goodwin, America's foremost character actor, nodded his consent to H. A. Spanuth's request that he and his constellation of shining lights submit to the ordeal of filming in "Oliver Twist" and of having the result of the demonstration of their talents diffused throughout four or five reels of two-inch celluloid, it was not the Dickens masterpiece that was banked on for the financial success of the enterprise, it was the star, Nat C. Goodwin.

Tall trees from little acorns grow, and the advent of Mr. Goodwin into the film world is but the forerunner of what is to come, when the great stars in big productions will be as common in the cinematographical world as in animate stageland.

In the forthcoming production of "Oliver Twist," Mr. Goodwin has an opportunity of producing his own version, on which he has labored assiduously for the last eight or ten years. In making this production, he has availed himself of all the reality possible in the moving picture, and frequently impossible to accomplish in stage illusion.

The question is often asked by dramatic people where or why it is that the moving picture has such a tremendous vogue and which, instead of dying as most things do with the wearing off of the novelty, seems to have an increase of patrons as time goes on. The answer is very simple. It is the nearness to reality and the possibility of bringing the world's greatest within the financial touch of all, which has been the Mecca that has made the moving picture the greatest motive power in the world today.

The people of New York will have an opportunity of seeing this construction of Mr. Goodwin's genius at a Broadway house in the very near future.

Philadelphia, Pa.—B. Ketcham's Sons have a contract for a theatre at the southwest corner of 41st and Lancaster avenue for Mrs. Jennie Effinger.

NOTES OF THE WEEK

The investigation of moving picture houses from a safe and sanitary standpoint is much more to the point than the seemingly interminable fuss about films.

No doubt an investigation of both has been necessary; but the film is coming to that plane of artistic, moral and educational perfection that it is almost, but not quite, able to take care of itself.

Over on the east side of New York City any day in the week can be seen sights that cause one to feel more than anything else the need of proper sanitation in moving picture houses. When pallid-faced mothers are seen sitting in dark, badly ventilated rooms, viewing in breathless interest the scenes in the pictures, which afford them the only pleasure, maybe, that they ever get, two truths of importance are borne in upon us—firstly, the mission of the moving picture, and secondly the necessity for roomy, well-ventilated auditoriums where the poor may enjoy in safety the educational and entertaining advantages of the moving picture.

* * * *

The moving picture rights of Prof. Max Reinhardt's production of "The Miracle" have been acquired by A. H. Woods, producer of "The Fascinating Widow." Mr. Woods has just returned from a brief trip abroad, and although he has not told the price of the concession, it is supposed that in bonuses alone Mr. Woods paid over $50,000.

* * * *

Moving pictures that speak have been exhibited at the Royal Institution in London. Films were shown of a cock crowing and lions roaring in a den, the sound being reproduced with such startling realism that the pictures appeared to roar.

* * * *

The Governor of Oregon has given his official sanction to a moving picture film, the story of which is based upon prison reform and the institution of the parole system in that state. The Governor is one of the characters portrayed.

Ninety women, representatives of a movement to better conditions of motherhood and to make possible the rearing of children to the higher standards of manhood and womanhood in the State of Washington, met recently at the First Baptist Church in Tacoma, when attending the State Congress of Mothers and Parent-Teachers' Association.

Possibilities of reforms that may grow out of the meeting was evidenced when the mothers applauded the suggestion that moving picture theatres be a part of every public school.

* * * *

An Ohioan has designed a variation of the moving-picture machine, this on a modest type and designed, probably, to throw pictures or signs on pavements, windows or sheets. A box contains a film which is revolved by means of a handle. In the top of the box is a small opening. Pivoted on one side of the box is a wheel with a number of perforations in it and mounted above the opening in the box is a lens. When the handle is turned then the film revolves and the wheel revolves. Each time one of the perforations in the wheel registers with the opening in the box the picture on the film that happens to be passing at that time is magnified by the lens and presented in large form on whatever surface the display is aimed at. This apparatus is very effective for advertising purposes.

Says the Chicago Record-Herald:

"We have become accustomed to moving pictures, but the picture that not only moves but also barks, whines, screeches, sings, clangs, chatters, patters and performs innumerable other vocal stunts is still something of a novelty.

"The cinematograph views thrown upon canvases in moving picture theatres lacked only sound to make them almost as realistic as life itself. The clatter of hoofs was lacking in the thrilling cowboy scene, and the love scene in the moonlight minus the twitter of birds was not all that could be desired. The 'Allefex' has come to supply the want.

"The 'Allefex' is an ingenious contrivance weighing about 225 pounds. In spite of its multitudinous functions, it is said to be not difficult to handle. Considering the space it occupies, it is without doubt the greatest noise and speech producing object in the world, and from the viewpoint of the moving picture man it is the greatest invention of the country.

"In the repertoire of the 'Allefex' are the tolling of church bells and the clang of fire bells, the honk-honk of the motor car, the firing of guns, the clashing of swords, the cry of a baby, the crashing of falling wood or metal, the noises peculiar to the kettle drum, the ring of the anvil, the rustling of leaves, the rumbling of trains, the patter of rain, the sound of waves, wind, hail, the puff of a railway engine, the breaking of crockery and wood, the 'pop-pop' of quick-firers in action, the rattle of fetters, the tolling of bells, the clang of fire bells and ships' bells, the clattering of horses' hoofs.

During Lord Kitchener's recent visit to El Obeid, in Egypt, when he inaugurated the new railway, a cinematograph show was given with his approval to the natives. It was the first time any of them had witnessed anything of the kind. The films dealt with all the events which have taken place within the last two months in the Sudan.

The film which reproduced the consecration of Khartum Cathedral gave rise to a good deal of discussion. They could not understand what the surpliced figures were. Some said they were prisoners, others women. One or two natives, more intelligent than the rest, ventured the opinion that they might be priests; but they were reproved for their ignorance by one of the sheiks, whose version was that they were representatives of the British Army.

The following from an editorial in the Toledo, O., News Bee, on "Learning by New Ways," is interesting and smacks with truth:

"Every parent knows that the best means for entertaining and instructing little ones is the picture. You can say 'c-a-t, cat,' to a child forty times and next day it will come back at you with 'cat' spelt with a 'k,' but you put that word with a picture of pussy and kiddie will get it correctly, quickly. Same thing with matters of higher instruction—the object lesson lodges in the youthful mind for keeps."

Thomas A. Edison expects to spend $3,000,000 and devote eight years to the work of perfecting a repertory of educational films that will meet the requirements he has set to make the moving picture useful in the schoolroom.

"The moving picture journalist has been born," says the Evansville, Ind., Courier.

"Already we have motion picture weeklies. In a half dozen or more Evansville theatres and theatoriums motion pictures showing scenes of vital interest are shown every week.

"The motion picture company now has its 'star reporter,' its camera man with the news sense, as well as the big city daily.

"There is much difference in the way one moving picture maker will record a street parade, or a target practice at sea, or the arrival of a liner bringing in hundreds of shipwrecked people, as there are ways in which a writer will tell that story. The man who can make it most vivid, who can find the things that will make people catch their breath, is the man in demand.

"It is only a step of the imagination to the day when 'moving picture weeklies' will be delivered at our homes —maybe as supplements to the Sunday papers. It was not so long ago that a whole town read the one New York paper that reached it. Now there is a daily on every lawn. The inventors are never satisfied and we may yet have moving picture films thrown on our lawns by the newsboy and put them on screens in our own sitting rooms."

Reports from Germany reveal a disturbed condition among actors, managers and playwrights, and it is said that many theatrical establishments are on the brink of ruin in consequence of the inroads being made by the moving picture. In fact, the feeling is so strong that an opinion has been universally voiced in theatrical circles that not only should a heavy duty be imposed on the importation of moving pictures, but also that they should be confined by law to science and education and should be debarred from invading the "sacred realm of drama."

VICTORGRAPH FILMS COMING TO THE FRONT

The Victorgraph Film Company of Brooklyn, which have only recently begun to release their first films, are having great success and their product of the camera is being eagerly sought by wideawake exchangemen. Two of their first films, "A Stranger in the West," and "An Artistic Elopement" were shown last week at Joe Weber's Broadway Theatre to an immense audience, among which were many of New York's exclusive set occupying the mezzanine boxes.

"An Artistic Elopement" is a rare comedy, brilliant, vivacious, and the applause following its production on the screen was so overwhelming that it was immediately shown again. The Victorgraph people are turning out the goods and there should be a ready sale for films bearing the Victorgraph trademark, even though the releases are independent of any distributing agency. Their next release, "The Outlaw's Sister," is an unusual Western story.

FILM SUPPLY COMPANY OF AMERICA

The following telegram has been sent to all of the buying exchanges now purchasing films through The Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Company, and will, in itself, explain the objects of the Film Supply Company of America. We have nothing more to say on this subject at this time:

"Film Supply Company of America, temporary office 7 East Fourteenth street, have secured the exclusive agency for the following brands of independent films, making a total of twenty-one reels. Kindly place your standing order for any or all of these brands with us for shipment on and after May 27, as they will no longer be shipped through the sales company after that date. To obviate confusion wire your cancellation to sales company at the same time you place standing order with us. For the present release dates remain as usual. Thanhouser, Gaumont, American, Great Northern, Reliance, Eclair, Solax, Majestic, Lux, Comet. Address orders.

FRANK WINCH—AUTOMOBILE DID YOU SAY?

Yes, Frank Winch's new Thomas car, 6-cylinder, 70-H.P. We don't know whether Frank wants to break his neck, or what he wants. This is going some, eh?

Harry M. Marvin of Canastota, N. Y., assignor to Biograph Company, New York, has patented (No. 1,021,060) a moving picture apparatus including a fire extinguishing means for the film, comprising a casing which has an open ended passageway of a size to permit the free passage of the film but sufficiently constricted to extinguish the flames of a burning film that enters the passageway.

The lease of the P. J. Shea Theatre at Troy, N. Y., has been transferred to C. B. Keith. The theatre will open under its new management Saturday, April 27th.

THE MUTUAL FILM COMPANY

Washington, D. C.

The first official statement of the establishment of the Mutual Film Company in this city was given to the representative of The News. This will be located at 426 Ninth street, opening its offices for business on May 20. Arthur Lucas, who has so ably directed the Washington Film Exchange of the Independents for Miles Bros., in this city, will have charge of this district for the new company, which will include Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Richmond, and all intermediate cities extending almost as far south as Atlanta. It is understood that the latter city will have its own exchange of the Mutual. The outlook is that Mr. Lucas will take with him the entire working force of the Washington Film Exchange in this new enterprise. These are men who are well acquainted with the moving picture conditions and the especial needs of the market in this immediate vicinity.

In speaking to Mr. Lucas on the subject he said: "I have every reason to believe that the Mutual Film Company will be a success. It will distribute the output of some of the very best manufacturers, whose releases have become money-makers to the managers of the five-cent show and are demanded by patrons of the motion pictures. At a meeting of the local exhibitors, recently called, the Mutual and its program were explained and received hearty endorsement. Those who have been accustomed to using the releases of the various manufacturers who are now allied with the new concern are anxious to continue to secure these films."

Exactly who will have charge of the Washington office of the Sales Company has not been announced. The entrance of the Mutuals in this vicinity will necessitate a further division of managerial patronage, and just how this will be accomplished remains to be seen.

THE MACKIE-FLAMMER CO.

A visit to the office quarters, a cheerful suite of four rooms in the Commercial Trust Building, occupied by our friend H. A. Mackie and his bright young partner, William H. Flammer, revealed to us for the hundredth time the spirit of healthy enterprise which hovers about any business which has the name of Mackie attached to it.

This firm reports the most prosperous business results, and in fact the cheerful, well-satisfied faces of the two heads of the company tell the tale more truthfully than words could express it.

The Mackie-Flammer Company are building, leasing and operating theatres, a business which at the present period in the history of our country augurs financial success for those connected with it, and who have learned aright the secret of careful manipulation.

Something more of an interesting nature in the news line is soon to be forthcoming from the Mackie-Flammer concern. Watch for it in the columns of this paper.

THE AMUSE U IN BALIZE, BRITISH HONDURAS

British Honduras is a well-managed British colony. The government has learned one very important fact, that it pays to educate the children. Therefore, in Balize, a coast town of British Honduras, where Mr. Lewis, an American, who, we are told, owns everything worth owning about town, has a moving picture theatre, named "The Amuse U." The school children are sent in a body to this theatre where educational features are shown, and the government pays the cost. This is a good example which merits following.

A CAUSE AND A COURSE

Stars change their courses, and this applies to two kinds of stars; only the real, "sure-nuff," celestial variety don't know why they do so, and probably have no cause, while the Broadway contingent do and have. We learn how a good cause may cause a good course in "Stars their Courses Change," Rex release of Sunday, May 26th. She was an actress, but she was one hundred per cent.

woman, and that's a pretty noble word. She loved a weakling, as lots of other strong women have, perhaps due to some contrary note in nature. She discovered that he was a weakling, but even though her heart lied, her realization and disappointment did not, so she stifled the cry of her soul and ceased to worship her idol of tin. That was a good course in itself, but this very course led to the heart of a real man and—very suddenly the indefinite twilight of despair transmorphosed into the inspiring dawn of a distinct happiness.

PAUL RAINEY'S HUNT

This film is still having a wonderful run at the Lyceum Theatre in New York City. The crowds, especially on a matinee and Saturday, are very much in evidence, and all this is due to the personality of the man who stood by the camera and went through the whole scene and who now is the lecturer for this popular entertainment. We refer to John C. Hemment. Without him the lecture would fall very flat. We understand he is going to lecture in other cities where this film may go. We would be sorry for anyone, unless he is a very careful, clever lecturer, to handle this subject, because by so doing they lose the inimitable wit that John C. Hemment interspersses between the slides and the films. We listened to an understudy, a very mediocre sort of a chap, whom we would be sorry to listen to if we had our choice. Of course, we are fully aware if state rights are sold that John C. Hemment cannot divide himself up in many parts, and the state that secures his services will secure a gold mine.

ACTORS' CHURCH ALLIANCE ATTENDS "MOVIES" AT WEBER'S

The Actors' Church Alliance, of New York City, attended Joe Weber's Broadway Theatre Thursday night in a body and witnessed the exhibition of eight first-run reels. Many prominent thespians and clergymen were present and the party occupied all the mezzanine boxes.

The program was one of the best Manager Edward C. White has had for a long time, Rex, Solax, Victorgraph, Reliance, Imp, Nestor, Powers, and last but not least, the Animated Weekly being shown.

THANHOUSER STARS ALMOST DROWN

Tragedy almost stalked in on the Thanhouser Stock Company producing "Jess" when a wagon containing Marguerite Snow and James Cruz was overturned by the swift current while crossing a stream. Not only is there the present printed record of the incident, but there is a film record; a Thanhouser camera man happened to be churning away at the moment and you see the incident reproduced in "Jess." The scene is where Miss Snow as Jess, on the wagon with Mr. Cruze, who is Capt. John Neil, race through the stream and away from the bullets of the villain Muller's Boers. You see in the film that the current is strong, very strong, and you see Cruze and Miss Snow jump from the wagon into it. Here the unexpected—while the natural—happened. Before the jump, the wagon had bobbed about on the current like a cork; but the weight of the persons aboard had kept her "balanced." After the jump, with the balancing weight removed, the cart—simply turned over. Here is where the film thrills. The wagon is seen to come swiftly over on the man and girl in the water alongside and the man is seen to catch the girl and somehow pull her to safety. It is all done in a flash. Congratulations are due Miss Snow and Mr. Cruze on their nerve and—luck!

"THE HIGH COST OF LIVING" FEATURED AT LAST!

Here is a subject which will ring the cash register and strike a sympathetic note with every man and woman in the picture theatre audiences. Eclair has dramatized the subject nearest the heart of the American people, and in this two reel feature, which will be an early June release, will present an unusual living caricature. The Americans have always been duly impressed with newspaper cartoons, on political and every-day subjects. But when they behold in the powerful film-play, live caricatures of King Coal, King Tobacco, King Milk, King Meat, King Sugar, they will enjoy a treat which is absolutely unique. The "high cost of living" is far from a joke with any of us. Yet, in this story it will appeal to the humor of spectators; the rich and wicked Trusts get punished and the working people, Mr. Consumer and his humble friends, at last attain revenge and reward for their long sufferings. The moving picture business has been often said to be in its infancy; but here is a grown-up product which will start a new movement. Cartoons and satires have changed the history of nations; with the political strife now stirring the United States, a direct and daring production bearing so closely upon trade and tariff issues will create great enthusiasm. "The High Cost of Living" does not tread upon the toes of any particular political party; but it will appeal to every one who believes that social injustice is warping the progress of the country and making life pretty rocky travelling for Mr. Consumer.

THE POWER OF MELODY

A touching story, accompanied with artistic settings and extremely clever acting, is Nestor's production, "The Power of Melody," to be released on Monday, May 20.

The story winds itself around a struggling composer, portrayed by Harry von Meter, and a foolish girl who has left her parents' home to follow the glitter of the gay life. Miss Vivian Rich, Nestor's leading lady, adapts herself to this part wonderfully well.

HOW THE RANGER WAS CURED

A sure cure for the blues is "How the Ranger Was Cured," and if one wants real comedy, this splendid Nestor Western comedy, to be released on Wednesday, May 22, certainly supplies that want. Jack Conway, as the ranger, is at his funniest, and as the most ludicrous situations imaginable arise, in which he can display to the utmost his mirth-making ability, the picture cannot help but be popular.

The ranger, James Morgan, has no faith in doctors but believes implicity in patent medicines and vainly endeavors to bring his wife (Eugenia Forde excellently portrays this character), around to his way of thinking. Whenever the cowboys on his ranch complain of not feeling well, James tries to induce them to partake of the patent medicines, but they prefer the good advice of the doctor. As for the ranger himself, he is quite a sick man and his wife despairs of her husband ever getting well again, for the stuff he keeps taking, instead of improving his condition, makes him decidedly worse.

James, learning of a new brand of patent medicine, P—Dope—A, buys several bottles and freely imbibes the contents, of which 65 per cent is alcohol. James becomes drowsy and then morpheus takes a hand. The succession of incidents which follow his entrance into dreamland are, to say the least, most amusing. He starts in by killing two men by forcing them to drink whole bottles of his favorite brand of patent medicine and is pursued by the sheriff and his posse. After a most exciting chase, he has the pleasant experience of having a big gun shoved down his mouth and—awakes to find the doctor pouring some medicine in his mouth in an effort to restore him to consciousness.

James' horrible nightmare has the splendid effect of making him swear off the use of patent medicines and now his advice is: "When you are ill, get a doctor!"

The settings and backgrounds for the scenes in this picture are most excellent and the photography is Nestor, which is "nuff sed."

THE MOVING PICTURE AND THE SCHOOLS OF WASHINGTON, D. C.

By Willard Howe

I have endeavored from the various sources of superintendents, teachers, parents, and pupils to gather the attitude, benefits, and objections of the motion picture by the public schools of the Capital of the Nation. With variations, the consensus of opinion is in favor of the reel for instructive and informative purposes. There is, however, objection to the melodramatic and trashy love tales of the screen for young minds.

An interview with Dr. William M. Davidson, superintendent of the public schools of the District of Columbia, was sought and cheerfully granted. Dr. Davidson is highly in favor of what he terms graphic teaching. "It is the best way to make a lasting impression," he declared, "and as for the motion picture, I see in it one of the finest aids to instruction for the pupil. I wish I could install such machines in every school building and supplement many of the lessons with animated views. Remembering that our school funds are always limited and subject to appropriations from Congress, which so readily neglects the Nation's Capital in its more interested concern for the nation itself, I can not see the gratification of my desires in the near future at all. Even one machine would be of great assistance, but this is out of reach at present, unless some private benefactor comes to our assistance. It is my belief, however, that the day will come when the dangers and complicated manipulation of the cinematograph will be so reduced that almost any reasonable boy or girl can operate it, and then will the schools have it at command.

"Under the direction of the public schools, we recently gave a series of talks with stereopticon views on morals, culture, physical development, play, manhood, and a number of allied subjects which will be more lasting than all the scolding, preaching, and pleading the teachers have been doing for years and years. The children saw themselves in unkempt conditions, in street fights, in cheerful play, in exercises as others see them and it put a new light upon the subject. The animated camera would even be an improvement on this, but that will come later.

"Of course I am mostly interested in educational, scenic, topical, industrial, and such views. To this I would add history when this comes within the bounds of actual events. I want all the boys and girls to see these as often as possible.

"The advancement of the graphic idea shows itself in other ways than in the motion picture. Look at the newspapers and magazines to-day. There was a time when these were composed entirely of "words"; then a few small pictures began to intrude; and to-day the illustrations of literature are as important as the matter to read. And the size of the pictures has increased, too, so as to catch the eye at once. This is also demonstrated in the large types used in the daily papers, when the big headline must hold the essence of the article below. This is the age of visualization. Why, I still remember my first lasting knowledge of this very city came to me through a set of hand stereopticon views sent me by a relative from Washington. Most of the things I had been told before were forgotten, but the pictures have remained until this day."

Dr. Davidson was pleased to be informed on the literature published relative to the motion picture—its industry and advancement. Perusing the Moving Picture News, he remarked, "Why, this is quite a remarkable paper and contains much excellent information."

An outgrowth of the favor with which the public schools here look upon the motion picture is found in the recent organization of the Dennison Parent-Teacher Association. The chief aim of this is to secure at some particular theatre films which are recommended to the pupils to visit on Saturday afternoon. Several managers are co-operating with the teachers and parents in this enterprise.

In an interview with members of the committee for selecting the films, I was informed that difficulty was experienced in finding sufficient films suitable for children. They all realized that with an increasing demand for such subjects the market would be supplied. The "Cry of the Children" recently exhibited, was very highly praised and the scenic, topical, and industrial films were earnestly commended. Five schools are primarily interested in this movement, with the Dennison School as the nucleus.

The committee on the selection of the films is composed of Mrs. Jennie O. Berlinger, chairman; Rev. James D. Buhrer, Mr. Cleveland, Mrs. Hildreth, Mrs. D. Fulton Harris, Dr. E. Sotheron, and Dr. Edgar Speiden. The officers are as follows: President, Fred L. Fishback; vice presidents, Miss Kate E. Rawlings and Mrs. L. H. Levy; treasurer, D. Fulton Harris, and secretary, Miss Florence Mortimer. It is of interest to note that all of these are parents with the exception of Miss Rawlings and Miss Mortimer, who are teachers of the eighth and seventh grades, respectively.

A significant idea of the Parent-Teacher Association is that the parents shall have a closer jurisdiction over the amusement presented to the children after school hours (for they are sure to go to a picture show somewhere), the teachers assisting and co-operating. Through this union with vigilant mothers and fathers, the careless parents have begun to consider the whereabouts of their youngsters and exercise a neglected duty. For, after all, the objectionable effects of the picture show on children should be primarily laid at the door of the guardian, who should determine their attendance.

The Washington Film Exchange, the headquarters of the Independents here, has offered assistance to this association in furnishing such educational and instructive reels as can be procured. Gratification has been expressed for this generosity.

Another educational movement, which has been in operation for some time past, is the Saturday morning exhibition at the Passtime. Manager Bachrach offers a free show of slides and motion pictures to all school children and parents. This is accompanied by a lecture by a prominent personage on some vital question of the day.

"The Coming of Columbus" was given a private exhibition by Manager Brylawski to the press, educators, and the clergy, all of whom endorsed its historical and educational sides. So widespread has been the recommendation of this film that the Colonial played to capacity houses for a week. As a priest, who has always shown animosity to motion picture theatres, remarked, "No, I have not heretofore endorsed such shows, but I would certainly advise you seeing the "Coming of Columbus."

In talking to a teacher of English of one of the high schools recently, I gained this information: "While I do not approve of indiscriminate attendance to moving picture theatres, I will say that they have done much to stimulate the mind and imagination. This I have especially noted in the paragraph writing, in which the pupils are required to present terse narrative or descriptive accounts. These were formerly characterized as dry, labored efforts; but now I find many bright, really interesting and original compositions. Upon inquiring, I have learned that these last come from students who have gathered their subjects from the screen."

Another teacher declared that the motion picture had quickened the perception of the students in reading and arithmetic, as well as in grasping a situation graphically. A great interest is being awakened in Washington relative to the benefits to be derived from the judicious use of the animated camera. As one of the officers of the Parent-Teacher Association remarked, "The only way to counteract the objectionable points for children's minds found in the show that must of necessity cater to the general public is to arrange the program ourselves and urge parents to send the children to such exhibitions. We must fight the moving picture with the moving picture and not against it. We can see such excellent fields for information and instruction in these graphic presentations that we have no desire to stifle such an industry. We merely wish to direct it for the best need of our children."

KINEMACOLOR.

Tom D. Cochrane, so well known in the motion picture world, as a producer for the manufacturing firms and who has been engaged by the Kinemacolor Company of America to take charge of its studio, is busily engaged in preparing a number of comedies and dramas which will shortly be placed upon the market in Kinemacolor.

The Kinemacolor Company has leased a superb site for taking studio pictures, near to New York City.

Henry J. Brock, president of the Kinemacolor Company of America and of Kinemacolor of Canada, Limited, has appointed Arthur A. Lotto, general representative of the Canadian Northwest, going as far as the Pacific Coast, to arrange for the building and leasing of theatres and for the granting of franchises for Kinemacolor. Mr. Lotto leaves New York for his Canadian trip this week.

By special arrangement with the Navy Department the Kinemacolor Company will take some remarkable views in natural colors of the principal battleships and cruisers of "Uncle Sam's Navy" and will also show many striking views of life on board the warships and of the officers and the crews, in Kinemacolor.

A most remarkable tour is about to be made by the camera operators of the Kinemacolor Company of America; a corps of whom will start this week to take Kinemacolor views of the principal national parks of the United States.

By special arrangement with the Department of the Interior, the Kinemacolor Company of America's camera operators will proceed from Los Angeles, Cal., where they have been operating for the past two months, and will visit the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. Then they will make a trip through the Yellowstone Park and proceed through the Glacier National Park and the Ranier National Park. The last portion of their trip will embrace the great Crater Lake National Park and the world famous Yosemite Valley.

Mr. Alfred G. Gosden, the chief of the Kinemacolor camera staff, who secured most of the striking pictures of the Durbar in India, will head the expedition, and will be accompanied by Mr. Lawrence Grant, who won fame for himself in New York by his interesting and magnetic lectures upon the Durbar.

Never before has an attempt been made to secure the views of the national pjarks above mentioned, as will be done by the Kinemacolor Company. No expense has been spared in equipping the expedition, which will consist of eight men, four guides and two cooks. There will be ten mules and six horses utilized, together with complete camping outfits, and views will be taken from points that have probably never been visited by white men.

The Department of the Interior is giving every assistance in the taking of the Kinemacolor views of the national parks of America and it is expected that many striking views will be secured that will be entirely new, even to those who are most familiar with the national playgrounds.

Mr. Lawrence Grant, who accompanies the expedition, does so to familiarize himself with the views to be taken and in order to prepare his lectures so that they can be given in an interesting and intelligent manner when the pictures in natural colors of the national parks will be exhibited throughout the United States in the fall of this year.

The title for this series, as announced by the Kinemacolor Company, will be "See America First," and the pictures will appeal to not only the lovers of the beauties of Nature but also to all patriotic citizens of this republic.

EIGHT-SHEETS, TOO, FOR "JESS"

Thanhouser Company have supplemented their publicity paraphernalia for "Jess" with eight-sheets. Paper of this size is quite unusual for a regular release, but the New Rochelle offices report a good demand for it. The "eights" show scenes in the Boer War, which figures prominently in the Rider Haggard story. The rest of the "Jess" pub. stuff consists of two varieties of one-sheets, illustrated heralds, and three-sheets.

"HAMFAT'S SUCCESS"

Eclair's Newest Joy-Thriller

The "Hamfat actor," as the one-night-stand Shakesperean artist is so generally and so kindly labelled by his professional associates, is at last elevated to the heights which he deserves in this droll comedy of situation—and lack of it! Cassius Brutus Anthony Hamfat, having failed in his interpretations of the classics, and being without the withal to settle a three-months board bill, despairingly goes forth to make one last effort for a position with K. E. Frobert, an unsympathetic manager, who rebuffs him. Hamfat returns to his dingy fifth-floor-back room, to find that the landlady has sped for a policeman. Donning a Rube make-up, which he finds in his old trunk, he eludes the minion of the law and walks along the Gay White Way, wondering how he is to answer the ringing of the inner dinner bell. He is mistaken for a real "yap" by two desperate swindlers, and they persuade him to accept their hospitality in a cabaret restaurant, while they do their best to fleece him out of a large roll of stage money which they have located upon his person—believing it to be bank notes of the realm. Hamfat accedes, and gets his first square meal of months, unaware that at the adjoining table sits the manager who had refused him so cruelly before. The swindlers tipple not wisely but to energetically, with the result that when all three are supposed to join funds in a pool on an imaginary gold mine, they give Hamfat real money change for his theatrical yellow-backs. They gladly excuse him, and are promptly arrested, to get a deserved punishment. Hamfat, with joy in his heart and a full purse, hastens to his boarding house, where he gives his landlady a nervous shock, and the overdue board bill, to receive a staggering knockout himself in the form of an offer from Frobert, the manager, to give up Shakespeare forever and come to comic opera! He has proved that he was an actor after all. It is released Friday, May 31.

SCOTT & VAN ALTENA SLIDES

A very convenient method for the management of a moving picture theatre to make the usual announcements to his patrons is by means of slides thrown on the screen with the desired wording in a suitable setting; these pictures are familiar to us all.

The well known firm of Scott & Van Altena, 59 Pearl street, New York City, manufacturers of high quality lantern slides for songs and all other purposes, have just placed on the market a series of about 75 different slides, embracing the most popular titles, all copyrighted.

The subjects are photographed from life and embrace novel and decidedly original ideas in great variety. Fine photography, splendid artistic conceptions, and rich color effects place these slides in a very high class.

This firm will be pleased to send a catalogue on request.

"UNIVERSAL FEATURES" LANDS TWO SENSATIONS

The Universal Features, at 7 East 14th Street, have landed the complete rights for the two startling Eclair productions—"Sherlock Holmes," in five features of two reels each, and "The Tiger-Bandits of Paris," a three reel thriller of a real life tragedy, just ended in France. These will be distributed by States and Territory rights, from the Universal. "Sherlock Holmes" is the greatest detective character of modern literature, and to have the complete series by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle for such a production means a great step forward for the literary qualities of American films.

WHAT D'YE CARE?

When earth's last picture is painted
And the tubes are all twisted and dried,
I don't think many will care very much—
They have something else, on the side.

For artists and poets are liars;
Their high-lights are false, forsooth!
But Kinemacolor is faithful
And it paints with the brush of Truth.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Credit to Authors

WE want to see credit given on the film to the original author of the play, the editor who revised it, and the director who staged it. In the past, we have taken a decided stand in favor of credit to authors and are pleased to see that the agitation, primarily inaugurated by Mr. Sargent is bearing fruit. William H. Kitchell, a versatile photoplaywright, in a communication, recently stated that he did not care so much for credit on the film as in the trade journals. We read the assertion with interest. It is true that ofttimes the title of the film is unknown until a glance at the poster outside the theatre tells the puzzled film fan the name of the picture, but there are those exceptions when the title stands out clearly. When it does, the name of the author should also be plainly read. Some of the manufacturers are publishing the names of writers in the trade journals, notably the Edison Company. All the companies should do it. Some weeks ago we published the news that the Eclair Company was using the names of authors on Eclair posters. This is the best move of them all. Eclair submitted posters of late releases to prove their statement. The photoplaywright's name stood out boldly and, like Ben Adhem's, "led all the rest." The Eclair Company should have credit from all photoplaywrights for this innovation.

Not Without Faults

The all-powerful director is not without faults. There are some instances where the humble photoplaywright might have suggested something of which the director was ignorant. The following example goes to prove that the editor and author and director may ofttimes consult over the proper "putting over" of a script, despite the statements that the author has no business "to meddle with things that do not concern him." One photoplaywright turned out a corking newspaper script. It was so good that he received $30 for it a week after submission. It evidently "appealed" to the director in question and he was and is considered amongst the best of them. It was put on immediately. The author of that script was an old newspaper man. The director was not. There was a metropolitan pressroom scene, the big "break" in the play. Imagine the writer's astonishment when that pressroom was flashed on the screen. There was an ancient Goss cylinder, two revolution press, with an endgate taking out papers at the rate of one every five minutes. Imagine the pressroom of the New York World or Herald with an old cylinder press to print the editions! The director had evidently brought into service the first press he came to, never imagining there are presses and then some. Every newspaperman or printer who witnessed that play, spotted the blunder. This is just one of many instances where suggestions from the author of the script would have proven valuable.

An "Association" We Endorse

Mr. A. Van Buren Powell, successful photoplaywright of Brooklyn, steps gaily to the home plate with the by-laws for an "Association" which we heartily endorse and urge every one in the profession to join. No ten dollar membership fee, but benefits are guaranteed. We will permit Mr. Powell to explain his excellent idea:

"There has been a lot of agitation for some sort of 'combination' or 'Association' for the photoplaywrights; and, despite the preponderance of adverse editorial criticism of such a measure, I am convinced that there are many who will not be absolutely contented until they attain their desire. Therefore, at risk of your censure, I humbly submit a plan for a combination of the scirpt writers, which, if adopted and adhered to, will help us all out wonderfully.

"My motive in advocating this thing is personal only insofar as an earnest desire to keep the script-writing field open to the free-lances can be considered personal. My fostering has no charter. No membership fees, dues or payments of any kind are required. There are no 'strings' attached to membership. The sole duty required of a member is to place a copy of the Motto and Creed prominently over the typewriter, to promise to adhere to them and to DO IT. No doubt there are many writers who are unconsciously members already—such will readily recognize the fact upon learning our watchword—it is OPTIMISM.

"Come on, now, all ye photoplaywrights! Let's get together! We'll call ourselves 'The Order of Optimistic Photoplaywrights.' The name being approved, we will all rise and repeat the Oath of Allegiance:

"'I do solemnly swear to adopt an attitude of optimism toward the photoplaywriting situation; I do solemnly swear to abide by the Creed of the Order of Optimistic Photoplaywrights; I do solemnly swear to adhere to the Motto of that Order.' (To those who have signed Affidavit-release-forms the swearing will come easy.)

"And now for our Creed:

"'We believe in the universal uprightness, honesty and fairness of the photoplay editors.

"'We believe that the editors are doing all in their power to aid us; and that many are doing far more than is actually required of them in an endeavor to render us assistance.

"'We believe that our scripts may be good and still be rejected; and that a script which is not worthy deserves rejection.

"'We believe that "kicking" militates against our best interests, and that a courteously worded complaint, made only when undeniably justified, will invariably receive prompt attention and adjustment.

"'We believe that mistakes may happen in the best-regulated studios; and that the studio staff, without exception, stands ready to do all in their power to rectify mistakes when made.

"'We believe that we should show appreciation of all that is being done for us.

"'We believe that conditions will adjust themselves favorably if we are patient and try to help in our humble way.

"'We believe that good times are here and better times swiftly approaching. With your tolerant attention I will subjoin our Motto and close':

OUR MOTTO BE OPTIMISTIC
BOOST—WHENEVER YOU CAN KICK—NEVER!

The Order of Optimists

Mr. Matt Mereness, the Schoharie, N. Y., Apostle of Sunshine, will undoubtedly be elected to an important office in Mr. Powell's new association formed above. Both these photoplaywrights have the right idea. The editor herewith nominates Mr. Powell president (a becoming honor to the organizer), and Mr. Mereness vice president of "The Order of Optimists." Every photoplay editor has been reached by wireless and their united endorsement of the aims of the new order are given in one word "Great." Brothern and Sistern Photoplaywrights, join early and avoid the rush!

To return to Mr. Mereness, who writes as follows: "When I read and hear of all the imaginary wrongs the script writer has, I am grieved. As to the favored writers, my personal experience is that nearly all companies are glad to receive outside scripts. If you send them good stuff and the kind they want, you will not have to be a favored writer to draw a check. When a company like Thanhouser or Essanay say they are not in the market for scripts, it is not because they have a few favored writers, it means they are well supplied with scenarios. They may be filming stuff like Kalem's Egyptian stories. What would an outside writer know about that? I have heard complaints about editors marking and writing on scripts. I have had that experience, but it is ten to one its a word of advice. Remember the editor is your friend, he wants you to succeed and writing a mean letter to the editor will not help your case and may close a market to you. If you have it in at present for an editor, take it out on the cat and keep on pegging away at scripts."

Amen!

"SOLAX" NIGHT AT WEBER'S, BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY

"THE PHANTOM BANDIT," OR "ZIGOMAR VS. LE ROUQUIN"

In the first series of Zigomar pictures, Zigomar, a noted French thief and criminal, after a chase extending through several countries, finally being cornered by Paulin Broquet, the celebrated Parisian detective, placed a bomb in his underground den. The explosion killed the police and apparently the thief, and the detective retreated, feeling satisfied that his work of tracking and capturing Zigomar was at an end.

Zigomar Revives

The new series begins after the explosion, when the bandit extricates himself from the debris. He is unhurt and full of rage, swears death to his enemy.

After determining the number of his associates who escape the explosion, Zigomar undertakes the task of revenge, and disguises himself as a coal-man. In this disguise, he carries a bundle of wood to the room of the chief of police. He has secreted an explosive amongst the wood. Being unaware of the danger, Paulin Broquet seats himself at the table. A terrible explosion fills the room with smoke and debris and Broquet falls, mortally hurt.

Le Rouquin, the famous detective, is working in his office, when his attention is attracted by a newspaper account: "Paulin Broquet has been a victim of the vengeance of the gang "Z" which he pursued so ardently."

Le Rouquin Takes the Case

Immediately, Le Rouquin goes to the home of Paulin Broquet. The wounded man, realizing that this was done by the hand of Zigomar, entrusts Le Rouquin with the task of revenge.

While descending the stairs in Broquet's house, Le Rouquin meets a very respectable looking old man. A little farther down, he comes upon men carrying a piano, one of them tries to quarrel with him and by a rapid movement throws him over the railing of the stairs.

Then on the order of the old man, the piano is also dropped over the staircase. Owing to his alertness, Le Rouquin, in getting a stronghold on the stair railing, and in this way saves himself from being crushed by the piano. He realizes that this is a trap laid by the "Z." But the four porters are not to be seen; they have disappeared, and instead, the old man, two stylish young ladies, escorted by two well-dressed gentlemen, come out.

Le Rouquin swears to capture Zigomar.

He Gets a Clue

While going down, one of the ladies has dropped her bag. Le Rouquin opens it and finds a card bearing the name "Olga Liontef, 11 rue de Paris." He goes to the young lady, threatens her with arrest, and finally succeeds in her revealing the secrets of Zigomar.

Having learned that Zigomar is conducting a gambling house, Le Rouquin goes thither, but this time he is put off the track. An electric bell has warned the gamblers. When the policeman and the detectives come in they find only honest citizens who are enjoying a concert. Through a wonderful mechanism the gambling house is transformed, instantly, into a concert hall. Hardly have the policemen gone, when the concert hall is transformed into a gambling house again and they resume operations.

Le Rouquin does not want to be beaten. He boldly dons the garments of the footman and in this way comes upon the gamblers. Nevertheless, he fails to capture Zigomar, the thief escaping through a secret door in the wall.

The Two Zigomars

Zigomar, in order to deceive Le Rouquin, has disguised one of his lieutenants as a second Zigomar, with a perfect resemblance.

There is a great reception at the hotel of the Marquis d'Aulnon. Zigomar, disguised as a prestidigitator, goes there with intent to rob the guests. Le Rouquin, informed of the project of Zigomar, goes there also. He comes just in time to prevent the robbery, but an accomplice of Zigomar, an electrician, disconnects wires and throws the house in darkness, the wily bandit escaping again.

At the same time, in Marsilia, a jeweler's safe is broken. Owing to an ingenious mechanism, the robber has been photographed, but being of an Herculean strength, has escaped with his booty.

SCENES FROM "ZIGOMAR"

Held for Ransom

Le Rouquin is puzzled on learning this new deed of Zigomar, whom he believed to have in his hands in Paris.

A short while after he learns that Zigomar has captured some travelers in the mountains, and holds them for ransom. He wants to clear the puzzle.

In the wild mountains, through rugged rocks, Le Rouquin follows the trail of the tourists captured by Zigomar. He obtains some information from an old shepherd and borrows his shabby clothes. Disguised in this way, always following the trail, he arrives at the grotto where the tourists are kept by Zigomar. Rashly, in his desire to capture the bandit, Le Rouquin goes into the grotto alone. He is recognized at once. His wig is torn off and the men dressed in black robes firmly bind him. Then he is laid on a big stone shaped like a tomb. In the presence of the terrified tourists, Le Rouquin is condemned, by Zigomar, to be crushed to death. A big stone, which descends very slowly, is suspended over his body. Just to be more cruel and to increase the sufferings of his enemy, the stone, from time to time, halts in its descent—then continues its slow descent. The "Z" withdraws, but one of them suddenly throws off the cape. It is Olga. She rushes to the pulley, stops it in its descent, cuts the cords with which he is tied, and gives him a pistol. A barrel of powder is in the place and Olga holds a torch near it, defying Zigomar, while Le Rouquin, the tourists and herself escape.

In the Opium Den

At Toulon, in the basement of a cabaret, frequented by sailors. No one can enter without a password. There a beautiful hall, nicely lighted, decorated in an oriental fashion, with big fans, parasols, and Japanese women, who are kneeling on the floor and offering opium pipes to the men who are lying on the floor.

An officer, seemingly in a stupor, is following an ideal vision. He sees beautiful feminine figures who disappear while they wave big parasols in slow rhythm. The walls, the smokers, everything has disappeared. There are only a few dancers who are following a slow rhythmical dance, presenting a beautiful fairy-like tableau.

Suddenly a man leaps at the smoker. It is Le Rouquin, who has recognized Zigomar. The latter, brusquely awakened, arises. A fight ensues between the two. Zigomar is almost captured; a second smoker who looks exactly like Zigomar, attacks Le Rouquin. But which is Zigomar? This minute's hesitation means a great deal for Le Rouquin, the two bandits having aroused the rest of the smokers against Le Rouqin, and consequently, he is compelled to flee, pursued by the "Z." He regains his motor boat and leaves the "Island of the Opium Smokers" in great haste.

The Auto Pursuit

The pursuit is continued on land, Zigomar and Olga disguised as a youth in one auto and members of the "Z" band in another. It is a terrible chase, autos going at full speed. An accident to the machine puts the detective and his companion at the mercy of their foes. Le Rouquin and Olga are prisoners in a peasant's hut. They are bound hand and foot before a big fire. Le Rouquin stoically puts his hand into the flames and in this way succeeds in burning the cord. He frees his companion and both run away, after first having dug a hole in the wall, which is made of small sticks. They then set fire to the house. Le Rouquin and Olga run across the plains. The "Z," noticing their escape, run after them. They arrive at a ford. Alas, the road is blocked by wild oxen—the fugitives are separated. Olga is overtaken by the "Z." Their leader is a woman, Olga's greatest foe. Olga, thrown off her horse by her rival, runs across the plain until she comes to a cliff. Here a terrible fight ensues between the two. Olga jumps into the water. Her foe pursues her. The fight continues in the water and both of them prove to be wonderful swimmers. Notwithstanding her courage, Olga fails. Her enemy grabs her by the hair and half drowned, carries her to the shore and gives her up to Zigomar.

The Mazeppa

Furious at Olga's treachery, Zigomar abandons her to the cruelty of her foe. The poor woman is attached to the tail of a horse, which they let loose.

Peasants rescue the unfortunate woman and in a pitiful condition they carry her to their house. There Le Rouquin finds her again. His hatred toward Zigomar knows no limit. He will avenge himself.

In order to deceive the gang "Z" Le Rouquin makes public that he was found dead, having been thrown from his horse. The "Z" thinking they are now secure, neglect to take as much precaution as heretofore. They gather together to celebrate their victory. At a certain moment when Zigomar is giving a toast, the door opens, Le Rouquin and Olga appear with policemen.

Le Rouquin, at last, triumphantly brings Zigomar before the magistrate. But the bandit is determined not to be taken alive. Olga's rival, arrested with the "Z," goes to Zigomar, and feigning that she is bidding him good-bye, gives him poison. A few minutes later, his mouth frothing, the miserable wretch falls dead. Justice is done!

"THE SMUGGLER'S DOGS"
(Lux Split-reel)

A love story, cleverly woven about some realistic scenes, in which the dogs used by the tobacco smugglers on the Franco-German frontier are tracked by the police dogs, or dogs trained by the customs officers for that purpose, is the Lux subject entitled, "The Smuggler's Dogs," the opening theme of a very interesting split-reel.

It is an exciting drama, well played, well photographed, and especially well adapted to the American picture house in that it furnishes in an entertaining way knowledge of this unique form of tracing smugglers. The smuggler's dogs are laden with small bags of tobacco, and having been carefully trained, they easily find their way home, standing at the same time a much better chance of evading the vigilance of the customs officers than their masters.

In the story, the daughter of a sergeant on the frontier police falls in love with a young smuggler. One evening he induces the girl to accompany him to the mountains. All night long they journey breathlessly onward until at last they arrive at the smuggler's haunt. The film gives alternate views of the dog chase and the wandering of the lovers. At last the smugglers, realizing that they have been discovered by the police, rush out and in the fight that ensues the girl is accidentally shot by her own father. The story is good, and has the advantage of being of an instructive nature as well as a drama of good quality.

The second subject is a very good comedy, entitled "Arabella's Flight." The two subjects cover in all 976 feet of film.

THE BABY'S SHOES

By VIRGINIA WEST

Adapted from Republic Release

THE two men lounged in a miserable attic room. The younger of them half lay across a table with his head on his arm. His face was handsome, in spite of the drawn look about the mouth and eyes. The whole expression was that of a weak nature struggling with a problem too big for it.

The other man slouched in a chair tilted against the wall, a pipe held firmly between his teeth. The muscles of his mouth had formed themselves into a perpetual sneer, but the expression of the eyes was not unkind.

"Say, pal," he said, letting the front legs of his chair down with a thump; "say, what the hell's the matter with yer? Ever since ye seen that old paper wrapped around that junk ye been mopey."

The man at the table did not move.

"Well, let's see," continued the other, rising and crossing to where an old torn paper lay on the floor. "Well, let's see what's the matter with Frankie, if we can. Price o' cotton goin' down. I reckon that ain't it. New candidate for President—reckon he don't wanta be President. No—no—let's see. Railroad wreck——" The man's tone grew a shade softer. "Say, son, youse didn't have nobody get killed?"

The younger man shook his head slightly.

The other leaned against the wall and continued scanning the wrinkled newspaper. After a few moments he said: "Mebbe this is it, only I can't read it very good, it's so tore. By Gosh! Here's your name, only I can't read the last one, it's tore off. It's Mrs. Frank somebody, though, and she's married to another feller. Say, pard, it couldn't be yer little wife give ye the go-by, could it? Well, well, well!"

"Frankie had a little wife,
He tried so hard to keep her;
But a handsome man he came along
And——"

"Stop!"

Frank jumped to his feet with blazing eyes.

"Yes, she was my wife and it's none of your d—n business!" he cried.

The man leaning against the wall dropped the paper and stood staring.

Frank sank into his chair again and dropped his head on the table.

"Well, I'll be eternally blowed!" said the other man under his breath.

After a few moments of silence he began walking uneasily around the room. Now and then he stopped, each time looking uncertainly and in a half-embarrassed way at his companion.

At last he nerved himself to it and walked to the table.

"Frank," he said, putting his hand hesitatingly on the young man's shoulder, "I know I'm a blunderin' fool, but I only wanted to stir ye up by teasin' ye a little. I didn't know nothin' about yer folks. I'm—I'm—well, I'm durn sorry I said that."

Frank stirred wearily.

"Oh, it's all right, Bill," he said, "I'm a fool, that's all. Just leave me alone and I'll be all right."

Bill threw himself across the tumbled bed and lay very still. But he did not sleep. After an hour he rolled over on his side, with his face toward Frank and said as gently as a man of his type could speak: "Say, kid, d'ye want to tell me about it?"

The young fellow looked at Bill dully for a moment. He started to shake his head, when something in the rough fellow's face stopped him. After all, it might help to tell it.

"There's not much," he began. "I got married when I was very young—only twenty-one. I loved my wife and she loved me—I think. After a year there was a baby girl."

Frank stopped and passed his hand slowly across his face.

"I used to laugh at young married men for the way they talked about their kids—but I tell you, Bill, it was a queer thing the way that little girl got herself wound around my heart."

Silence. Then in a hoarse voice: "There's not much to tell. She died and—and I—well, I didn't have the courage to stand it and I began to drink. My wife pleaded with me, but when I went home and found the house so quiet I just couldn't stand it, and so I went from bad to worse.

"In a little while my wife couldn't stand it any longer and so she got a divorce from me. I didn't blame her, and I thought I'd got over it all until I picked up that old paper and saw she was married to another man. Somehow it's all come back to me and—and—well, that's all, Bill."

The weary head dropped over onto the table again. Bill half arose and pushed a bottle toward his friend.

"Drink that," he said; "it'll cheer ye up."

Frank pushed the bottle away and arose.

"No," he said; "I've got a job to do to-night, and I need all my brains."

"Is it a good one?" asked Bill eagerly. "Is there much swag, ye think?"

"It looks like it. I don't know." Frank suddenly whirled round on Bill.

"Oh, it's rotten work, Bill, this thieving. When you get into it you can't get out. Some day they'll land me in the pen, then—no matter, it's all the same."

"Oh, say, kid, yer loosin' yer nerve. Brace up now an' be a man."

The young fellow gave a bitter laugh. "All right, Bill. I'll be a man," he said.

That night he did his work. When he returned to his room at three in the morning, the innocent bundle he carried under his arm contained many things.

Bill had not returned.

Frank secured the door, shaded the light and sat down to inspect his haul.

There were a few pieces of heavy table silver, some jewelry, a rather good roll of money and a little carved box which he had taken hastily, unopened, thinking there must be valuables in it.

He looked over the things, one by one, leaving the box until last, for he supposed he would have to pick the lock. But when at last he pulled the box toward him and examined it, it flew open at his touch. Inside was a soft lining like that of a jewel box, but it did not contain jewels. Instead, there lay a pair of tiny baby shoes.

The man pushed the box from him and shrank back from the table. Why was he so haunted with things to bring back torturing memories? It seemed that some devil followed him and stood grinning at his anguish. Would they never let him forget?

In spite of himself, he drew the box toward him again and lifted the little shoes from it. A card was attached. The man began to tremble. His hand shook and the tears blinded his eyes, but he saw enough to know that the card he held had been written by his own hand and the tiny shoes had been those of his little girl.

He bowed his head and his whole body shook with silent sobs. He had stolen his own baby's shoes—stolen from his own wife. But no, she was the wife of another man and it must have been that other man's house into which he had broken. Then the thought came to him, what should he do?

Long he sat, holding the shoes clasped tight in his hands, his eyes staring into space. When the first rays of the sun peeped in at the dirty little window Frank arose, pale and determined. He would take back the things he had stolen.

In the dim light of the early morning he wrote on what paper he could find, and told his former wife that the things stolen from her home on a certain night would be returned if she promised that the one returning them should not be molested.

It seemed to Frank that the time would never pass.

He was torn constantly by a conflict of feelings. He knew he should return the things he had taken but the thought of seeing his wife again and having all the old memories brought back stronger than ever, this thought sometimes made him almost determine not to ask at the post office for the answer to his letter. He had not given his own name and he knew that if he did not go for the letter he could not be traced.

But he did go, and the letter asked him to come to the house the next evening.

When the man was shown into the room where the woman stood waiting for him, he handed her the package containing the jewels, money and silver and the carved box.

The package the woman immediately put aside. "Oh, I am so glad," she said as she hugged the box to her breast. Then she opened it and raised the shoes to her lips.

Frank saw that she had not recognized him and he tried to leave the room before she had a chance to do so.

"Wait," she said quickly, as she saw him turn. "Tell me why you took these little shoes."

He spoke very low.

"I did not open the box—then, but its contents have brought back the sweetest and the saddest memory of my life."

"You perhaps had——" she stopped. "Oh," she cried, "it is Frank!"

"Yes. May I go now?"

The wife bowed her head.

"Will you take my hand?" he asked hoarsely. "Just for old time's sake."

She took the hand but did not lift her head. The man raised the hand to his lips, then turned to go.

"Frank!"

The man turned toward her.

Quickly she broke the ribbon that held together the two little shoes.

"Take it," she whispered, holding one shoe toward him, "take it—for old times' sake."

SOLAX BURNS AUTO FOR REALISM

An expensive touring car was recently burned on the Solax studio grounds. The action in the photo-drama revolves about two characters of the underworld. One tries his level best to be honest while the other is hardened to vice.

Madame Blache in talking to reporters on the burning of the car said:

"While it is not an ordinary thing to wantonly destroy an expensive automobile, still if the Solax Company believes that the plot or thread of a moving picture demands anything of the kind the matter of expense never stands in the way. The car that we used, to be sure, was a Duracq, three years old, and its engine was pretty well out of commission. It was not beyond repair, however, and was far from being a candidate for the junk heap.

"The picture in which the car was destroyed was entitled "Micky's Pal," and it tells a story of two crooks, one of whom reforms. Micky, the one who reforms, is engaged as watchman on the grounds of a large estate. In the part of the picture where the machine is burned Micky's employer has returned from the opera and his car is standing outside the mansion. At this point the chauffeur asks Micky to watch the automobile while he goes to get a drink, and while he is gone Micky sees his old pal sneaking through a rear door of his employer's house with swag.

"Micky leaves the automobile and runs after his erstwhile pal. The man stops and puts up a fight, and in the scrimmage both men manage to get back to where the automobile is standing. Micky has had his pipe in his mouth during the tussle. The pipe accidentally lands into the car, and being lighted, sets fire to the gasoline tank.

"We secured three separate pictures of the explosion. One we will use in the motion picture; another will be used in the 'Animated Weekly,' published by the Sales Company, and still another we have in reserve. There are a number of very interesting complications in the story, all of which make it a picture of great strength."

The picture was put on the stage under the supervision of Edward Warren, director of the company. It is said to be one of the strongest pictures ever used in films. Three separate cameras were focused on the fire. The principal roles in the picture were filled by Darwin Karr and Lee Beggs, the leading men of the Solax Stock Company.

MOVING PICTURES AMONG NON- CHRISTIANS OF PHILIPPINES

Secretary Worcester before starting on his annual inspection tour through the non-Christian provinces of Luzon, equipped himself with a stereopticon and cinematograph machine; also slides showing great buildings of New York, Niagara Falls, the Washington Monument, snow, ice, colored views and other interesting pictures, with seven cinematograph films, were taken along for the instruction and amusement of the non-Christians.

Great enthusiasm was shown by the people, and it is said that they went absolutely wild over the pictures, shouting with joy. Some of the explanations given the pictures by the primitive people are amusing. In particular Guiapad, a man of influence in the regions of Banaue and Quiangan, explained the Washington Monument with a story that it was one of the props upon which the earth rested, which had pierced the earth and come through to the other side. The Lubuagan people would have been so disappointed had the cine not been taken out to them that it was entirely dismantled and transported to that town.

Nothing that has ever been seen among these mountain people has caused so much excitement or been so much talked about as this cinematograph. The people called the moving figures "anitas" or spirits. Some thought them alive; others said that "Apo Dios" was moving the machine. More than at anything else were they astonished to see on the screen the pictures of their own people taken years ago, some of them now dead. And at the approach of a horse or train on the cine screen they would flee from before it, fearing the objects would run over them.

Oswego, N. Y.—J. H. Cordingly has received a permit to convert his store on East Bridge street into a moving picture house.

New York, N. Y.—W. J. Walters, of 237 West Thirty-seventh street, will open an airdrome on the southeast corner of Eighty-first street and Broadway.

Corpus Christi, Tex.—Charles L. Saxtion will construct Amusement Garden at 722 Chaparral street.

Paragould, Ark.—Marin & Keaton have announced they will erect an airdrome for the coming season.

VOTES FOR WOMEN

Reliance Release June 26th

The scenario for this photoplay was written by Mrs. Mary Ware Dennett, Mrs. James Lee Laidlaw, and Mrs. Frances Maule Bjorkman, and the entire production was made under the supervision of the National Women's Suffrage Association. By this it will be readily understood that it is not a burlesque on the Suffrage question. It exploits the favorite theories of the Suffragists—their reasons for demanding the ballot, etc. The suffrage workers are vainly endeavoring to win over Senator Herman to their cause, as his vote on a certain bill they favor means its passage. May Fillmore, one of the most ardent of the workers, discovers that the father of a little motherless tenement brood has died of tuberculosis after having vainly importuned the owner, Senator Herman, to make building alterations that will remedy unsatisfactory conditions. She goes to the Senator's fiancee, Jane Wadsworth, and succeeds in securing her help. Jane accompanies May to the poor bereaved family and she is shocked at the terrible lack of sanitation. They find three little girls and a baby left to fight the world alone. Elsie, the eldest, is doing embroidery sweat-shop work at home and minding the baby, while Hester worked in a department store. The other tot is a half-time scholar and in the afternoon assists her sister working on corset covers for another shop. All these fearful conditions are pointed out by May and have their desired effect upon Jane. She is further shocked upon learning that her fiance is the negligent owner. Jane goes to him and pleads that he do something in the matter. He waves her away and treats her like a child. Angered, she joins the Suffragists and assists in bringing both her father and the Senator to terms. Hester is insulted by a floorwalker in her father's shop, which proves another shock to Jane when her father does nothing in the matter. Later she is stricken with scarlet fever which she contracted from the embroidery on one of her trousseau gowns which came from her father's store. The father and Senator upon learning that they were in part guilty, as the embroidery was made in the Senator's unsanitary tenement, give in and most enthusiastically join the Suffrage movement. They are seen with the girls at Suffrage headquarters, at the Men's League, and finally in the parade. The following well known Suffragists assisted the Reliance players: Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, Miss Jane Addams, Mrs. Mary Ware Dennett, Mrs. Jas. Lee Laidlaw, Mrs. A. C. Hughston, Mrs. Harriett May Mills, Mrs. Charles Beard, Miss Eleanor Byrnes, Mrs. Raymond Brown, Mrs. Marcia Townsend, Mrs. Frances Maule Bjorkman, Mrs. F. Maule Cooley, Miss Inez Milholland, Miss Anna Maxwell Jones, Miss Ann Forsythe, Miss Mary Keegan, Mrs. L. H. Ozedam, Mr. R. C. Beadle, executive secretary of the Men's League; Mrs.

James Lee Laidlaw, executive committee, Men's League; Charles Wadsworth Camp, Editor Metropolitan Magazine, Witter Bynner, poet and playwright; Max Eastman, secretary Men's League; Frederick Nathan, executive committee, Men's League; also assisted. Among the Reliance players who took part in the picture were Miss Gertrude Robinson, Mrs. Balfour, Miss Delespine, Miss Pearl Egan, Miss Gladys Egan, Mr. Charles Herman, Mr. E. P. Sullivan, Mr. J. W. Backus and others.

AUX. LOCAL 35 I. A. T. S. E.

OFFICERS

John F. Stephens .....President
Sam Kaplan .....Vice-President
Gus Durkin .....Financial Secretary
Morris Klapholz .....Recording Secretary
Henry Weinberger .....Business Agent
Edward Phelps .....Assistant Business Agent

* * * *

The Auxiliary meets at Teutonia Hall, No. 66 Essex street, the first and third Monday of every month at 12 o'clock, midnight. Dues can be paid to Brother Weinberger at the union office, No. 133 Third avenue, or to Gus Durkin, care of Berkeley Theatre, No. 19 West 44th street.

* * * *

The regular meeting of Auxiliary Local 35, I. A. T. S. E., was held Monday night, May 6th, at 12 o'clock. When Brother Stephens called the meeting to order it could easily be seen that something out of the ordinary was in the wind, as every brother looked forward to a meeting that would go down in the annals of Auxiliary Local 35 as one of the most important of its five years' existence as a member of the International Alliance. The meeting in itself would have been interesting, as the election of officers was to be decided, but the meeting Monday night was a treat, a lesson, I may say a sermon, a meeting that the brothers who attended will talk about for a long time to come. They learned what unionism is and the benefit of organization from a preacher that has devoted his life to the good and welfare of the I. A. T. S. E., Chas. C. Shay. He spoke for a half hour and the only sound that I could hear was the scratching of my pencil taking down his speech, and, boys, I am going to keep that as a souvenir of one of the best half hours I ever pushed a pencil. The one thin gto be regretted was that the unfortunate brothers that did not attend cannot read it in the News, as Brother Chas. Shay's wisdom would make one of the strongest editorials that can be conceived of by a man of his years on the great question of unionism. He doesn't talk for effect or applause, but there is a ring of sincerity in his voice, a look of determination on his face, an eye that can inspire you with confidence and yet you stop as he speaks and wonder why his words produce a feeling that you carry with you always, a feeling that makes you talk unionism to your brother craftsmen. If we only had more men like brother Chas. C. Shay, the president of the I. A., you can bet your last sou that there would be a mutual feeling of friendship between capital and organized labor.

* * * *

Brother Clyde Spencer, of Local 39, New Orleans, was a visitor at the meeting of the Auxiliary. Although he did not do any talking, I know he was busy thinking, and hope when he thinks of New York he won't forget Auxiliary Local 35, I. A. T. S. E., and the midnight meeting he attended at No. 66 Essex street.

* * * *

Local 35 held their regular meeting Sunday, May 5th. The meeting was well attended and business of great importance was transacted by the body. The meeting adjourned at 5.30.

* * * *

Brother Theo. Ridder, who was connected with the Kinetograph Company, No. 40 East 21st street, for ten years as a machinist and operator, has decided to become an exhibitor. As soon as the weather permits he will open an air dome in the Bronx. At present he is connected with the Emergency Repair Company, No. 210 East 14th street. Brother Ridder is a creckerjack chauffeur and drove for P. L. Waters, the president of the General Film Company. Well, Theodore, your hat's in the ring of business, and Brother Girvan and I wish you the best of success in all your enterprises, but who doesn't want to see a member of Auxiliary Local 35 forge to the front.

* * * *

Brother Bob Saunders left New York with a six months' contract in his inside pocket from the Paragon Feature Film Company. His first stopping place will be Ontario, then Quebec, Ottawa, Montreal and the small towns to follow. Brother Saunders always was rated as a first-class road man and I consider the Paragon Company lucky in securing the services of Brother Saunders.

Brother Harry Patterson was on 14th street Monday. He is certainly looking prosperous. At present he is working at the Plaza Theatre, No. 168 Park place, Brooklyn, and as he has been connected with the house for two years that is ample proof that the proprietor knows a good operator when he sees one, and Harry is there in the projection line forty ways—a quiet, conservative chap, and is known by all the boys as a Beau Brummel. When it comes to dressing the fashion plates have nothing on my friend Patterson, always up to date both in projection and style. His operating room is as neat as a pin, and his work is only a criterion of results that can be attained by an operator that takes projection seriously. The seating capacity of the Plaza is 299, and the operating room can boast of a Type B Edison and a double dissolving stereopticon and a Powers No. 5. The admission charged is ten cents, and the S. R. O. sign is always out at the Plaza, where you dodge the trolleys and always find a union operator and good projection.

* * * *

I paid a visit the other night to the Metropolitan Theatre, No. 134 Essex street, and had a long chat with the congenial manager, Mr. Lewis Kassman, and the assistant manager, Mr. Jack Reich. They deserve great credit. With all their opposition, they are always ready with a new surprise to spring on their patrons, and talk about packing them in! It seemed to me there was only one theatre on the East Side and that was the Metropolitan. The projection at this house is par excellence. Both the operators are members of Auxiliary Local 35 and know their business from A to Z, and Jack Wernick and George Langor are well known to all the patrons of the Metropolitan as the operators that run the union slide. Keep to the union label, boys. It can do no harm when you put up a picture like you can. The music at this theatre is far above the average. The orchestra is led by Professor Young, of Local 310. All the acts are booked from Local No. 5, Hebrew Variety Actors' Union. That's what you call unionism, boys. Everyone wanting them wears a union button, and, what's more, they produce results. The outfit consists of two Powers machines.

* * * *

The Unique Theatre, No. 136 East 14th street, one of the first picture houses in New York devoted to silent drama, has dispensed with vaudeville and is now giving the best picture programs in the United States. I know this is a broad assertion, but the proof of the pudding is in the eating and seeing is believing. Six feature reels a day, with a three-reel feature. Going some! Well, I should say yes, and as the smiling manager watches the crowds that come and go it proves that with all the opposition on 14th street that the photo play can hold its own. Manager Flanagan has been conected with the Unique for seven years and is a real live, wideawake manager. His one ambition is to please everyone and his friends can be numbered in the thousands from all walks of life, and it's the smile of my friend Flanagan that brings the big politician as well as the newsboy to view the "movies" at the Unique. The projection is A1, both operators being union men. The musical program are effects ably taken care of, the house attaches polite and neat, and the manager always smiling, is a sure sign of big box-office receipts at the Unique Theatre on 14th street, and, I may add, he thinks the Moving Picture News the best ever. Do you share his views?

* * * *

Manager Ganes, of the Manhattan Theatre, 31st street and Broadway, was relieved of $390 on Wednesday, May 1st, by Gus Kriger, who was employed as an usher. Mr. Ganes sent Gus to the bank and he never came back, so it was "fare thee well" to $390. Gus was formerly stage manager of the Circle Theatre and the Cambridge Theatre, Cambridge, Mass., and also worked as a stage manager for some time at the Manhattan. His photo is in another part of the News and anyone knowing him or his whereabouts will confer a favor on Manager Ganes. His height is 5 feet 9 inches; weight, 190 pounds; clean shaven. His destination is thought to be Butte, Mon., and he will no doubt try to connect with a picture house, as he is a good all-round man. Mr. Ganes requests all operators, performers and musicians to keep their eyes open for him and wire any news to him at the Manhattan Theatre.

* * * *

To the Philadelphia brothers that wrote me I take pleasure in stating that all news of the local in the Quaker City will find its way into the Moving Picture News, and, brothers, I thank you for the interest you take in the little publication with the union label, with the union page, for the union man, and its editor, Mr. Saunders, is always willing to boost the man behind the gun. Your letter in full will be published in the next issue of the Operators' Chat. Again I thank you, brothers, and wish you and the local the best of luck, and beg to remain,

Fraternally yours,
TOM COSTELLO.

Brother Patterson, Montreal.—Am waiting for those pictures you promised to send; also let us know what the boys are doing in the projection line.

* * * *

Brother Aiken, when I called to see you last March you promised to let me know how things were going on in Utica. Up to date I have only got a few postal cards. Now get busy and write us a nice, chatty letter and let us know what the boys of Utica Picture Machine Local are doing.

* * * *

Brother Hale, of Toronto, says that there is a great improvement in projection through the Canadian west. Well, no one is any beter pleased to hear that than myself.

* * * *

Brother operators, don't forget to send in your name and address for cards of admision to the new big demonstration that is to be held on May 21st at 2 o'clock. This is something that ought to interest every operator.—J. G.

* * * *

Seems to me that Mr. John Boob, from Wichita, Kan., must have only been in the business a very short time when he springs such an old "chestnut' as that on us. I can remember using it myself in 1903 and 1904. We operators are always on the watch for new ideas, so if any of the "Boobs" from Kansas or any other State have any, why, let us know all about them. We will be only too glad to use them.

* * * *

Mr. "Man in the Baths," you would do us a great big favor if you could get one of the operators in Bathtown to let us have some of the doings there for our "Chat column," for from what you have written in some of your previous letters they must be a very smart lot of boys. So I would appreciate it very much if one or more would write something nice for our column.

* * * *

Brother Smith, Allendale, Canada.—Thanks for your good wishes. We are getting along very nicely with our "Column" now and we are receiving letters every day from our brothers throughout the country congratulating us on our Operators' Page.

* * * *

Brother Operators as we have not heard from you lately we would like to know if your education has been neglected and you only write when you get some one else to hold the pen. HOW JOHN THE BARBER AND MARXY MARX WERE STUNG

John the Barber, John J. Reisler by rights, who manicures, shaves and cuts hair by proxy at No. 169 West Forty-fifth street, and Maxy Marx, manufacturer of sartorial scenery for actors and others given to nifty raiment, have been stung.

It is bad enough to be deceived on identity, but the matter of being stung for hard cash is neither a small one nor one to most people's liking, and neither John nor Maxy were particularly hilarious over the incident.

It seems that William Horowitz, "of the Creek Indian Clan," posing as the vice-president of the National Exclusive Film Exchange, was introduced to Maxy by John, and that Horowitz inveigled Maxy to cash checks for him to the amount of $175. The checks came back marked "No Good." A council of war was held by the two wilted pals. Result—the prompt arrest of Horowitz, whose explanation "supposed" that the treasurer of his company had neglected to keep up his personal account in the Denver Bank. He promised to straighten things out and was held on a bail of $1,000 by Magistrate Appleton until the beginning of the next chapter.

THE PEER OF ALL MOVING PICTURE MACHINES

NEW YORK MANAGERS SAY

The machine has given entire satisfaction, and we will soon need more machines for our other theatres.
Arthur S. White, Manager Moving Picture Department, Percy G. Williams Circuit of theatres.

I am so pleased with the result that I shall install another Simplex machine in place of one of another make.
Wm. J. Gane, Manhattan Theatre.

We consider it far ahead of any other machine, and have since put them in our other theatres.
Walter Rosenberg, Savoy Theatre.

So well pleased am I with our "Simplex" that I would not give one screw of it for any other entire machine on the market.
Harry Levine, Manager, Riverside Theatre.

Its precision in construction is such that it stands up to the excessive hard work, and we have no more annoying breakdowns.
E. Stern, Proprietor, Bleecker Theatre.

The new "Simplex" projector is undoubtedly the best machine we have ever operated.
E. J. Crane, Eden Musee.

After using the other machines, I cheerfully state that the "Simplex" is decidedly the best.

NANINE, THE ARTIST'S WIFE
Gaumont Release, June 9

Nanine and Yolande are two quaint, charming peasant girls of middle France. Often have they heard of the large city of Paris but never have they seen or tasted of its pleasures. They are entirely contented with their lot, however, and never expect to get much further than their paternal dwelling, until one afternoon when the two girls in the company of two young peasant admirers, while frolicking over the fields, intrude upon the privacy of Maurice Crosby, the noted French artist. The latter recognizes the beauty in the girlish pair and becomes fascinated in particular with Nanine.

Seeing possibilities of the most wonderful model in them and also goaded on by his love, he pays Nanine a visit only to be reprimanded by her father. Excusing himself for the intrusion the artist takes his departure only after leaving his address with the young peasantess and assuring her that he would want to be the first one to give her assistance any time she might be in need of same.

An opportunity for calling upon Maurice was soon granted through an accident which befell the girls' father. Nanine writes him of her plight. The artist sends back hasty word for her to come on to him where she can find honest work.

Nanine and Yolande leave for Paris in all their peasant finery and arrive at their benefactor's studio only after having been a curious object to the eyes of the citizens of the big city. Crosby, however, is able to make good use of them and is even inspired by their presence.

The preference that he seems to pay to Nanine soon arouses the jealousy of Yolande, who quarrels with her sister and makes her feel so uncomfortable that she decides to return home.

As she leaves the door to start her homeward journey, Maurice intercepts her and, refusing to listen to her reason for going home, pledges her his love with the result that they are married.

Thus is the dainty little Nanine properly rewarded.

THE TALE OF AN EGG
Gaumont Release, June 13

Young Mary is indeed a pretty, winsome, little damsel, but somehow or other she has never met with the right fellow. This is probably due to the life of isolation that she leads a way off in her country home town. During her vacation she evolves an original scheme to make known her wishes by writing the following on a newly laid egg: "I am young, pretty and rich; I want to marry a nice young man," to which she signs her name and address and awaits further developments. After many, many incidents, the egg is finally served hard-boiled to three young gallants in a town restaurant. The one that reads the mission on the egg notifies the rest and the three start off in a hot pursuit. The address takes them to a well-worn mansion, under the grape arbor of which they discover an old maid, of whom they inquire for "Mary." She very exultantly informs them that that is her name, whereupon two of the three make their escape, the last being held in her clutches. He produces the egg, believing that it must be a mistake, but she informs him that she is the authoress of the letter on the egg, which by that time was written thirty years ago when both she and the egg were fresh. The dismay of the young gallant is, however, turned to exultation when old Mary introduces a most charming young niece who accepts the obligation of marrying the handsome beau brummel whom her aunt had corralled.

JIMMIE AS HYPNOTIST

Jimmie is deeply interested in the science of hypnotism. He studies, drinks and sleeps it. One evening during his parents' absence while he is engaged with his sister in the wonderful influence of hypnotism, the servant, Orphelia, helps herself to his mother's toilet dainties. Jimmie, without confiding to anyone else, notices the theft but keeps it concealed until his parents return. They, not suspecting the maid, place the blame on Jimmie's shoulders, who, however, assures them that he is not at fault and can produce the culprit through his understanding of hypnotism. Without further ado he puts his little sister (whom he has taken into the secret) in a hypnotic spell and, of course, she singles out the culprit.

CHAMBER OF FORGETFULNESS
Eclair Release, May 21

A jealous husband suspects his beautiful wife of flirting with men. He seizes one opportunity to accuse her and mistakes some love letters, which she is keeping for a girl friend, as being addressed to her. He is so bitter that the unhappy young woman dies of a broken heart and the husband sends the little son to be raised by another family. For fifteen years he leads his solitary, bitter life, and all that time the bed chamber of his wife has been sealed just as she left it. The son demands some keepsakes of his mother and with his father enters the closed boudoir. There they find the proofs of the mother's innocence and the son is infuriated against the father for his bygone cruelties. The two sadly seek the mother's grave where they discover each other praying: the dead loved one appears in a vision and they become reconciled at last.

THE BEAUTY SPOTS
Eclair Release, May 24

The son of wealthy aristocratic parents falls in love with the daughter of a self-made man. The girl pricks her face with a thorn from some roses and the youth puts a tiny piece of court plaster on the spot, which has the effect of a fascinating beauty spot. The youth proposes, asks the father for the girl's hand, and is informed that she can only marry a man who works. The youth answers several advertisements for help but is not taken seriously. He has a fantastic dream of his sweetheart and myriads of beauty spots and conceives the notion of making beauty spots fashionable and going into business. He gets into all kinds of scrapes promoting the fashion but finally succeeds and is taken into partnership with Dr. Grump's Toilet Specialties. With his partnership papers explanations are made to his sweetheart and her father and he is forgiven and accepted. In the finale the colored maid appears also in fashion with a white beauty spot on her black face.

MARRIED WITHOUT KNOWING IT
Eclair Release, May 26

Jacqueline has two lovers: Cabochard and Finot. She loves Finot and declares she will not marry Cabochard, whom her father has, however, decided she should marry. Jacqueline, despairing, implores the aid of her mother, who also favors Finot. She promises to help her daughter, but as she cannot give her opinion openly, she will think of some plan. An ingenious woman friend of hers, associates with her in planning the trick which will make the father change his mind. Jacqueline pretends to receive Cabochard with more courtesy. One day while the happy lover is with her, a woman comes in followed by nine children and carrying two in her arms. She rushes to Cabochard, accuses him of having abandoned her with all her children, and upbraids him for his intention to marry. The lover, stupefied, tries in vain to explain. The betrothed and her mother pretend to be very angry, while the children cling to Cabochard. The father arrives, puts Cabochard out and consents to receive Finot as a husband for his daughter.

THE THIRST FOR GOLD
Imp Release, May 27

John Brown leaves his ohme in the East to seek his fortune in the gold mines of the far West. For fifteen years he struggles against fate—the riches he has sought so long and arduously do not come to him. After this, his last desperate effort, he had decided that if still unsuccessful, he would return to his Eastern home. He fails to find the precious metal and his provisions being out, and his supply of water almost gone, he breaks camp and starts across the desert to the nearest settlement.

He loses his way and for several days wanders aimlessly. In the distance, he sees a figure approaching. When they meet, he discovers it is a young man, a prospector like himself—unkempt and disheveled—without pack or water bottle, also that he is delirious, presumably from thirst. He seizes John's water bottle, and there is a terrific struggle. He is finally overpowered. The stranger offers nuggets from a rich strike he has made for a drink of water. John refuses, for there is only a few drops of the liquid remaining. The young man pleads for his mother's sake, and John is again about to refuse, when he sees a vision of his own mother, as he last saw her fifteen years ago, and he tenders his bottle. Together they start out on their long journey through the desert.

They are suffering greatly and are almost exhausted when far in the distance John sees

BELLS OF PARADISE

1 AND 3 SHEET LITHOS. HERALDS, BOOKLETS, PAMPHLETS.

A story supremely graceful, delicate and touching. Costumes and actions picturesque. A film completely colored by hand. Scenes carrying one into the interior of Louis XVI cathedrals, gardens, castles and fields. In fact the most harmonious bit of film beauty that Gaumont has yet offered. The acme of filmdom—A PICTURE DE LUXE. Even better than THE CHRISTIAN MARTYRS and THE MARGRAVE'S DAUGHTER.

a railroad train. Knowing there must be water in that direction, they strain every effort to reach the distant spot. The stranger is exhausted and John almost so from carrying him. At last the goal is reached—here is a water tank—John pulls the rope releasing the water, and both men fall into it.

The younger man, thinking he will die, gives John a paper showing the location of the mine, which he was crossing the desert to have filed, and offers it to him if he will promise to take care of his mother, a photograph of whom he also shows to John. In this pictured face, to his intense amazement, he recognizes his own mother! And the young prospector is his own brother, Walter, whom he left at home a small boy. The shock of finding a brother revives Walter and they then make their way to town and file the claim. Then home to mother and luxury.

The story closes with the two brothers being warmly welcomed by the mother in the East.

UP AGAINST IT

Imp Release, June 1

Amos Bently was up against it in more senses than one. Times were so hard with him that he had to part with the furniture of his little apartment in order to pay his debts. However, things were inclined to take a better turn for him.

He was invited to be a guest of some friends of his. And between him and the daughter of the family some sort of heart interest was supposed to exist. Disinclined to accept the invitation at first, he yielded to the persuasions of his friend, the brother of the girl, and made his way to the host's house. Unfortunately his nether garment gave way in a somewhat conspicuous place and in attempting to conceal the tear, while the evening party was in progess, poor Amos suffered a great deal of torture.

Finally, he was shown into the room of his probable fiancée. And while in the act of searching for a needle and thread was discovered by her father, who had not yet made the acquaintance of Amos.

Poor Amos stood in imminent danger from an ugly-looking revolver which Mr. Crampton pointed at him. However, his peril was discovered in time by the girl and her brother, and the lady, lending him a convenient dressing gown, proceeded to help him out of his sartorial difficulty and at the same time intimated to him that she would not be disinclined to darn his socks for an indefinite period. So the young couple was made happy.

This is a whirlwind comedy of laughter and fun; rapidly played by King Baggot as Amos Bently, Vivian Prescott as Louise Crampton, W. E. Shay as her brother, Frank, and W. R. Daly as the father.

THE ART OF SILVER PLATE MAKING

The art of silver plate making as illustrated in this film is the result of a special concession given to the Imp Films Company by one of the most eminent firms in the world, Sheffield Plate Co., of New York City. We see the fashioning of the metal into various articles for table and decorative uses, and the mechanical appliances of a first class silver plate making factory in actual operation.

The photographic difficulties of the dimly illuminated interiors have been well overcome and the result is that the film presents an excellent series of views of the actual operations of silver plate making industry. From the rough sheet metal to the finished and highly engraved dish or salver, the illustration takes an interesting course in this picture.

THE PERIL
Imp Release, May 30

The peril that threatens in a greater or less degree the entire civilized world is the keynote of our current picture.

Hokoruma, a Japanese soldier, is sent to San Francisco to ohtain, at all hazards, a plan of the new harhor fortifications, about to he erected. He registers at a Japanese employment hureau and through this means secures a position of hutler in the home of the Commanding General, Colonel Jones. This gives him the opportunity of learning and seeing much that is necessary for him to know in accomplishing his end.

The Colonel's daughter, Clara, is engaged to Lieut. Pond, and the marriage is dated for the near future. At the Officers' Club Lieut. Pond is guilty of an act unbecoming to a gentleman, and the Colonel, who is severe but just, offers him the choice of two alternatives—court-martial, or resignation. The Lieutenant is overwhelmed with the threatened disgrace. But he thinks he sees a means of escape—he will persuade his fiancée to elope with him—the Colonel would never carry out the proceedings against his son-in-law.

He enters Clara's home secretly and while waiting in a dark room, while she is preparing to join him, a man stealthily creeps in and endeavors to make away with some important papers, which are kept in a secret drawer. Recovering from the surprise the Lieutenant springs on the intruder and there is a terrific struggle, at the height of which Clara enters the room. She is horrified to see her lover in the clutches of a supposed burglar, and immediately arouses the household. Her parents appear, and the spy succumhs to the vigorous hlows inflicted hy his opponent. When the lights are turned on, it is revealed that the would-he rohher is none other than Hokoruma, the butler.

Lieutenant Pond is, of course, fully forgiven hy the Colonel, who is saved from disgrace hy the courage displayed by the man whom he was to court-martial, and to whom he now willingly and gladly gives his daughter.

A MESSAGE FROM BEYOND
Solax Release, May 29th

Charles Kingsley's parents gave him everything they had when he left his home to start husiness in a large city. Charles, like other country hoys, hy undivided effort and persistent application, made his way to the top. He married a woman of high social position and has children, a son and a daughter. The daughter inherits her mother's snohbish characteristics but the son is a democrat.

Kingsley's mother, a good, old homely lady, not having seen her son for a number of years, decides to surprise him with a visit. She arrives just when the family is making elaborate preparations to receive the Governor. Naturally, the snohhish mother and daughter make the old lady's welcome an unpleasant one. They don't know what to do with her until an emergency occurs in the kitchen. Young Mrs. Kingsley then has her mother-in-law attend to the preparation of the dinner. The old lady is only too happy to he of service and joyfully undertakes the work of the cook.

When Kingsley, Jr., however, comes home and learns that his grandmother is doing the drudge work, he goes down there and sticks hy her side, and in his boiled shirt and dress suit assists her at her lahors. He appoints bimself her entertainer and does nobly.

The old lady, not long afterwards, dies and leaves young Kingsley her large painted portrait. Soon after when Kingsley is in difficulties he imagines he sees the spirit of his old grandmother and she seems to point to the portrait of herself. Several times this occurs and in order to satisfy her spirit he goes to the portrait, takes the picture out of the frame, and to his delight, finds an envelope containing a good deal of money. The story is convincingly and strikingly told in pictures.

JUST A BOY
Solax Release, May 31

Mrs. Armstrong, having lost her cbild, is unconsolably unhappy. She passes a rather aimless existence. Even her devoted hushand who pays her constant attention, cannot take her out of that phlegmatic mood. One day she comes upon a policeman in the act of arresting a street urchin—a waif—a kid, who delights in street sports—such as dice throwing, leap frog and hanana-swiping from tbe "Ginny's fruit stand." He is a wild hoy—horn and hred to the streets.

The hoy loves dirt and delights in mud.

She rescues the waif from the arms of the law and tries to bring bim up as she would have hrought up her little boy—had he lived. She tries to make the hoy comfortahle and happy and she almost succeeds—but the boy meets on the street some of his former associates and they rile him with jeers and call him "Sissy," and mock at his fine clothes.

The hoy goes hack home—to his fine room. He is thoughtful and morose. He has not been comfortahle in tight shoes and clean linen. He longed for his rags and his old pals of the corners and the docks. Witb an air of determination he decides to go back to his former life—that care-free existence of the streets. He answers the call of the wild. He is just a hoy.

UNCLE HIRAM VISITS WASHINGTON
Reliance Release, June 5

RELIANCE.

The Reliance Release of June 5 will prove a very interesting one at this time in view of the coming election. It pictures Uncle Hiram, a countryman making his first visit to the National capital. He arrives at the station, visits tbe equestrian statue of General Wm. Tecumseh Sherman, sees the Washington Monument and is surprised at its height of 555 ft. He sees the capitol from the top of this monument. He goes into the treasury where he meets Lee McClung, treasurer of the U. S., who shows him $10,000 in gold, then forty million dollars in ten thousand dollar gold certificates. He is shown a receipt for the largest single money transaction in the world. Leaving the treasury he sees the White House; the statue of Andrew Jackson; takes a walk along Pennsylvania avenue and sees the Lihrary of Congress. Coming to the White House Uncle Hiram sees the members of the President's Cahinet leaving and recognizes Secretary Meyer of the Navy, Secretary Wilson of Agriculture, Secretary Stimson of War, Secretary Hitchcock, Postmaster General, Secretary Nagel of Commeice and Labor, Secretary Fisher of the Interior and Attorney General of the U. S. Wickersham. Uncle Hiram recognizes Admiral George Dewey and is shown the guns the Admiral captured at Manilla. He sees Major General Leonard Wood, Chief of Staff, U. S. Army. Within the White House are shown the executive offices; the East Room (this is the first motion picture ever showing the interior of the East Room) interior of the President's office; W. M. Pennell, the President's private doorkeeper; Rudolph Foster, Assistant Secretary to the President, and Major Thomas L. Rhodes, the successor to Major Archihald Butt, martyred hero of the Titanic. Outside the White House, Uncle Hiram sees two of the President's body guard mounted on motorcycles. Then he catches a glimpse of the President himself leaving the White House. Having seen all there was to see in the city, Uncle Hiram leaves for home.

KAINTUCK

Reliance Release, June 8

Kaintuck is a big mountaineer. He loves his sweetheart, Sue, with his whole simple, honest heart. One day an artist comes to sketch in their vicinity. He is immediately struck by Sue's beauty and asks permission to use ber as his model. Kaintuck is not pleased with the idea but the girl consents. When the artist secures board in Sue's home, Kaintuck's jealousy knows no bounds. One day he sees the artist posing Sue and noticing that the man's arms are about the girl he decides that she loves him. But the artist thinks only of Sue as a model. His heart is given to Dora, her sister. One day the artist stumbles upon an illict still in the woods and inspired by it's picturesqueness he takes out his book and starts to sketch it. Some moonshiners who have been watching him think he must be a revenue spy who would be better out of the way. So they lead bim out to shoot him. The girls see him and Sue rushes up to plead for his life. Kaintuck, coming along, saves the artist for Sue's sake. Later he comes to the girl, telling her that he will give her up to the man she loves. She is surprised—and when Dora comes along with the artist the situation is explained to everyone's satisfaction.

JESS

Thanhouser Release, May 21

PART ONE.

Silas Croft was a kindly old Englishman who had a farm in South Africa. With him resided his two nieces, whom he had taken from their drunken, worthless father when they were of a tender age. Jess, the elder, was brilliant and educated; Bess, the younger, was beautiful, but frankly admitted that she did not possess the mental attainments of Jess. The two were great friends, and Jess, altbough only the senior by years, had almost a motherly affection for her pretty little sister.

Croft, finding old age stealing upon him, advertised for a partner, stipulating that he must be a gentleman. Probably it was bis secret idea that the right man might come along, and fall in love with his favorite, beautiful Bessie.

Captain Jobn Neil, an English Army officer, wbo found his income insufficient to support him in his profession, heard of the business opportunity and accepted it. Jess, the unimpressionable, speedily fell in love with him, and her womanly intuition told her that she could win him, for he was fascinated by her. The girl was happy for a while, but suddenly learned that her little sister was also in love with the handsome Englisbman.

Tbe elder girl realized that happiness for her meant sorrow, probably life-long sorrow, for Bess. Accustomed to making sacrifies for the girl she so tenderly loved, Jess made another. On the pretext of a visit to an old school friend, she absented herself from her home, knowing that Neil would be bound to fall in love with Bess, who was beautiful and amiable.

Thanhouser Release, May 28

PART TWO.

The expected happened. At the time Jess departed, Neil liked both girls, but preferred Jess. Thrown into daily companionsbip with Bess, he soon grew to love her, and made ber happy by proposing to her. And little sister wrote to big sister, telling her the glorious news, never suspecting the truth.

Jess received the letter in her place of refuge, and rejoiced that she had been able to ensure the happiness of Bess, while at the same time she wept in secret over the fate that had taken all romance out of her young life.

The two nieces of Silas Croft, an Englishman who has an estate in South Africa, are both in love with their uncle's partner, Capt. John Neil, a retired army officer. Jess, the elder, realizes that her sister's affections are centered on Neil, and makes a pretext to leave the farm, believing that by so doing she will ensure the happiness of little sister Bess. Matters turn out as she had anticipated and in her distant home Jess, with mingled feelings of joy and sorrow, receives news of tbe engagement.

At this time, the rebellion which freed the Transvaal from British rule, was brewing. Croft, who at first doubted that any trouble was impending, at last realizes the gravity of the situation, and Neil consents to go to Pretoria and bring Jess home before it is too late. The gallant soldier arrives in the city, but is unable to leave witb his charge, because the Boers have besieged the place, and even courtiers cannot pierce the lines.

A certain Frank Muller, son of a Boer and an Englishwoman, is one of the leaders in the revolt. He had proposed to Bess, and been rejected. Learning that his successful rival is in Pretoria, he plans to dispose of him. Pretending great friendliness, he sends Neil a pass for Jess and himself, signed by Oom Paul Kruger. The unsuspecting Englishman falls into the trap, and with the girl, leaves under the charge of a Boer escort, furnished by Muller.

These men have been tricked into believing that Kruger has ordered that the couple be killed, and while they are crossing a river, fire upon them, and believe they are slain. Jess and Neil, however, have a miraculous escape.

Thanhouser Release, May 28

PART THREE.

Following the crossing of the river under fire, on their way to Pretoria, Jess and Neil become separated, and the girl reaches the farm alone. There she finds that the villain, Muller, has been ahead of her, and that her uncle is a prisoner, on a charge of treason. Muller, who is military head of the district, tells Bess that Croft will he convicted and hanged unless she consents to marry him. The girl, however, refuses, the court-martial is held, and when Jess arrives, her uncle is sentenced to die at dawn, a few hours away.

There is no one to whom she can appeal, and Jess, grief stricken, decides to be her own avenger. Muller is asleep in his tent, waiting for the dawn when the last of the protectors of the girl he covets shall be separated from her by death. He awakes with a start. Bending over him is Jess. He believes it is a visitor from another world, for he could have sworn that he had seen her die a horrible death. Stricken with terror, unable to speak or make a motion, he goes to his death, his last thought being that there is a life beyond the grave, and that evil brings its own punishment.

Jess wanders away into the desert and dies. Neil searching, finds her body. The troubles of the others are finally swept away, and Neil and Bess live happily many years in their Englisb home, never realizing that they owe everything to tbe self-sacrificing Jess, althougb they sincerely mourn and miss her.

WHOM GOD HATH JOINED

Thanhouser Release, May 31

A young mechanic, temporarily residing in a Southern City, found that business was slack in his trade, and decided to send his wife to her relations in the North until happier days dawned. He did not dream that he was putting her in peril, and when later he received word that the ship upon wbich she sailed had heen lost with all on board, he was frantic with grief and self-reproach. Life in this city became hateful to him, and having no ties that bound him there, he abruptly departed into the country, deciding to wander wherever fate might lead him.

He found, that after a period of sorrow and suffering, his lines were cast in pleasant paths, for he met a kindly old farmer, who offered him a job, and soon grew to absolutely trust him. His employer had a daughter, and as time passed on, the girl showed him favor, while the farmer made it manifest that he would be only too glad to trust the future of bis child in the hands of one who but a short time before had been a stranger.

The young man did not love the girl as he had loved his wife; but he was very fond of her, had almost a filial affection for her father, and gradually, as time dulled his anguish, he became convinced that his happiness depended upon a second marriage. So he proposed, was accepted, and the course of true love seemed to be running very smoothly.

In the meantime, the wife was slowly regaining her strength. She had not met death in the wreck, but was the one survivor, having been found, nearly dead by some fishermen, who had discovered the broken fragments of the ship. When able to sit up, her memory was gone, and it was not until many weary months had passed that sbe was able to remember who she was, and what had happened.

By this time the husband had vanished, and the poor weak woman found it impossible to trace him. She kept up the search, however, and finally, by chance located him, reading in a paper of his approaching marriage.

The wife reached the house on the day set for the ceremony. There she met her rival, arrayed in her wedding gown, and told her who she was. The untutored country girl, in her first moment of anguish, denied that the man of her choice was the husband of the other woman, and fiercely ordered her away. In terror of her life, the wife departed, and the country girl followed her to the porch of the house, and grimly watched her as she staggered off. She saw her attempt to cross the railroad tracks, slip and fall, striking her head on the tracks and lying there unconscious. The same moment the watcher heard the whistle of the approaching train, and knew that if she refused to aid, that the obstacle that might prevent her marriage to the man she loved would be removed.

First she watched her grimly, determined that she should die. The train was coming on rapidly, but the woman's thoughts traveled far more swiftly. She hated her rival bitterly, but she could not let her die. In the end she dragged her from the tracks, restored her to her husband, and tearfully watched the couple as they departed from her life, happy after their long period of suffering.

The girl remained at the farmhouse, and during the long lonely years that followed, she frequently wondered whether she had done right in sacrificing her happiness. "Is love worth a crime?" she mused, and somehow she could never answer the question to her own satisfaction.

Champion Release, May 27

THE RANCH WOMAN

In this story of Western life on the border Peggy Wilson, a ranch widow, comely and winsome, has become infatuated with Juan Gonzales, a Mexican gambler. To be sure, she doesn't know that Juan is really the character he is, although her cowboys try to open her eyes to the fact; especially her foreman, Bill Shank, who has a tender streak himself in her direction. The Mexican, pretending great devotion for the widow, manages to extract various sums of money from her willing coffers, which he gambles away.

For a side diversion, Juan has a beautiful senorita as a string to his bow, and she proves his undoing with the widow. Treating the senorita, as was his wont, in a nasty way, her mother urges her to betray his double dealing in hearts and cards to the widow. This she does. The widow, aroused by the information received, verifies its truth in person and casts her infatuation and its cause to the dogs.

The spurned Mexican lover vows vengeance and proceeds to carry it out. He plots dire deeds against the widow. In the meantime, Dark Cloud, a Chippewa brave, whom the widow has done a good turn earlier in the game, sees a chance to befriend his benefactress. The fateful moment which the villain has set for the dark purpose, is the ringing of the Angelus. This moment arrives and the widow is there, lured to her doom. But so also is Dark Cloud; and the vile Mexican meets his Waterloo. The Indian lifted him into the air and hurled him over the brow of the cliffs.

HEROES OF THE BLUE AND THE GRAY

Champion Release, May 29

A "Veteran" story that has an appeal for those who love the heroes on either side of the great struggle. Two old veterans—one who fought under Grant, the other under Lee—are together on a family picnic. Becoming reminiscent of the days of '61, they quarrel. This quarrel leads them to separate their respective children, who are sweethearts. But the children quietly rebel against this mandate, and traitorously meet in love's fond embraces. In the meantime the two old codgers have fallen asleep, and sleeping they dream of the days when souls were tried in the fiery vortex of internecine strife.

Now we see the old fellows as youthful heroes. With martial tread and bearing, we see them in the van of battle. Charge and counter charge is made, and these two leaders meet and clash. Then each from the lips of Lee and Grant, receive words of praise for their valor. Then fades away the havoc of war. The two old veterans awake once more to life's present realities, and their sleeveless coats.

Then comes Memorial Day and the G. A. R. Veterans are marching to the cemeteries. Each one betakes himself to a grave with flowers and flags. The Confederate's son died at Gettysburg, the Yank's father at Antietam. By these two graves they meet in silent commune. Then they hear the familiar "taps" and as they turn to, they stand face to face. Once more appears a vision to them of their old leaders and comrades. Then the old fellows salute and they clasp hands with fervor. And in the background comes the sweethearts in warm embrace. And as we gaze on the vision which the old veterans have conjured up, and behold the grand union of hearts and hands, we rejoice while dropping a silent tear for the Heroes of the Blue and the Gray.

THE SOLDIER'S LAST CALL

Republic Release, May 28

Two old veterans, one a Yank, the other a Rebel, both inmates of the country poor house, have been cronies for years. The Yank always carries his old bugle while the Southern veteran is never without his sword, which he uses as a cane. Both old men live close to the Military Academy which they often visit and in which they soon become great favorites.

They are both present when the funeral of a soldier takes place, and in a spirit of mischief the Yank tells the Southerner that no military honors will be accorded him when he dies as there are no rebels left. This preys upon the old man's mind until he finally writes a letter to the commander of the Academy, begging him to give him a military funeral when he dies, as he has no kith or kin nor a Southern Army to do this for him. When the letter is read at the barracks there is not a dry eye among the hundreds of cadets who unanimously vote that the old Southern soldier be notified that full military honors will be accorded him at his funeral, though they are in hopes he will be spared to them for many years.

Sham battles are quite often indulged in by the cadets, and one day while one of these batles are gonng on the old Southerner is awakened from a dream of by-gone days by the rattle of firearms and canons. His half-awakened condition makes him think he is back on the firing lines among his own soldiers. Forgetting his weakness and old age and filled with a spirit of patriotism, he dashes towards the scene of battle just as one side is retreating. He swings his old sword over his head and cries to the boys to "charge" and leads them against the opposing side. The boys thinking the old man is joining their sham battle cheer and follow him—but alas, his poor old heart has been overtaxed and as he climbs on the breastworks he totters and falls, and the spirit of the old rebel goes to its rest.

The soldiers of the Academy bury him with military honors. After the last volley has been fired and the academy bugler is about to sound taps, his old Yankee crony with the old bugle under his arm begs permission of the Captain to let the music of his old bugle performs this service. As the last note dies away the old Yank falls across the grave of his friend and the two souls are joined never to battle or part again.

THE OTHER MAN
Republic Release, June 1

Norman O'Neill and George Fitzhugh are in love with Nora Danver. George proposes to Nora and is informed that she is going to marry Norman. George encounters a man and a woman and believes he recognizes Norman; he immediately returns and informs Nora of this; she disbelieves him, but nevertheless is persuaded to accompany him. Nora believing her fiance faithless decides to break the engagement.

In the meantime the man and woman come to the entrance of the Danvers estate. The man leaves the woman and enters the grounds. Nora's father is asleep in his armchair in the library and is awakened. He finds an intruder searching his desk; the intruder overpowers him and in the struggle, the father believes he recognizes Norman.

Nora meets Norman on the lawn and informs him that she saw him with another woman and that she has reason to believe him faithless and will listen to no explanation.

Nora's father, who has been injured by the intruder, staggers from the house. Norman and Nora come to his assistance and the father tells of the robbery and accuses Norman of the theft. Norman, dazed at the accusation, and realizing that things look black for him and that even Nora believes him guilty, decides to escape. The soldiers are informed and sent in search of Norman. They come across a man whom they believe to be Norman, but he eludes them. The escaping man is finally shot by the pursuing soldiers, but takes refuge in a tunnel. There he encounters a man and a struggle ensues. After the struggle one man is lying on the ground and the other, whom he recognizes as Norman, runs from the scene as the soldiers approach. The man is raised from the ground. George accuses him of theft, calling him Norman's name. The man informs them that he is not Norman and, realizing that he is near death, confesses that he is the one who is guilty. George sees the remarkable resemblance between the man and Norman and later, when he comes across Norman, he tells him of the mistake and of his double's confession.

FROM GRASS TO GLASS
(The Milk Industry.)
Rex Release, May 23

There is something distinctly inspiring about a glass of pure milk, something clean and sweet and out-of-doory. If you have the merest imagination you will be carried off on a train of thoughts to a patch of Paradise in the Eden of Summer; and if your imagination has had a few rehearsals you might even see a soft sunset, with the contented kine lowing their greeting to the descending night. A glass of milk has a lot of psychological suggestion and influence, too. Place some milk and, say, some whiskey, side by side; surrender all your faculties, relax all your muscles and fibres, and mechanically reach out for one of the glasses; it's almost a safe prediction that you will take the milk without knowing why or how. Of course, there are a few colonels and other nuts who would pick up the whiskey if they were asleep, but in our little psychological experiment, we don't include this constituency. Now, wouldn't this result justify the belief that the underlying elements in our composition are wholesome and natural? See, even a glass of milk can teach a lesson of life.

A Message from Beyond

RELEASED WEDNESDAY, MAY 29TH

The grey old grandmother has a message. She sends it from the world yonder—and the grandson who had entertained her and helped her peel potatoes while dressed in a boiled shirt and dress suit, receives the message at a time when he most needed it. A remarkable sermon on the law of recompense.

Just A Boy

RELEASED FRIDAY, MAY 31ST

A good home and clean surroundings could not compare in "Shorty's" estimation with dice-throwing and banana swiping from a "dago's" fruit stand. "Nix," said "Shorty," after a taste of it, "on this Sissy stuff. The docks and muh pals are good enough for me." "Shorty" could not resist the call of the wild and left a good home rather than grow up and be a "Sissy."

"From Grass to Glass" is a pictorial tribute to milk and the system that brings it to the breakfast tables of the metropolis. From the modern dairy farm nestling in the lap of the Berkshire mountains we skip to the cows themselves and show their nurses, feeding, grooming and milking; the receiving station; loading and icing cars; transferring the milk from the city railroad terminal to the Pasteurizing Plant; passing the pasteurized milk over the cooling pipes at the rate of 8,000 quarts per hour; washing and sterilizing cans and bottles by automatic processes; testing for bacteria; colonies of bacteria after incubation, and other interesting facts and factors in the most wholesome industry in the world.

Then—one of the consumers. And maybe that baby didn't "have another."

STARS THEIR COURSES CHANGE
Rex Release, May 26

Not all men who are worthy of success attain it, but all men who attain success are worthy of it—even in love. It's the man who fights just a little bit longer, the man who won't give up just yet, even though his hopes are only a prayer, who usually wakes up one morning to find the victory has surrendered itself. Faint heart and craven fears are love's greatest enemy; with which bit of obvious philosophy we will proceed with a tale of three loves, two as strong as youth and truth and one as weak as a mockery.

What if she was an actress—she was a petite, sweet, neat young thing, as pure as a young rose flirting with a zephyr. He thought he loved her an awful lot, and perhaps he did love her a little, but she loved him with a depth and devotion such as woman gives to man but once in her life.

Now this young man was not entirely independent. His uncle supplied the money for the flowers and dinners he tenderly tendered the girl. And it just happened that his uncle had an indefinite anonymous aversion for stage girls. So when the kid told him all about his romance and the one who had created it and her vocation, the silence of the listener and the hopes of the speaker were shattered. All the many fond dreams that had found shelter in the boy's mortgaged mind were suddenly dispossessed, and sent scattering on the highways of despair. Have we told you, or haven't we, that the boy was just a little weak?

So he went to the girl and explained that if he married her he would be disinherited. The girl listened, and it would do your heart good to see the resolution and determination slowly graduate into a dynamic, dominant impulse. In the zest of her new zeal, she turned upon her lover and "Listen," she said, "let's show him there's something in us. I'll get a position as stenographer, you do something, anything, we'll both make good, then, with his consent, we'll marry." It might have been the soft, strong light in her eyes, it might have been the intense, intoxicating voice, but he caught the spirit of hope and the hope of endeavor and he accepted the challenge and charge.

But he was just a little weak, so he tired of a man's work and laid down. That's just what he did: he laid down. Poor, weak boy, he laid down. So he crawled back and told his uncle that he had changed his mind and was ready to do as directed. And would you believe it—his uncle was a real man, you know—it angered him to think that he had given up and he disinherited him anyhow.

The girl conquered the despair that followed the realization that her love-god was an idol of tin—and incidentally conquered the uncle's dislike for stage girls. In fact—well, you might hear of their marriage soon.

THE WHITE BROTHER'S TEXT
Powers Release, May 28

Indian Louis is a converted red-skin and is laboring zealously in the cause of Christ. He opens a mission in a mining camp and tacks a notice in a conspicuous place inviting the miners to attend devotional exercises at his cabin. The miners are a rough lot and they resent the intrusion of the Indian. They send him word to leave the country or they will do him violence. He pays no attentin t the threat with the result that they call on him in a body and force him to quit the camp. Pete, a drunken miner, takes the initiative and handles Louis roughly. The Indian returns to his own people and there converts a brother to Christianity. Pete goes on a prospecting expedition and is bitten by a scorpion and staggers away for help. He is found by the cnverted Indian, who takes him to the camp of the Indians, bathes his wound and administers herbs to relieve the pain. He leaves his patient for a moment and Louis appears on the scene. He recognizes in Pete his old enemy and is obessed by a desire to kill him forgetting the teachings of his Bible. He stealthily steals upon the prostrate Pete and raises his knife when the convert returns and stays his hand. He admonishes Louis to remember the text, "Forgive Thine Enemies," one that Louis has always preached. The knife falls from the hand of Louis and he is repentant and begs the forgiveness of Pete. The latter recognizes the spirit of forgiving and extends his hand converted to the faith that Louis has always preached. It is a strong story with the locale in Old Mexico.

HIS SECOND WIFE
Powers Release, June 1

Mr. Ellison is living happy with his second wife and theirs bids fair to be an ideal union. His daughter, Alice, by his first wife, comes to make her home with them and the first cloud darkens their existence. Ellison is very fond of the daughter, a beautiful young woman, and they spend many hours together, the wife being ignored, unintentionally. She resents the attentions of her husband for the girl and her life is suddenly made miserable. On one occasion Ellison gives his wife a present, a portrait of Alice, and then her bitterness is made complete. Arthur Maxwell, a young man with much leisure time on his hands, visits the vicinity and spends much time in the pretty grounds. He is found by Ellison, his wife and daughter and the owner of the estate recognizes in him a friend and gives him the freedom of the grounds. Alice and her father are, as usual, engrossed in each other's company, and Mrs. Ellison goes to find them. She meets Maxwell, stumbles and falls, when she is supported by the young man. The situation is most compromising when Maxwell appears on the scene and finds his wife almost in the arms of the young man. He steals away and when his wife returns home there is a stormy scene. He accuses her of flirting and she retorts by accusing him of neglect that he may spend his time with Alice. The girl listens and comprehends the situation. She has been the means of the quarrel. She hastens to Maxwell and begs him to go and not further compromise her step-mother. He promises to do so and writes a note to Ellison exonerating the wife. Mrs. Ellison has left the house but meets Alice, who forces her to return and, through her intercession, a complete reconciliation is brought about. Alice destroys the note and is happy. A beautiful story admirably acted.

THE POWER OF MELODY
Nestor Release, May 20

Albert Earle, a talented musician, lives in a small rented apartment. He is out of work; his bills are due and, having pawned everything of value, he is utterly discouraged Janet, his wife, implores him to take his latest composition to the publishers but Earle, knowing the futility of such visits, refuses. His little daughter's illness, however, compels him to take his song to the office of Henry Biglow, who roughly turns him down without a hearing. On his way home, Earle buys a paper and eagerly searches its help wanted column while Janet prepares the simple meal. Seeing an cafe, without waiting to eat his supper, he hurries out and procures the position.

The Bigelows' only daughter, Georgia, is somewhere in the city, preferring cafes and music halls and the company of fast men and women to the home of her parents. The parents' efforts have been unsuccessful in their attempts to bring the wanderer home.

On the night of the violinist's engagement, Georgia Biglow with Fred, Bob and Florence, her companions, visit the cafe. While they are drinking and making merry, Earle plays the song which had been rejected. It touches the heart of Georgia as she listens. The plaintive melody recalls her parents and home and makes her realize the kind of life she is leading. When the music is ended there are tears in her eyes.

The following night Georgia comes to the cafe with her friends, hoping again to hear the song that had such a strange effect on her. Earle softly plays it, and the struggle begins. Will she give up the life that holds such evil fascination for her Will she return to father and mother? Can they forgive her and take her to their arms once more? She cries and sobs when the music ceases. Earle, who had been playing the song directly to her, suspecting its power, rushes to her side. She has made up her mind to go home, knowing that she will be welcomed and forgiven if under the power of that music. She tells Earle so and he escorts her home. There on the porch at midnight, she tells him to play; to play the melody as he alone can play it; as he never has played it before. He does so. Biglow and his wife hear the sweet strains of the violin. What does it mean? It brings sad recollections of their wayward child. They rush to the door, there to see the erring one waiting with outstretched arms. She is quickly taken to their arms and all is forgiven. Biglow tells the violinist that he owes the violinist a great debt but Earle is content and well rewarded in the knowledge that his melody has had the power to move a wayward heart and bring happiness to a sorrowing home.

SANTA MONICA ROAD RACE
Nestor Release, May 25

This free-for-all automobile race smashed all world's previous records. Teddy Tetzlaff, in "Owensmouth Baby" Fiat, came in first, time 3:50:57; average 78.71 miles an hour, making new world's record. Caleb Bragg, the young Pasadena millionaire, in Fiat, came in second, time 3:54:65 and David Bruce-Brown, winner of the Savannah free-for-all, came in third in his Benz car, time 3:56:32.

This was the greatest race ever run on the Santa Monica course, also the cleanest, for this race, which may be said to have marked the supremacy of the sport in all respects, had scarcely an accident, for all the tremendous and and grim toying with death. Very thrilling it was, as the automobiles flew along the Nevada turn, which is known as Death's Curve. One man was rendered unconscious by a piece of tire from the big red Fiat which Barney Oldfield was driving. Bad luck still pursues Barney Oldfield, for he suffered more accidents to his car than any other pilot.

To Bruce Brown, who came in third, fell the honor of reeling off the fastest lap of the day, five minutes, 27.25 seconds. He was unable to assume the lead, however, as he was forced to the pits for tires and Tetzlaff, in his 90 horse-power Fiat, went on his championship way..

OILFIELDS, CALIFORNIA

A succession of highly interesting and instructive pictures showing the famed oil fields of Bakersfield, Cal.; the Kern River; a gusher; the building of a reservoir with a capacity of one million barrels; the pumping of water with compressed air to prevent inundation of oil strata; the wonderful Summerland oil wells in the Pacific Ocean and a most spectacular fire.

HOW THE RANGER WAS CURED
Nestor Release, May 22

James Morgan is a patent medicine fiend. Whenever his wife, the litle girl, his cowboys or himself are sick or even ailing, James insists upon them taking all sorts of patent medicines and, as a consequence, everyone becomes worse after the doses. The only one who absolutely refuses to take his patent medicine is the foreman, Tom Merrill, for he claims that when he wants to drink whiskey, he will take it pure. Alcohol in any form, however, is prohibited on the Morgan ranch and the foreman cures the boys of the barmful patent medicine habit by showing them the Pure Food Law label on the bottles, which proclaimed that 65% of the compound was alcohol.

On this particular day, Morgan sends away the doctor from his sick child, quarrels with the foreman in regard to a new brand of medicine he had bought; insists upon his wife taking a dose and takes a goodly amount himself. He lays down to sleep and Morpheus takes a hand. After a horrible nightmare, in which James kills two men by forcing them to drink entire bottles of his favorite brand of patent medicine, P-Dope-A; is pursued and finally caught by the sheriff and his posse, and the doctor is shoving a great big gar down his throat, James awakes to find the medico forcing him to drink some medicine in order to restore him to consciousness. The vivid impression that his wild dreams have made upon him, or rather his attack of delirium tremens, caused by freely imbibing P-Dope-A, makes James declare, then and there, that never again would he touch patent medicines.

As a result, in a few months, not only himself, but his wife and child, are restored to health and happiness. Moral, when you are sick, get a doctor..

LOVE'S CALL

Majestic Release, May 28

Jack Morgan upon being jilted by the girl he loves, decides to renounce the world and enter a monastery. On the day that he seeks the monastery he happens to see a pretty blind girl who is on her way to the sanitarium. Jack is received as a novice and applies himself fervently to prayer.

In the meantime the blind girl, May, leaves the sanitarium with a nurse. They are going to take a walk through the country. The nurse discovers that she has forgotten something and returns to the sanitarium.

May wanders away and unknowingly walks on a railroad track. She hears the train coming but gets bewildered and does not know which way to turn.

Jack, also out walking, sees the girl and saves her life by drawing her away from the tracks. He takes her to the gate of the sanitarium. She gives him a little pin and feels his face that she may know him again. He gives her a rosary.

Some time later her eyes are cured. She rushes out into the sunshine alone. Morgan sees her, returns to the monastery and changes his novice for civilian attire. The girl knows him at once. They become very friendly and he realizes that she feels the love for him that he feels for her. He bids her wait for him.

Going back to the monastery he tells the abbot that he loves May. The kind old priest who has been watching him all unknowingly, bids him go back to the girl.

Jack returns to May and brings her to the abbot who gives them his blessing and tells them to go in peace "for the church must have tne undivided heart."

THE OUTLAW'S SISTER

Victorgraph Release.

Mary Wells, a stenographer employed in an express office, is commissioned to carry $10,000 across country, as the manager of the concern knows that the outlaws will not suspect a woman. She starts on her way, stopping at her house to tell her mother, and is overheard by Tom, her wayward brother, who decides to steal the money from her. He follows Mary and attacks her—robs her of the money and rides away. The sheriff of the county, riding by, hears her cries and starts in pursuit after the thief. He catches Tom and takes the money away from him, and is seen doing this by an eavesdropper who immediately starts on her way to the express office to tell them what she has seen. Mary, in the meantime, has ridden up to where Tom and the sheriff are, and after pleading with the latter promises to marry him if he lets Tom go free. He consents and Tom rides away just as the manager and his assistants come on the scene from another direction. To save Tom the sheriff confesses that he had held up Mary and taken the money. They hold up the sheriff, search him, relieve him of the money and take him to jail. Tom later marries and settles down in another county. Five years later the sheriff is released from prison and starts for Mary's home, where he is received with outstretched arms by Mary and her mother. They tell him of Tom's reformation and all ends happily.

What is the Perfect Moving Picture Machine?

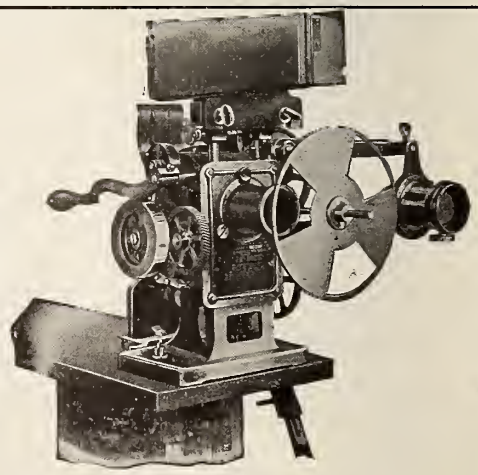
First, it must please your patrons. They must have a clear, flickerless, steady picture. POWER'S NO. 6 positively projects perfect pictures. That's the machine for them.

For yours, Mr. Exhibitor: an easy running machine—one a child can operate, hut which will do a man's work—a machine whose parts are exposed and getatahle when necessary; almost noiseless in operation, composed of the finest material that money can purchase, with the delicate adjustment of a watch, and firm as the hills eternal; a machine that will see you through twelve months in the year. That's the machine for you.

The perfect machine must please hoth patrons and exhihitor. POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH NO. 6 has over five thousand users who are living proofs that it does this always.

If you use alternating current the ideal combination is POWER'S NO. 6 with two-wing revolving shutter and Power's Adjustahle Inductor. POWER'S INDUCTOR saves the maximum amount of current and operates without heat. It excels particularly in the hrilliant steady light made possihle hy its use.

Wrife today for catalogue D fully explaining it.



Nicholas Power Company, 90 Gold St., New York

For fourteen years the leading makers of motion picture machines.

TO WRITERS

The Editor

(The Journal of Information for Literary Workers) published in your interest for eighteen years, is the magazine of which Jack London said: "I may not tell a hundredth part of what I learned from THE EDITOR, but I may say that it taught me how to solve the stamp and landlord problems." It is a monthly stimulus to the production and sale of more and better manuscripts. Besides articles of concrete, practical worth by editors or by writers successful or about to be successful, each number contains in "The Literary Market" all the news of all the magazines, new and old, that pay for manuscripts.

Just now $1,500.00 is offered in prizes for poems. Full details in current number of THE EDITOR, which will be sent for 15 cents. The yearly subscription is one dollar.

COOKE LENSES

are imported from a European factory where lens-making is a fine art. Evidence of this is seen in the beautiful finish of each lens-mount, but PROOF lies in the rare quality of the photographs. Three-fourths of the world's photo-engravers have discovered that no other lens will stand their searching tests.

Cooke anastigmat lenses are made for all purposes. Write for fine catalogue with "Helps to Photographers."

Genuine Parts or "Dupes"

Do you know what is being used to repair your MOTIOGRAPH—Genuine parts or "Dupes"—

A genuine part is made by the manufacturer of your machine with care as regards quality and fit, and every genuine MOTIOGRAPH part is interchangeable with the part on your particular model—

A "duped" part is of the cheap "thrown together" variety made of cheap material by cheap workmen and made to sell cheap, without regard to fit or service.

It is up to you, Mr. Exhibitor, to see that only genuine long-wearing quality parts are used in your repair work.

We warn you but cannot force you to protect yourself—but if your dealer cannot supply genuine MOTIOGRAPH parts send direct to us.

"THE PERIL"

HERE COMES "THE PERIL"!

(Copyright 1912 Imp Films Co.)

It is a 1000-foot feature, absolutely different from any Decoration Day release ever produced. King Baggot and a strong supporting company at their very best. If you don't begin to ask for it now, you may not get it at all. Released Thursday, May 30th.

"THE THIRST FOR GOLD"

(Copyright 1912 Imp Films Co.)

Another of those magnificent Western mining Imps. There hasn't been a mediocre one in the whole series thus far, and there isn't going to be! This one has the real "punch" to it. Released Monday, May 27th.

BAGGOT IN A SCREAMING SPLIT "UP AGAINST IT"

(Copyright 1912 Imp Films Co.)

This is not only a "split" reel but it tells the story of a "split" pair of trousers. King Baggot goes into society and rips his panties. Then the fun begins. If you don't scream with laughter at this film, you've got a wooden Indian lashed to the mast. On the same reel we release "THE ART OF SILVER PLATE MAKING," one of the most interesting things you ever saw. Secured by special grant from the makers of the famous Sheffield plate. Released Saturday, June 1st. Get it!

Sales Company Program No Affected by Withdrawal of Some Members

TO EXHIBITORS:

The withdrawal from the Sales Co. of a number of manufacturers, who have alli themselves with a stock-jobbing scheme which, if successful, would have throttled the e tire Independent market, does not affect the high aims and principles of the Motion P ture Distributing & Sales Co. nor the quality of the weekly program.

The scheme attempted to be carried out by a coterie of men had for its object t control of factories and exchanges, which would have permitted them to absolutely d tate the prices for rentals and would have afforded them a market for such film as th might produce, regardless of quality. This was so contrary to all the principles which the Sales Co. was founded, that the Sales Co. refused to co-operate therewit and the original founders of the company declined to sell them either their factories exchanges.

Other brands of films are being substituted for those that have withdrawn. Amo them are the Victor, in which Florence Lawrence appears, under the direction of Har Solter, who directed all Imp and Lubin productions in which she has appeared, and t Gem, directed by George Nichols, until recently director of the Thanhouser Co., a prior to that of the Biograph Co. The Itala Co. resumes its releases of one reel subjec produced by well organized stock companies which cater to the American market. T "101" Bison stock company has added new directors and actors, and is issuing one re subjects of the same quality as its feature two and three reel films. Release dates are no being fixed for a large number of sensational and spectacular two and three reel subject

It will therefore be seen that the withdrawal of members who were unsuccessful utilizing the Sales Co. for their selfish and private interests is really a benefit inste of a loss.

A glance at the new Sales Co. program should convince every exhibitor that he w receive from this company better subjects than ever before.

DIRECTORS, MANAGERS AND ACTORS

SO many letters on this subject have come to us, some mentioning the names of firms and, even individuals, some very spleenish and hard to believe, which we have only been able to place in the waste paper basket. We have selected the two following letters out of the batch:

May 17th, 1912.

Mr. A. H. Saunders,
30 West 13th street,
City.

Dear Sir: Why do so many of the picture companies pay so little attention to their scenario department? They seem to go on the principle that anyone can turn out a picture play.

How long would a theatrical manager last if he depended upon his advertising men, his bookkeepers and his office boys for his plays? Or how long would a paper last whose editorials were written by its pressmen?

Why should the picture directors be expected, or allowed, to alter and change scenarios as they see fit?

There is not one theatrical director in the city who would be allowed to change a play he was rehearsing without calling in the author or the manager. Now, are we directors (yes, I am one) so much more brilliant?

I have heard picture directors say that they could not put on a picture that did not appeal to them. How long would our brothers of the stage last who could only put on a play that they themselves liked?

Wouldn't it be the wise way for the picture manager to hire a capable scenario editor, a capable stage director, insist that the director make no changes without consulting the editor, and hold each responsible for his own department?

Now, Mr. Saunders, please let us hear from you on the subject, and see if you can't make some of these people, who will spend thousands of dollars on scenery and properties, spend a little more on the most important part of the picture, the scenario.

Very truly,
"A Director."

May 17th, 1912.

Mr. A. H. Saunders.

Dear Sir: I have read with a great deal of interest your articles regarding the immorality of some of the moving picture shows in this city, and for once did not want to believe that you were right, but after a personal investigation of two studios found that, as usual, you knew all of the facts before you wrote anything on the subject. Only this evening a young lady friend of mine told of one studio in which she could not work, as she could not stand for the insulting language of the director.

I am very glad to say that these are the only cases that I have known of, having been fortunate in being employed by companies whose managers were gentlemen, and would employ only those who were ladies and gentlemen.

I hope that you will keep on the subject until a lady will be as safe from insult in a moving picture studio as in her own home.

Very truly,
"An Employee of the Pictures."

After publishing the above we feel like closing our columns to this subject, believing that full publicity has been given to the matter, and we feel assured that many of the abuses will be remedied, and that we have done well in calling the attention of our readers to the existing state of affairs.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF ADVERTISING.

"Advertisers want results from their advertising." This is a saying that goes without contradiction, and how to select the medium which meets their wishes and gains those results is a problem that advertising agents all over the country have been trying to solve. This is almost as inscrutable as the riddle of the Sphinx and very few are they who can honestly say they have solved the riddle. We want to have a heart-to-heart talk with our advertisers, present, past and future. The reason for commencing this article is the fact that we have on our desk a letter asking us to give the writer information concerning such and such manufacturer and the pertinent question, why that certain advertiser does not appear in our columns? These are questions that every individual manufacturer can answer for himself. The Moving Picture News is open to every one, irrespective of what and who he may be.

The reason the one advertiser does not appear in our columns, is the fact that we have asked payment in advance with his advertising copy. The reason the other does not appear is the fact that they demanded that we take out the money in trade, offering us a proposition the same to be liquidated in advertising in our columns. This we absolutely refuse to do, holding that an editor who engages in business in addition to his editorial capacity can never be unbiased, and it must naturally follow that he will do more for the firm or firms which he is identified with, to the detriment of other advertisers in his paper; consequently we have refused over and over again to be identified with any firm or series of firms, either holding stock or shares therein.

But to revert back again to our article, "the keyed advertisement," we want to tell our readers that we placed keyed advertising in our paper and got results galore, and only five of them mentioned the Moving Picture News. This advertisement appeared nowhere else and out of some 82 replies all referred to other papers. (Readers are requested to mention M. P. N. when replying to ads therein.) The best test we have to offer is the fact that the St. Louis Motion Picture Company advertised nowhere else than the Moving Picture News, and their advertising in our columns netted them 3,800 replies and we suppose a considerable proportion of orders therefrom. Another instance that has occurred very recently, a certain film had been advertised in three papers and the manager of that advertising campaign told us that 45 per cent. of the replies were received through the News. One other illustration, six papers were selected for an advertising campaign. Paper Number 1, which claims a quarter of a million circulation, brought 184 replies; another paper, whose representatives state they publish 10,000 a week, received 163 replies. Paper Number 3, who will not say what their circulation is, received no replies; paper Number 4, since gone out of existence, received no replies. One of the oldest papers in the country, claiming an unlimited circulation, received 15 replies. This we call paper Number 5. Last, the Moving Picture News, received 31 replies. When we were shown these figures we felt a little downcast, and those who read the above will also say it is a little small, but when we take into consideration the class of our readers and the following results, we want all advertisers and intending advertisers to take special note of these telling figures. The orders received from 1, with 184 replies was 4. Orders received from 2, with 163 replies was 7. Of course no orders came from Numbers 3 and 4, nor did there from Number 5, but from the Moving Picture News 26 orders were netted. Is this worth anything to the advertiser?

Again to make a little test for an advertiser, we resorted to a method for bringing replies which not only astonished the advertiser, but created a friend who will always stand by the News. The Moving Picture News is read from cover to cover by every man in the industry and we offer a test to advertisers which if they dare to take up would certainly make many more friends than we have at present, but there is not a man with courage enough to take up our offer which has been made to every advertiser. This will not only answer our correspondent, but put at rest the question of merit or demerit in the eyes of our readers.

In conclusion, replying to requests to open our paper editorially to the detriment of some of our advertisers and to boost those who do not support us, we want to say distinctly and emphatically that we are going to maintain an absolutely neutral position at this time of day. We are not at all interested in factional quarrels. The only stand we have taken and maintained from our inception has been that of the great principle of letting every man be free to work in his own way, and protesting against the monopolizing of an industry by patents that do not exist, and when it comes to fighting little matters between individuals the Moving Picture News is absolutely closed.

FIRE! FIRE! FIRE!

Moving picture films when lighted generate their own oxygen, giving off poisonous vapor, and, of course, this condition makes such a fire exceedingly difficult to extinguish. It is hardly necessary to say that anything which will tend to eliminate or minimize such fires is worthy of instant attention on the part of all film manufacturers and moving picture men. In the interests of our readers we have made an investigation of the various fire extinguishing devices now on the market, and as the result of this have found one which is far superior to the others on fires in highly inflammable materials. We have arranged for a demonstration of this extinguisher and urge the attendance of all moving picture men.

The demonstration will be given at the factory of the manufacturer, where facilities are at hand for drawing an arc to represent actual conditions in a booth. They will break this arc, removing the cause of the fire without injury to the operator or danger to the moving picture apparatus. They will demonstrate the action of this extinguisher on fires in moving picture films They will endeavor to show exactly how large a quantity of burning film can be successfully extinguished and under what conditions. They do not claim to be able to extinguish fires which have assumed great proportions. They request co-operation on the part of all moving picture men and a careful investigation of their product as the only known means of coping with this most dangerous class of fire. In addition to fires in celluloid, the manufacturers will demonstrate the effectiveness of their extinguishing compound on other classes of vicious fires met with in actual experience. These fires will include burning material saturated with gasoline, benzine, naphtha, kerosene, etc., and fires in calcium carbide.

We urge the attendance of all moving picture men to this demonstration, which will be held Tuesday, May 28th, at 10.30 a.m. The date and time were altered to suit the numerous requests from operators, who are keenly interested in this subject, and exhibitors who wish to attend and cannot make it convenient for 2.30 p. m. Tickets of admission may be secured upon application to The Moving Picture News.

The demonstration will take place at the Pyrene Manufacturing Co. plant, 410 East Thirty-second street, on Tuesday, May 28th, and those who have not applied for tickets are requested to take this copy of the News as a voucher. If any of our readers have old films to be tested, will they take old junk with them to this demonstration, which we want to be as effective as it is possible to make an experiment.

We have received a communication from the Kleine Optical Company through Mr. George Kleine, in which he states that the Kleine Optical Company have never had a fire. We are exceedingly glad to hear of this, and the error was ours to some extent. We had overlooked the fact for the moment that the Kleine Optical Company had transferred their exchange to the General Film Company, and that the Kleine Optical fire should read the General Film Company fire.

A correspondent also called our attention to an omission of the Lubin great fire in Philadelphia It is such fires as these that we want to prevent, and we believe the demonstration as above outlined will make it easier to suppress them at the commencement.

We want all readers who can be present at this demonstration to be there. Full report will appear in our next issue.

THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS LEAGUE OF AMERICA

Cincinnati, O., May 14, 1912.

Moving Picture News,
New York City.
Gentlemen:—

Under a separate cover I am sending you a group photograph of the officers of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Kentucky.

M. A. Neff, president of the League, C. M. Christenson, national secretary, O. B. Weaver, state treasurer and W. A. Pittis, vice-president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Ohio, were present at a meeting of the Local Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Columbus on Tuesday. After they visited the local organization they, with Mr. Max Stearn and the president of the Local, Mr. Maddox, held a council at the Chittenden Hotel in the interest of the State League.

Big preparations are being made for the Toledo Convention. Cincinnati Local No. 2 held a rousing meeting at the Sinton Hotel, Monday, May 13th, at 1:30 P. M.; several visiting members were present and eight new members were added to the list. A motion was passed that every member of Local No. 2 secure the National Certificate of membership signed by the president and secretary and hang the card in a conspicuous place in the front of his theatre. Every member present paid the required amount, 50c, for the card and in the near future every local theatre which is eligible in Cincinnati will have a certificate of the National League displayed in front of his theatre.

The new code which is to govern the motion picture theatres of Cincinnati was read section by section and will soon be ready to present to the proper authorities.

Very truly yours,
A. FENWICK,
Secretary.

CONWAY'S "CALLED BACK" A FILM

Hugh Conway's great novel, "Called Back," has become Thanhouser film, in two parts. It is the first two-reeler to follow that company's "Jess." Mr. Conway's story is one of the best known mystery-dramatic efforts in the English language and the name alone will draw. The release day is Friday, June 21st. There will be enough "paper" put out with it to enable the exhibitor to "bill it like a circus." The mystery element will be a feature of the paper, too.

Yoakum, Tex.—The Airdrome erected on May street is nearing completion.

Altoona, Pa.—A Natopolis will open a moving picture show at 1121 Eleventh avenue.

May 11th, 1912.

Moving Picture News of New York,
New York City, N. Y.
Gentlemen:—

The Second Annual Convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America is to be held in Chicago, on August 13th-17th, under the auspices of the Illinois Branch of the Exhibitors' League.

You will notice the names above of the Executive Committee who is handling this great work. Two nights have been set aside for the showing of both Association and Independent films at Orchestra Hall. The Publicity Committee will print a souvenir program, of which 50,000 will be distributed. The LaSalle Hotel has been accepted for the holding of our Convention on the above dates.

Kindly give this copy a good spot in your paper, and hoping to hear from you, we remain,

Yours truly,
MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA.
L. H. Frank,
Chairman Publicity Committee.

NESTOR RELEASES

An exceedingly novel and most dramatic photo playlet is "The Foreign Spy," the Nestor release of Monday, May 27th. The story is told in one elaborate scene, and so tense it is, so realistic the acting, that one is held completely under a spell from the reading of the main-title to the finish. It may be truly said that "The Foreign Spy," is unquestionably one of the classiest feature films ever produced.

Josephine Ricketts, as the "Spy," ascends to histrionic heights; while Sidney Ayres, as the avenger, acts with uncommon repose and remarkable strength. Russell Bassett, Donald MacDonald and Harry Von Meter complete the all-star cast. The quintette of sterling actors is a treat to behld.

views of the beautiful California hills, and not a few startling feats of horsemanship. Betty Keller and Lee Moran do some fine work and cleverly outwit the sheriff. The photoplay is truly Nestorian.

A TRIP TO THE GARDEN OF ALLAH

("Our Roving Commissioner.")

Mr. J. Parker Read, Jr., has just returned from a trip to North Africa and the great Desert of Sahara after a sojourn of over two months.

The object of Mr. Read's journey was to secure a 3-reel feature production of the original Garden of Allah, made famous by Robt. Hichens in his book by that name, and later by Liebler and Co., in their production of the dramatized version at the Century Theatre, New York City.

This enterprising young man, among a number of others, endeavored to secure the moving picture rights of the play which, however, were held at such an enormous figure as to make them beyond the reach of anyone but a capitalist.

It was at this point in the history of the securing of the pictures of the original beauty spot in the desert that Mr. Tyler, of the Liebler Co., suggested to Mr. Read the taking of a motor trip to the Garden of Allah, which is situated at Biskra, in the Desert of Sahara: And acting promptly upon Mr. Tyler's advice the young man took the trip by motor through France and Algiers, through the wonderful gorges of Chablet, on to the City of Constantine, founded by Julius Cæsar, thence to El Kantara, called the Gateway of the Desert, around which Robt. Hichens wrote his well-known book, "Barbary Sheep," and eventually to that marvelous paradise in the midst of the parched sands of Sahara, the Garden of Allah.

From this trip Mr. Read has brought back some wonderful films of scenes as they are to-day at the Garden of Allah. In and around Biskara, to which spot the Read party motored 150 miles across the desert, several pictures were secured of native dances, the most barbarous of which is that of the "Howling Dervishes," who ran daggers through their cheeks, and burned themselves with hot irons directly in front of the moving picture camera.

It is interesting to know that the same trip was taken by a party dispatched by Liebler and Co., previous to the launching of "The Garden of Allah." as a stage production. Among this party were scenic artists who reproduced perfect facsimiles of the scenes around which the play is woven. And it is still more interesting to patrons of the moving picture theatre to know that Mr. Read has brought with him moving picture scenes which are identical with those in the marvelous Liebler production. The history of this Garden in the desert may not be generally known. It was created some twenty-five years ago by a lover of beauty, a Frenchman by name Count Landos who paid the French Government no less than $100,000, for the concession which gave him the right to turn the water from several oases into his garden. In Mr. Read's words; "No more beautiful or romantic spot could possibly be imagined."

It was in London that Mr. Read secured his equipment and the services of expert camera operators before starting on his trip; and it was from Paris that the motor car which carried the party started on its long journey.

The marketing of these films will be commenced in earnest by Mr. Read within a week or ten days—as soon as his lithographs and other advertising matter are in shape to deliver. He is making his headquarters at his office in the Exchange Building, 145 West 45th street.

SCENE FROM "OLIVER TWIST," WITH NAT. C. GOODWIN AS FAGIN Feature Release of the General Film Publicity & Sales Co.

THE noted Sargent Cuff, when up against a difficult proposition, invariably whistled "The Last Rose of Summer." Whenever the Want-to-Know in Filmland are puzzled, they invariably refrain from whistling and cuff Sargent. 'Tis as broad as it is long—not Sargent, of course, but the deadly parallel.

The Hon. Epes Winthrop Sargent is the human interrogation point; the thinking machine; the man with the soft answer that turneth away wrath in Reeldom. He can tell you if the leading woman of the Doorknob Picture Company has brown eyes, and just how much the Newwrinkle Film Concern is paying for photo-plays, and without so much as turning a hair!

There are two of our great men, gentle reader, who are partial to the card index system. One of these is the

EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Hon. Frank Hitchcock, Postmaster-General of these United States, and expert manipulator of the political steamroller. The other is Epes Winthrop Sargent, solver of difficult questions, and confidant of the picture playwright and the moving picture theatre exhibitor. Both possess a card index that is wonderful to behold.

Like many others who have attained prominence in Reeldom, Epes Winthrop Sargent was formerly a newspaperman. It is understood, however, that he did not use his euphonious name in its entirety when beating out the chatter of the day, being content with plain E. W. Sargent. The complete title, in all its beauty, only blossomed forth when E. W. S. became owner of that card index. He was first in the field with it. The Hon. Hitchcock is a sincere flatterer by the process of imitation.

Journalism is the art of mirroring the process and progress of society for a day and painting it upon the broad canvass of the daily newspaper, and of echoing the will, the desire, the utterance, the inspiration and the command of the great mass. Sargent does all this in Moving Pictureland, and more. He has solved the problem of uniting two diverse needs, the training of the book, the practice of the writer, the knowledge the writer needs, and the capacity to express and to feel the sweep and tide of the animated picture public, which is indispensable to the expert in a new and difficult field of industry.

After the above little bit of word painting, which we flatter ourselves is pretty good stuff, we will proceed with a story proving conclusively just how E. Winthrop Sargent is wrapped up in all lines of his profession. Wrapped up, we repeat sternly, just the same in summer as in winter.

Mr. Sargent, slave of the camera, was dosing over a picture play plot in the smoking car when a half dozen shots rang out in the still night air.

The train slackened. There were more shots.

"T-train robbers!" shrieked a pallid passenger as he crawled under the seat.

Our hero grasped his black box and tripod, which he always carries with him for local color, and, running to the car platform, sprang off into the still night air.

The robbers, most of them, were grouped about the express car. There was much coin in the express safe. The company said not over $12.30, but it must have been a million. Anyway, the robbers hankered for it, and they did a lot of shooting. Now they had shoved a stick of dynamite into the car and were just about to light the fuse.

Suddenly a blinding glare filled the no longer still night air with a dazzling flash.

With a wild shriek the robbers fled to the tall timber.

The flashlight of E. W. S.'s camera had saved the day—no, the night.

When they approached to congratulate Mr. Sargent, they found him with his eyes filled with tears. "Something went wrong with the dinged thing," he muttered. "The film's spoiled!"

What more could you ask in convincing proof of Mr. Sargent's interest in the game than the above touching story?

Among the very first sights to be seen by the provincial picture exhibitor, playwright, et cetera, when paying the primary visit to Gotham, is Winthrop Sargent. They plan a call upon him just as systematically as they plan to see the Flatiron Building, Grant's Tomb and Coney Island. Of course, the Western exhibitor or author would like to see how the pictures are made, and other little details of interest to their professions, but they go away perfectly satisfied if they can gain an audience with Mr. Sargent.

And Brother Sargent isn't so very busy. O no! He receives and answers, on an average, eight hundred questions on eight hundred different subjects in the course of a month. Other than this occupation, which is a mere pleasure, he contributes most of the comedy which has made Lubin famous; writes two or three departments for picture trade journals and magazines; keeps up an almost unlimited correspondence; reads and revises picture plays; and occasionally contributes short stories to one or more newspaper syndicates. He has plenty of time, you can readily perceive, to entertain callers, and he loves to have 'em saunter in and spend an hour or so with him, discussing various phases of the picture business, the crops, and the big league pennant races. In leisure hours, he dashes off some tasty little brochure, his latest being "Technique of the Photoplay," which is now in its second edition. How does he find time to do it all? Newspaper training, my friends, newspaper training. Everybody cannot do it.

The greatest among us have their little fads and foibles. Colonel Roosevelt likes to pitch hay; Bill Taft plays golf; Jawn D. Rockefeller supports several universities; Epes Winthrop Sargent fools with a tool chest and does his own printing.

On a Saturday night, after answering the very last question received on "How Old Is Ann?" Mr. Sargent hies himself to his brown stone mansion. In the basement thereof is the tool chest and job printing press. On off days, our hero can be found in that basement carving pretty things out of mahogany and hickory, or kicking that job press while turning out the latest designs in stationery and handbills.

To sum up, he is the prominent literatus in prose and verse, scientific agriculturist, philosopher and artistic craftsman, and finds recreation in hatchet and hand-saw after the cares of the day. It is an innocent, fanciful fad, and Mrs. Sargent encourages him in his harmless amusement.

But away with this airy persiflage, abase the jokes, tut-tut on this funny business, say we. In all seriousness, Epes Winthrop Sargent is one of the "boys" who write the department "dope" for the trade papers and the animated picture magazines. He has every branch of the industry at his finger ends and he has possibly accomplished more for the struggling pictureplaywright and the puzzled exhibitor, through practical instruction and correct information, than any other writer in the same line of work, for he has been in the business since its inception.

Before the animated picture industry grew in importance, Sargent was a power in New York journalism. He has written important "stuff" for the Telegraph, the World, several theatrical journals, and has also covered assignments in Europe. He also served efficiently as a theatrical press agent and is strictly an Eastern product. He admits that he has never seen the waving fields of alfalfa, nor has he sniffed the exhilarating odor of new-mown hay. He has certainly missed something, but not everything. He works ten hours a day, six days a week, for the benefit of the picture playwright and exhibitor. He is personally a jolly fellow and admired in the moving picture field.

Like every writer, Epes Winthrop Sargent has made enemies, but they are in the great minority. His legion of friends appreciate the work he is doing. If in his hours of ease he toys with the tool chest and hand press, remember, please, that he is keeping one eye on the copyright law, and is just as ready to use the auger in boring holes through the enemies of cinematography as he is to use the contents of that tool chest in making knick-knacks for his wife to put in the stove.

FILM WAR STARTS IN PERRY

With the appearance of Julius Singer, state manager of the Laemmle Film Service of Des Moines in Perry, a battle started which may involve the entire moving picture profession in a war against what is known as "pirating." Manager Al Walton, of the Grand Opera House, secured a set of films from the H. Davis Film Service at Watertown, Wis., a few days ago for the Crusaders, a world-wide famous production. He advertised it well and the fact became known to Mr. Singer, who became active to-day.

He came to the city, examined the films when they arrived, and pronounced them a duplicate production taken from the Crusader films for which he holds the state right. He immediately employed Harry Wifvat as his attorney and started suit in the Superior Court, attaching the films and using his contract for the use of the same as a basis for entering the state courts.

Mr. Singer protected Mr. Walton, having furnished him with the original films, which are, in fact, superior to the alleged copy, and Mr. Walton's attraction will be bettered because of the warfare which is now on.

The Des Moines film man declared that he knew there were several "dupes" of the original films out and all the regular picture men were trying to help locate them. This is the first time they appeared in Iowa and he was on the job at once to put them out of circulation. Mr. Walton is not involved in the matter in any way. He is, however, interested in watching the outcome of the affair.

"These pictures are all copyrighted," said Mr. Springer, "and the United States Government protects by law all copyrighted films. The fact that I hold a contract for the exclusive right to show this film in Iowa permits me to bring the matter into the state courts.

"Mr. Walton secures his attractions from me and when he told me he had secured the Crusaders from the Davis Film Service, I knew it was a 'pirate' picture. I laid for it and I am going to fight it to the finish. I have the entire moving picture associations behind me and we propose to put a stop to the copying of pictures.

"Moving pictures can be copied just like photographs, and I am certain the Davis people secured this picture from one of our own set of reels. Anyway, I have the reels attached and am going to fight it out in the courts."

THANHOUSER KIDLET AGAIN

The Thanhouser Kidlet is again the feature of a Thanhouser picture, this latest "Dottie's New Doll." a comedy released Tuesday, June 4. Here the youngest, New Rochelle player—or shall it be playerette?—is the innocent kidnapper of a judge's baby daughter. The judge thought a gang of Chinamen, one of whom he had imprisoned for theft, had stolen the infant in revenge. But the chubby "Kidlet" turns up as the guilty party to the joy of the judge and the Chinaman.

In the same week with "Dottie's New Doll," is "Her Secret," out Friday, June 7. It is as good a drama as the other is a comedy. Mignon Anderson is the "her" who possesses the "secret," and a notable cast assists her in revealing it to you.

THE SCALAWAG

This touching Western drama is a Nestor production and is to be released on Wednesday, May 29th. Excellently photographed and splendidly acted, this picture is decidedly "Worth-While."

Mr. Jack Conway capably handles the character of the "Scalawag" who, apparently a good-for-nothing, proves himself to be a good fellow in the end. Eugenia Forde portrays the character of the "Scalawag's" wife and very realistic she makes it seem. Tired of struggling to make both ends meet, she decides to leave her husband and make her home with her father in the West. Just before her departure, the "Scalawag" attempts to secure possession of their little baby, but is prevented by the appearance of the father himself. This last unmanly act turns his wife completly against him and their farewell is not a loving one.

We next see the wife, after a lapse of some five years safely ensconced in the home of her father, trying to forget her unhappy wedded life. The little girl, Annie, has grown into a winsome, mischievous child of six years. After depositing a satchel of money in the rig outside the door, the grandfather returns to the house for his bank-book and, no sooner is his back turned, than little Annie has climbed in the rig and in a moment, is gleefully driving the horse down the road. Meeting two men on the road, she proudly informs them of the valuable package she has in the rig and, in less than no time, the two rather disreputable looking men have jumped in and driven away.

We recognize in one of the men the father of the child but he little knows that this little lady is his baby. His companion treats little Annie none too kindly and "The Scalawag" resents his rough handling of the child. An exciting fight ensues, with the result that the "Scalawag" is mortally wounded while his companion hurries off with the gold. Little Annie, sorry for her protector, manages to get to the foot of the hill, where he has rolled, but hurts her ankle badly. Managing to regain his feet, the "Scalawag" takes the little girl in his arms and reaches the road just as the grandfather and his men have succeded in capturing the "Scalawag's" companion. The "Scalawag" recognizes his wife's father and just as he realizes that the little girl he protected is his own little Annie, the hand of Death reaches out and claims him.

JIM'S ATONEMENT

By Virginia West

(Adapted from Imp Release.)

WHEN Jim and Mollie were married all the neighbors said that they were the happiest couple in the world. They thought so too, and Frank was happy because his friends were.

Jim and Frank had been good friends since boyhood and since Jim's engagement to Mollie she and Frank had been good friends too.

The two men were surveyors, and many were the long, happy tramps they had together over the hills and valleys climbing rocks, fording streams and cutting their way through the underbrush. To them work became play and pleasant companionship.

Frank had a hobby for amateur photography, which he had many good chances to indulge in in the midst of his work. His camera was always slung over his shoulder ready to catch a particularly beautiful scene or some creature of the woods.

Jim joked much with his friend about his fad as he called it, but he was always ready to help him, if need be, when an opportunity for a good picture came.

For six months after the marriage of Mollie and Jim all went well. Frank was a frequent visitor at their home and was welcomed equally by husband and wife.

At last the primitive man that lurks to some extent in most of us, came to the surface in Jim.

One evening the three of them were seated at supper. Suddenly Mollie exclaimed! "Oh, I have the nicest secret." Of course both men asked what it was. But Mollie shook her head. "I cannot tell," she said. "But, still I don't know—I may have to tell someone for I need advice on the subject." Both men bent forward eagerly, playfully.

"Tell me," they both said at once.

"No, I can't tell you Jim. You don't know anything about the subject. But Frank—now Frank may do, but I don't know whether he's wise enough—I'll have to think about it." Mollie's eyes twinkled as she spoke.

The men laughed, but there was a suspicion of something in Jim's voice that had never been there before. He was not even conscious of what it was—he only knew that something had made him moody and he didn't feel like talking as he usually did in the evening.

The next day Mollie managed to see Frank alone for a few minutes.

"Frank," she said, with shining eyes. "I've got a grand surprise for Jim's birthday. You know that photograph of him when he was about sixteen?" Frank nodded. "Well, Jim was regretting recently that it was so small and in such bad condition. I thought I'd show it to you and if you thought it could be done, I'd have it enlarged and give it to him for his birthday. Don't you think that would be nice?"

"You bet it would!" exclaimed Frank enthusiastically. "Get it for me now and I'll attend to the whole thing for you, and he'll never suspect anything at all."

"Oh, you're an angel Frank," cried Mollie, and hurried out of the room.

As Molly was going out of one door Jim opened another and entered just in time to hear his wife's last remark and to catch a glimpse of her bright happy face as she turned from Frank.

The girl was not conscious that Jim had entered, and when she came hurrying back with the photograph she did not see him until she was well within the room. She gave him a quick surprised look and turned away, trying to conceal the picture.

"Oh,—I didn't know you were back," she said with elaborate unconcern.

"Yes, I came in just as you went out."

Mollie glanced at Frank.

Jim turned and left the room without speaking again.

"Do you think Jim noticed anything?" Mollie asked when the door had closed.

Frank looked uneasy.

"I didn't know what he noticed, but I didn't like his manner. I—I believe you had better tell him about it Mollie."

"Tell him about it! For heaven's sake what are you talking about Frank? I want to surprise him. Talk of a woman not being able to keep a secret. You're a lot worse."

Frank laughed in a half embarrassed way. "All right, I won't tell but you'd better be mighty careful that he's not around when you're talking to me about it."

In another room Jim was having a fight with himself. He told himself over and over that he was a fool and a cad to feel as he did, but still, somehow the feeling didn't lessen. He kept seeing the scene he had just witnessed and remembering the words and manner of Mollie both then and the evening before, and he could not help the spark of jealousy that burned in his breast.

"You're an idiot," he said to himself many times, "Mollie is the truest woman in the world and Frank is the soul of honor."

Still the memory rankled in his brain.

He told himself that he had seen nothing unusual, but his heart ached just the same.

As far as he got in his argument with himself was to decide to await developments, and while he waited, to try to act just as he always had.

Frank guessed what was passing through Jim's mind and was hurt as he had never felt hurt before. He felt that he could not give away Mollie's secret and on the other hand he could not tell Mollie what was in his thoughts, for he felt that it would be insulting her just to suggest such a thing. So he left things as they were.

Mollie, entirely unconscious of the situation and brimfull of her secret, sometimes acted a little unnaturally, which of course, made matters worse.

A week passed in which Jim suffered tortures. In spite of all his efforts in the opposite direction, he found himself watching his wife and his friend. Blinded by his ever-growing jealousy he misinterpreted all he saw.

At last the picture was finished and Frank brought it to Mollie at a time when he thought Jim would not come in.

Molly was in ecstacy. "Oh, Frank, its beautiful," she cried, "I'm so happy and I thank you so much." She put her hand on Frank's arm and looked up into his face with her eyes full of joy.

Jim had noticed Frank leave his work earlier than usual, and the demon so got possession of him that he left everything and followed him at a long enough distance so that he could keep out of Frank's sight.

He saw Frank enter his house and then his suspicions were confirmed. Softly he opened the front door and went to the door of the sitting-room. It was closed and Jim heard voices inside. He turned the knob noiselessly and opened the door part way. He was just in time to hear the words of Mollie as she thanked Frank and to see the look in her eyes as she raised them to his face.

Jim tried to speak but could not utter a word. His heart seemed frozen and his voice was gone. Silently he closed the door and went wearily away from the house.

Mollie began to prepare dinner. "You must stay," she said to Frank, "I'll soon have dinner ready."

Frank stayed but as the time went on and the dinner was ready to put on the table, Mollie began to worry about the absence of Jim.

"Perhaps he's fallen off a rock, Frank. Where was he?"

"No, we worked in the office this morning," answered Frank reassuringly, "We are going out this afternoon. Perhaps something turned up that made it necessary for Jim to go out without coming home."

"I know I'm foolish," Mollie said tearfully, "But I can't help worrying when he doesn't come."

"Shall I go look for him?"

"Oh, if you would! But eat your dinner first. It's all ready and you had better eat. Jim may come in before you've finished."

Silently Frank ate his dinner. He was troubled too but he tried to hide it from Mollie.

"Don't you worry," he said as he left the house," Jim's all right and will be back this evening. Have a good supper for him."

Frank went to the office first and asked in an off-hand way if Jim were there. "No," said the boy, "He's gone to dinner."

Frank kept his thoughts to himself. "All right," he said. "If he comes in again tell him I've gone out on the job."

When he had climbed the hill he saw a man standing on a ledge of rocks. He took a path that led to him. When he had gone a few yards he knew that he was right in thinking the figure was Jim.

The rock upon which Jim stood was one of a series of ledges one above the other, on the side of the mountain. He did not hear Frank until he spoke at his side.

"Is something wrong old man?" asked Frank. "Mollie's worrying because you didn't come home to dinner."

"Yes," cried Jim turning toward Frank, a wild light blazing in his eyes, "yes, I reckon she's worrying a lot. I went home to dinner and when I saw how she was worrying I came away again. You hypocrite!"

Frank instinctively stepped back from his accuser in astonishment. As he did so a small piece of rock from the edge of the cliff gave way and he shot straight down through space.

Jim stood motionless for a moment, not daring to look over the cliff. Then he shrugged his shoulders. "I didn't do it," he said and turned to the path.

When Mollie saw Jim coming she ran to the door to meet him. He walked past her into the house.

"Why, Jim, what's the matter?" she asked, almost afraid to form the words.

When they were in the sitting-room Jim turned and faced her. "Mollie," he said tensely. "We might as well have it out now. Frank's dead, I reckon, so you can't hurt him by telling the truth."

"What on earth are you talking about, Jim," Mollie exclaimed.

"Oh, don't try to deny it! Frank has been making love to you right under my nose and I was too blind to see it until a week ago."

"Jim, are you out of your mind? Do you mean to say you have harmed Frank because you thought that?"

Jim gave a short laugh. "Oh, no, I didn't have to. Fate was kind enough to step in and do it for me. He stepped off a cliff."

"Oh?" Mollie sank into a chair and covered her face.

"Naturally, you are grieved to lose you lover."

Molly sprang to her feet. "Jim," she cried, "I'll not stand this any longer. Tell me what you're talking about."

Jim came close to the girl and talked in a tense voice that frightened her.

"I've been watching you and Frank for a week and have been trying to fight my suspicions, but to-day I came into the room when you didn't know it, and I saw Frank give you a photograph and I needed nothing more than your words and your face when you thanked him to tell me that I was right. Can you dare to deny it?"

"Yes, I do deny it!"

"You deny the photograph?"

"No. He gave me a photograph but not of himself."

"Not of him—do you dare to show it to me?"

"Yes, I dare to show it to you Jim, but I am very sorry for you," she answered sadly.

She took the picture from a drawer and handed it to her husband.

"You're trying to deceive me. This is not the one," he cried.

"It is the one," answered Mollie quietly. "I wanted to have the little one enlarged for your birthday. Frank attended to it for me and you saw us consulting about it. That is all."

Jim looked into her face and knew that she told the truth. In a flash it came over him what a terrible thing he had done. He sank into a chair with a groan.

"Oh, Mollie can you ever forgive me?"

"I don't know, Jim," she answered wearily.

Suddenly the thought of Frank came to Jim's mind. "Perhaps I can save him," he cried, and put every other thought from him.

When Jim and the men he had brought with him looked over the cliff they could see Frank lying on a ledge below them.

Jim would hear to no plan but that he should go down by a rope and personally rescue Frank from his dangerous position.

Slowly and carefully they lowered him. When he reached his friend he found him alive but unconscious. Jim lifted him in his arms and the men above raised them both.

They carried Frank to Jim's home. When all had been done for him to make him comfortable and they were assured that his complete recovery was only a question of time, Jim turned again to Mollie with the question. "Can you forgive me?"

"I cannot answer now, Jim," she replied sadly. "You have made a wound that only time can heal. You will have to wait."

Jim understood and bowed his head in acceptance of his punishment.

FUNNY THINGS THAT HAPPEN IN THE STUDIO

"The Intelligent Mutt"

In the making of a photo play a few weeks ago Eddie Middleton, one of the directors of the Lubin Stock Company, needed a tramp dog. A thorough bred could be easily obtained at the dog stores, but a vagrant would have to be found. Several kiddies of the Latin quarter, near the plant were put upon the quest and a reward of 25 cents offered for the worst mutt that could be presented. Among several, one was the real thing, he was a horrible specimen, coal black with a big head and a row of ribs that bulged from each side of his coat. The face was pitiful and he showed every sign of a bad season and starvation. The little Dago got his quarter and Middleton was delighted. The dog was put through the scene and filled all requirements, not being on the salary list he was rewarded with a good meal and then hustled out of the plant gate. Next morning at 9 o'clock promptly with the other players "Sloppy" turned up for engagement, forcing his way to the front he reported to Thomas Hopkins, the superintendent of the studio and was promptly turned out. Still he lingered around and several times showed himself at the office door. Middleton was sent for and instructed to keep that dog away, or if necessary to drown him in the tank. The director gave him another meal and again turned "Sloppy" out of the grounds. Next morning again the mutt was on the job, and making his way to the superintendent's desk, offered a reminder of his presence by placing a paw on Mr. Hopkin's knee. The autocrat of the studio was furious and with some poetical language threw his hat at the tramp, while a score of players went into hysterics laughing. "Sloppy" then went in quest of Middleton and suggested breakfast and again the director took him to the kitchen. For days promptly at 9 o'clock the dog reported, and in the end perservance prevailed. The property man of the plant has built a house for him and "Sloppy" is a member of the Lubin Stock Company.

PRIZE SCENARIO CONTEST

Powers Motion Picture Company to Purchase the Highest Class of Stories Obtainable

Realizing that the story is the thing in moving pictures the Powers Motion Picture Company will in the future pay the highest prices for suitable manuscripts. In addition to this the concern has inauguarated a prize contest to stimulate authors to better efforts. The contest is now open and will close July 15, 1912.

Four prizes are offered competitors; $100,00. $75.00, $50,00 and $25.00, and the prizes will be awarded by a committee composed of moving picture experts. The contest will be in charge of the scenario department and all manuscripts should be addressed to the scenario editor.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Your Rejected Manuscripts

What are you doing with your rejected manuscripts, gentle script writer? Bet a half dollar you have a bunch of 'em crammed away in the back of a drawer some place. These scripts have traveled the pace, no doubt, and you have often thought of chucking them into the fire. Don't do it. Some rainy afternoon, take those old stories out and look over them carefully. Read each one through and try to perceive the faults therein which should be more plainly discernible with passing time. Chances are, ten to one that you will find a script in which there are possibilities unnoticed before. An idea to improve the plot may spring into your brain. Then you will take that old script, rewrite it under another title, and send it forth. Maybe that script will sell. It is the old, old truth of more time, more study and a twist and turn here and there—and then success. Try it. We know several pictureplaywrights who have turned to old plots after a year or so, rejuvenated them, and then sent them forth to market.

The Magazine Story

Do you appreciate that many plots submitted in picture play form are available for short stories that magazine editors would be pleased to consider? A scenario editor was telling us just the other day of the scripts read by him, unavailable for the screen, but which had the material in them for first-class yarns for magazines. Boiled down action, sprightly dialogue and convincing plot brings a good price in the form of a magazine story. Maybe you have good fiction which you have been endeavoring to sell to film concerns in the form of a picture play script.

All Are Welcome

All are cordially invited to enter membership in "The Order of Optimists," Nashville, Tenn., writes:

"Hats off not only to President Van Buren Powell, of the "Optimistic Order," but to William Lord Wright for giving us an opportunity to join this great and good organization. Every scenario writer in this land ought to become a member. Be optimistic. Submit your work on its merits and don't become a 'sore-head' or a 'knocker.' Me for a chair in the 'Optimistic lodge room.'"

Your chair has been reserved, Nashville, and we extend to you the password, which is "Keep Sweet." The sign of distress is "Protective Association." Any member starting the "plot stealing" subject will be expelled. The membership is rapidly increasing and we want all to join. Send in your ideas as to any impromevent of the charter.

Still Another One

The dad of the Writers' Association graft lives in Ohio. Down in that state of strenuosity, we have discovered that the father of this idea has been flourishing for the past three years or more. There is an "expert" in that state who will guarantee to sell anything from a song poem to a three-act comedy-drama. His late specialty is the pictureplay script. He does not charge a cent for "examination." You send on your script and if it can be revised the cost will be but five dollars in advance, the check from the editor, when it is sold, going direct to you." To quote again: "I never have gotten less than $35 for a picturescript, and more often $65 and $75." After reading the literature of this association for music writers, playwrights and vaudeville sketchers, we can readily perceive where these later schools and associations get their inspiration.

A Call from the Wild

Here is a call from the wild—in this case, Niles, Mich. A writer up there writes us as follows:

"For the love of Mike, why can't they get a Webster's Dictionary in certain editorial offices? The man who prepares the sub-titles certainly needs a 'best speller' in many instances. I sold a script to a certain concern. My leaders were eliminated and others put in. I am not objecting to that, either. But here is the objection: Right in the middle of the picture was flashed a leader as follows: 'On His Mettal.' There was much laughter from my friends who thought I was responsible for the unsimplified spelling. Then to add insult to injury, farther along in the picture came another leader: 'Close to the Thrown.' And no one had a fall taken out of them at all. The bad spelling ruined the entire picture."

Tough luck, Mr. Segar, and your first play, too! It is a fact that there are too many instances of carelessness as per the above. We saw a pictureplay the other night where the word "until" was spelled with two "l's" all through the picture where a telegram played a most important part. A little more attention to the details will obviate these inexcusable blunders. However, this is not the pictureplaywright's fault, thank goodness.

The Return Postage Proposition

A physician, a lawyer, yes, even newspaper men, have certain professional ethics which are sternly followed, come what will. The professional writer also has certain ethics, the first among them being to invariably enclose return postage with submitted manuscripts. The pictureplaywright is engaging in the literary profession and should make it a hard and fast rule to enclose sufficient return postage with each and every script sent out. A step farther should invariably be taken and that is, to enclose with the script a self-addressed and stamped envelope. These are little niceties which show the mental calibre of the writer. A scenario editor is not obliged to return your script unless sufficient postage is enclosed. In many instances it has been done, but there are now too many writers in the field, and it is only common courtesy to present a clean, typewritten manuscript and the proper return stamps with it. You can purchase a pair of postal scales for a small sum.

The use of such scales are recommended to those who cannot confine their stories to about three sheets of MS. paper. Three such sheets are sufficient to carry any photoplay intended to run one thousand feet. A writer is suing the Kalem Company because the editor failed to return his script within ten days. This writer did not enclose return postage. It is said that his script held postage due when received at the Kalem editorial department.

It is only going to be a question of a few months until a lucrative and attractive market to literary aspirants will be close to the rank and file, unless some of the soreheads, organizers of "protective associations" and "walking delegates" cease rubbing it in on the long-suffering editors. We have issued this warning bulletin previously. It is a shame that hundreds of well-meaning and hard-working script writers are to suffer because of the ivory-domed actions of the minority. When the bars are closed down, it will be the fault of these disturbers. Some method should be taken by the editors to keep them out of every well-organized office.

But Do They Blow Away?

"They spring up like chaff before the wind and are blown away" is the flowery language used by a well-known writer in complimenting our recent reprinting of misleading advertisements appearing in certain magazines. But do they? Some of these ads have been appearing for the past two years, and we are told authoriattively that one "university for script writers" gathers in on an average of $100 weekly from the credulous. We believe the time will come when the magazines still accepting these misleading statements and offers from "professors" will eliminate the practice.

"Why Should Editors Count in this Business?" is a further query from the above correspondent, who takes the position that the director is the power behind the throne and the editor in reality a mere publicity agent. Even if this was strictly true, the director would have no time to give careful attention to the hundreds of scripts received and also to perform his other duties. But it is not a true situation. The majority of the script editors to-day are men selected for their fitness to judge manuscripts and for their ability to write perfect scripts conforming to the tastes of the directors. Men like Warren, Plimpton, Schulberg, Hoadley, Vinton, Terwilliger and others, are not only able editors, but are versatile writers as well. So long as the companies purchase outside scripts the editor will be a prime necessity, for there must be a clearing house and some one to separate the wheat from the unusual amount of chaff.

QUEENS THEATRE FEATURED SOLAX NIGHT.

Queens Theatre on Third avenue and Fifty-ninth street, New York, one of the neatest and best managed picture houses in New York City, recently featured a Solax night with remarkable success. They ran an exclusive Solax program. Besides "The Sewer," the two reel feature, they ran "Saved by a Cat," "Billy's Nurse" and "Billy's Shoes." Darwin Karr, the Solax leading man, who does such heroic work in "The Sewer" and "Saved by a Cat," personally appeared after the pictures. Billy Quirk was also there and entertained. Blanche Cornwall made her bow, and Director Warren told how pictures are taken.

Here is a copy of a letter from Mr. Stedeker, president of the Queens Theatre Company:

H. Z. Levine, Publicity Manager,
Solax Company, Flushing, N. Y.

Dear Sir:

Owing to the very successful "Solax Night" held at the Queens Theatre the other night, we wish to thank most cordially Mr. Karr, Mr. Quirk, Miss Cornwall, Mr. Warren and the entire Solax management, and hope that at some future time we may have a return date.

Yours truly,
THE QUEENS THEATRE CO.,
Henry Stedeker, President.
C. E. Dwyer, Treasurer.

NEW OPEN AIRDROME ON BROADWAY, NEW YORK

Messrs. Harris & Goldston are equipping a fine open-air show on Broadway, near 99th street. They purchased a Powers No. 6 M. P. Machine from J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man." Mr. Hallberg reports the sale of an A. C. to D. C. Economizer, 40 amp. size, to W. C. Grau, Hopkinsville, Ky. A No. 6 Powers, with full line of supplies, to Earl & Carroll, Cornwall, N. Y. Many places are equipping their theatres with Hallberg A. C. Economizers, throwing out the cheaper devices on account of the better light produced by the Hallberg.

Whitinsville, Mass.—Prospect Theatre has opened with great success.

Brooklyn, N. Y.—Frank Longo is having built a moving picture show at 188 Twenty-first street.

WESTERN CORRESPONDENCE

Hot Springs, Ark., May 22nd.—If ever an illustration was needed to prove the popularity of motion pictures in this city it was found during the past and present week, when every house was doing a big business, and, I am pleased to state, the pictures are better and newer now than they have ever been in the history of the trade in Hot Springs.

Some time ago I stated that if one—just one, mind you—manager would make it his business to show strictly first run product that the others would follow the lead, maybe perhaps, not because they cared to add the additional expense of service of this kind, but because they would be forced to do so in order to hold their patronage, and when the New Central Theatre opened it came to pass that my prediction was verified. Sidney M. Nutt put on first run Trust pictures and the house has been doing a land office business ever since.

The Photo Play, which has been one of the faithful Independent houses, has always shown a good line of pictures, and they are as bright and steady as anyone would care to look at, but they have lately been going after feature material, paying the price for it and getting the returns. The last instance of this sort of enterprise was the booking of all the Bison "101 Ranch" output, and the crowd here awaits these reels with the same impatience that the small boys long for the water to get warm enough to take their initial summer swim. Out at the Lyric Summer Theatre in Whittington park, where Harry Hale has transferred the scene of his operations, the same things hold good, and down at the Princess, which uses a reel as a "chaser," there is always a good Thanhouser, Imp or American of late issue. Funny thing about the Princess Theatre relative to the "chaser" is that the picture doesn't "chase," but holds 'em fast until the last scene is over and the white light appears. That's a compliment to the industry in general and the reels in particular, for if there is one city in all the great land where motion pictures are sought eagerly each day, it is in "the valley of vapors."

Work on the new Lyric Theatre is being rushed, and when the house is completed it will be a beauty in every sense of the word. The seating capacity will be greatly enlarged and a bigger show will be given. That is some indication that the coming season is to be a winner, for the liberal administration will be in power, and we'll have our Sunday picture shows, too. Also, through the initiative and referendum, we will have the ponies romping on the Oaklawn and Essex tracks, and, taken all in all, we don't mind if the summer may be a little dull, which it hasn't evidenced as yet, for we know what is in store for us in a business sense the coming winter.

Mr. Hale has taken in as a partner W. S. Jacobs, of the Ohio Club, and that gentleman has not only enough confidence in the future prosperity of Hot Springs to spend several thousand dollars in the New Lyric, but he and his other business partner, Charles Bryan, Jr., are going to install a magnificent $20,000 cafe in the rear of the Indiana bar, a cafe that for beauty and facility, will surpass anything in the southland.

There was one stellar attraction that came to the New Central last week, the Vitagraph special, "Vanity Fair," which, in three reels, was a treat. This series attracted a great deal of attention, especially from the clubwomen and the children in the public schools. This year's graduating class of the high school attended in a body, and the reels made a decided hit.

The Bison "101 Ranch" special, depicting the trials and experience of the war telegrapher, was also a banner feature and the crowd at the Photo Play "ate it up."

"The Old Actor," a Biograph drama, made a deep impression in this city. The venerable artist playing this part has many friends in this city, and they enjoyed his work immensely.

Edison gave us a great snow scene in the "Guilty Party," and when their educated bull pup is flashed on the screen the audience immediately sits up and takes notice.

Those who had the pleasure of seeing "The Chauffeur, the Girl and the Cop," by Essany, enjoyed this comedy, and the boarding house of "Alkali Ike" was also appreciated. We congratulated ourselves on our modern hotels here.

Maurice Costello shone to good advantage in "The Way of a Man with a Maid," and this Vitagraph reel was royally received. His "Counsel for the Defense" attracted a great deal of attention from the legal fraternity in this city, too.

I am in reciept of a copy of the "Thespian" published in Kansas City, Mo., which contains a very flattering criticism of Charles Cecil Smith, who opened a four weeks' engagement on the Western Vaudeville Association's time. Mr. Smith is a Hot Springs product and they seemed to like his work in old "K. C."

Tom Reed, a very clever cartoonist, and the Comedy Masons, are making things lively at Whitting Park this week, while Westony, the celebrated pianist, had lovers of that instrument standing on their heads at the Princess. This artist is a wonder and what he did to that "Baby Grand" is a shame to relate.

Albert Taylor closed a two weeks' engagement at the Airdome to poor business, due to the fact that the warm weather hasn't hit Hot Springs as yet, and the nights were too cool to go into the open for one's drama. The Livingston Stock Company follows, with indications of better success, producing as the opening bill, "The Man of the Day," another "Man of the Hour," political drama. The Taylor Stock Company played a better and more high class line of royalty productions than any company ever in this city.

Heard in the New Central the other evening that Miss Florence Lawrence had returned from a very pleasant vacation abroad and that she had signed up with the Powers people. She is a great favorite in this city. By the way, what has become of the "Vitagraph Girl," Miss Turner? Haven't seen her here in weeks. You see, we live so far from the seat of news regarding these favorites of the screen that rumors don't get here until the facts are "ancient history."

H. B. FRANCIS PRODUCES FINE SUFFRAGE PICTURE FOR ECLAIR

BY M. I. MACDONALD.

SCENES FROM "SUFFRAGE AND THE MAN"
Eclair Co. release of June 6th.

One of the most poignant and most important questions of the day is that of Woman Suffrage. The proper rights of woman, so long deferred, is beating with indomitable fury against every inch of the ramparts placed by men to bar her from having a voice in the vital questions of the day—questions which have to do with national affairs as well as with the municipal and moral rulings which perhaps come closer to the home, and in which women, who have the gentler hand and finer instinct, should have a say.

Last year only a handful of women, and sympathetic men, constituted the suffragette parade; this year the tremendous demonstration which the long procession of both sexes afoot and ahorse presented to the curious throngs which lined Fifth avenue on the afternoon of the parade astonished even the enthusiasts.

It was at this point in the history of Woman Suffrage in the city of New York that Miss Dorothy Steele, herself a splendid specimen of what a woman ought to be, hit upon the idea of making use of the moving picture to champion the cause. The Eclair Film Company saw the point and straightway seized the opportunity to be of use in the matter, Mr. Francis, one of the staff of competent directors of the Eclair Company, undertaking the task of production, to which matter he has attended in the most satisfactory and artistic manner.

The story centres around the ideal modern woman and the man, who, by the way, is by no manner of means ideal in his unenlightened state, and who opposes woman suffrage so strongly as to allow the difference of opinion to cause a rupture in his relations with his fiancee. She, like the good stuff that so many of our American suffragettes are made of, stuck to her point, being thoroughly convinced that the cause which she had chosen to aid was the right one; she preferred to stand by her convictions.

Meantime, the young man becomes the dupe of his ideal—the parasite type—whose mother conspires to bring the two together and marry them. The planning of the conspiracy is, however, overheard by him, and he eventually realizes that the modern, educated, helpful woman is the ideal type, and not the china doll variety, into whose clutches he had so nearly fallen.

The story ends in the union of the two central figures in marriage and of their casting their ballots side by side.

The picture was produced with the aid and under the supervision of the Woman's Political Union, several of the women belonging to the society appearing in the production.

The story is full of the most intense interest and has been splendidly and intelligently staged by Mr. Francis.

OLIVER TWIST IN FILM AT THE LYCEUM

Oliver Twist, a Dickens masterpiece, which in its dramatized form has moved so many audiences to anger and to tears, and which has at the same time a wonderful faculty of turning tears to laughter, and anger to paroxysyms of mirth in the midst of the most tragic situations, was exhibited to press representatives and other interested parties on Monday, May 20th.

This was the first showing of this wonderful five reel production, and was given the reception that such a cast of players, with the famous Nat C. Goodwin as the central star, must win wherever they appear.

To say that the filmed production of "Oliver Twist" is a success is putting it mildly. It is a phenomenal creation—the finesse of literature, drama, and photography rolled into one.

The adventurous story of "Oliver Twist," whose mother passed out a few hours after his birth in the workhouse, where he was partially reared, and starved and beaten, from whence he passed into the clutches of Fagin the Jew, thence to the care of the good Mr. Brownlow, his adventures of the most heartrending character, is the result accruing from circumstances born of a mysterious parentage and a fortune whose shadowy fingers turned the wheels of circumstances.

The all star cast used in this production was as follows:

Fagin.....Mr. Nat C. Goodwin
Oliver Twist.....Vinnie Burns
Bill Sykes.....Mr. Mortimer Martine
Nancy.....Miss Beatrice Moreland
Monks.....Mr. Edwin McKim
Artful Dodger.....Charles Rodgers
Bates.....Daniel Read
Mr. Brownlow.....Mr. Hudson Liston
Mr. Grimwig.....Frank Kendrick
Bumble, Beadle.....Stuart Holmes
Rose.....Miss Lillian DeLesque
Mrs. Maylie.....Mrs. Liston
Giles.....Mr. Will Scherer
Brittles.....Mr. Frank Stafford
Agnes Fleming.....Miss Louise White
Charles Leeford.....Mr. Jack Hopkins
Nurse.....Miss Agnes Stone

Certain other notable casts of former times are hereby given. Notably a production given at the old Walnut Street Theatre in Philadelphia in which such great artists as E. L. Davenport, Lucile Weston, and J. W. Wallack played Nancy, Fagin and Sykes. In February 1861, at the New Metropolitan, Wallack again appeared as Fagin to the celebrated Charlotte Cushman's Nancy. On December 27, 1867, the memorable Wallack Theatre production was made.

A production of "Oliver Twist" at the Bowery Theatre the following spring, is interesting in that Fanny Davenport, later a famous Nancy, appeared in the secondary role of Rose. Mrs. W. G. Jones was the Nancy.

A little more than a year later, on July 5th, 1869, Lucille Western appeared as Nancy at the Grand Opera House. The Herald of the succeeding day said that she was "without a rival in that part." Her performance was a gruesome one, so shocking, in fact, that Brigham Young had forbidden it in Salt Lake City. This fact was cleverly turned into an advertisement, and Miss Western was tremendously successful in the part. Mr. McKee Rankin was her Fagin, and during a later engagement at Wood's Museum, James A. Herne scored heavily as Bill.

In the meantime, several important stars maintained "Oliver Twist" as a regular constituent of their repertoires Mr. and Mrs. E. L. Davenport appeared in the play frequently, and T. W. Keene also presented it.

On May 19th, 1874, at the Fifth Avenue Theatre, scenes from the play were given, although not in connected form. A number of well-remembered players took part in this performance.

Fanny Davenport did Nancy again and again in later years, notably at Haverly's Fifth Avenue Theatre on December 31, 1881, when "Oliver Twist" was given in conjunction with "London Assurance," with Edward Tearle as Bill, Charles Fisher as Fagin, Mrs. Fisher as Oliver, Minnie Monk as Mrs. Corney and Mary Shaw as Rose.

Prior to this, in 1877, Kitty Blanchard had appeared as Nancy, with Louis Aldrich as Bill, at the Broadway Theatre, while the year following Helene Adell played Nancy at the Olympic.

Oliver Twist has had very few New York performances within the past thirty years. In 1891, Henrietta Vaders, J. B. Studley, and Harry Eytinge appeared as Nancy, Bill and Fagin at the Windsor, while Elita Proctor Otis and Nance O'Neill have given representations of the part at various times since then. In 1905, Amelia Bingham did Nancy to J. E. Dodson's Fagin, in the revival of the play by the Fifth Avenue Theatre Stock.

The Comyns Carr version was produced by H. Beerbohm Tree (now Sir Herbert) at His Majesty's Theatre, London, for a single performance in the spring of 1905. He revived it the next fall with the result that it ran for five months to crowded houses and was withdrawn only because of Tree's desire to make other productions

This inimitable production of Oliver Twist, to which we are indebted to H. A. Spanuth, of the General Film Publicity and Sales Company, is one which will go down in history not only as a magnificent production, but as the first case on record of the filming of a great character actor.

"ONE MAN'S LOVE"
Reliance Release, June 15th.

BECK, OF THE SPECIAL EVENT, A BUSY MAN

The Special Event has made some great strides in the line of special pictures, having taken at least eight of the greatest events that happened last week for private parties. Mr. Beck, head camera man, reports that he never had a day like last Saturday. He was seen in at least five different colored taxicabs to get around to the pictures he has taken—first down at the Singer Building, then at Brooklyn Bridge, then in City Hall for the Police Parade, then at the Brooklyn Police Parade, and then was found in front of the Grand Stand at the Carnegie Lyceum taking the New York Police Parade.

I guess that is going some for our friend Beck. He is still there with a hustle, and we, without a doubt, think he is classed with the quickest camera men in the United States.

THE AVIATOR AND THE JOURNALIST'S WIFE

A bill in Equity was filed some time ago by The Feature and Educational Film Company, of Cleveland, O., through their attorneys, Schwartz and Lustig, 511-512 Williamson building, Cleveland, O., which resulted in a complete set of films on "The Aviator and The Journalist's Wife," part one, two and three, being seized at the Imperial Theatre, of Cleveland, O., where said films were exhibited without authority, and without the permission of the United States Copyright holder of said films.

The Feautre and Educational Film Company is the sole owner and holder of the American rights to show the films in this country, and are the owners and holders of the United States copyright on said films.

The bill in Equity was brought in the United States District Court, asking for a restraining order, damages, and an order of seizure at a preliminary hearing before William L. Day, Judge of the United States District Court, and order of seizure was granted, directed to the United States Marshal, ordering him to seize the films at the Imperial Theatre.

The attorneys for The Feature and Educational Film Company insist that they will prosecute this case to the fullest extent of the law, as only by such methods can infringers of copyrighted films be wiped out from doing business under such nefarious methods by doing business on pirated films without any authority, and against the copyright laws of the United States.

MISSISSIPPI FLOOD VIEWS BY A SURVIVOR

Exclusive views of the great Mississippi Flood, which caused so much suffering all along the Mississippi Valley, and called the attention of the whole world to its disastrous results, have been obtained by an enterprising New York slide manufacturer and are being marketed in a set of twenty-two colored slides. Many of the most remarkable scenes to be secured after the flood were snapped by a local photographer, who himself was swept out of house and home, as well as studio. The pictures are the result of his work with the only property he saved from the great disaster—his camera and a box of loaded plate holders.

The twenty-two scenes are superior to any reproduced by the daily papers, as they are views of curious incidents in connection with the flood, which were sought after by the photographer in secluded places where the press men did not visit. Huge dwellings and factories are seen totally wrecked and stretches of territory inundated, showing complete destruction.

Each slide bears a short descriptive reading, explaining the picture. Handsome one-sheet posters are also ready.

The slides are made by the Novelty Slide Company, of 20 East Fourteenth street, New York, Mr. Coufal, manager of the company, having secured the photographs from the ill-fated photographer.

RAYMOND GAUMONT IN AMERICA

Mr. Raymond Gaumont, son of Leon Gaumont, head of the Gaumont Company of America, has arrived on American soil.

Raymond Gaumont is a young man of unusual culture, having had every advantage of education given him by a practical and farseeing father. The young man has recently graduated from college in England. When out of school or not engaged in his favorite sport of yachting his time has been divided between the French, Spanish and English offices of the Company—with the London office he is very familiar.

Mr. Gaumont, Jr., is in this country for an indefinite period. He has come on a mission of good sense; namely to become acquainted with the American end of the business, and conditions of the American market.

His father has decided that he shall become expert in every department of the business. He is therefore starting in as camera man and is now on an assignment in Virginia, Delaware, and Maryland.

He will spend at least nine months with Mr. Blache at the Flushing plant before making a tour of the other offices of the Company throughout Canada from St. John to Vancouver.

REX SUPPLIES THE DEMAND!

The continual demand for a third Rex has triumphed. The exhibitors' continuous requests for more of Rex have borne fruit. The Rex Company announces its third release beginning with Tuesday, June 4th, and the title of the first third production is "The Diamond Path," which is a very appropriate appellation for a production so often and long begged for and so capable of bringing diamonds to the wise, live exhibitors who have had enough foresight and insight to demand more Rex quantity as well as quality.

The third Rex was inevitable. It had to come, as all good things have to come, when events are swept on by a tide of advancement and progressive policies. Just what significance and important portent the advent of the third Rex release possesses will be evidenced in the enthusiastic welcome it will receive in the trade.

LOVE SOMETHING!

The greatest gift Nature has bequeathed unto us is love—the faculty to love everything everywhere. If we possessed vast wealth and allowed it to remain idle; if we were blessed with superhuman strength and were too lazy to do the great big things our strength permitted and suggested, we would and could be no more despicable creatures than we are with the unfathomable and illimitable store of love which we deliberately ignore and "idle-ize."

We are capable of just as much love as we care to be. The quantity is inexhaustible. But there is a paradoxical fact connected with it. The more of it we lavish, and even squander, the more there is remaining, and the more of it we save, the less we possess.

"Grandfather's Clock," the Rex release of Thursday, May 30th, suggests more, however, than that we should love each other. It recommends that we love inanimate things, even things as practical and sentimentally uninteresting as desks, chairs and clocks. It proves, in a pleasing and forceful manner, that a clock can influence and create a great deal of good and prove a mighty truth. The child loved the old grandfather's clock well enough to insist on taking it along with a few possessions of her parents when they were ejected from the old farmhouse. In the clock was the will proving their right to the house and—but that's the story, and we don't wish to spoil your interest.

GAUMONT RUMBLINGS.

The Gaumont Company is still hard at it presenting feature films through the ordinary channel of the Exchanges. The hand-colored features, "Heliogabalus," Tyrant of Rome," and "The Lost Ring," have recently made their appearances on the market and scored big hits.

The wonder, however, of recent film history made its appearance on Thursday May 16th, on which date appeared "Attacked by a Lion," a one thousand foot production depicting the actual charge of a lion on a horse, frustrated by a timely bullet from the gun of the rider, formed the central topic around which the most interesting story of a Morocco desert heritage encircled.

On Sunday, May 19th, a two-reel production of considerable popularity, entitled "Fate of Mothers," was also released on the market. These productions have well established the reputation, or rather the superiority of the Gaumont Company.

They still have to offer, however, features of equal and still greater importance, chief amongst which are "The Midnight Wedding," a two reel production on June 2nd; "When the Leaves Fall," a most handsomely hand-colored one-reel subject, Sunday, June 16th, and a two-reel hand-colored masterpiece, "The Bells of Paradise," on Thursday, June 20th.

On Sunday, June 30th, another lion picture will make its appearance, entitled "The Lion's Revenge." It is to be borne in mind that it is also hand-colored, thereby doubling the feature possibilities of these reels.

On July 4th, the day on which we honor the Declaration of Independence, which is responsible for the large quantity of heroic bloodshed during the American Revolution, the Gaumont Company is producing a most appropriate two-reel feature, entitled, "Written in Blood." The advance pamphlets show this story to be the strongest feature that has ever been offered to the market. There is no doubt but that it will exceed the long-lived popularity of any one production that this capable French concern has ever placed before the public.

A GOOD IDEA

The film makers are now putting the name of the film on all the sub-titles—that is a good idea and should be followed by all those makers who have not yet done so. Why don't makers put the author's name on the title? Also the name of the characters. Some makers do, others did, and stop it now and again—what is the reason?

WILLIAM H. HARBECK'S WIDOW ASKS FOR INJUNCTION

Charles Wynard of 436 East 138th street, George H. Hamilton and C. B. Clements, with offices in the Marbridge Building, were made defendants yesterday in a suit to enjoin them from leasing, exhibiting or offering for sale, sets of moving picture films, copyrighted by William H. Harbeck, a victim of the Titanic. Wynard and Hamilton were served with subpœnas to appear in the Federal District Court next Friday. Clements was out of town and could not be reached.

The plaintiff in the action is Mrs. Catherine Harbeck, widow of William H. Harbeck. She resides in Toledo, Ohio. She said yesterday that her husband was a photographer, who took moving pictures on his own initiative. When he met his death he was taking pictures of the Titanic. These have been lost. He spent all of last Summer in Alaska taking panoramic moving pictures of the Guggenheim interests, showing twenty-five miles of railroad track built on ice, and the Controller Bay territory, in which the government is very much interested. He also took pictures of places never before photographed. These were shown in Gifford N. Pinchot's home in Washington bv Mr. Harbeck before he left for abroad.

Moore Saw Them First

Tom Moore, of Washington, who owns eleven theatres, a friend of Mr. Harbeck's, supplied him with the apparatus necessary to exhibit the pictures. The fact that Mr. Moore saw them at that time has much to do with the present action.

The papers in the case mention three other sets of films known as "The Round Up," "Pendleton" and "Oregon," but the Alaska films are regarded as by far the most important. According to a statement made by Moore, these pictures are worth more than $100,000. The entire set of films was left with Charles Wynard, when Harbeck went to England. After the Titanic's loss, Harbeck being one of the victims, Wynard and his associates, so Moore alleges, began to exhibit them. Mrs. Harbeck understood that when her husband lost his life the films disappeared, too, and only knew of their existence when she received a telegram from Moore asking her to come on to Washington regarding them. She immediately went there, and in the meantime Moore had arranged with the defendants to exhibit them in one of his theatres. The exhibition took place according to schedule, so it is charged, and Moore's deduction that they were the Harbeck pictures, he asserts, was correct. Mrs. Harbeck swore out a warrant and, with the aid of Moore's affidavit, one set of films was seized.

Place Case with Attorney

Moore heard a week ago that the promoters of the films had arranged to show them to Colonel Roosevelt at Oyster Bay, and came to New York with Mrs. Harbeck for the purpose of seizing them. But they finally placed the whole matter in the hands of Cravath, Henderson & Gersdorff of 52 William street, who are now acting as Mrs. Harbeck's attorneys.

Before leaving for his home in Washington yesterday, Moore said that Wynard and Hamilton admitted to him they received an offer of $50,000 for the films, but thought them more valuable. He said they still retained possession of the original negatives and refused not only to give them up, but to stop exhibiting them. Hamilton asserts that he and one Goldie obtained a right to sell, rent and lease the Harbeck films to the World's Amusement Company and the World's Exposition Company.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

CATHERINE HARBECK, Administratrix of the estate of William H. Harbeck, deceased, Plaintiff, Against
CHARLES WYNARD, GEORGE H. HAMILTON, and C. B. CLEMENTS, Defendants.

TO THE HONORABLE THE JUDGES OF THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

Your plaintiff, Catherine Harbeck, administratrix of the estate of William H. Harbeck, deceased, a citizen of the State of Ohio, and residing at Toledo, in the said State, brings this bill against Charles Wynard, George H. Hamilton and C. B. Clements, who reside in the state of New York, and in the southern District of New York, within the jurisdiction of this court, and thereupon alleges:

FIRST: William H. Harbeck, deceased, late a citizen of the United States and resident of the State of Ohio, having had places of business in said State, in the State of Washington and elsewhere, departed this life on, to wit, the 15th day of April, 1912, having been lost on the Steamship Titanic. Plaintiff, the widow of said decedent, has taken out administration on his said estate has been appointed administratrix thereof, and has duly qualified as such, in proper proceedings to that end in the Probate Court of Lucas County, Ohio, as duly appears from letters of administration on the said estate of William H. Harbeck, deceased, granted to plaintiff, which she now brings here and shows unto this Court.

SECOND: The said William H. Harbeck, deceased, was engaged in the business of photography and the manufacture of photographic films for moving pictures, and in the making and vending of said films to divers persons for the purpose of exhibition throughout the country. Among the said films so made, acquired and owned by the said Harbeck, and by him kept for the purpose of sale to divers persons for exhibition throughout the country, were certain films entitled The Round Up, Pendleton, Oregon, which said films were duly protected by copyright registration and by the grant of a copyright thereon, under the laws of the United States, to said Harbeck, on to wit, November 10, 1911, as appears by a certified copy of the certificate of copyright registration, Class J.XXc, No. 163088, attached hereto, marked "Exhibit A" and prayed to be read as a part of this bill.

The said Harbeck also owned certain films entitled Panoramic Views of Alaska in Animated Maps, which said films were duly protected by copyright registration and by the grant of a copyright thereon, under the laws of the United States, to said Harbeck, on to wit, February 14, 1912, as appears by a certified copy of the certificate of copyright registration, Class J.XXc, No. 166299, which said copy is hereto attached, marked "Exhibit B" and prayed to be read as part of this bill.

Your plaintiff as administratrix of the estate of said William H. Harbeck now owns and holds the said copyrights to the said films entitled The Round Up, Pendleton, Oregon, and Panoramic Views of Alaska in Animated Maps above described, absolutely and exclusively, and has not transferred, assigned or in any way parted with the title to said films or either of them, or to any part thereof, excepting certain limited territorial rights in The Round Up, Pendleton, Oregon, not material hereto.

THIRD: All of the foregoing matters were and are known to the defendants, Wynard, Hamilton and Clements, and to each of them, and none of the said defendants has acquired from the said William H. Harbeck, deceased, or from your plaintiff, his administratrix, any right, title or interest in and to any of the films above described. Nevertheless, plaintiff avers that the said defendant Wynard, having obtained possession of copies of each of said films on or about the 1st day of March, A.D. 1912, at the time when the said William H. Harbeck was departing for Europe, and having learned of the death of the said Harbeck as aforesaid, has appropriated the said films to his own use and profit without the consent and against the protest of plaintiff, and has copied, reproduced and duplicated the same for purposes of exhibiting in moving picture shows in divers places throughout the country, and has offered and is offering the same for sale. And your plaintiff alleges and charges that the said defendant Wynard, in combination with the defendants Hamilton and Clements, is offering and endeavoring to sell the said films so copied, reproduced and duplicated as aforesaid to the public generally, and more particularly to and through Fayette T. Moore, a proprietor of a moving picture theatre in Washington, D. C. And your plaintiff believes and charges that the said defendant Wynard, with his co-defendants Clements and Hamilton will continue to appropriate the said films and to copy, reproduce and duplicate the same, and sell the same unless restrained by this Honorable Court. And Plaintiff files herewith as Exhibit C to this her bill, the affidavit of the said Thomas Moore, and prays the same to be read and considered as part thereof.

FOURTH: Plaintiff alleges that the said copyrights are infringed and will continue to be infringed, and the said films so copyrighted as aforesaid will become valueless and of no worth if the said defendants continue to hold the copies, reproductions and duplicates of the said films which they have wrongfully made as aforesaid, and be enabled to recopy the same and dispose of the copies and duplicates to the moving picture trade. The said copies and duplicates would thus supplant the original films protected by copyright and belonging to your plaintiff. The plaintiff avers that she is remediless for protection under her copyrights aforesaid unless this Honorable Court enjoin the said defendants and each of them from copying, reproducing, using, vending or otherwise employing or disposing of the said films or the copies thereof which they hold.

FIFTH: Plaintiff alleges that the said films so protected by copyright as aforesaid are of the value not less than $5,000.

IN CONSIDERATION WHEREOF plaintiff prays that this Honorable Court may issue its writ of subpœna in due form of law directed to the said defendants Charles Wynard, George H. Hamilton and C. B. Clements, and to each of them, demanding them at a certain day therein specified to appear herein and answer all and singular the matters hereinabove set forth, the said answers not being required to be under oath, answers under oath being hereby expressly waived.

And the plaintiff further prays that the said defendants and each of them, their representatives, agents and servants may be restrained by injunction primarily until final hearing and perpetually thereafter from selling, leasing, renting, exhibiting or offering or endeavoring to sell, rent, lease, exhibit or offer said films or either of them, and from exploiting, pirating or in any manner disposing of or utilizing the same, and from copying, reproducing or duplicating the said films or either of them, and from selling, leasing, renting, exhibiting or offering to sell, lease or rent any copies, negatives, reproductions or duplicates of the said films which the said defendants or any of them have made or hold, and from making any copies of the copies, negatives, reproductions, and duplicates of the said films.

And plaintiff further prays that she may be awarded a mandatory injunction compelling the said defendants and each of them, their representatives, agents and servants to surrender and deliver to her the said films hereinabove described, the copies, reproductions, duplicates and negatives of the said films which the said defendants or any of them have made or hold, and that she may have such other and further relief as the nature and circumstances of the case may require and to the court may seem just.

"LIEUTENANT'S LAST FIGHT"—WONDERFUL MILITARY FILM

With hundreds of people in the cast, depicting amazing scenes of battle, staged in scenery of rare beauty and grandeur, "The Lieutenant's Last Fight," the "101" Bison two-reel subject, for release June 1, will undoubtedly prove the biggest attraction thus far released under this now world-famous brand.

The story opens with an Indian village, the home of Big Bear, the son of the Sioux chief. The Government agent, impressed with the brightness of the lad, persuades his father to permit him to be sent to a military school.

The cadets, perfectly disciplined, are shown in their trim uniforms, drilling on the parade grounds, and the young savage is introduced into their midst. Ten years serve to convert the slender boy into a stalwart man, who graduates with the rank of lieutenant, and is assigned to Ft. Reno. He arrives in a stage coach and reports for duty to Col. Garvin.

The officers and their families are at dinner when the colonel introduces the new officer. Lieut. Big Bear is made to keenly feel the barrier of race, as his pleasant acknowledgment of the introduction is met with coolness. Soft-hearted Ethel, the colonel's daughter, noting the man's mental anguish, impulsively comes forward and gives the lieutenant her hand, with a gracious word of welcome.

The old Indian chief is advised of his son's coming, and attired in all the glory of paint and feathers, so dear to the Indian heart, visits Big Bear. An affecting scene takes place as the father and son meet again, and the old chief fondly caresses the gold trappings of his son's uniform, and proudly admires the shining brass buttons.

The actions of the chief are the source of much amusement to the other officers and the women of the post, who watch the pair from a window and mimic the actions of the chief. Indignant at their narrowness, Ethel runs out and asks Big Bear for an introduction to his father.

Capt. Haines has been an ardent wooer of Ethel, and he resents the friendly interest she has taken in the Indian. He is infuriated when he sees Big Bear in pleasant conversation with the girl while the lieutenant is waiting to speak to the colonel at his quarters. Haines waits for Big Bear and warns him to refrain from speaking to Ethel. The Indian resents the insult, and the men engage in a terrific struggle. Haines is being badly thrashed by the powerful Indian when he draws the revolver from Big Bear's holster and attempts to shoot him. The weapon is knocked from his hand, but the shot attracts other officers, who pull the contestants apart. Haines dramatically accuses Big Bear of having attempted to kill him, and points to the Indian's revolver with one cartridge exploded.

Big Bear is court-martialed and found guilty of assaulting a brother officer, and is ordered publicly disgraced and dismissed from the service. The ceremony is most impressive, as the shoulder straps and side arms of the lieutenant are torn from him, in the presence of the whole regiment.

Big Bear packs his belongings into his trunk, including his sabre and uniform and departs. With tears in her eyes and quivering lips, Ethel alone bids the lieutenant good-bye, and as he clasps the hand of the girl and sees the sympathy and friendship in her face, his whole heart goes out to her. With the taciturnity of his race, however, he does not betray his feelings, and with a handclasp he bids her adieu—forever.

Big Bear is given a warm welcome by the tribe, and his father and mother. His civilian's attire is noted, and when the Indians hear the story of his disgrace they are filled with rage.

The Government has been negotiating with the Indians for their lands, and, a few days later, at a meeting with the colonel at the fort, the old chief denounces the palefaces and their methods, and threatens trouble. After his departure, the colonel, knowing that a terrible Indian war is inevitable, sends a courier to Ft. Custer, apprising the commander of the situation, and telling him that the women of Ft. Reno would be sent to Ft. Custer via stage coach, under escort, for safety. The courier is shot from his horse by the Indians, who find the letter but are unable to read it.

Big Bear has been persuaded by his father to don the war paint, and to join in the fight against the whites, when the letter is brought into camp. He interprets the message and the old chief immediately determines to massacre the escort and capture the women.

Instantly Big Bear realizes the terrible danger Ethel is placed in, and, alone in his tent, he racks his brain for a scheme to save her. A vision of her soft eyes looking tenderly at him as she bade him good-bye comes to him, and he resolves to sacrifice his life, if need be, to save her from harm.

At the fort the women are placed in the coach, and, accompanied by a picked detail, start on the journey to Ft. Custer, a larger and safer structure. As the Indians leave the camp to ambush the soldiers, Big Bear, by a ruse, stays behind, and rushing into his tent tears the Indian feathers from his head and dons his lieutenant's uniform. Buckling his sabre about him, he examines his heavy army pistols, and, leaping on a horse, starts out on his hopeless mission.

As the stage coach reaches a valley, the surrounding bushes and trees become suddenly alive with Indians, and a volley marks a trail of death among the soldiers. Lashing their horses, the troopers endeavor to escape, and a running fight ensues.

Behind a hill the last stand is made, and huddled together the little band fight for their lives. Galloping along, Big Bear comes upon the body of the company bugler and picking up his instrument makes his way to the crest of the hill. From this advantageous position, hidden by the bushes, he deliberately picks off the redskins as they approach close to the stage coach. Coolly and calmly he makes every bullet tell. Amid the terrible excitement and thunder of riflery, the crack of his guns is not noticed.

With the clothes practically shot from his back and hanging in shreds, a trooper suddenly darts through the line of Indians, down the hillside, and plunging into the river at terrific speed the horse turns a somersault. The wounded rider clings to the saddle and the noble animal gallops to the fort. A word, and the bugle call rings out and the brigade is mounted and hastening to the scene of battle.

Meantime the little band is in a desperate predicament. Big Bear has seen the escape of the soldier, and knowing that every second is golden, he puts the bugle to his lips and the musical blasts of "The Charge" cause consternation among the Indians, who think the soldiers are at hand and hurriedly retreat. They soon discover their mistake, however, and return to the attack with redoubled fury. The few minutes' respite, however, have saved the doomed people.

Creeping up from the foot of the hill an Indian works his way to the back of Big Bear. Taking deliberate aim he sends a bullet crashing into his body. Mortally wounded the lieutenant leaps upon the Indian, but is soon dispatched. As the troops arrive and charge in the ranks of the Indians, a thrilling scene is enacted, but the redskins are broken up and scattered, and ignominiously run for their lives, pursued by the relentless soldiers.

The last scene shows the still form of the lieutenant in the twilight—the man who was despised by the white people with whom he had cast his lot, and who met his death at the hands of his own race—"unwept, unhonored and unsung," his heroism unknown even to the girl for whom he gave his life.

A SQUAW MAN

(Champion)

The story of a wealthy young man's elopement with an Indian girl, the coming of the little papoose, the embarrassment and then desertion of the husband at the coming of the Indian chief to visit his daughter.

Then follows the return of the Indians to the West, the likewise arrival of the recalcitrant lover, husband and father, his escape in a barroom scuffle from the enraged cowboys, and nursing back to life by his faithful Indian wife. It is a startling story, with a cowboy chase, a fight on horseback, a sensational fall from a wildly galloping horse, and clever bits of daring and deviltry.

Released Wednesday, June 5th.

The enormous earnings of the Eastman Kodak Company are attributed to the growth of the motion picture business. There are about 25,000 picture theatres in this country alone, and it is said that 125,000,000 feet of film are being used every day by them and other shows. The Eastman Company is turning out 250,000,000 feet of film annually, and gets on an average four cents a foot.

The gross earnings of the company for 1911 were $11,649,-264. In 1905 they were $4,013,913. In 1911 the company paid 40 per cent dividends on the common stock. In 1905 it paid 10 per cent.

On his way from New York, he has lectured at Youngstown, O.; Omaha, Neb., and North Yakima, Washington. He is now covering the circuit of the People's Amusement Company of the State of Oregon.

DON'T TRESPASS!

To trespass on a human heart is almost as much a wrong as to parade on a few thousand blades of forbidden grass, yet the first offence is more immune from direct punishment than the last. Hearts are private property, and should not be stolen and trampled upon and transgressed against. The heart is a sacred part of the anatomy, and it shouldn't be punctured.

The ruthless, reckless ravaging of a human heart is the dominant theme in "Ashes of Hope," Rex release of Sunday, June 2d. She gave him everything, the fire and faith of a first love, devotion and trust. And he gave nothing—or nothing but a jesting lie and a heedless suggestion of a promise.

SNIPS AND SNAPS OF NEWS BY A PERIPATETIC CAMERA

Mary Lawton Metcalfe

Let us drop every other engagement and accept all the invitations from mothers' and teachers' clubs, to speak of some of the reasons why the moving picture machines and theatres should be recognized as important factors of progressive education.

New England has its Boston; the South has its Charleston; Richmond Borough has its Westerleigh.

The public school of mothers and teachers, therefore, is made up of wideawake women, prompt to investigate all the new ideas that are constantly cropping up to make the road to knowledge inviting and accessible.

On Wednesday afternoon through the dashing April storm, I wended my way to the public school of Westerleigh. In spite of the inclement afternoon, a large assemblage was present. After regular routine and business of the club, the gracious Madame President introduced the subject: "Moving Pictures a Valuable Accessory to Education" and then turned me loose to talk.

I have written a series of articles in the Moving Picture News since November, 1911, to date on my personal theories, and successfully experimented at educational matinées this spring as to enhancing the value of pictures by telling stories with them; it was very easy to make a kind of glorified warm hash of the best ingredients and serve an entirely new mental meal to an attentive audience.

Moving pictures first to attract attention.

Moving pictures to provide the university extension course.

Moving pictures to promote the sanitation of every community.

Moving pictures to be the vestibule of every public library.

Moving pictures to fill the benches at Sunday-school.

Moving pictures to get the dust off the family Bible.

Moving pictures to help the preacher.

Those were some of the ingredients of the glorified New Thought hash.

* * * *

In closing, we made a climax by urging that mothers and teachers would establish good-will relations with the picture theatres and offer to patronize the shows, if a committee of the clubwomen of every locality are permitted to suggest pleasant scenes and subjects.

While the hissing samovar was giving forth cheering fumes, suggestive of the cup that cheers without inebriating, my subject was opened up for further inquiries and discussion.

* * * *

It is with pleasure that I report to the theatre and film exchanges, that the more talking women you turn loose for your interests, the quicker intelligent communities will have dispelled from their minds entirely wrong ideas of the moving picture trade.

It is a satisfaction to hear that quite another phase of the work has been presented by privilege of being a talker.

* * * *

The question which was put to me was—"How about the fire laws? I could not answer. Although many of my own fraternities have been to Albany and can tell the names of law-makers off the reel, it is a pleasure yet in store to be able to say how do the New York City fire laws operate against having moving pictures in clubrooms, schools and halls.

The audience was asked to talk the needs of the Westerleigh Club over with the nearest theatre manager, inviting him to put on such films as would be entertaining and instructive to the entire community of representative families.

* * * *

There must be some safety machine that will not sizzle up tapes, burn fingers, and scare the audience into a panic. I did not know of such, but promised to report later. That Westerleigh Mothers-Teachers' Club means business. They belong to the local Federation and to the Greater New York City Federation, and can be splendid advertisers of the moving picture trade as necessary in school and clubwork.

One question that has been hurled at me several times since my last ink-work in this paper is:

Do you think the pictures in motion make people blind? Mercy, what next as a minus obstacle in the march of progress!

No, madame, your informant was more apt to blind you by the dust he was trying to throw in your eyes.

It is not to be supposed that an audience would sit five hours with the waves of motion causing from the screen convulsions of the optic nerves and eyeballs, besides his own brain-camera inverted from effort to do lip reading.

Any pastime, pleasure, occupation can be so prostituted that it drives men, women and children blind and deaf and dumb and lame and crooked to the exit doors of life.

* * * *

Just think a few practical thoughts about this blind business. Shall the noble art of sewing be abandoned because in the sweat shops of New York women and little children must without singing the "Song of the Shirt," sew buttons until they go blind? It is not wise to abolish sewing, but to help make such jurisdiction that the fine art of sewing shall not compel parents and their children to go blind from the point of the needle.

Cooking is a fine art, but many cook-mothers are straining their eyes blind to search for husbands, who are increasing the wages of wives that devote seven days and nights a week to looking for hooks and crooks to buckle down expenses.

Yes, cooking is a noble art but it can be made to ruin the sight, so that women both go blind and mad from staying at this entertainment, entirely recommended by the men of the family too long—too long.

* * * *

In my wanderings with professional pen, I have not met a man or woman who has gone blind from seeing moving pictures.

Many persons enjoy horseback but men go it blind from being too much on the track.

* * * *

Moral! Any art, science, craft, pleasure and hobby can be ridden to blindness, moral or physical.

* * * *

Pleasure and comfort come from keeping in the middle of the road—that is, observing the happy medium of seeing just enough of good things to go home and want to come again, bringing the kinder mitt.

* * * * * *

A bachelor maid Aunty told me that she does not take her little niece to a picture show because the child had lost its mother and a friend several weeks after took her to a moving picture show. One film was a dying mother clinging to the little girl she was holding in bed.

The poor little sad heart in the audience sobbed aloud, "That's mama and me."

She had to be taken home and refused to be comforted as the picture brought up the mental film in memory's box of her own bereavement.

* * * * * *

You gentlemen who develop scenario have a grave responsibility. While I am doing all possible to proclaim the illustrative value of pictures, in the name of teachers and parents we must protest against pictures of death, sorrow, suffering. There is enough real tragedy in every home—God help the little one who mourns a parent—pictures should give lively incidents to lead off from misery and sadness.

* * * * * *

We suburbanites and dwellers in Mesopotamia sometimes end up in a picture house after a hard day's shoping.

One afternoon I said to a friend: "Let us drop in here," one of the big vaudeville play-houses up town. The four reels gave us such mournful stories, the memories are like being pall-bearers at one's own funeral.

The great end and object of the cultured public librarian is to create a taste for good literature.

Books are recommended to readers, whether they like the names or not.

To feed a family on prunes twenty-one times a week is quite nauseating, even if some people do like them.

Do you theatre managers catch on?

If your audiences love murders, death, burial, robberies, scalping, roasting, are you going to feed it to the meek and mild-eyed until you make them black-ball the trade?

It is up to you to cultivate the cheerful taste. We get melancholia and prohibition spirits of jim-jams too easily from home lost chords to have it aided and cultivated for fun.

These few remarks are so plain that it does not take a Philadelphia lawyer to understand. They are remarks that can help a manager select films for a mixed audience.

FOREIGN CONSULAR REPORTS

Plant for Making Machinery in England

A report from an American consulate states that a firm in England desires to get in touch with an American company desiring to produce in England a small machine or device which could be manufactured and sold there to greater advantage than might be done in the United States. This firm is prepared to make the machine throughout—drawings, patterns, welding, machine word, fittings, and erecting, but would prefer an article which is already being sold in that country. Copy of the complete report giving further particulars can be obtained from the Bureau of Manufactures.

Moving Picture Films

A business firm in the Near East writes one of the commercial agents of the Department of Commerce and Labor that moving pictures are very popular at present in certain sections of the Near East. This firm would like to get in touch with persons willing to establish theatres in that section, or with manufacturers of moving picture films who would be willing to rent their films to already established theatres.

Delay in Making Copies of Films

One of the great difficulties experienced by American films is in having copies made abroad. After the American agent has secured his orders he must get copies, as it is impracticable to wait until the films desired can be obtained from the United States. One of the first steps to be taken by the American house is to make a contract with some reliable European manufacturer for copies. The contract must be made with great care, particularly as regards delivery, as it is often in the interest of the European firm to delay delivery. The following case has been reported to this office as illustrative of the difficulties of the American importer: The Berlin agent of an American manufacturer had secured orders for 30 copies of a new film. Copies were made in Paris according to previous contract with a French film manufacturer, and were delivered just too late to enable the agent to fulfill his contracts with the German customers, with the result that acceptance was refused in every instance.

An American house desiring to sell films in Germany should secure a reliable general agent in Berlin, which is the principal market for films, and pictures are submitted to police censorship there. At least three pictures a week should be turned out in order to make the business pay, the agent's expenses, particularly for traveling, being heavy.

Moving picture machines are manufactured in Germany, and French machines are also used here. A good machine can be purchased for 950 marks (about $225).

MOROCCO

(From Consul General Maxwell Blake, Tangier.)

There is a very promising field for the sale of moving picture apparatus in Morocco, as the large native population appears very partial to this form of entertainment. At present there is but one such theater in Tangier, but it has made considerable profit.

The best way of establishing this business here would be by providing an agency depot in Tangier, which would also supply the neighboring towns of Gibraltar, Algeciras, and Linea de Concepcion, Spain. A stock of 150 films would be sufficient, 50 films to be renewed each week. Heretofore films showing ships of war, troops in action, melodramatic battles, etc., have been most popular.

SYRIA

(From Consul General W. Stanley Hollis, Beirut.)

There are three moving picture theaters in Beirut and one each in Damascus, Haifa and Tripoli. Films are leased from two Paris firms and one in Rome, and reach the houses here after being shown in Egypt. American firms desiring to reach this market with their supplies would have to follow the example of these firms and establish an agency in Cairo or Alexandria, or do business through these firms themselves.

(From Consul Jesse B. Jackson, Aleppo.)

There is but one cinematograph theater in this district and it obtain all its films under contract with a Paris firm. These films reach here only after being used in a number of other towns and are often in bad conditions and out of date. There is apparently room for some strong American competition in this and other Syrian towns, but the hold of the present firms could only be broken by personal solicitation, as the proprietors of the various houses fear to make a temporary change because of possible retaliation. Thorough confidence would have to be inspired in the users of films and proof of better conditions would necessarily have to be shown. If these exactions can be met by American manufacturers, there is no reason why a large business can not be immediately developed.

All of your whistles, such as the locomotive, tugboat, steamboat and fog horn, should be wooden whistles as you get a much better quality of tone from them than you do from the old-style tin whistle. You should also have a large one-tone Pedal F whistle to use for ocean liner's, etc.

The Chinese musette can be used in many Oriental, or side-show pictures, as well as many Chinese pictures, and in such a picture a musette properly used would be the hit of the picture.

JAPAN

(From Consul General Thomas Sammons, Yokohama.)

In Yokohama, as well as throughout the Empire, the moving picture show is taking the place of the old-line theater. The price of admission is sometimes 2½ cents, but usually 5 cents. There are also numerous traveling picture shows.

These concerns do a large film-exchange business, mostly with European manufacturers. An American film is seldom seen, although investigation leads to the belief that the public would be very glad to see more characteristic American views. There is also a good opening here for American moving picture machines and accessories.

CHINA

(From Consul General Amos P. Wilder, Shanghai.)

American pictures would be popular in this place if the right selections, suitable to the local taste, could be made. This can only be done by establishing a local agency which could judiciously select the films that would be popular and which could also oversee the business in other ports. There are but two important shows in Shanghai.

(From Consul Lester Mayquard, Harbin.)

All the four moving picture machines in Harbin are of French manufacture. The proprietors of the theaters obtain their supplies through Moscow and Paris agents. One owner also handles films and sells about 10,000 meters each of positive and negative films per year. There are two machines here for taking moving pictures, one of English and the other of French make.

STRAITS SETTLEMENTS

There are three moving picture shows in Singapore and six throughout the rest of the peninsula. A French company supplies the machines and controls the film market. This company stocks about 1,000,000 meters of film (meter=3.28 feet), buying what it desires from other manufacturers and sending in about 5,000 feet of new film each week. It has had an operator in this field for some time taking pictures of rubber growing and other local industries.

"A Case of Dynamite" "Return of Captain John" "A Case of Dynamite"

TWO COMING IMP RELEASES

"THE RETURN OF CAPTAIN JOHN"

In Drama Release of June 6th, 1912

This is a pathetic story of the sea telling how a young seafarer left his sweetheart on shore while he, himself, went away on a voyage from which he was not to return the same man. For the ship was wrecked and the young seafarer on being rescued and restored to animation on a distant part of the coast was a changed man, for he had lost his memory. And so had forgotten all former personalities including his sweetheart.

In his new home he married and was happy with his wife and little child. One day, however, duty took him away on a voyage to the village he had left two years before. He was recognized by his sweetheart, who was still awaiting his return, and other friends, but he failed to recognize them. There was a long and anguished meeting between him and the girl before she succeeded in bringing back his lost memory, at last, by means of a little locket which he had presented to her before he went away on his fatal journey.

When recollection returned to him, he was confronted by the agonizing circumstance that though his heart was pledged to one girl, he was married to another. But duty prevailed and leaving the stricken girl, he returned to his wife and child and so this little tragedy of the sea closed.

Margarita Fischer is the sweetheart, and Harry Pollard is the young captain and in these roles find a remarkably fine vehicle for the manifestation of their wonderful powers. The ocean scenes and the views of fishing life on the Californian coast are singularly fine. Regarded purely as a picture, outside of its merits as a play, this offering is unquestionably one of the best Imp productions ever yet put out; the delicate effects of light and shade being wonderfully well realized.

ECLAIR IN NEW EXECUTIVE OFFICES

Eclair has new executive offices at 225-227 West Forty-second street, and the laboratories and studios at the Fort Lee location are being considerably enlarged to meet the growing needs of the feature productions.

Meriden, Conn.—Plans are being drawn for a moving picture theatre on State street for A. Ferrucci, of 74 St. John street.

Meriden, Conn.—Work has been strarted on a moving picture theatre at 156 Dixwell avenue for Louis Bernfeld, of 96 Lyon street.

New York, N. Y.—A theatre will be constructed on the northwest corner of Westchester and Bergen avenues, and have a seating capacity of 2200.

"A CASE OF DYNAMITE"

Imp Comedy Release of June 8th

Joe Moore, the youthful Imp actor, makes a further advance in his work in this amusing little piece. He, in a spirit of boyish deviltry, paints the ominous word "dynamite" on the suit-case of a harmless individual, who having to visit the bank, a jewelry store, and other places, scares all and sundry by the terrible word, and being, so to speak, bribed to make himself scarce, becomes rich through this ominous inscription on the suit-case , of all of which for the time being he is blissfully unconscious.

At last, however, the police get on his track and after many amusing incidents in which fear predominates they run him to earth; earth being the police station. Within that temple of justice, when the suit-case is opened, they discovered that the most formidable article therein contained was an alarm clock. So all their fears vanished. Jonathan Jay is set at liberty and everybody is made to look extremely foolish through their unfounded but natural suspicions.

Besides Joe Moore, who, as we have said, scores excellently in the role of the boy, John R. Cumpson, as the dynamiter, and H. S. Mack, as the nervy policeman, help along the fun. "A Case of Dynamite" will surely provoke giggles.

CLOWNLAND

"Clownland" is the title of a picture to be released by the Imp Films Company on Saturday, June 22d. It is the story of a little boy who dreams a dream. He dreams that he goes to a circus performance. For the purpose of making the picture the Imp Company engaged the services of a well-known troupe of artists in New York City, and the resulting picture is full of the realism of the stage. This picture will unquestionably please the children wherever shown.

Always on the alert to present novel themes to exhibitors, the Imp Films Company will on Saturday, June 15th, release a subject entitled "A Bullfight in Nuevo Laredo, Mexico." This picture was taken in February last on the occasion of the celebration of George Washington's birthday by the people of Laredo, Texas. It is a realistic representation of a bullfight without any of the repellent aspects of the sport, which have been carefully eliminated from the picture.

The Shriners' National Convention recently held at Los Angeles, Cal., forms a part of the Imp Saturday release of Saturday, June 8th.

BABIES THREE
Powers Release, June 4

A momentous happening has occurred at the home of John Briggs, a traveling man, who is on the road at the time. Mrs. Briggs is the proud mother of a lusty infant. Little Dorothy, aged nine, is in a quandary and appeals to the nurse for enlightenment but is told to run away and play. The nurse turns her over to the maid but that sedate young woman is not communicative. Dorothy is persistent and is finally allowed to accompany the maid to the railroad station where a telegram is sent to Briggs in forming him that he is the father of a baby. It is all pretty clear to Dorothy and she wonders about the ground only to discover that a mother cat has two beautiful young kittens. Dorothy has an inspiration. She goes to the station and coaxes an employe to send a telegram to her papa the import of which is that two additional babies have arrived. Briggs receives the first telegram at his hotel in a distant town and is overjoyed. He proudly shows the wire to his brother knights of the road and receives their congratulations. He prepares to hasten home and is about to leave the hostelry when the second telegram comes and he deduces that he is the father of triplets and his ardor is somewhat cooled. He is forced to show the message to his companions and is guyed unmercifully. Arriving at home he approaches the chamber of his wife with misgivings. Entering, he is shown the child in its cradle and mustering up courage he inquires about the other two. The nurse is mystified and denies all knowledge of any other babies. Dorothy makes her appearance with the two baby kittens and the matter is explained to his releif and satisfaction.

Drone, an enemy of the foreman, steals the foreman's money and White Fawn interferes. Drone forces her to go with him. A chase follows. White Fawn is struck by a bullet intended for her lover, the foreman, and dies. The picture closes with the chief waiting in vain for the return of his daughter.

THE MIDNIGHT WEDDING
Gaumont Release, June 2

The big industrial manufacturer J. H. Duncan, officer of the Legion of Honor and director of Duncan & Co., manufacturer of electric supplies, is veritable much attached to his daughter, young and pretty Suzanne. Capricious and frivolous the young Miss Duncan is a very spoilt child, possessing grace and charm of a nature that claims her father's righthand bower, Peter Morrison, as victim.

Young Peter is desperately in love with Suzanne, takes every opportunity to be in her presence, but alas! his affections are not returned to the fullest extent. He has become so infatuated that she appears to him in all his dreams and there is no way out of it but that he propose. In doing this, Peter receives a stunning blow for he finds that Suzanne has trifled with his affections and cannot possibly consent to be his wife. The affair so upsets Peter that he decides that he must leave his employer and notifies him accordingly. However, Mr. Duncan cannot look forward to the same success in business without the assistance of young Morrison, and so persuades him to try and throw off the sadness of his misfortune and remain in his employ, at the same time, assuring him that he soon would rise to the most important position in the establishment. The young engineer, touched by the kinds words of the director, decides to remain with the concern, but the refusal of Suzanne bears grievously upon his heart and he refuses to allow his idle moments to pass without visions of her.

After a period of six months after the matter has subsided to a certain extent, Peter comes home one evening to find the announcement of Suzanne's engagement to a titled nobleman on his table in his room. His mother had received the announcement, and not knowing just how deeply Peter would take it, placed it there for him to see. From this time on Peter was inconsolable and could think of nothing but of the coming marriage of Suzanne with the Count at the Hotel Neville, which was to take place at midnight on the 27th of December. His last hopes were now destroyed. On the night of the 27th he came home, arranged his dress for the wedding, inasmuch as he was an invited guest, placed several suspicious packages in his pockets and prepared to depart for the hotel. Before leaving, however, he wrote a note to his mother, advising that he was now bidding her "good-bye" forever, that he did not care to live any longer, had suffered too much and was prepared to die with her who had ruined his fortune. At midnight he further informed he would be revenged.

At the hotel Peter found Mr. Duncan making most active preparations for the final moment of the marriage. The florists, electricians, tappisters were going and coming in incessant procession. From the room that he was given, the engineer could descry all these activities which proved entirely too much for his weakening brain. In sheer revenge he pulled out two sticks of dynamite from his pockets and placed them in the works of the clock on the top of his dresser. The dynamite was so inserted as to go off by contact with the electric circuit at the very hour of midnight, when the wedding festivities were in full blast. It was thus he prepared his revenge, and even if he himself could not marry the girl of his choice he would at least prevent the Count from claiming the one he loved.

In the meantime, his mother had discovered the note on the table and in the moments of horror and surprise that ensued, found time to hurry to the hotel in a taxi and arrive just ten minutes of twelve, in an attempt to find her frenzied son. No one knew of his presence, however, inasmuch as he had concealed himself on the balcony overlooking the reception room. Five minutes before the fatal hour, however, Peter recognized his mother and, realizing the gravity of the situation which would also include the death of his own dear parent, he made one mad rush for the engine room in the basement and bade the electricians to cut off the dynamos and stop the current and give him time to remove the dynamite from the works of the clock. In the reception room, however, things were progressing most gloriously. The party was about its highest, everybody was in the best of spirits, suddenly, however, the reception room was plunged in total darkness. Terror seized every heart and Mr. Duncan tried to explain the strange situation. However, Peter rushed upstairs at this point and gave a hurried explanation that he had accidentally caused a short circuit and that in a few minutes the hotel would be entirely lit up.

Mother and son recognize each other and embrace—only he and she knowing the secret.

REPARATION
Republic Release, June 4

Bert Morton and some college companions, while on an automobile tour, stop at a farmhouse for refreshments. Bert meets and falls in love with Mary, the daughter of the farmer. She returns his love.

Bert receives a letter from his father, stating that it is necessary for him to come home and marry Alice Martin. Bert informs Mary that he must leave her for a while, keeping her ignorant of the real reason. His father persuades him to marry Alice Martin, although Bert loves Mary and is in honor bound to marry her. His father's appeal finally wins the boy over and he shuts his eyes to the vision of the unfortunate little country girl who is eagerly awaiting his return. When she does not hear from him, she decides to visit him.

In the meantime, Bert becomes engaged to Alice Martin and the wedding day is set. Mary arrives at Bert's home and tells Bert the "truth," stating how necessary it is for him to marry her. Bert offers her money, which she spurns. Mary seeks to find consolation in death, but is saved by two workmen and is brought to the house of Bert's fiancee; later, when Bert calls on his fiancee, he meets Mary there.

Alice overhears a conversation between Mary and Bert, and thus learns the truth of their relationship. The revelation is a great shock to her as she loves Bert, but womanhood asserts itself and wins out. She explains to Bert that she knows all and obtains his promise that he will wed the unfortunate girl, who, in the eyes of God, is his wife. Bert confesses all to his father and receives full forgiveness as well as a welcome greeting for his wife.

A WESTERN TRIANGLE
Republic Release, June 8

The inevitable triangle, two men and a woman, is far more dramatic when the two men prove to be brothers. Jennie Forrester has been the playmate of the Harrison boys ever since she wore pinafores and pigtails. When the older brother, Louis, proposed to her, Jennie promptly refused him, as she loved the younger one, whom she had already accepted. Louis in anger denounces his brother and they come to blows. The crowd of cowboys, however, steps in and prevent what might have been a fatal quarrel.

John Hopkins, who hates Louis bitterly for an imaginary wrong, has been a witness to this quarrel and sees an opportunity for revenge without any danger to himself, as he thinks. The two brothers have been left alone, after assurance by both that the quarrel would not continue. The younger one removes his belt with gun and knife and hangs it in his saddle horn while he goes to the brook to get some water to wash himself with. The elder remains on a log, brooding. Hopkins sees this from a distance and when Henry has left, he takes the younger brother's knife from the belt and, sneaking up behind Louis, he stabs him in the back. Not satisfied with his fiendish act, he robs the body, then rushes away. The cowboys discover the body with Henry's knife sticking in the back and, remembering the quarrel, they conclude that Henry is guilty. Western law is brought into play, and in spite of Jennie, preparations are made to hang him.

Jennie, in the meantime, has ridden at breakneck speed for assistance to the authorities. She is held up by Hopkins, who shows her a purse of money, which she recognizes as having belonged to the murdered man. By a clever ruse she unarms the murderer and compels him to ride with "hands up" to the scene of execution in the nick of time to save her lover from death and the cowboys from committing a crime. Western atmosphere, splendid riding, tense situation and quick action makes this an extremely interesting picture.

BEAUTIFUL PALO DURO

A 250-foot scenic picture of one of the garden spots of the New World. The Palo Duro Canyon is situated 15 miles from Amarillo, Tex., and has been called by Ex-President Theodore Roosevelt, "one of the most beautiful spots in the United States.

It was Mr. Roosevelt who proposed making this the New National Park. It contains a national amphitheatre over 2,000 feet high, besides many beautiful caves, waterfalls, and over fifty miles of canyons whose rugged beauty cannot be surpassed.

THE OLD VIOLIN

Solax Release, June 5

An old violin-maker, living in a small town, spends his time perfecting instruments. Like other men engaged in kindred artistic occupations, he is absorbed in his work and forgets about worldly necessities until want—implacable and inexorable—throws her shadows across his threshhold. While the old violinmaker goes out to seek financial assistance from his friend the bookseller, a young violinist comes to his home and leaves a Stradivarius worth $10,000 to be repaired. The young musician came to have his violin repaired—but soon he found that his heart strings also needed repairing—for he fell in love with the violinmaker's daughter.

Although the violin-maker gets temporary relief from his friend, the bookseller, a crabbed and crafty creditor later makes his life miserable. This creditor takes some of the instruments in part payment of his notes. The old musician is now left in narrow straits. In desperation he decides to substitute one of his own violins for the $10,000 Stradivarius. "Surely, that young violinist will not know the difference!" After a pathetic scene in which the violinist struggles with his conscience, his daughter enters and from his peculiar actions, she guesses his frame of mind. There is a very dramatic scene between father and daughter. In the meanwhile, the young violinist enters and he saves the situation and makes harmony out of impending discord.

THE DOG—GONE QUESTION

Solax Release, June 7

Dr. Nearsighted gives Billy the boot. Billy is the bane of the old Doctor's existence. The old man, being nearsighted, likes dogs, because they are such dependable creatures. Billy hates dogs because they usually make a meal of the seat of his trousers —so whenever opportunity offered, Billy used to poison the old doc's dog. Whenever the Doctor found Billy around, making love to his daughter, the doctor went after him with a shotgun. After Billy had poisoned his last dog, the nearsighted doctor advertises for a live one to replace the dead one.

Two tramps, anxious to make some coin, read the ad and immediately concoct a scheme —they steal a dogskin from a costumer and impose upon Dr. Nearsighted. In the meanwhile, Billy gets busy and poisons the food and water for the new dog. He goes to the kennel and there meets his sweetheart and tells her that he has poisoned the dog's water. The fraud, masquerading in a dog's skin, having licked up the supposedly poisoned water, overhears the conversation and supposing that he has been poisoned, almost gets a fit from fright. This complicates the situation and makes the finish ludicrous.

On the same reel is

BILLY BOY

Miss Eva Black, a negro washerwoman, wants to be rather fashionable and so has cards printed. She makes a call on one of her "clients" and the client writes on her card—"Call at 8 p. m"—and gives the address.

Billy Boy is a street corner Johnny. He stands around and flirts with the "swell dames" that pass. Miss Eva Black passes and drops her "call" card. A swell girl passes and, seeing the card, picks it up. Billy spies her from the distance and, of course, follows her. She reads Miss Black's card and then drops it. Billy is on the jump and picks up the card and reads—"Miss Eva Black—Call at 8 p. m.," and the address.

Billy decides it's the opportunity of a lifetime. After sending Miss Black flowers and candy, Billy primps up and calls on the waiting Miss Black. When the negress confronts him, Billy makes one dive through the window and is gone for evermore.

DOTTIE'S NEW DOLL

Thanhouser Release, June 4

Dottie was very proud of her great big beautiful doll, but even the best of dolls are like plungers in Wall Street sometimes—they are in danger of getting broke. And that was what happenedshr "Beautiful Bess," and it nearly broke her mother's tiny heart.

The accident happened while Dottie and her nurse were in the park. Nurse had gone away for a moment with another nurse, and Dottie was all alone with the wreck of her child. There was no one to comfort her, and she wept bitterly.

Suddenly she noticed another go-cart near her, and noticed that it contained a beautiful doll and one that was not broken. It had real hair and could gurgle and kicked about in a funny way that was most delightful, in fact, a much more desirable play fellow than "Beautiful Bess."

So, being a child who always took what she wanted when she wanted, Dottie threw Beautiful Bess into the shrubbery and put the new doll into her buggy, carefully covering her up so that nurse would not notice the substitution. Glady she welcomed the return of her nurse, and gleefully she went home, for she wanted to be alone with her new doll.

Sitting alone at supper in her nursery, it suddenly struck her that perhaps new dollie might be able to eat, for she seemed so accomplished. She started her in on cocoa, and managed to spill it all over them both. Dismayed, she rushed from her bedroom where the new doll was, to the nursery, where nurse returned in time to see her, showed anger at her condition, removed her apron and put it in the soiled clothes basket.

Dottie was a kind mistress and she realized that if she needed clean clothes, new dollie was in the same condition. So she took advantage of being unwatched to try to remove new dollie's clothes, failed and finally dumped dolly and all into the basket. It struck her that immediate sanitary measures were needed (although she did not use those exact words), so she promptly dragged the basket off, knowing where the laundry was, as she had been there with her nurse.

She arrived just in time to save a poor Chinaman from being dragged away to a cell. He was an honest, hard working Chinaman, (there are many of them, by the way,) but his partner was a thief and had been sentenced for stealing a watch, and the judge who presided had reason to fear that the criminal's Tong was after him. So when the judge's baby mysteriously disappeared, and the good-Chinaman was seen in the neighborhood at the time, he naturally was suspected. They were just preparing to work all the police degrees in full form on the unhappy Wu when Dottie arrived with her dirty doll that needed to be washed.

The judge and his wife took the new doll away from Dottie, for it was their baby, and Dottie returned home disconsolate. The grateful Chinaman cheered her up, however, by promising to get her a doll with a pigtail from the Flowery Kingdom. All the same she regrets the animated toy that she had for a short time, so short in fact, that it did not have opportunity to be troublesome.

HER SECRET

Thanhouser Release, June 7

The husband was stern, solemn, and never could understand why anyone should laugh. The wife didn't have much sense, perhaps, but she was full of life and laughter. Why they should have married was a mystery; that there should have come a matrimonial shipwreck was hardly a surprise.

A simple minded old music master was their daughter's instructor. He deeply admired the wife, and once, when the husband had been especially ill-natured, and the music master found her in tears, he told her of his devotion. The husband surprised them and ordered the wife from the house. Calling their daughter, who was only fifteen, he explained that the mother, because of her sins, was going out of their life forever. The girl, however, refused to accept the verdict, and cheerfully abandoned a life of luxury to follow the mother who had always fondly cared for and loved her.

In due time a divorce was granted, and the wife married the music master. They were poor but happy and the woman never regretted the choice she had made. On her death bed she called her loyal daughter to her and confided to her the care of her baby son, the child of her second marriage, making the girl promise to care for him always.

The first husband heard of his wife's death and his thoughts turned to his child. He wrote to her offering to provide a home of luxury on condition that she would cast out of her life the man and the child he hated. Her first impulse was to refuse, but the music master induced her to accept, and she realized that she would be able to provide the funds that would give "baby brother" the comforts that he needed.

The father was proud of his handsome daughter, and decided to provide her with a wealthy husband. The man he selected did not appeal to her, but when threatened with poverty, she consented, not for her own sake but because of the sacred charge confided to her at her mother's deathbed.

On the night of the marriage, the girl received word that her brother had been fatally injured by a fall from a window. In her bridal gown, she ran from the house, forgetting everything and everybody in her anxiety to reach the child.

The bridegroom noticed her agitation and her hasty flight, and placing the worst possible construction on it, followed her to the poor tenement. There he listened and learned enough to satisfy him that his suspicions were unfounded, and to prove that the girl of his choice was a noble, self-sacrificing woman.

Tenderly he went to her and told her that he knew her secret, and that there was no reason why it should be hidden from him. "Your people are my people," he added, as he extended a hand of brotherly love to the child, then turning enfolded his bride in his arms.

And the girl whose life had been one of self-sacrifice, could see that she was entering upon a future of happiness and love.

THE FOREIGN SPY
Nestor Release, May 27

"After serving an eight-year sentence, ex-Captain Carter, formerly of the Third Engineers, has been released from the military prison. Carter was convicted of treason, after losing some important plans of the coast defense. It was supposed that the papers had been secured from him by a woman in the employ of a foreign government. She was known in diplomatic circles as 'Celeste.'"

The above article appearing in a daily newspaper is the keynote of the story. Carter, during the long, weary years of his incarceration, has thought only of vengeance! The woman whose subtle power and perfidy had blinded him with passion, secured his confidence and betrayed his honor and his manhood is now the one haunting theme. He sets out to search for the object of his vengeance and discovers the siren upon the eve of a similar work. Celeste has an appointment with one Baron Von Stein, to whom she is to deliver plans of some of the country's coast defenses. She goes from the house to secure her victim, leaving a letter for the Baron, giving the man servant, who is a party to the intrigue, full instructions. Upon the departure of the spy, the avenger, Carter, enters her apartment from the garden window. He discovers the letter, which reads:

"Dear Baron: Conceal yourself upon my return. I shall have with me Lieutenant Howe, who has the new coast defense plans upon his person. Trust me to obtain them.
"CELESTE."

He replaces the letter and hides behind the portieres as the Baron enters. The servant and accomplice, following instructions, presents the letter and serves the Baron with cigarettes and wine. Celeste's carriage is heard without and the Baron is about to conceal himself when the avenger comes forth and, at the pistol's point, compels him to submbit to being bound. He is then forced behind the same portieres.

Celeste and the lieutenant enter. He is a manly young chap and seems to be under the spell of the woman's wiles. Wine and cigarettes are served. Celeste, in coquettish mood, endeavors to draw from him information regarding his country's defenses, etc. He, in a spirit of bewildered confidence, displays the plans he bears. She fails, however, to obtain them. Glancing at the portieres, where the Baron stands revealed to her view, held there with Carter's pistol at his back, she interprets his glance to propose coffee to the young officer. It is brought. Stealthily and unseen, from the folds of her dress, the woman takes a vial containing a drug which she puts in the young man's cup. Celeste, with a winning grace, hands him the cup, cajoling and coquetting the while. The lieutenant raises the drugged cup to his lips but he is saved by the firm hand of the avenger. The woman is horrified. Carter hands Howe the newspaper article, saying: "I am that man!" The officer, realizing the danger so narrowly averted and well-nigh panic-stricken with fear and rage, would commit violence upon his arch-betrayer, but Carter bids him depart, claiming her for his own vengeance. The young man, breathing a prayer of gratitude, departs. In the midst of the denunciation which follows, the Baron emerges from hiding. He is unbound and, being warned, is ordered by Carter to go. Left alone with the victim of her former plots, the woman realizes her pending doom and becomes terror-stricken. Securing the pistol placed by him at hand she turns it upon herself, while he gazes coldly on, the relentless executioneer.

THE SCALAWAG
Nestor Release, May 29

Anne is rocking the baby as Lem enters with a letter from his wife's father. As Anne opens it, Lem sees two five dollar bills and demands the letter. Reluctantly, Anne obeys and Lem takes one bill and hands her the letter, which reads:

"Dear Daughter: There is just one thing for you to do; give up that scalawag husband of yours. Am sending you ten dollars to tide you over. I have bought a ranch in another state and I am coming Wednesday to take you with me. Be ready. Your loving,
"FATHER."

When Wednesday morning arrived, Anne was ready to go. Lem had been shiftless, but he still loved his wife and baby, so when he found that she was going back with her father, he decide to take the baby and slip away. This, however, was prevented by the old man's appearance in the doorway, and his wife and little one were soon on their way to their new home.

Five years passed. The baby had grown to be a mischievous tot of six, with a great fondness for horses. Lem had gone from bad to worse through evil associates. Upon this particular morning, the foreman had just placed the money he was to deposit for little Annie's grandfather in the buck-board, when he discovered he had forgotten his bank book and hurried into the house for it. Instantly, seeing a chance for a ride and to tease the foreman, the child climbed into the buck-board and started the horse off at a good trot and, before the foreman had returned, had already passed out of sight.

Lem and his partner, Luke, who had but that day arrived in that part of the country, saw the child approaching with lines dragging. Handing her the lines, Lem asked the little one where she was going. For a reply, the child held up the satchel of money, then declared she was going to the bank. The two men were in the buck-board in short order, but instead of sending the child back, as Lem wished, Luke insisted that she might tell on them and so she sat happily between the partners. As they drove rapidly along the road, a neighbor recognized the child and rig and hastened away to the ranch to tell them what he had seen. The foreman and the boys, Anne and her father had, in the meanwhile, missed both the little one and the buckboard, so that when the neighbor arrived, they set out in hot pursuit.

Believing they were followed, Luke stopped the horse at the foot of a mountain and snatching the satchel of money as Lem alighted, he raised his whip to send the horse on with the child. Lem, however, was too quick for him and lifted her in his arms just as the horse dashed away. Up the mountain the men ran, but when they reached the top, Luke again insisted upon being rid of the child. He would throw her down to the ledge below. A quarrel followed, in which Lem was wounded and then forced over the cliff by Luke, the child, in the meanwhile, running away. As Luke turned to catch her, he saw the posse in pursuit and fled down the other side of the mountain. Little Annie returned and, looking over at the half unconscious Lem, she managed to half-climb, half-roll, to him, but in so doing, badly injured her ankle, so Lem was forced to either carry her or leave her alone. Staggering along with the child, he reached the grandfather and his men just as they captured Luke with the money. Lem had been wounded too severely to recover and had but placed the child in the old man's arms, to learn that it was his own little daughter, when he passed away.

THE SHERIFF OUTWITTED
Nestor Release, June 1

Bob Short, having shot a man in self-defense, is making a quick get-away from the scene of the fight. Seeing the sheriff coming along the road, he hides in the bushes until he passes, but the sheriff has observed him, however. After the sheriff has disappeared from view, Bob hastens to the home of his sweetheart, Bess Dennison, and tells her that he is going to leave the country. Bess tells him to go up to the deserted house on the hilltop and she will bring him food.

On his journey to town, the sheriff's thoughts are far from being pleasant, as he had asked Bob's sweetheart to go to a dance with him and she had refused, telling him that she loved Bob. On his entrance in town, he is immediately informed of the shooting and recalls meeting Bob on the road, and immediately starts out in pursuit of Bob, with two deputies to aid him in the search. Sending his men in different directions, the sheriff goes to the home of Bess. While he questions her, one of his men hurriedly appears and informs him that he has found empty shells outside the deserted shack on the hill. The sheriff vainly attempts to shut him up but Bess has overheard and as the sheriff and his men ride away, Bess mounts her horse and takes a back trail to the house on the hill. In the meantime, Bob has observed the lone deputy and, fearing discovery, hides in the rear of the shack. When Bess appears there is no sign of Bob and she leaves a note for him, telling him to make good his escape as the sheriff has discovered his hiding place. When the deputy has disappeared from view, Bob returns and reads the note. Observing the approach of the sheriff and his men, Bob mounts his horse and rides over hill and dale, with the sheriff and his men in close pursuit. They are gaining on him, when Bob throws himself off his horse and fires at the trio, wounding one of the deputies. The sheriff orders the other one to take him home, intending to follow Bob alone. Bob has run down the canyon to Bess's home and finds her alone. Seeing the sheriff coming, Bob hides behind the door and, as the sheriff enters the room, he is ordered to throw up his hands. Binding him to a chair, Bess and Bob leave the ranch house, after writing a note to Bess's mother saying they are going to be married and are leaving the country. When the old folks return, they free the sheriff but he is powerless, as Bob has taken possession of his horse. Bob and Bess hasten to a minister's and we leave them starting out for a new land, with Bess bidding her dear mountains good-bye.

Champion Release, June 3

John Storm, a young minister, is desperately in love with Marion Truesdale, one of his parishioners. Soon after their betrothal, Sir Arthur Norworth, a wealthy English aristocrat, pays desperate court to her. His wealth and position attract her, and unknown to Storm she agrees to go to England and become Lady Norworth. So it happens that when the wedding day arrives, Marion does not appear. Storm receives a telegram from Marion stating she has sailed with Norworth.

He is shaken with grief and agony. We see him five years later in a town in the Southwest, brought to the lowest level; a human derelict. He becomes a hanger-on to a mine owner, whom he has saved from a gang of men, and puts in his time brooding and drinking. One day, Burton, the mine owner receives a letter from his sister, that Sir Arthur Norworth is dead, and she is bringing his widow out for a vacation. Burton loses the letter and Storm finds and reads it. The realization that Marion is coming is too much for him. Conflicting emotions of Love and Revenge stir within him.

They arrive! Burton is very solicitous and gallant, while Storm keeps out of sight. Burton does his best within the next few days to win favor with her, but she preceives his true motive and avoids him. He takes advantage of his sister's absence one night to make violent love to her, but she repulses him. He persists and insults her, threatening to speak of her compromising position, unless she marries him. He then calls in Storm, and for the first time in many years, Marion faces him. She pleads with him to save her honor, until he throws down the bible and with a sob leaves the room.

For a moment Marion is triumphant, but Burton is enraged and he seizes her. Her hand grasps a knife that Storm has left in the room, and she strikes him to the floor. Outside, Storm hears the screams, hurries in and sees the murdered man. He realizes Marion's peril. She is in hysteria, and when the servants come on the scene they find Storm kneeling over the dead body. To them, Storm shields Marion by confessing to the crime. He is taken away. The closing scene shows Marion in the garb of a Sister of Charity.

A SQUAW MAN
Champion Release, June 5

In the beginning we have an elopement of a rich man's son and an Indian girl. With the consequent train of events leading up and subsequent thereto, they are as follows: First in due season, a little pappoose. Then the august presence of the noble Chief Dark Cloud, the wife's father, coming upon the scene spells misery for the couple. The boy, shamed and wretched by the appearance of the old Chief in his incongruous garb, half savage, half civilized, quarrels and flees, deserting his squaw.

The scene now shifts to the West. After a lapse of years, the maiden and her child are back in the tribe of their ancestors. Here too comes the recalcitrant lover, husband and father. Driven from the East through misconduct, a fight in a Western barroom almost costs him his life. Escaping on horseback by a hairbreadth, he is subsequently found by his own child and later nursed back to life by his Indian wife.

Then comes his return Eastward. But the matter of his return is most surprising and unexpected. In fact it is apt to cause one to gasp in surprise. But the story contains causes for many such gaspings. The cowboy chase, the fight on horseback, the fall from the back of a wildly dashing horse. All these are startling bits of realism, clever expositions

GRANDFATHER'S CLOCK
Rex Release, May 29

Several thousand years ago, in a little town in Asia Minor, lived two men whose names were Cain and Abel. They were brothers, the first brothers in the world; and not being used to the relationship, they were unbrotherly. Cain was envious of Abel; and as jealousy, hatred and violence are very close relatives in the primitive mind, he slew Abel. To-day, in the light of all the many events and transitions that have evolved since that distant day, we are still uncertain as to whether Cain or Abel was the more unfortunate as a result.

The point is that human nature is a stubborn, inflexible composition, and is to-day just about the same queer complexity as that with which Adam was blessed and cursed. The wrongdoer receives his punishment upon earth, with his heart as prosecutor and his thoughts the prison-cell; the greatest judge of ourselves is that part of ourselves which we ignorantly and evasively call Conscience.

The old grandfather permitted his two sons to run the farm, but the age-old spirit of envy and selfishness were rife in their hearts. Heated disagreements and defeated plans for individual mastery developed into frank hatred and mutual hostility. Phil, the younger son, had a frail little fairy of a daughter, the pride of grandfather's fond old heart, the guide of his wavering feet and the tender goddess of all his worshipping thoughts. The child and grandfather were playmates, two children linked together by all the dividing years, two children fooling Time and foiling its relentless edict; young spring and tired winter, one unconscious of, the other forgetting the eternal approach of the grave. Phil and his sweet little wife loved the old man, loved him! Bill, the younger son, and the venomous, virulent virago that had taken his name and his love—taken so much of it that he had none left—respectively tolerated and despised him.

Once, in grave meditation, grandfather did remember the immutable law of the years and the invincible course that leads to the last narrow house, and he made a will bequeathing all his possessions to Phil. He placed it in the old clock, that he had loved as almost a human thing all his long life. And the old clock, that had struck the hour of his birth on an eternal night long ago, chimed a parting knell to that life passing out. And then the old clock stopped, never to go again.

After his death a bogus will appeared, leaving all to Bill and nothing to Phil. Sorrowfully the little family left the house, taking their few belongings and the old clock, the silent symbol of the tragic truth hushed in the silence of the tomb.

The child's tender care of grandfather's clock earned more than its own reward—for the will was found and the last scrawl of the feeble hand proclaimed the right, like the Hand of Righteousness raised from the grave to erase a living lie. When the other realized that the crushed truth had arisen, when in sad wondering he faced the wandering years, homeless and aimless, his heart sobbed its pitiful repentance and his whole abject being was a trembling prayer for pardon—a prayer answered by the forgiving hearts of the others.

ASHES OF HOPE
Rex Release, June 2

"To him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not, shall be taken away even that which he hath." The Biblical law isn't very just, but it is so true to life, so dismally true to life. Sometimes they "who have not" possess only love, and even that is taken away, snatched by ruthless hands, trampled by cruel feet, spurned by scorn, ravaged by rapacious recklessness, robbed by rampant wrong and murdered by mockery. You can lose almost anything in the world and find it again; but if you find and lose the real kind of love, you can never regain it. It's lost, like a sweet song heard in the silence of the woods that suddenly dies with a last yearning echo, to wed the stillness about. And thereafter, life is only the tomb of a sweet, bitter memory.

The plan was conceived in a spirit of venture and adventure. He was just tired enough of society and the same social functions to run away from them. So he decided and determined to go among the very poor, live their dreary life and fight their weary strife—just for fun. It was interesting to him. because it wasn't real enough to be terrihle. The grim shadow of poverty was only a mask, and the wolf lurking and loitering at the door but a stuffed specimen. The monotonous despair and the melancholy hopes were only a stagey melodrama, to him too impossihle to he real. The souls of the poor were not bare enough for him to see the red stripes of the chastening rod. He could not see the hruised hearts concealed in the disguise of a hrave smile, he could not feel the pang of unrequited soul-hunger and heart-yearning. His untutored eyes could see only the surface—and Marion's heart was deep.

Deep with the stifled aspirations of a forceful spirit suhmerged in the slough of desperate destitution, deep with the fire and faith of human love. She was a sweet girl; a girl with a smile as earnest and honest as truth. And her eyes told you things, things passionately pure, things higher than the earth—they spoke an acquaintance with God.

They met. A far something in the soul of the girl responded to an indefinite something in his. And the greatest blessing and the greatest bane of earth melded with and became her being—a heedless, headless love.

Then he tired of the jesting imitation, of the eternal squalor and the dreary denial, and longed for the convenient comforts and luxuries of his other life. He told them he was going to work elsewhere, and the girl's heart filled with an instinctive hut indistinct fear and forhoding, interpreted hy a great, glistening tear.

Type was never so cold and bold and cruel as that which told her, a few weeks later, of his marriage to millions. A great sob arose from the desert of her soul to mock the lying promises of man, and her heart bowed to a sorrow as solemn as midnight, as profound as death.

FEATHER TOP
Eclair Release, May 28

Old Mother Rigby, the village witch of a quaint New England settlemen in colonial days, makes for herself a scare-crow to protect her garden. She is so pleased with her work that she brings it to life, by making it smoke her magic pipe, telling the newly created man (whom she names "Lord Feathertop") that as long as he breathes the tobacco smoke he will remain handsome and living. She sends the fine new gentleman to woo the Squire's daughter. At the wedding feast the girl learns the real nature of her suitor, by seeing his reflection in a mirror of truth. Lord Feathertop is really in love and he has seen for himself that he is only a "contraption" of ragged old clothes with sticks for legs and pumpkin for a head. He rushes home to the witch's house and declares that he can not live without love. Breaking the pipe which has kept him alive, the magic ended, he falls to the floor as a scare-crow. The witch philosophically plants him in her garden declaring that he will do more work as a scare-crow than most of his living brothers.

HAMFAT'S SUCCESS
Eclair Release, May 30

Anthony Ceaser Brutus Hamfat is a struggling tragedian whose one-night-stand performances hring him no success. He applies vainly to K. E. Frohert, the famous manager and returns home to find his landlady in a fury for his delayed payment. As he hurries to his room the landlady speeds for a policeman. Hamfat in extreme despair pulls on an old rube costume and makes a hasty exit in disguise. Two swindlers believe this to be a splendid chance and they invite the "old farmer" to dine with them in a gay Broadway cafe. Hamfat accepts. He does not neglect exhibiting a roll of stage money which he found in the costume. The swindlers are greatly pleased with themselves. At length they propose selling a third interest in an imaginary mine and Hamfat agrees. He is the real gainer. for he takes his change in real money. Hamfat hastens homeward in a taxicah to settle his accounts, buying flowers for his landlady. The swindlers are apprehended hy the police and get a richly deserved punishment. It happens that Frohert, the manager, has heen dining in this same restaurant. Hamfat is recognized. Just as the Thespian is giving the long suffering landlady her money, a messenger brings an offer from Frohert to give Hamfat a good part in comic opera. He is proved an actor, after all.

CHESTNUT GROVE MYSTERY
Eclair Release, June 2

The aged heggar is alone in his hut. It is nightfall. Carefully closing the door and window he takes a bottle of whiskey from the fireplace and gayly empties its contents. He goes to the wall and uncovers a hiding place, and takes out a hollow piece of wood, from which he brings forth gold, jewels and bank notes upon which he gazes lovingly. He goes accompanied by Valeria and Violet. He purchases one of the hats but Valeria is not interested and will not wear it, having no interest in the girl. It is offered to Violet and she is delighted and wears the headgear. The contrast in the characters of the two women is so marked that Hugh proposes to Violet and is accepted. Hugh and Violet are ignored hy Valeria and her mother but Hugh retaliates hy purchasing the stock of hats and sending them to the woman hy a Count who gets in bad hy his gallantry.

ONE MAN'S LOVE
Reliance Release, June 15

Belle Grant, a heautiful American girl, goes to a ball at the Emhassy and wins the attention of the Russian Grand Duke Boris. During the ball he removes Belle's slipper and drinks champagne from it. Next morning her father reads of this escapade in the papers and is very much annoyed over it. When a vaudeville manager appears and offers the girl a thousand dollars a week to go on the stage, her father vows if she accepts this offer he will disown her. However, nothing daunted, she leaves her home and goes upon the stage. Her former sweetheart, a young ensign in the Navy, follows her and hegs her to return with him. But he finds her with the Duke and she laughs at him.

As the companion of the Duke, she finds her place in the midst of a very gay set. But after going the pace that kills for a time, she finds that her vogue has waned. Cast off by her gay friends, disowned by her father, she sinks lower and lower. One day she is arrested upon the streets for vagrancy. When she is hrought up in court she is fined fifty dollars, or one year on the island. Having no money, she is about to he led away when the ensign, who happened to be in the courtroom, sees and recognizes her. He steps to her side, pays her fine, and takes her to his home, where his housekeeper cares for her. And when he asks her to be his wife, she refuses, knowing her own unworthiness. But he finally persuades her to accept his love, for he forgives her freely.

THE BREAK DOWN
Imp Relaese, June 2

Disguises and impersonations are commoner in real life than most people suppose. Now and again a crisis, in the big world of commerce, finance or politics, arises in which it is essential that a man should have a double so near himself in resemblance that a deception can be practiced.

The officers and stockholders of The Mutual Construction Company were holding a serious session. Huntley Sharpe, the president, announced that a half million dollars must he raised forthwith in order that certain unfinished contracts in hand could he completed, then matters of the company would proceed smoothly.

But a minority of the stockholders would not trust the president. They demanded that a receiver for the company should he appointed. This demand so affected Mr. Sharpe that he suffered a nervous breakdown, fearing the collapse of the company.

His physicians decided that if he would regain his health, he must go away instantly. This brought about unexpected results. The stockholders realized that Sharpe's absence from the city would bring ahout the very thing they desired to avert, viz: the downfall of the company, hecause puhlic confidence in it would be awakened.

In this difficulty a bright inspiration occurred to the company's secretary. He met a man exactly the double of Mr. Sharpe. Swearing all to secrecy and pledging Sharpe's double likewise, the man was induced to take the place of Mr. Sharpe in the office day by day.

Meanwhile, the real Mr. Sharpe went to Hot Springs; recovered his health, after a short course of treatment, and while there meeting several financial kings was so enahled to raise the necessary money to complete the contracts and assure the continued prosperity of The Mutual Construction Company.

THE RETURN OF CAPTAIN JOHN
Imp Release, June 6

When Captain Alvin Strong went to rejoin his ship, he parted from his sweetheart, Alice, with a promise to marry her at the terminatoin of the voyage. He left a locket in her possession as a souvenir. The ship, however, was wrecked with all on board save Captain Strong, who was washed ashore on a distant part of the coast, in an unconscious condition.

When he was restored to animation, by the kindly fishermen of the village, he had forgotten who he was. In other words, the calamity of the shipwreck had deprived him of his memory.

After he regained his physical strength, he remained in the fishing village and secured a joh among the fishermen.

Meanwhile, his sweetheart, at home, had not given up hope of his return and daily frequented the shore in expectation of seeing his ship return.

As Alvin Strong progressed in his new work, he also progressed in the affections of the daughter of his benefactor, the old fisherman. In course of time he married the girl, and a baby was born to him. Still, he had no recollection of the past, beyond the day when he was thrown upon the shore and was restored to life. Everything in his mind before this was a blank.

One day in company with several of his fellow fishermen, he had to take a trip by water to the village which he had left two years before as Captain Strong. Agnes recognized him; so did her mother and many of the villagers, but he failed to recognize them. There was a scene of anguish between the girl and him, and she at last brought about his recognition of her by showing him the locket that he had given her two years ago. Instantly reason returned to him and he realized the position that he stood in. He had pledged himself to this girl, but he had married another and there was a child. Duty triumphed, however, and he returned to his wife and baby, leaving Agnes in despair and disappointment.

A CASE OF DYNAMITE
Imp Release, June 8

Jonathan Jay, while waiting on a customer in his little country store, catches Cy, the village bad boy, stealing apples. He punishes him with a whipping, and Cy plans revenge.

The opportunity comes when Jonathan gets a telegram calling him to the city to close up a business deal. While he is buying his ticket Cy paints the word "Dynamite" on his grip, and as the train pulls in, Jonathan hurriedly picks up the case and rushes for his car, without noticing the awful word thereon.

On his arrival in the city he goes to a jewelry store, where the clerk seeing the name on the grip, offers him practically every thing in the store. Jay takes all he can carry and starts for the bank. The jewelry clerk rushes for a policeman and they give chase to the unsuspecting countryman, who goes into the bank to draw out some money. Here he meets with the same experience, as the cashier also fears an explosion. Jay is now well loaded down with money and jewelry—but is soon tracked by the cashier and the clerk and the policeman. After many amusing experiences he is captured and taken to jail, where everything is satisfactorily explained; he is released and starts happily for his country home.

On the same reel:

THE SHRINERS CONVENTION IN CALIFORNIA
Imp Release, June 8

The procession was chiefly formed of a large number of floats emblematic of the States and various bodies affiliated to and with the Shriners. Noticeable were the Japanese floats and the Californian "Bear." All the floats were artistically decorated with real flowers and picturesquely attired figures. They embraced many shapes, including gondolas, ships, houses, etc.

At night time there was a procession of illuminated floats and other vehicles as well as mammoth animals, the whole forming a veritable feast of the eye of brilliantly illuminated effects.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It seems that the moving picture must revolutionize the very thoughts of men. And as for science and education, we have already arrived at that place where word of mouth demonstration is deemed insufficient, and must be supplemented by photographic illustration. Not long ago at the Texas Medical Association convention Dr. T. S. Weisenburg, Professor of Neuropathology, Medico-Chirurgical College, Philadelphia, used moving pictures to illustrate his lecture on nervous diseases.

* * * *

In California women are beginning to assert themselves in all sorts of ways, and it may be said in a most creditable manner. Very recently Mrs. Hester Grant Giles, an energetic social worker of Los Angeles, suggested the building of an $80,000 moving picture theatre for women, and where subjects of special interest to the feminine sex could be shown.

* * * *

The Essex County Mosquito Extermination Committee has an auxiliary campaign of education in moving pictures now under preparation by Thomas Edison, in addition to one of the most strenuous attacks ever made on the offending mosquito.

* * * *

On Sunday the 19th, the camera manipulators of the Animated Weekly and party had a lively time on a picture-taking trip to Fire Island. On the Atlantic side of the Island reside a colony of people living in the simple old-fashioned way, who received the moving picture people with open arms. Barn dances and all kinds of merriment were in order. The trip, which was taken in a sailboat from Long Island, was voted by the party to be the dandiest fun that they had had in some time.

The Eclair Film Company have opened offices and projecting room at 225 W. 42nd street, New York City.

Mr. David Horsley has returned to his home at Bayonne, N. J., from California, and will remain in the East for a couple of weeks.

NOTES OF THE WEEK

A well-known newspaper refers to the elasticity of the law in the following clever manner:

"One of the striking, even if not one of the most valuable, properties of law is its elasticity. The old saying that a shrewd lawyer can drive a coach and four through a new statute may be exaggerated but it is full of suggestion.

"Consider an affair that happened out in Los Angeles a few days ago. A moving picture show put in a lot of new films, including one portraying a cockfight in a city of Spain. It was a tremendously realistic cockfight, so greatly realistic, in fact, that several social reformers strongly objected to it. They ordered the proprietor to withdraw it, but he refused to do so, whereupon they threatened to prosecute him. He told them to go ahead.

"The proprietor was not as smart as he imagined himself to be. He didn't know that the exhibition of a cockfight picture is an act of cruelty to animals, but the authorities have decided that it is, and the owner must withdraw or take the consequences. The law was stretched almost to the breaking point in that decision."

* * * *

William H. Harbeck, the well-known moving picture machine operator who toured Alaska a year ago, bringing with him splendid trophies in the shape of several thousand feet of moving pictures, and who came to his death with the sinking of the Titanic, was under a $10,000 contract with the White Star line to take moving pictures of the giant vessel on her maiden trip to America. When the Titanic sank she carried down with her 110,000 feet of films taken in Europe. He intended to establish an office in New York and put out special feature pictures of his travels on the other side of the Atlantic.

* * * *

The following from the Toronto (Ont.) News is interesting:

"Beginning the first of June new and more stringent regulations will govern moving picture theatres. Colonel Matheson, the Provincial Treasurer, has announced a new code for the moving picture proprietor. The licensing of film exchanges, which was formerly a matter of imposing a fee of $500, is now to be a charge of $150 and a fee of 50 cents for each subject on every film.

"The fee for machines has been increased from $50 to $75, and the fee for operators from $1 to $5. Provision is made for apprentices by the issuing on payment of $11 a license for six months which cannot be renewed.

"Precautions against fire are strengthened by requiring the electric wires lighting the theatre to be separate from those lighting the lamp in the machine and those lighting the red exit lights. Where acetylene gas is used as the illuminant, it must be kept in cylinders tested to 1,800 pounds to the square inch.

No Dark Houses

"For every 350 feet of floor space there must be two white lights of two candle-power each for the purpose of making objects visible. This means that putting a house entirely in the dark is not to be permitted.

"In every theatre seating 300 or less the two main aisles must be three feet wide at least; in those seating 500 they must be 3½ feet. Where there is only one aisle it must be 4½ feet. Theatres seating over 500 must have at least two main aisles 4½ feet wide, with cross aisles at least 3½ feet wide. Where chairs are used they must be battened together and fastened to the floor.

"Under the new rules no film bearing the censor's stamp can be interfered with, and any film exhibited which has not been censored renders the exhibitor liable to a fine of not more than $200.

"Lantern slides for any entertainment or lecture are to be censored whenever the Board of Censors think it necessary."

Harry Whitney, who sailed last March on the sealer "Neptune" to the sealing grounds along the northeastern coast of America, has returned with 8,000 sealskins and five young seals aboard. The "Neptune" has also brought 13,000 feet of moving pictures with it, which will give the public the first opportunity that it has had to see how seals are caught.

Moving pictures are used by a French scientist in the study of the deformation of metals when strongly compressed by the hydraulic press. In some cases he uses a brass tube of 3 inches diameter and .04 inches thickness of metal and observes the appearance of the surface when the tube is flattened out by pressure. Sometimes the tubes are filled with a liquid and then compressed. Various figures appear on the surface of the metal, and moving picture views are taken at the rate of 15 a second. By throwing the views on a screen it is easier to study the effects than by direct observation.

* * * *

The American Film Manufacturers' Association, Inc., of New York City, a membership corporation, was incorporated with the Secretary of State, May 17th. The particular object for which it is formed is to co-operate for the best interests of the motion picture industry through the improvement in the quality of motion pictures. The directors are: Jules E. Brulatour, Carl Laemmle, Joseph R. Miles, Arthur B. Graham and Archibald E. Stevenson, of New York City.

An American consul in a Mediterranean country reports that a merchant in his district desires to represent American cinematograph firms. It is stated that a good business is carried on in imported films, as the moving-picture shows are some of the chief amusements. Correspondence may be in English, and full particulars should be sent as soon as possible.

Charles Balfour, a cowboy with the Bison Moving Picture Company was killed on May 9th, at Santa Monica, California. When his horse slipped and fell in turning a corner. He sustained a fractured skull from which he could not recover.

Within five minutes later "Bud" Osborne a rider of the same company met with a like mishap at the identical location, and as a result is laid up in the hospital.

The largest corporation of its kind in Louisiana and Mississippi has just been organized, with the completion of all necessary papers and the election of officers and directors. The organization has a capital stock of $50,000 and was established for the purpose of maintaining a chain of motion picture houses in several towns and cities in the two states named above. The following officers were elected: H. P. Mollere, president; V. J. Mollere, vice-president and general manager; Charles Lohmann, secretary and treasurer. The company now operate theaters in Hattiesburg, McComb, Brookhaven (Miss.) and Hammond (La.). As soon as arrangements can be made six more theatres will be added, making a circuit of 10 show houses. This is the largest theatrical company in the state, outside of New Orleans.

* * * *

Confirmation of recent rumors of a consolidation among the moving picture shows in Galveston came Monday, April 22d, with an announcement of Geo. K. Jorgensen, proprietor of the Crystal Vaudeville, Crystal-Majestic Vaudeville and Crystal moving picture shows here, as well as the Crystal theatres in other cities. The announcement of Mr. Jorgensen was co-incident with the dispatch announcing that at Austin there had been granted the charter of the Galveston Theatre Company of Galveston with a capital stock of $15,000. The incorporators of the new corporation are G. K. Jorgensen, I. A. Walker and A. L. Scudder.

The moving picture shows taken in by the new corporation, Mr. Jorgensen announced, are the Casino, the Vaudette and the Leader, which have been purchased from the interests represented by E. H. Hulsey. The earnest money has been paid down and the deal is to be formally closed at once.

Powers Picture Plays

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT

In the future POWERS PICTURE PLAYS will be released WEDNESDAY and SATURDAY, the split reel subjects being released WEDNESDAY instead of TUESDAY.

"BABIES THREE" and "THERE'S MANY A SLIP," a comedy split. The former is a delightful child story that will appeal to all classes, a little girl furnishing pleasing complications.

"THERE'S MANY A SLIP" is a decidedly humorous tale in which a trio of lovers seek the hand of a girl. The right man wins owing to a series of funny situations and his rivals incur the displeasure of the parents. Every foot a hearty laugh.

RELEASED WEDNESDAY, JUNE 5. Book this split for a business stimulator.

"HATS AND HAPPINESS" is a pleasing society drama which teaches a wholesome and convincing lesson. It is elaborately staged and acted by a competent company of players—a strong story with human interest and pathos.

FOR RELEASE SATURDAY, JUNE 8.

Power's Cameragraph Wins

The two newest and higgest moving picture shows in New York City install Power's No. 6. Paul J. Rainey's Africa hunt at the Lyceum Theatre displays a series of wonderful pictures in animal life and conditions in Africa. The Carnegie Alaska-Siberia expedition at the Maxine Elliott Theatre is offering a remarkable set of reels depicting life and incidents in the far North. Both these attractions, which are being widely discussed, are showing in houses of the front rank, managed by Daniel Frohman and the Shuherts; they arc both high class, high priced productions, charging one dollar admission. Each gives a show lasting over two hours which can he witnessed without eye strain, the pictures heing ahsolutely steady and without flicker.

BOTH OF THESE PRODUCTIONS ARE USING POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH NO. 6

WHY?

Because POWER'S is recognized as the only moving picture machine which projects perfectly clear, steady pictures, and gives absolute satisfaction. The hest films in the world can he spoiled by imperfect projection. The hig producers know this and insist on having only the best machines to project their films; that is why they have installed "POWER'S." These attractions are playing to full houses. Put in a No. 6 and you will do the same. Let us send you catalogue D giving full details.

TO WRITERS

The Editor

(The Journal of Information for Literary Workers) published in your interest for eighteen years, is the magazine of which Jack London said: "I may not tell a hundredth part of what I learned from THE EDITOR, but I may say that it taught me how to solve the stamp and landlord problems." It is a monthly stimulus to the production and sale of more and better manuscripts. Besides articles of concrete, practical worth by editors or by writers successful or about to be successful, each number contains in "The Literary Market" all the news of all the magazines, new and old, that pay for manuscripts.

Just now $1,500.00 is offered in prizes for poems. Full details in current number of THE EDITOR, which will be sent for 15 cents. The yearly subscription is one dollar.

COOKE LENSES

are imported from a European factory where lens-making is a fine art. Evidence of this is seen in the beautiful finish of each lens-mount, but PROOF lies in the rare quality of the photographs. Three-fourths of the world's photo-engravers have discovered that no other lens will stand their searching tests.

Cooke anastigmat lenses are made for all purposes. Write for fine catalogue with "Helps to Photographers."

No. 1000—A MOTIOGRAPH

Genuine Parts or "Dupes"

Do you know what is being used to repair your MOTIOGRAPH—Genuine parts or "Dupes"—

A genuine part is made by the manufacturer of your machine with care as regards quality and fit, and every genuine MOTIOGRAPH part is interchangeable with the part on your particular model—

A "duped" part is of the cheap "thrown together" variety made of cheap material by cheap workmen and made to sell cheap, without regard to fit or service.

It is up to you, Mr. Exhibitor, to see that only genuine long-wearing quality parts are used in your repair work.

We warn you but cannot force you to protect yourself—but if your dealer cannot supply genuine MOTIOGRAPH parts send direct to us.

The Precision Machine Company,

New York City, N. Y.

Dear Sirs:

I have been in the motion picture business for the past fifteen years. I operated the very first projecting machine in the United States, called the "Eidoliscope", which was at that time being operated in a basement on lower Broadway just at the turn into Whitehall Street, New York City. It was next to impossible to drag people in to witness said exhibitions.

The said "Eidoliscope" machine was a constant motion machine, the film run up instead of down. I have operated, handled, or been keenly in touch with every projecting machine manufactured since that time. I advanced from the ranks of operator to Superintendent, Manager of Production, and General Manager of film manufacturing plants.

My experience has been such as to warrant me in saying that my judgment relative to projecting machines is as accurate as any other man's in the business.

I take great pleasure in stating that I consider the SIMPLEX machine to be the acme of perfection, and so far superior to any other on the market that to me there is no comparison.

I have just this minute finished running a negative on the said SIMPLEX machine, (which makes the fifth time that said negative has been run on the said SIMPLEX machine), which we have had installed in our manufacturing plant for the last four months. No one can know more keenly than I, the danger of running negative on the average machine, and until we secured the SIMPLEX machine, the negative was sometimes run once, often not at all; a positive print being made from same to avoid possible scratching. On the negative that I have just finished running, there is not one single scratch, and to me that is marvelous.

I take great pleasure in complimenting you most highly for producing such a wonderful piece of mechanism. If you would produce as fine a perforator and printer as you have a projector, you would place the moving picture business twenty-five years ahead of the times.

With very best wishes, I beg to remain,

Yours very truly,

"Coming events cast their shadows before," but when the event has passed the time called present, it casts before it what may be considered more substantial than a shadow. REX COMPANY ANNOUNCES THIRD RELEASE!

Event Promises Greater Progress and Prosperity for the Industry—Exhibitors Receive Statement with Enthusiasm—Trade Considers Achievement Distinct and Decisive Triumph of Merit.

The Rextraordinary announcement of the Rex Third Release comes as a half-expected surprise and a universally desired effect. As every effect has its cause, and as the cause precedes the effect, it might be old news to state that the cause for the happy decision on the part of the Rex Company was the constant and consistent demand for quantity as well as quality. The attitude taken by the Rex Company prior to its second release was paralleled in the present instance in that its interest in the interests of the industry would not permit it to heed the insistent and persistent requests of the exhibitors for another release until it felt it could do so and still adhere to the sterling standard it has established. In making the announcement of a third release, the Rex Company states that the endorsement and enforcement of the exhibitors that made this course possible and necessary will be fully justified and rewarded.

It is rumored that the Patents Company was greatly distressed over the announcement, and when our correspondent called at their offices for an interview, they sent word that they were out—hundreds of dollars.

THE ART OF Scenario Writing

Second Edition By WILLIAM LORD WRIGHT

The MOVING PICTURE NEWS has secured the sole right to republish this standard work on Scenario writing, and offers it as a premium to all new subscribers of $2.00 for one year.

ART OF SCENARIO WRITING, separately, $1.00, post free.

Read what the Moving Picture World of February 25th, 1911, says of this excellent aid:—

The Art of Writing Scenarios

By William Lord Wright. Author of "Twixt Loyalty and Love," "Simon Kenton," etc., etc. Published by the Scenario Instruction Publishing Co., Bellefontaine, Ohio. Price $1.00.

In a very interesting series of articles published in our pages last month, Mr. G. R. Craw told the aspiring scenario author how to write scenarios. Those articles have been favorably commented upon as being of great practical value. Now comes Mr. W. Lord Wright with a little book of about 30 pages which still further adds to our knowledge of a subject that has perplexed many would-be moving picture authors, namely: How to set about work; how to acquire its technique; how, in fact, to prepare goods suitable for the market.

Mr. Wright, who is a successful scenario writer, first of all points out what is in demand by moving picture makers. Then he indicates what is not wanted. After reviewing the function of the scenario editor, he gives some of his own experiences, his failure and his successes. Then we come to some practical advice. He tells the author how to get ideas; where to market the completed scenario; how it should be written and presented, winding up by printing a sample scenario as a guide. Finally, he points out the value of action in this branch of dramatic work, and takes the view that, though unhonored, the moving picture scenario writer may some day come into his own in the way of publicity, fame and fortune. We hope he will, though we think this agreeable state of things a long way off.

Meanwhile we welcome Mr. Wright's little book just as we welcomed Mr. Craw's articles. These things relieve us of some responsibility. We are often asked how a scenario should be written, where it should be marketed, and how much money there is in it? Mr. Wright answers all these questions for us. We invite all our readers who are interested in this department of dramatic work, to get a copy of this book and study the formula that he gives. Of course, it is one thing to give a formula for a moving picture scenario, or plays, or a novel. These things may be delivered to managers technically correct in every detail, and yet lacking the one essential which no book on earth can teach: The selection of a theme which will get over: this is the divine afflatus referred to long ago by the author of the phrase: Poëta nascitur, non fit: The poet is born, not made. So we believe is the scenario writer. Still, for the benefit of those who are not born and who think they can be made, Mr. Wright's book should be of great value. It will sell well on account of that. It may have a negative value, too, in that it may possibly act as a deterrent to many people who think they can write scenarios and cannot realize their unfitness for the work. There are two or three books extant, and they have run through numerous editions, on how to write plays. It is not on record that any playwright who has succeeded during the last quarter of a century traces any of his success to these manuals, which, perhaps, have been instrumental in diminishing the output of unsuitable plays. It is no easy thing to write a good play; it is no easy thing to write a good scenario. So we hope Mr. Wright's book will encourage the aspirant who aspires to some reasonable hope of success, will discourage those who have no fitness for this form of work. There are too many of the latter kind in the moving picture field to-day.

THE ART OF SCENARIO WRITING contains a sample scenario recommended as the best form, by GILES R. WARREN, who is acknowledged as one of the most successful and original scenario editors of the present day.

FIRE DEMONSTRATION FOR M. P. MEN

As we have announced in previous issues of the News that a demonstration of a fire-extinguishing apparatus would be held, we have pleasure to announce that on Tuesday a. m., May 28th, a demonstration of the Pyrene Fire Extinguisher was given to a number of people in the moving picture business on the roof of the factory of the Pyrene Manufacturing Co., a ten (10) story building, 410 East 32d street, New York City. The day was warm and clear with changeable, high winds.

Preceding the regular demonstration given on the roof of the factory, a discussion on Pyrene and its particular advantages as a fire-fighting device was given by Mr. George H. Peterson, of the company, in which he showed, on a small scale, what Pyrene gas will do to burning material, generating this gas in a receptacle, and showing its effect upon burning tapers. Mr. Peterson also explained the non-conductivity of Pyrene by an electrical apparatus, which clearly contrasted the conductive properties of Pyrene and water. Mr. Peterson also explained very carefully and clearly the non-staining properties of Pyrene. He also showed its non-damaging features to moving picture films and paper which had been written upon with ink. After this discussion the witnesses of the demonstration were shown the effect of Pyrene on a 100-ampere, 220-volt arc, rigged up for the occasion. This arc was broken several times, a very small amount of Pyrene being used in each case.

Pyrene was next demonstrated on actual fire. One gallon of gasoline in a pail was quickly extinguished by two strokes of Pyrene liquid. One gallon of gasoline with two (2) pounds of calcium carbide, using water to generate acetylene gas, was set afire (in a pail), and this was extinguished also in a very few seconds. A running fire, twenty feet long and about three feet wide, of gasoline was extinguished in the open air with very little difficulty, and after being extinguished was relighted to show that there was still gasoline left.

A GALLON OF GASOLINE

TEN POUNDS OF COTTON WASTE

About ten pounds of cotton waste was then soaked with one gallon of gasoline and set afire, two extinguishers working upon this fire, simultaneously, extinguishing it in about one minute. Attention was called to the fact that the demonstrator stopped in his operations to show the control Pyrene had over the fire coming back. A duplicate fire was made, using fresh gasoline, and the soda and acid extinguisher was applied without any extinguishing effect. The soda and acid extinguisher also failed to extinguish gasoline in a pail.

Dry excelsior was set afire in a wooden box 4 feet by 3 feet by 3 feet. When this box was well ablaze two Pyrene extinguishers conquered it in less than a minute, two men working, less than one quart of liquid being used, and the excelsior was taken out after it was extinguished, showing no burning embers or damage to the unburned parts on account of the Pyrene coming in contact with them. A fresh made fire, consisting of a portion of a box loaded with excelsior and standing about twelve feet high, was ignited and permitted to burn until the wood was well ablaze. This was extinguished with very little effort, one man working on same, and less than one pint of Pyrene being used.

Two pounds of calcium carbide on the ground, using water to generate the acetylene, was extinguished by one spray of Pyrene liquid. This fire was only increased by the use of water.

A film was rigged up to represent the conditions on a moving picture machine and set afire. When the reel was well ablaze Pyrene very quickly extinguished it with one stroke of the piston. This was repeated several times out in the open air.

IMITATION BOOTH

In order to approximate, as near as possible, the conditions in a moving picture booth, this same fire was duplicated inside a small concrete room, where the action of Pyrene was just as complete and successful. Some loose films were put on the ground in a small heap, covering an area of two square feet. These were set afire, and although the fire was exceedingly rapid, approximating an explosion in its violent combustion, a small amount of the films was saved by the application of Pyrene.

In reference to the special qualities of this extinguisher, we want to say that from practical demonstration it has the power of extinguishing a film fire if taken at its inception.

Cut No. 4 shows the method employed in rigging up a film as on a machine, and in this we were extremely interested. The flame was allowed to run around the loose film until it reached the full reel, and when this was in full flame the extinguisher was used and instantly overcame the fire.

Our next illustration shows the effect of some of the film caught by the extinguisher and put out after just charring the edges of the one section, and we want our readers to particularly notice the effect of the fire upon the end of the other section of film, where it had practically melted in the intense heat and shrivelled up. This was instantly put out by the Pyrene Extinguisher.

We think this demonstration to all the moving picture people present was effective, and placed in their hands a wonderfully effective preventative of many fires. It is the commencement of a fire either in the booth or in the exchange that does most of the damage, and if this is put out before it reaches any other film or films it can at once be seen the danger will be passed.

There is one point more especially we would like to impress upon our readers, and that is the fact that all projecting machines are now fitted with fireproof film holders and only about approximately one foot of film is exposed at any time, so that the danger from fire if one of these instruments is used will be reduced to an infinitesimal minimum.

THRILLS FOR THE VOTERS—FROM ECLAIR

The results in New Jersey, added to those of the other primaries, have shown the tremendous public enthusiasm in the present campaign. Yet, strangely enough there have been no features on the subject brought forth until this sensational Eclair double reel: "The High Cost of Living."

The theme of the production has been aptly called by the director, "the cause of all the trouble"—and the Presidential candidates are basing their pre-election activities in presenting cures and comments on the crooked business machinations which have brought this domestic topic into international limelight.

To preach sermons and make audiences laugh, cry and applaud at the end is a difficult task anywhere—still more so on the unsympathetic screen of a moving picture theatre. Yet, in "The High Cost of Living" the Eclair Company manages to make all these things happen. The honest working people, the struggling poor and the overbearing nature of the great commodity monopolies while presented in characters very cartoon-like, yet impress one with the sincerity of the complaint. The capture of the Trust kings, their hard labor on the stony rocks of the woodlands, their escape by bribery, and the subjugation of justice by the nefarious band, is very dramatic.

Uncle Sam—as has generally been his custom in the country's crises, plays a star part, and he at last shows the people the way to rid themselves of their troubles.

This is by selecting a real representative for President, from the prominent leaders now battling about the land. And, the way in which President Taft, Governor Wilson, Champ Clark, Colonel Roosevelt and other well-known people are featured will bring down storms of applause well deserved, in any picture house.

Eclair is already hard at work on a presentation of that grand American hymn, "The Holy City," which from the gorgeous work already completed, will bid fair to rival the Oberammergau Passion Play views. An American house which strives for the highest of subjects like these is helping every other legitimate producing company by raising the appreciation of picture triumphs among the educated and influential.

A convention of moving picture exhibitors of the State of New York will be held in New York City Wednesday, June 19th. Full particulars next issue.

David Horsley and an army of camera men journeyed to Indianapolis to motograph the big International Auto Race held there on Decoration Day. Filmed by the Nestor Company.

"The Ranch Girl's Choice," said to be an excellent Nestor Western drama and advertised for release Friday, June 7th, will instead be released on the following Friday, June 14th. The Nestor Company are releasing but two pictures during the week of June 1st, to wit: "The Half-Breed's Way" (Monday) and "The Mountain Daisy" (Wednesday). Commencing on June 10th, the Nestor will resume releasing three a week, release days being Monday, Wednesday and Friday.

GENTLE reader, we have a warm corner in our great, big heart for the newspaperman. You know it? What! You do? Well, well, isn't that funny? We wrote a meritorious couplet one time on "The Newspaperman," and we sent it, all nicely typed, to a magazine. We thought the couplet a good one. The editor did not think the same. He wrote back and said he didn't like newspapermen. He said they were "too numerous." He sent us back our couplet. That magazine went to the wall soon. The editor had never been a newspaperman, real or presumed. We have always entertained a lurking idea that if he had accepted and printed that couplet it might have imbued him with the enthusiastic spirit of newspaperdom, and saved his publication. Ah, well, we are not given the power to jerk aside a corner of Life's portiere and peer into the future!

With this bit of retrospection we will resume our tribute to those who make the papers and place Taft's or Roosevelt's speeches first page, first column, as the case may be. The city room of a newspaper office is a training school for something better, and the newspaperman who can receive with a pleased smile the long article of "Constant Reader," submitted to "help fill up the paper," is slated for advancement.

William Jennings Bryan was formerly a political writer, and just look at him now! He has a farm in Texas and gathers much excrement from chalk talks on the gasoline circuit. Champ Clark started in as a writer of humor and he has been regarded in a humorous light ever since. Neil G. Caward started in where they sack Pillsbury flour, and now he is editor of the Photoplay Magazine. He is another of the "Newspapermen in Filmland," the third to whom we have turned our earnest attention within the past few weeks.

Mr. Caward has the edge upon many other newspapermen because he has also dallied with the exhibiting end in Pictureland. In other words, he has been an exhibitor. It is understood that he found the task of dictating to the exchange as to what his program should be too great for him, but he achieved an enviable reputation as a judicious chooser of illustrated songs. However, Mr. Caward left off exhibiting before "Everybody's Doin' It" became the rage.

Let us glance over a page of the life of Mr. Caward and we will discover that he burned the midnight oil in a hall bedroom at Northfield, Minn., and later graduated from Carleton College. Midnight oil and diplomas are strictly synonymous and so we acknowledge the custom in Mr. Caward's case. No one informed us that he burned the midnight oil, but we suppose he did so. It is well.

Carleton College corridors yet reverberate with the stentorian tones of Mr. Caward as he stepped boldly forth on the stage at commencement time and, looking manly and handsome in his cap and gown, delivered "Hamlet's Soliloquy" to the edification of his admiring relatives and friends. Outside of that Mr. Caward is all right.

The subject of our sketch, after winning his sheepskin, was, for a time, undecided whether to become President of the United States or Governor of Minnesota. Finding that both positions were firmly clamped down he hit upon a happy medium and concluded to "enter journalism." (Note: They all "enter journalism" when they start, but later become newspapermen. Mr. Caward did the same.)

Minneapolis is one of two metropolises of Minnesota, and naturally Mr. Caward repaired to that great city, where he joined the staff of the Minneapolis Tribune in 1906, much to the perturbation of the city editor. He showed signs of making good and covered the undertakers, the city hall and the flour mills so assiduously and ably that he arose in his profession. Finally he got to the point where the city editor's biting sarcasm failed to penetrate his epidermis. This fact showed that Caward had arrived. At the time he left the Tribune to go with the Daily Journal of the same city, he was covering politics at the Minnesota State Capital. When you get to covering politics for a city newspaper your salary is raised from $15 weekly to $25. It's the best paid position on the staff, generally, and sometimes you can make a little on the side.

After a period in the editorial department of the Journal, Mr. Caward looked about for other journalistic fields to conquer. Where do you suppose he went to? Don't all reply at the same time. He repaired to that city where everybody goes west of Ohio. He entered Chicago and he walked up Madison street, calm and unafraid. Prying off a job on one of the Chicago dailies he did well with it, and when he quit to enter the advertising business for himself he was in a position to dodge dairy lunches and eat occasionally at first class cafes.

Then the editor of the Photoplay Magazine saw an opportunity to enter another game, nearly as fascinating as newspaper life, and he returned to that dear Minnesota and purchased a stack of chips in the photoplay game. He became manager of one of the largest theatres in the large State of Minnesota. The house accommodated 1,200 people and was often filled. Mr. Caward conducted his theatre at all times as an independent theatre, exhibiting "first run" of the sales company output. Many friends claim that this business judgment proved the importance of newspaper training. Anyway, Manager Caward found it as "good as wheat" in a State where the staff of life is of prime importance. With the opening of the momentous year 1912, the smell of printer's ink proved too much for Mr. Caward. He disposed of his theatre interest and hied him Chicagoward once again. He had received an offer to become editor of the Photoplay Magazine and visions of white copypaper, printing presses and typewriters were too much for him to withstand. All newspapermen will appreciate the situation and sympathize with our friend.

Mr. Caward not only received an offer to become editor, but he really became editor. He brought to the desk all his past experience and training in newspaper fields, and it was well with him. He took up his present position with the May number and has already surrounded himself with an able staff of storywriters. The improved appearance of the Photoplay Magazine tends to show that the publication will take first place among the magazines of the independent cause.

In conclusion, we must say that the Photoplay Magazine proprietors are to be congratulated upon the acquisition of Mr. Neil G. Caward. He is the right man in the right place. He is a versatile writer, has the picture game at his finger ends, and he promises to be distinctly heard from before many moons drift across the skyline.

As for the commencement exercises at Carleton College, why, we will let the incident pass into oblivion. Mr. Caward has bravely overcome the college handicap and finds his A. B. degree serviceable when there is a rush of classical stuff released. Then he can grab those dear old textbooks, turn rapidly to Homer and sit down and write pieces about the Odessey and such without wearing out the patience of a city librarian. The Moving Picture News is glad to extend the hand of fellowship to Editor Neil G. Caward of the Photoplay Magazine. In the words of Rip Van Winkle: "May he and his magazine live long and prosper."

A REPLY AND INFORMATION

Augusta, Kans., May 22d, 1912

Mr. Alfred H. Saunders,
Editor M. P. N.,

Dear Sir: Received your reply some time ago and will say in return that I thank you very much for the information received, but I am at a loss to think that I had asked you this information on account of any patent device which I may have, as I do not know of any reasonable method of getting away with all the flicker. I only asked you for that information to settle a little argument I had as to what a man could get for a device that would do what I asked. It is settled now and after knowing that you had taken the matter seriously in behalf of my interest I wish to again thank you for the trouble I put you to. You may be assured that if I could do that, Mr. Saunders, I wouldn't be here or anywhere else.

Since Mr. Boob from Wichita got in bad this week with the boys up there I am almost afraid to mention the name Moving Picture News while I reside in Kansas. But anyway maybe there is enough of us boobs in Kansas that we can hold our own until we get the sunflowers picked.

I am enclosing a little sketch for the benefit of the boobs in Kansas, and would like that you give it space if the great Easterners haven't taken it all up.

Mr. Saunders, I will bring no charge against you if this letter should appear in the M. P. N., as I feel that it is a help to the cause of the boobs in Kansas.

Thanking you very much, I remain,

Yours very truly,
JOHN H. CROWLEY,
Augusta, Kans.

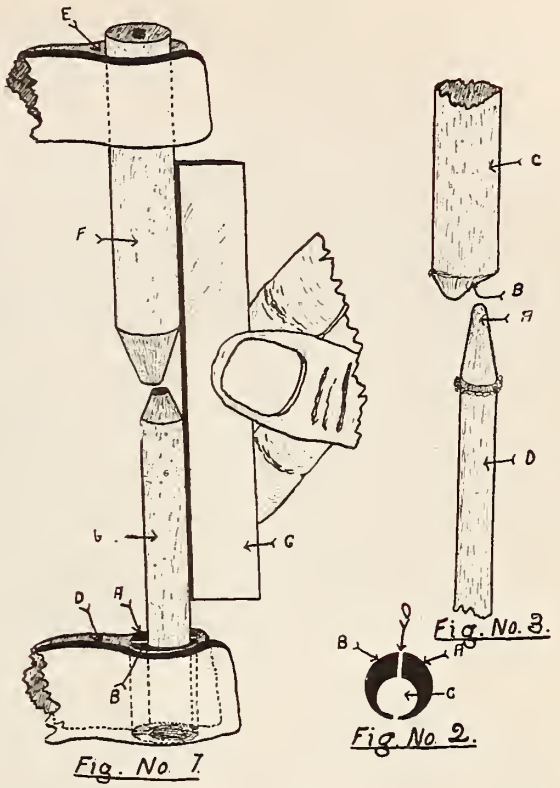
SETTING CARBONS FOR 220 V. D. C. WITH A STRAIGHT EDGE, THE RESULTS OBTAINED, WHAT IS USED FOR THE ABOVE AND HOW IT CAN BE EASILY MADE

Contributed to the Moving Picture News for the Benefit of Those Who Have Trouble in Setting Carbons for the Above Mentioned Current, by John H. Crowley, Augusta, Kans.

Fig. 1—Shows how the straight edge is used, indicated by the letter C. C.—Indicates the upper carbon, which is a 5/8 soft core. G.—Indicates the lower carbon, which is a 3/8 hard. E.—Indicates the upper carbon jaws. D.—Indicates the lower carbon jaws. A and B.—Indicate the intercepting ring clamps for lower carbon.

Fig. 2.—Shows the intercepting ring clamps indicated by the letters A and B. Being two solid pieces of copper 5/8 of an inch in diameter, with a 3/8 hole for the purpose of inserting a 3/8 carbon, the 3/8 hole being indicated by the letter C. D.—Indicates a strip 1-16 of an inch wide taken out when separated.

How Fig. 2 can be easily made. Take a solid piece of copper one inch long, 5/8 inches in diameter, drill a 3/8 hole reasonably close to one side, then cut directly in half by taking out a strip 1-16 of an inch wide as indicated by letter D in Fig. 2.



The results of straight edge carbon setting for 220 D. C. is that you have the front line of the upper carbon and the front line of the lower one on a straight edge, leaving the back line of upper carbon 2-8 of an inch back of the back line of the lower carbon, which will cause the crater indicated by letter B in Fig 3 to stay on the front side, while the entire carbon is consumed. Otherwise the front line of the upper carbon will be 1/8 of an inch in advance of the front line of the lower carbon and the back line of the upper carbon 1/8 of an ich back of the back line of the lower carbon. The result of which will, when setting the lower carbon in advance of the top one, make the position of crater change as the carbon is consumed.

REX ANNOUNCES ITS FIRST TUESDAY RELEASE.

In releasing the first Tuesday production, The Diamond Path, June 4th, the Rex Company desires to go on record with the purposeful pledge to maintain in its third release the same standard of ambitious merit and persistent endeavor that have characterized its efforts from the inception of its aim and name. It was your indorsement and encouragement, your confidence and co-operation, almost as much as our personal desire and duty, that have induced us to produce a third Rex. We will abide by your judgment. We are quite content to exert our sincerest efforts for whatever reward or recognition your discretion dictates.

Respectfully,
REX MOTION PICTURE MASTERPIECE COMPANY.

THE LITTLE SHUT-IN

BY VIRGINIA WEST

Adapted from Thanhouser Release.

HE was only a little fellow—just eight years old, but he had seen more trouble than many a grown-up.

In the first place, he was born lame and had to stay in the house all the time and couldn't run and play like the other children in the neighborhood. Then, his father had died when he was four and he and his mother had to live in a basement room where there was but one window, and that away up at the ceiling, where no window ought to be.

It was very hard to keep the room, even working every day, so the mother had to do what she could. Sometimes she washed at home, but mostly she was compelled to go out by the day and leave the little boy alone.

The little chap was cheery in spite of all his difficulties. For did he not have a window through which he could see the feet of the people passing by? And, oh, feet were such interesting things. Why you wouldn't guess how interesting they could be—and such a variety of them, too.

All day long the little fellow sat and watched the window. Many of the same pairs of feet passed regularly morning and evening. He began to be acquainted with them and to weave stories about their owners. It was a great comfort to him.

There was one pair of feet that he loved very much. They were so little and dainty. He was very sure the owner was sweet and lovely. He called her "Little Feet."

Then, there was another pair of feet that he loved. They were well clad and the owner of them walked always with such a firm, manly step. The boy called him "Manly Feet."

There was still another pair that figure in our story, and they were called "Cruel Feet." Their owner walked always with a soft, cat-like tread. Once the boy saw one of them kick a dog that was lying in the middle of the pavement gnawing a bone.

Of course there were many other feet, but they don't concern us just now.

Day after day, day after day, the child watched these pairs of feet go by. One day, just as though a fairy godmother had arranged it so, Little Feet suddenly stopped right in front of his window, and turned round. Then—what do you think? Manly Feet came up and stopped. Little Feet seemed to fairly twinkle with pleasure. He knew that Manly Feet was tenderly holding Little Feet's hand and the little boy was just simply thrilled with delight. Then both pairs of feet walked off together—very slowly.

After that the two pairs of feet walked joyously past, side by side, every morning. But alas, a day came when a terrible thing happened. Little Feet and Manly Feet each walked alone—and, oh, so sadly. Did you ever see feet walk sadly? Well, they can, and the little boy knew that his two friends were very unhappy.

A week passed, and then something else happened. Little Feet was walking slowly by the window when a voice sounded—but the little boy could not catch the name. The feet hesitated, turned slightly, (yet this happened right in front of the little cripple's window) and then went on.

In a few moments Cruel Feet went past, very rapidly. For three successive mornings after that, when Little Feet had been gone a few moments Cruel Feet came hurrying by.

And then, on the fourth morning, oh, sorrow of sorrows, Cruel Feet walked by Little Feet's side!

All this time Manly Feet continued to walk alone—sadly and still more sadly. For a week the little boy watched this condition of affairs tearfully. Something must be done, he decided. He knew that Little Feet and Manly Feet should be walking together and he determined to bring this about.

He waited patiently, as only a little cripple knows how to wait, and at last the opportunity came. One morning Little Feet walked alone. This was for what the boy waited and he was ready. He tied a note to the end of a crutch and just at the right—we might say the psychological moment, if you know what that means—he thrust the crutch out of the little narrow window as far as ever he could by straining his poor, little lame legs.

And, oh, didn't his heart beat when Little Feet came along and stopped and read the little note? And didn't it beat still faster when she stooped down and looked right into his wide open eyes with her own beautiful ones?

And then what do you think happened? The lady came down the steps and right into the room where the little boy was, just as the note on the end of the crutch had asked her to do.

"Oh, Little Feet, you did come in. I knew you would," cried the little boy with delight.

The lady smiled. "Why do you call me Little Feet?" she asked.

Then the little boy told her how he made friends of the feet that passed by his window as he could not see any more of the people.

"And don't you ever go out?" asked the lady.

"Not much," said the little boy, and he told her how his mamma had to work hard and didn't have time to take him out.

Then the lady told him about a wonderful place she called a Neighborhood House and how the people there were looking for little children just like him and how they would come for him the very next day and take him to their place and make him have the very best time he ever had in his life—yes, the very best time he had ever thought about and wanted to have.

The little boy's eyes grew very big and round and the very first thing he knew there was something wet running down over his cheeks. He was so surprised, for he didn't feel unhappy at all, but very, very glad about what the kind lady was telling him.

And then, what do you think? He looked at Little Feet and her eyes were all wet, and yet there was the most lovely smile on her lips. The little boy just didn't understand it at all.

Little Feet put a rose into the little boy's hand and said she would read to him from a book she had. As she sat with her head bent over the book the little boy thought if Manly Feet could only see her now everything would be all right. So with one eye on Little Feet and the other on the narrow window, he sat trembling with excitement.

Sure enough Manly Feet came. Like a flash out of the window went the rose, and joy of joys! Manly Feet stooped to pick it up and to see where it came from. Who should he see through the little window but Little Feet reading to a little lame boy who wasn't paying any attention at all but wildly beckoning him to come in.

And then Manly Feet came into the room. Oh, was anything ever so marvelous?

But soon the little boy's joy turned to sorrow. When Little Feet saw Manly Feet she did not look happy and her mouth looked as if somebody had drawn it all up. She started to leave the room.

"Oh, Little Feet, don't go away. I shall die if you go away," cried the little boy.

Little Feet came back and took the little boy by the hand. Manly Feet stood still in the middle of the dingy room, not knowing at all what everything was about. The little boy held out his other hand and his eyes pleaded so hard that some way, Manly Feet just had to go and take it.

Then the little boy told them how he had watched them go by alone and how happy he had been when he saw Little Feet and Manly Feet walking together and how he hated Cruel Feet and how he had seen him kick the dog and so on and so on. And then he told them how he had grieved when Little Feet and Manly Feet went alone again and still more when Cruel Feet walked by Little Feet.

Gradually the little boy brought the hands of Little Feet and Manly Feet nearer together until at last they touched.

"I know you love each other," he said. "Your feet told me so. You don't know how much feet say to a little boy when he can't see anything else. The Little Feet don't look happy when they walk with Cruel Feet and Manly Feet are sad when they walk alone. I know it was a silly quarrel. Wasn't it?" The little boy looked up into the faces of the owners of the feet and they both looked down at him.

Then they looked at each other. "Wasn't it a silly quarrel?" asked Manly Feet? and Little Feet made a queer little noise in her throat like something catching and said, "Yes."

And then, what do you think? Before the little boy knew what had happened Manly Feet had his arms around Little Feet and Little Feet was saying, "Oh, I am so glad," and at the same time tears were running down her cheeks, and the little boy decided that sometimes people cried when they were just so happy they didn't know what to do.

PIRATES IN THE FILM GAME

Copyright Law To Be Tested by General Film Publicity and Sales Company—Film of Goodwin Pirated

The inevitable has come! The new copyright law, passed by the last Congress, and the law on which Messrs. Augustus Thomas, William A. Brady, the Schuberts, Klaw & Erlanger, and in fact everybody connected with the theatrical production game have been laboring so assiduously to have passed, so that some sort of protection could be looked for, at the present time is before the Ways and Means Committee of Congress on the E. H. Townsend resolution (of Jimmie Fadden fame).

It has remained for a little concern in California to be the centerpiece of what will undoubtedly be the great film battle of the country. This concern has pirated the Clyde Fitch version of Nathan Hale, and an injunction has been asked for in the United States courts by Mr. Herman L. Roth, attorney for the Clyde Fitch Estate, and the General Film Publicity & Sales Company, who own all rights of producing Nat C. Goodwin in moving pictures. Coming as it does at this particular time, it will certainly be the means of testing the present copyright law, which, according to a number of authorities, is the strongest law that has been passed by Congress in regard to copyrights in the history of America. According to another coterie of legal lights, the present copyright law is sadly defective, and will not stand the test of investigation. At any rate, it will bring prominently forward a very pertinent question, inasmuch as the National Publishers' Association succeeded in putting over a clause in the present copyright law, and has a penalty affixed in the event of a newspaper stealing a copyrighted photograph, and using it without permission. The amount to be obtained by the injured party in actual damage is $5,000. If he cannot prove actual damages, and sues to recover statutory damages, he is limited to a sum not exceeding $250. This looks to the mind of the layman very much like class legislation, although authorities contend that Congress could strike out all damage allowed in lieu of actual damage, without jeopardizing the copyright act.

Some little time since, Edward H. Townsend, supposedly acting in the interests of certain film manufacturers, went before the Ways and Means Committee with a resolution, which read about as follows:

"That in the event of any film company inadvertently copying a novel, poem, dramatic production, or the literary effort of any person, that the amount of damage should be not more than $250 for the original offence, and should be $50 for each additional print made."

It will readily be seen that the film companies want to be put at least in as good a position as that secured by the Publishers' Association. As a matter of fact, under these conditions, the film companies could take anything they wanted at a cost to them of about $3,000. Mr. Augustus Thomas, who in addition to his great ability as a playwright, is also a legislator far above the ordinary and parliamentarian par excellence, was the first to scent danger in the proposed Townsend amendment, and a meeting was called by the National Association of Theatrical Producing Managers, and steps were at once taken for the throttling of the Townsend resolution, and Messrs. Thomas, Brady, and a number of others journeyed to Washington, and appeared before the joint Ways and Means Committee, and succeeded at least for the time being in having the iniquitous legislation stopped. However, the snake was not incinerated, merely scorched, and as will be seen by the papers, the heads of the Patents Company are still fighting for an opportunity to procure the brain children of authors at comparatively little cost.

As in the dramatic field, so the motion picture has now come to the place where the play and the star are the thing. It is no longer possible in the moving picture business to make a picture of a dog running, a taxicab passing a corner, or a horse drinking water, and sell one hundred or more copies of same at a good price per footage, and the film manufacturers are all sitting up nights looking for good material. The present case will be a test that will show whatever weakness there is in the present copyright law, and will also be the means of pointing out the necessary steps to be taken in order to avoid protection to authors and producing managers in the future.

Among the managers vitally interested in this law may be mentioned: Henry W. Savage, Charles Frohman, William F. Connor, Fred C. Whitney, William A. Brady, Samuel A. Scribner, Klaw & Erlanger, the Schuberts, George C. Tyler, Lew Fields, Charles H. Yale, James K. Hackett, Francis Wilson, and numerous others.

The forthcoming legal battle will probably be the most pretentious ever fought in dramatic history.

HOW SHORTY WON OUT

Imp Comedy Release, June 15

Shorty in the college was treated as a comedian. And he certainly looked the part. Still, comedian though he was, he was bold enough to lay siege to the heart of the college belle, Betty, as bright, lively and vivacious a girl as any co-educational system could possibly produce.

And, of course, loving admiration, she was a bit of a flirt. So when all the boys, singly, separately, and each unknown to the other, invited the girl out one night, she in a spirit of mischief, singly and separately accepted all the invitations.

So all the boys turned out at her rendezvous, togged out for the occasion. You can imagine the scene when eight or nine husky young fellows discovered that each of them was on the same mission—after the same girl.

Confusion and a deadly combat ensued. The police were called in and the bunch was landed behind the bars.

Meanwhile, Shorty had gotten after Betty by his own route and bore her off in triumph.

The settings of this picture are carefully chosen and there are beautiful collegiate architectural interiors and exteriors shown. The atmosphere of college life gets over in the film, which is briskly acted by Vivian Prescott as Betty, Johnny Cumpson as Shorty, and a crowd of smart boys headed by Heyward S. Mack.

It is a characteristic Imp comedy, full of Imp life and go.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

A MISTAKE SOMEWHERE.

SOMETIME, somewhere, somebody came blithely forth with the assertion that "many professional fiction writers have endeavored to write photoplays and that few have made good." The statement has been widely used—published here and there and everywhere so frequently that many have come to believe it true. There is a sad mistake, somewhere. In the first place, we beg to take exception to the assertion that "many professional fiction writers have endeavored to write photoplays." Why should they? If you were a successful "professional fiction writer," having contracts say for a year ahead at five cents a word, why should you write photoplays for $25 per script? The statement is poppycock. The successful fiction writer has an original idea. Developed it means to him a three or five thousand word story, or, perhaps, a novelette of, say, twenty thousand words. The idea in fiction form is worth to him from $150 to $1,000. Why should be spend his time and utilize his ideas in writing photoplays at $25 to $100? A successful fiction writer has a professional name that is worth a great deal. If Robert W. Chambers, for instance, concluded to write a photoplay, nine manufacturers out of ten would grab it, providing Chambers were willing to accept a fair price for the script. He might not know the first principles of script writing, but his professional name would look unusually good in the special advertising that would immediately be put forth by the film company. The clever writer of short stories or of novels would be foolish to turn to the picture field in its present condition. If he did, he would find little difficulty in marketing his efforts. The well-known writer's name would sell the script; it would be revamped and the author's name as well as the playlet well advertised. Every well known writer of fiction has a certain following. We say this despite a statement we read somewhere that the name of an author cuts little figure under a title in book or magazine. The name does cut a figure. In time the consistently successful writers of photoplays will become better known and they, too, will have their following. Then will the era of top-notch prices be inaugurated. Professional fiction writers, first class writers, we mean, have not as yet turned to picture play writing. When they do, watch out.

Mr. Plimpton's Idea

"Scenario Procedure at the Studio" is the subject of a meaty little article from the pen of Horace G. Plimpton, editor for the Edison company. The sketch appeared in a recent issue of The Photoplaywright Magazine, and we take the liberty of using a few facts with advance thanks to the magazine.

"The Edison studio receives from thirty to fifty scenarios a day," writes Mr. Plimpton. "The tendency of the number is to increase rather than to decrease. One-seventh are impossible of production and from two to five scenarios are accepted each week, truly a small proportion of the two hundred submitted a week. In my opinion the scenario is behind all other branches of film production. Good plots are seldom obtainable except by recourse to stories already published. A school of scenario writers has not yet been established. Too many are in the field with little ability or imagination. Writers of ability have refrained from coming into the field because the prices paid are low. Then it was seriously proposed that, as a remedy, the whole scale of prices be advanced. This is starting at the wrong end. Let the author submit scenarios of real merit and he will have little trouble over prices."

We have taken the liberty of using and crediting the above extracts of the Photoplaywright article because what Mr. Plimpton says is true, and his statements bear out what we have been repeatedly stating. There are too many in the field void of ability and imagination. No "school" for writers, worthy of the name, is being conducted. There are but very, very few clever writers of fiction in the scenario field because of low prices. The field is not so easy as it looks to the new writer and the author's opportunities to make good in it are being impaired by the "knockers" who, having no gray matter of their own, do not wish to see others succeed by hard work and study. The disorganizer, "walking delegate," "protective association" organizer and others of the inefficient will succeed, if importance is given their wails, by the conscientious writer, in having the scenario editors turn finally to the professional writer of magazine fiction. And we repeat, when that literary class seriously undertakes photoplay writing, and gets his or her price, the sledding for those now crying "plot stealing" and "discrimination" will be harder in reality than anything they are now imagining.

That First Script.

The sale of the first script has proven the ruination of more than one writer's career. Opening auspiciously, carelessness and egotism have supplanted painstaking work and originality, and then many join the "plot-stealing" theorists. We have watched with interest the experiences of several, now members in good standing in the down-and-out society. Having some talent for the work, they wrote carefully that first script after studying the picture screen and deciding they could do as well. So far, so good. The writer brought a fresh idea into the "mill"; the editor saw the idea, ignored the lack of technique, and bought the effort. Fine! The class of authors I am speaking of invariably become puffed up. Easy money! They immediately dash off another playlet. This one is devoid of that refreshing originality. It is returned. Others hurriedly written and sent the rounds meet a like fate. "What's the matter? My first one sold; why not these others," is the immediate thought. Then the "walking delegate" gets busy. The unhappy amateur falls into the clutches of the "protective association," the "professors," etc. Next comes the "favored writer" bug and finally the "plot-stealing" theory. Instead of putting time, thought and originality into successive work, the writer spends his time in falling into the editorial blacklist. The above experience is the sad fate of many a writer who by keeping sweet and working hard would deserve a better fate.

Order of Optimists.

The Order of Optimists membership has now increased to thirty. President Powell is so delighted that he may shortly take the stump and deliver car platform speeches. No dues, no assessments. Everybody welcome.

Carbon Copies.

Always make a carbon copy of every script sent out. Then if your work is lost in the mails, becomes accidentally destroyed, or is mislaid, you will have a copy to turn to. It's a plain matter of business. It is as essential to have carbon copies of manuscripts as it is to keep your work in a clean and presentable condition. Always place extra sheets to the front and back of the script proper. When worn, new sheets can be used, keeping the script in an attractive shape.

Budding Playwrights.

A recent editorial in Collier's Weekly advises all budding playwrights to try their hands at writing picture plays in order to attain the art of condensation and quick action. Collier's thinks that writing picture play scripts is the best experience that a would-be playwright of the more pretentious drama can obtain. Maybe the rule will work the other way, and some of these days the successful moving picture playwright can turn his attention to the two act light opera and the three and four act drama.

Tools of the Trade.

Chicago, Ill., writer asks if there is objection to rolled MS. Heavens and earth! We thought the rolled manuscript custom and both-sides-of-the-paper practice were things of the long ago. Beginners should always remember not to roll manuscripts and to write on one side of the paper only. This applies to any form of writing. Use good white paper, say 8½ by 11 inches, and fold twice, using a good sized manila envelope. Enclose a stamped and selfaddressed return envelope. The return envelope should be small enough to go into the outer envelope without creasing. Also, use the typewriter. If you haven't a machine of your own, rent one. It's cheaper than paying $1.50 per script for typewriting. We thought the time had passed when it would be necessary to rehearse these points, but from complaints received from several editors and inquiries received by the editor of this department we find the old custom still in vogue.

WILLIAM LORD WRIGHT.

ILLUSIONS OF THE CINEMATOGRAPH.

Those who frequent moving picture shows are familiar with the booming of cannon, the music of passing bands, etc., as displayed on the screen. The sounds are generally real, and are produced behind the stage by the ingenious showman, anxious to reinforce the illusion of one sense by evidence appealing to another. Possibly we may one day have also the flooding of the auditorium with perfume, when a picture of a garden in bloom appears, or air currents from motor driven fans during the portrayal of a storm. Be this as it may, it sometimes occurs that the spectator gets the additional sensation without the showman's aid. We are apt to imagine that we see or hear what we think we should see or hear under the circumstances—hence we may hear the artillery or smell the roses by pure imagination. Dr. Ponzo, an Italian investigator, who reports some observations of this kind to the Turin Academy of Science, finds that there is generally some basis for the imagined sensation, though it may bear little relation to reality. We translate a brief account of Dr. Ponzo's discoveries from La Nature (Paris, March 23d), to which it is contributed by Rene Merle. Says this writer:

"Dr. Ponzo has collected divers curious observations made during cinematograph exhibitions, and all belonging to the category of errors—illusions of the senses and of the perceptions furnished by them.

"Most of these relate to associations between the visual images of the cinematograph and independent acoustic impressions. Dr. Ponzo cites some of these associations: During the exhibition of a film representing a religious ceremony in Burma in which two young persons struck bells, he believed that he heard the tolling, and in seeking an explanation found it in the sensation of the low tones produced by the stringed instruments of the orchestra. Another time, seeing the representation of a moving automobile, he seemed to hear the noise of the motor—an impression that was the interpretation of the rattle of the hall ventilator. On several occasions he interpreted the noise of the same ventilator or of the cinematograph projector as the far-off rushing of a torrent or that of a waterfall when the film showed views of this kind. These associations easily occur when no particular attention is given to them and are very intense when they last but an instant. On the other hand, they are difficult to bring about voluntarily, and everyone knows what imperfect results have attended all efforts to combine the cinematograph and the phonograph, particularly because of the impossibility of localizing visual and acoustic impressions in a single point.

"It is certainly with the intention of favoring these acoustico-visual associations, and thus giving a greater impression of reality, that the promoters of moving picture shows furnish orchestral music and that they try to imitate behind the curtain certain noises such as those of the wind, of the sea, of vehicles, of falls, of the breaking of glass, etc.

"It is not alone acoustic impressions that are sometimes associated with the visual images of the cinematograph; all the senses equally may furnish such illusions.

"Dr. Ponzo cites an impression of moisture and cold received during the representation of a scene from Dante's 'Inferno,' involving rain; an impression of sea-air at the sight of a ship at sea, etc., all due to the temperature of the hall, but not noticed until the visual impressions had put them in evidence through association.

"Odor may also furnish illusions. . . . All these phenomena are valuable in the study of the associations of sensations and of the illusions that they produce; they are worth noting, for their observation is difficult because it can not be made at will, the desire to notice them being sufficient to prevent their occurrence."—Translation made for The Literary Digest.

Houston, Tex.—The Wyndhams Robertson Moving Picture Supply Company has been incorporated with a capital stock of $5,000.

Baltimore, Md.—Building Inspector Stubbs granted permission for the erection of a moving picture parlor for the Northern Exhibition Company at 1627 Harford avenue to cost $7,000.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

By De Facto.

In Florida, at Ballast Point, which is Tampa's Coney Island, there is the most unique picture projection to be found in the country. It is the conception of Mr. W. C. Burbert, of the Tampa Photo and Art Supply Company. The screen is not on a pier or in a building projecting over the water, but is itself planted clear out into the bay for a distance of one hundred and ten feet, and the pictures are thrown from a booth located on the board walk. The screen is 25x30 and the picture 20x24, and when the boardwalk lights are turned off and away out on the big screen in the water there appears a moving picture, while beneath the screen the waves of Tampa Bay roll and dash themselves upon the shore there is presented a sight that is fascinating in the extreme even to an old moving picture "fan" like De Facto. The pictures are given free by the promoters of the Ballast Point resort and the Tampans can pride themselves upon having the only place in the world where moving pictures are projected over navigable waters.

The swiftest closing of a picture show, next to a fire or panic, occurred one day recently in a theatre not a thousand miles from Savannah, when the proprietor walked in, and, while the picture was on the screen, coolly and with apparent calmness, announced to a full house: "Show's all over! Get your money at the box office! Show all over!" and almost before the patrons could recover their wits they were outside getting their dimes or "rain checks." An overdose of spiritus fermenti is said to have been the cause of this unusual proceeding, and the smile has not yet come off the countenances of those who are acquainted with the facts.

Everybody in the film business knows what a "subrenter" is, but it remains for a Florida "cracker" exhibitor to spring a new term to cover the case, and while at first it may seem a little difficult to see the connection, yet it is there all the same and is absolutely correct. "Blind tigering the reels" is the way he put it, and those who have heretofore thought that the "blind tiger" roamed exclusively around whiskey barrels have another guess coming, for they now know that the liquor traffic no longer has a monopoly of the term.

STANDARD FILM COMPANY.

Another new film company has sprung into existence, which is an incorporation of five other concerns. The office quarters of the company will be at 21 East Fourteenth street, which is at the present time undergoing changes in preparation for the advent of the newcomers.

At Asbury Park the plant and studios of the Standard Film Company are under construction, where two and three real features will be produced, and in six weeks' time it is expected that at least five different exchanges will be distributed by them throughout the United States.

Ligonier, Pa.—The store occupied by Keffer & Sweeney will be altered into a moving picture show by Harvy Black.

HOCHSTETTER UTILITY CO., INC., TO PRODUCE EDUCATIONAL AND HIGH CLASS FEATURES

By M. I. MacDonald

Long silence is often the forerunner of large developments, and the quiet contemplation of thoughtful men is the mortar which fixes in its place, solid and secure, each stone of the foundation work of large and successful business concerns.

So it has been with the organizers of the Hochstetter Utility Company, which has recently incorporated for the purpose of manufacturing high class moving pictures of educational and scientific value, and of which that clever young genius, F. W. Hochstetter, has been appointed president. The other officers of the campany, whose names are well known to many of our readers, are: D. H. Ward, vice-president; H. C. Pierson, treasurer, and A. Teitel, Secretary.

The executive offices of the Hochstetter Utility Co., Inc., are at 32 Union Square, New York City, while at 40 East Twelfth street, in the old headquarters of the Ortho Film Co., will be located the manufacturing plant of the concern. This plant will be prepared in large capacity to carry out the mechanical work of the company, such as developing and printing. Here will also be continued the work of the re-developing, cleaning and softening films, for which method a machine has been invented and patented by Mr. Hochstetter, owner of the process which has been so satisfactorily practised in the past, and which makes a six-months film as soft, and pliable, and distinct as a first-run film. Also a new and secret process for coloring films will be brought into use in the production of the splendid pictures which, it is anticipated, this company will produce.

MR. F. W. HOCHSTETTER

The first moving picture production of the Hochstetter Utility Company will be the Life of John Bunyan and that remarkable and well-known allegorical story which originated in the brain of this wonderful character, entitled "The Pilgrim's Progress." This production will be in two reels, 2,000 feet in all. It is one to which a great deal of expense is necessarily attached on account of the antiquity of the stage settings and costuming required, and which are of more or less difficulty to secure. The historical correctness of the production and authenticity of detail is being carefully supervised by Oscar I. Lamberger, Ph.D, who is well known as a promoter of the educational element in the moving picture; and the staging and dramatic end is in the competent hands of Mr. Francis Powers, late of the Pathé Frères directing staff. Both of these men are using every energy to make the production a complete success from an historical and artistic standpoint. These pictures will also be the first placed on the market colored by the secret colored process owned by Mr. Hochstetter. The best of experienced talent has been secured in the preparation of this production, as will be the case in all of the material put on the market by the Hochstetter Utility Company. No expense will be spared by them in the furtherance of the best developments, and there is no doubt that the public will benefit largely by their efforts.

MR. TEITEL

ANOTHER NEW THEATRE FOR NEWBURGH, NEW YORK

Mr. George Cohan, who owns several of the largest motion picture theatres in towns located on the Hudson River, is erecting a second theatre in Newburgh, N. Y. Through Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," he has purchased two Powers No. 6 machines for this new theatre. Mr. Cohan uses the "Hallberg A C to D C Economizer." Mr. Hallberg reports a brisk trade in moving picture equipments of all kinds from widely scattered territory.

THE VICTORY OF COURAGE

Courage means more than the general definitions accorded it. It is a metaphor in itself. Its purport includes hope, honor and even right, for courage in an unworthy cause is but boldness.

The struggle and triumph of an honest hope is thrillingly detailed in "The Diamond Path," the Rex release of Tuesday, June 4th, the first Rex Tuesday production. A girl's courage finally permits her persevering purpose to prove the innocence of another girl accused of theft and the guilt of the genuine thieves. The diamond path is the lane of many turnings that leads to the pivotal point and the climatic incident—as well as the route by which exhibitors will arrive at the inevitable conclusion that the third Rex release is a genuine print of the royal family.

SCENE FROM "THE DIAMOND PATH"

THANHOUSER'S "CALLED BACK" REALISTIC.

"Called Back," the Thanhouser two-reeler from Hugh Conway's novel, grips. That is the best of a lot of good things that you can say about it. It just lassoes your interest. You follow breathlessly the efforts of Gilbert Vaughn, the once blind man, to locate the house in which the fatal quarrel occurred—the quarrel which he heard, but did not witness—for then he was blind. The presentation of a blind man on the stage or in a film is often unpleasant, but the blind Gilbert Vaughn of Thanhouser's "Called Back" is very acceptable. The whole subject has no unpleasant phases, not even in the quarrel scene at the outset, wherein occurs the one fatality of the piece. There are no "horrors" in the execution of this. The English atmosphere in the first reel of the picture and the Italian atmosphere in the second ring true. Vaughn's "search" is as well stage-set as it is well conducted. You think it real, and you follow its every turn and twist for that reason. The original novel is a very masterpiece of mystery, and the present film is a masterpiece in realistic picture production. Thanhouser makes release on Friday, June 21st.

THOSE WERE HAPPY DAYS

"Those Were Happy Days" is the title of a very unique child story that has just been produced by Director Matthews, of the Powers Motion Picture Company. Mr. Matthews has a well earned reputation for his child stories and sustains it in this film.

It is springtime and two children rebel when it comes time to go to school. They are found playing in a cool and inviting spot by the irate father, and he hustles them to the house and turns them over to their mother. They are duly scrubbed, and, armed with their lunch, are sent to school. On the way they stumble over a can of black paint. Margery has an idea, and to think is to act. She proposes that they paint their faces to resemble children afflicted with measles. Willie is impressed with the idea and they appear in the schoolroom, languid and objects of pity. The teacher notices them and, by the aid of a glass, examines their faces. One glance is sufficient. School is dismissed instanter, and the scholars admonished to make a run for it in order not to contract the contagious disease. There is a scampering, and Willie and Margery enjoy the situation immensely.

Wild-eyed and apprehensive, the old pedagogue races to the village physician and tells him of the circumstances. Medicine case in hand, he makes a sprint for it. The parents of Willie and Margery are notified and the villagers are alarmed. There is a mad scramble to find the children and get them home before the contagion spreads.

In the meantime, the perpetrators of all the trouble have sought a sequestered spot and are eating an appetizing lunch when the party bursts upon them. Their parents are the most apprehensive and the mother takes Margery in her arms. The contact with her clothing smears the paint and their secret is discovered. The finale can be imagined. The children are soundly whipped, the measles scare is a thing of the past, and the villagers breathe much easier.

Mayor Frank K. Mott, of Oakland, Cal., in addition to his many other business ventures, is going into the moving picture business, and is now leading an enterprise to build a picture theatre in his former real estate quarters on Broadway. The building will be ambitious in design and will involve the expenditure of from $10,000 to $12,000. Others behind the venture are Senator John W. Stetson, J. P. Edoff, Frank J. Edoff and Henry Wieking.

THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

Arrangements are being made to run two special trains to the Chicago Motion Picture Exhibitors League Convention to be held at Chicago beginning the second Tuesday in August, 1912, one to start from New York City by way of Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Huntington, W. Va, Cincinnati, Indianapolis, Chicago. The other trains, one will leave as follows: Albany, N. Y., going through Buffalo, Erie, to Cleveland. The train leaving Pittsburg, Pa., going through Youngstown to Cleveland, will join the Albany train at Cleveland and from Cleveland through Sandusky, Toledo, South Bend to Chicago. These special trains will be solid Pullmans and will be fully equipped for the convenience and pleasure of the motion picture exhibitors. All exhibitors in adjoining territory will be notified of the schedule of the trains. Every exhibitor in the United States and Canada are invited to attend the Chicago Convention. Big preparations are being made for the accommodation and entertainment of visiting exhibitors.

Arrangements have been made with the La Salle Hotel, where headquarters will be established; two large halls will be at the disposal of the exhibitors. The entire eighteenth floor of the La Salle Hotel will be devoted to those who wish to make exhibits. All of those who intend displaying their goods at the convention are advised to write the La Salle Hotel and make arrangements for reservation at an early date. Headquarters of the local committee at Chicago has been established on the third floor of the Orpheum Theatre Building.

M. A. Neff, president of the League, will make a trip east in the interest of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America for the purpose of organizing State organizations, and promoting the interest of the Chicago State convention.

The following is the Chicago Executive Committee on arrrangements: W. J. Sweeney, chairman; R. R. Levy, C. L. Hull, C. C. Whelan, C. A. Anderson, S. I. Levin, I. Natkin, C. Abrams, F. Schaeffer, J. A. Olcock, H. A. Hill. Every member of the Moving Picture Exhibitors League of America will please give the Chicago convention as large publicity as possible. We confidentially expect not less than four thousand exhibitors to attend the convention at Chicago.

As evidence of the great interest being taken in the League organization, many new States are making application for new membership and the Cincinnati headquarters is a bee-hive of activity.

State and Local News.

Mr. Max Stearns of the Exhibit Theatre, Columbus, Ohio, formerly treasurer of the Moving Picture Exhibitors League of Ohio.

The Ohio State League is in a very prosperous condition. Cincinnati Local held a meeting at the Sinton Hotel Monday, May 13th. M. A. Neff presented a part of the new code which is being drafted and so far as it was complete was adopted. At the next meeting the full code is expected to be read.

The Moving Picture Exhibitors League of America, Cincinnati Local No. 2, raised $400. They decided to always keep a fund at all times in their treasury not less than $500 in order that the interest of the local might be efficiently looked after.

The State organization of Kentucky reports many new members. G. M. Wesley, organizer for the State of West Virginia, reports that all of the exhibitors in West Virginia are joining the League.

Indiana will hold a convention in the near future. They expect a very large attendance.

The Ohio State Convention is to be held at Toledo on the 16th and 17th of July. Toledo confidentlally reports that they will break all former records and show the boys just how to handle a convention.

Very truly yours,

M. A. NEFF,
President M. P. E. L. of A.

NOTES ABOUT THE INDIANA LEAGUE

The Indiana Motion Picture Exhibitors' League has been in existence about six months and has a membership of over one hundred. The League is in a most flourishing condition, especially when it is considered that it is always difficult to organize any body of business people, even though the organization may be the means of bringing more information and more dollars than any other medium to the members.

Mr. H. S. Dickson, of Winchester, is the president; Mr. F. J. Rembusch, of Shelbyville, secretary, and Mrs. Joseph H. Gain, of Indianapolis, treasurer. These gentlemen are doing everything in their power to improve the interest of motion picture exhibitors, and while it is hard work to get every exhibitor in Indiana into the League, it is believed that the day is not far distance when there will be an organization so strong in Indiana that they will sit up and take notice who may have anything to do with the policies of motion picture theatres.

Several members have expressed themselves as having their meetings in Indianapolis because Indianapolis is more centrally located and more easy of access, or else have the State divided into districts with a president in each district, so that they may meet separately. Then have one or two rousing meetings during the year. Every officer in the League is very enthusiastic.

In Indianapolis we have Dr. J. M. Rhodes, who has kept the Indianapolis moving picture exhibitors together by his untiring energy and devotion to the cause. Dr. Rhodes is a thorough showman and a thoroughbred gentleman besides.

Mr. John B. Hubert, of Indianapolis, Mr. John A. Victor, J. B. Trulock and W. L. Overholser are very much in favor of organizations among the exhibitors and their work is felt wherever you meet them on account of their enthusiasm for the cause.

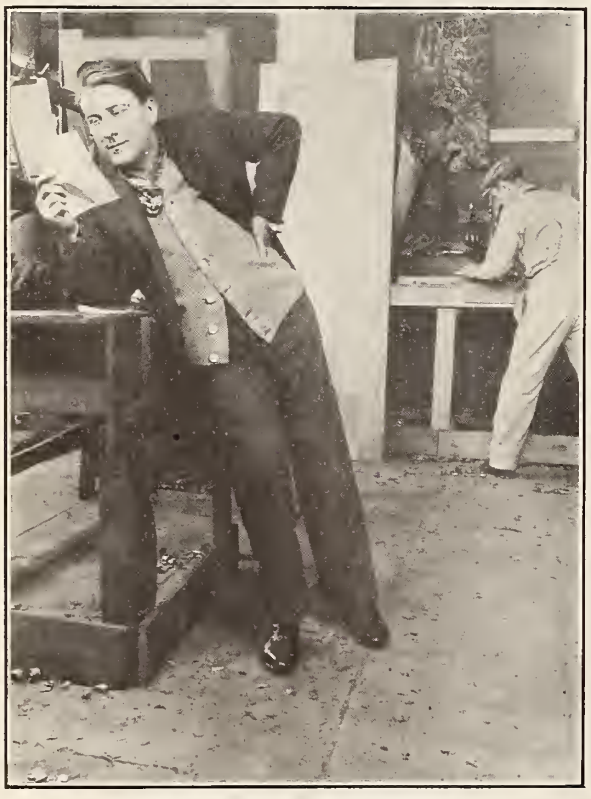
In the northern part of the State we have Mr. Joseph Bonnershein, of Fort Wayne, and Mr. Sprague Green. These gentlemen, with the other Fort Wayne exhibitors, were instrumental in showing the League a fine time in Fort Wayne at the last meeting a few weeks ago. Mr. Bonnershein had attended the meeting at Dayton, Ohio, and was much impressed with the National League. While at Fort Wayne Mr. Sprague Green took a delight in taking the visitors over the city in his seven passenger touring car. We presume business is prosperous, as most of us haven't any touring car, and we suppose the reason few of us are as shrewd or as experienced in the show game as Sprague Green.

One of the real good fellows in our League is Mr. C. B.

Sommers, of Muncie, and we do not want to forget Herschel Cannon of the same city. These gentlemen know the art of keeping everybody in a good humor and keeping spirit and life in affairs. Mr. Earl Rife, of Logansport, attends all the meetings and is a most pleasant and companionable gentleman. He is in favor of passing a State law that will require every exhibitor in Indiana to belong to the League.

In the western part of the State we have a most enthusiastic member, Mr. H. S. Prentice, of Terre Haute. Mr. Prentice has one of the most beautiful moving picture theatres in the State. He is at the same time one of the pioneer exhibitors. He remembers the day when he got ten cents for one reel of pictures and turned them out every five minutes; and at that time he was afraid he would soon be in Rockefeller's class, but since many exhibitors are running six and seven reels and the same number of songs and vaudeville acts for five cents his fears have subsided. Mr. W. R. Deaton, of Warsaw, was an old partner of Mr. Prentice's and the moment you talk to Mr. Deaton you will find yourself impressed with a man who is most sincerely devoted to the cause of the League. If every manager and owner was as enthusiastic as Mr. Deaton we would have five hundred members within no time at all.

In the southern part of the State Mr. J. R. Brannon has been attending all the meetings besides the national meeting in Dayton. Mr. Brannon is a good man to listen to at any time, being a most thorough business man of excellent personal charm and splendid judgment. There is only one thing needed to make the Indiana League the most prosperous in the Union, and that is for every member who has not paid their dues to send $1.50 at once for this quarter to F. J. Rembusch, Shelbyville, Ind., and those who have not yet joined send their initiation fees of $5.00 without a moment's delay to F. J. Rembusch, secretary, Shelbyville, Ind.



"LET NO MAN PUT ASUNDER"
Imp Release, June 13

Arthur Lucas recently, through his attorney, Leon Tobriner, petitioned the District Supreme Court to dissolve the partnership existing between himself and Herbert L. Miles, trading under the name ofWashington Film Exchange, 426 Ninth street northwest. A receiver is also sought.

CLEVER MOTION PICTURE ACTRESS.

Miss Florence M. Wellington, the beautiful and cultured young woman who has recently made her debut on the motion picture stage, is one of the most eligible of the many bright young women who are lending their talents and charms to the motion picture today.

To be all that the motion picture stage demands involves a number of rare attributes—beauty, grace, intelligence, dramatic ability, and last but not by any means least, a steady nerve.

MISS FLORENCE M. WELLINGTON

Miss Wellington has, we are told, not only one, or even two of these requisites, but all of them.

She is a beautiful young woman, a fearless horsewoman, vivacious and of a strongly emotional nature, and is one of the few who are really serious in the study and criticism of their own work. She has appeared in both Pathe and Kalem productions and has recently been picked up as a prize packet by the Victograph Film Company, in whose productions she is appearing at the present time.

COVINGTON, KY., MOVING PICTURE MEN FORM ORGANIZATION.

The Moving Picture League of America met yesterday at the Industrial Club in Covington and perfected a local organization under the name of the Kenton & Campbell Company Branch No. 1. Officers were elected as follows: President, Nat Rogers; first vice-president, C. Tarvin; second vice-president, B. D. Griffiths; secretary, Harry Brice; treasurer, W. J. Halpin. State Vice-President Orene Parker was elected a delegate to the National Convention to be held in Chicago in August.

Councilman Benesch, of Cleveland, Ohio, has suggested holding an annual exhibition of moving pictures illustrative of the city's progress in order that taxpayers may have some idea of how and why their money is spent. The idea is good.

OPERATOR'S CHAT

By Tom Costello.

Auxiliary Local 35, I. A. T. S. E.

Officers.

President—John F. Stephens.
Vice-President—Sam Kaplan.
Financial Secretary—Gus Durkin.
Recording Secretary—Morris Klapholtz.
Business Agent—Henry Weinberger.
Assistant Business Agent—Edward Phelps.

The Auxiliary meets at Teutonia Hall, No. 66 Essex street, the first and third Monday of every month at 12 o'clock midnight. Dues can be paid to Bro. Weinberger at the Union Office, No. 133 Third avenue, or to Gus Durkin, care of Berkeley Theatre, No. 19 West 44th street.

The Auxiliary held their regular meeting at the above rooms Monday, May 20th. The hall was crowded to its full capacity; seven new members took the obligation and a long list of applicants are waiting to be examined by the overworked examining board. The initiation will be raised to $25 at the next meeting, so all the operators who have taken advantage of the $10 rate are congratulating themselves. The organization is in a healthy state, with an increasing membership every meeting.

Of course, we are bound to hear the wailings of the unfortunate crank-turners who did not pass the examination; they are out with the hammer, but believe me, I'd rather be on the inside looking out, and as long as the Operator's Chat and the Moving Picture News is chronicling the happenings of picture-plays you will always find a booster in its editor, for the Operator at all times is fearless in his criticisms and loyal to the little union that has grown so strong in the past two years, an organization that has had to contend with obstacles and which is dropping from its rolls the faint-hearted who are afraid to stick to their obligation. The Auxiliary wants every operator in New York, and unless something unforeseen happens they will get the other 10 per cent. they need to have a union with a rating of 100 per cent., and every man who wears the Auxiliary button a master in the projection line.

* * * *

The Exhibitor and the Operator.

A conversation heard on 14th street Friday, May 24th, but our friend the operator was a sticker, and although he did not land the position he spoke his mind. The following is a brief synopsis of the talk and I'm going to try and make it an interesting item for the Chat:

Exhibitor: You're an operator?

Operator: Yes, sir.

Exhibitor: Working at present?

Operator: No, sir, the house where I was employed closed for the summer.

Exhibitor: Well, I can give you a good position; what's your salary?

Operator: The union scale.

Exhibitor: My house opens at 7:30 P. M., my show runs till 10:30.

Operator: (With a broad grin) I'll take the job; when do I start?"

Exhibitor: By the way, where do you live?

Operator. No. ——, Brooklyn.

Exhibitor: You go to this address, No. ——— street, and set up the machine and get everything in readiness for Monday night.

Operator: All right, sir, I'll be there with bells on.

Exhibitor: I forgot to tell you we are going to get our service at the ——— Exchange, so meet me at 9:30, and, handing the operator a slip with Monday night's program, told him to book the show and go to the ——— Sign Company and get the posters.

Operator: (His broad grin vanished like the mountain mist) Did you say that was a soft job?

Exhibitor: Pretty soft, well I should smile, and if you don't want it say so and I can get a good operator for $15 per week.

I will add he meant per-h-a-p-s.

The exhibitor walked away and I guess he is still looking for an operator.

Now I'm going to try and show the reader of the Chat how soft the job really was. The operator lived in Brooklyn, he would have to be up at 8:30 to get breakfast and then go to the exchange from 10:30 till 12 o'clock; wait for his reels, then wait another hour for posters, then he would leave posters at the exchange and go out for lunch, and as the exchange his benefactor was booking from had the reputation of from 10 and 12 jumps to the 1,000 feet, then the operator would have to start early to avoid the crush on the cars, then take out jumps after arriving, trim the arc lamps, and now it is 7:30, the show goes on until 10:30, we keep the operator busy, the show closes, he has to bring the film back to the exchange and by the time he arrives back in Brooklyn it is 1:30. Pretty soft these jobs. Well, I don't think, and as I talk from the operator's point of view, I am going to ask every fair-minded exhibitor if he can expect an operator to project a good picture after doing a hard day's work; can he give you results that the educated patrons want? The audience, your audience, they are the ones who pay to watch the movies, they are the ones who criticise poor projection, and Mr. Exhibitor, I am speaking in behalf of 600 operators, members of Auxiliary Local 35, I. A. T. S. E., do you think it fair? Do they do it in Frisco, Chicago, Cincinnati, Boston, and many other cities where the wages are from $22.50 to $35 for operators? Where did these operators originate from? New York, and to-day I will say that the operator, the real bona fide article, not the crank-turner, the New York operator, has a batting average of 1000 per cent. when it comes to good projection. When you want an operator, Mr. Exhibitor, whether he is union or non-union, he is a human being, the operating room has taken the place of the coop and the reel carrying operator will soon be a thing of the past.

MOVING PICTURES THAT TALK.

Professor Expounds New Invention.

Science has marched forward to another victory, says the London Daily Chronicle. Last night it was acclaimed by a gathering of learned gentlemen in the Royal Institution, when Professor William Stirling gave a lecture with demonstrations. In a little while it will be the most popular item in all the music halls of Europe. It is an absolute perfection of the cinematograph combined with the phonograph.

There have been half successful attempts before. The public has seen the cinematograph and heard the phonograph trying to keep pace with it. But an absolute unison between sight and sound was not accomplished. Now with M. Leon Gaumont's invention of the "Chronophone" the synchronisation is complete and perfect.

Last night the learned professors with their intellectual ladies clapped their hands and laughed delightedly when on the screen a Gallic cock appeared life-like in its pride and colors, and as it ruffled its feathers, and inflated its gorge, and opened its beak there came forth the most strident and triumphant cock crows ever heard at dawn. Again and again, one heard the call of chanticleer and so perfectly did the sounds correspond to the actions of the bird that it was almost impossible to believe that the real bird was not there.

A recitation from Kipling's "Ballad of the Camperdown" was given, and as the image of actor on the screen moved lips and facial muscles so the words were spoken. Then followed an angry scene in a French railway carriage, a monologue over the telephone, the adventures of a lion tamer with his roaring and excited beasts, and "The toast of the King" at an English banquet, so perfectly "synchronised" that the effect of life was produced with amazing realism.

In future it will be possible for political speakers to make their orations with all the eloquence of gesture and speech to great and distant audiences without leaving their own drawing rooms. It will be possible to see and hear plays performed without the actors coming to the theatre with bag and baggage. They will send their moving images and the reproduction of their voices. Hundreds of years hence our descendants may see and hear their forefathers as though their living ghosts walked and spoke long after their bones have crumbled to dust. The "Chronophone" will give a kind of immortality to all of us whose records are obtained.

NOTHING SHALL BE HIDDEN

Imp Release, June 10

Science comes to the aid of a young lover, who has to encounter the opposition of the father of the girl to whom he is attached. Desiring to get into touch with the girl at her home, the lover over the telephone establishes to his own satisfaction that at that moment the girl's home is being burglarized.

An alarm to the police station leads to the arrest of the crooks and the young lover so wins the hand of the girl and promises his prospective father-in-law a share in the invention by which he saw, as well as heard, what the burglars were doing.

Possibly the dramatist is anticipating matters in this pivotal part of the play. Light, especially the X-Ray kind, penetrated solid bodies, but, so far human vision is unable to do the same. However, according to some physicists, we must not dismiss as hopeless the solution of the problem.

"Nothing Shall Be Hidden" suggests the time when its scientific consummation will be reached.

Margarita Fischer and Harry Pollard are seen in the leads in this picture.

GENERAL FILM PUBLICITY AND SALES COMPANY ADVANCE A PRECEDENT FOR OTHERS TO FOLLOW

The cry from among the masses who visit moving picture theatres is a complaint against the tiresome similarity of subject used in the pictures. A business man was heard to remark first the other day: "Every picture seems just like the last one; we know just exactly what is going to happen before we see it. Why don't they give us a change?" This is what the General Film Publicity and Sales Company are doing. Through the efforts of Messrs. Spanuth and Strouse, one of the world's greatest actors has been persuaded to appear in a filmed production of "Oliver Twist." They have, in so doing, established a precedent. "Oliver Twist," written by one of the greatest of literary geniuses, produced in dramatized form by some of the world's greatest actors and actresses, and last but not least, filmed in a faultless manner, is bound to make a strong impress on the countenance of moving picturedom.

THE VICTOR FILM CO.

The first release of the Victor Film Co., whose announcement appears in this issue will be on Friday, June 14th, and is a rollicking comedy "Not Like Other Girls." Miss Florence Lawrence will inject all her vivacity and charm into this production in her effort to prove she's not like other girls.

Mr. Owen Moore will carry the masculine part of their interests and more will be heard of anon about these clever people and their parts in the productions of the Victor Film Co.

"FRA DIAVOLO" PRODUCED BY SOLAX

One of the prettiest and most romantic of the operas of the old school is "Fra Diavolo," of which Solax is filming a specially prepared dramatized version with Madame Blache taking care of the directing end.

Madame Blache is well known for the artistic and intelligent manner in which productions prepared specially by her are presented on the screen.

"Fra Diavolo" is full of pretty rural scenes. Those familiar with the opera from which the filmed play is taken, will remember the element of comedy and love interest that permeates the story, as well as the pathos of the highly tragic situations which occur. The story of Lord and Lady Allcash traveling through the Italian mountains with plenty of money and very little sense, their adventures at the mountain inn, the pretty innkeeper's daughter and her sweetheart, Lorenzo, the bandit chieftain, Fra Diavolo, who disguises himself as a marquis to steal Lady Allcash's diamonds, all are in the interweavings of the play the brilliant threads that crisscross.

Some time ago Solax produced "Mignon" most successfully. However, "Fra Diavolo" is expected to surpass anything that has yet been placed on the market by this company. The interior settings are deep and splendid in their appropriateness, and the exteriors have been well chosen, with a view to retaining the Italian atmosphere.

A fuller account of this splendid production will be given by us in another issue.

"A WESTERN CHILD'S HEROISM"

(Champion)

In a clearing in the Blockwood Hills lives Bill Burton, a miner, with his wife and child, in a little log cabin. Burton befriends a Mexican who has escaped pursuing officers of the law, wounded. During the Mexican's convalescence, the miner strikes it rich and the gold is stored away in the chimney. This is discovered by the Mexican, who makes ready to rob his benefactor. While Burton is gone, he makes for the gold but is discovered by the miner's wife, who struggles with him. The little daughter now takes a hand, and at the pistol point forces the ingrate to the door, where he goes off with maledictions on his lips. He soon returns with marauding Indians, and they sneak upon the cabin and set it afire. The little girl discovers their approach in time to escape on horseback, stealing on the back of one tethered by the Indians, and she sets off for help. The fire now rages furiously, at which juncture the cowboys dash up and put the villains to flight.

Mr. Sydney Ascher has opened an airdrome in Brooklyn. The bleachers alone have a seating capacity of 1,500 people.

"THE OUTCAST."

"101" Bison of June 8—Two Reels

Staged in wild and beautiful forests and mountains, telling an absorbing story of early Western life, presented by a large cast, "The Outcast," in two reels, should be as well received by the public as the previous releases of this famous series.

The prologue shows the life of a trapper, living in the soliture of the forest. He digs a bear trap, which is covered with boughs and grass. An Indian girl, armed with a bow and arrow, creeps close to a wild turkey which she brings down. As she runs forward to gather up her prey she falls into the trap. Evans, the trapper, finds her there and on lifting her from the pit finds that she has sprained her ankle, and takes her to his cabin, and makes her as comfortable as possible. As the shades of evening fall and the pain subsides the girl drops into slumber, and loth to awaken her Evans leaves her in possession of his cabin and, wrapped in a blanket sleeps outside.

In the morning, the girl having recovered sufficiently, he lifts her to his horse, and mounting behind her proceeds to the Indian camp. On the way he is attacked by a trio of Indians who fire at him from behind a tree, and the trapper brings down one of his assailants. The others rush back to the camp, and when Evans arrives he is roughly dealt with by the Indians, but is saved by the intervention of the girl, who is the daughter of the Sioux chief.

Some time later a party of Cheyennes visit the Sioux, and the chief buys the girl from her father. Though she has not seen the white trapper since the day of her accident, the Indian girl's heart has gone out to him, and the prospect of becoming the squaw of the Cheyenne chief is distasteful to her. It is an unwilling bride, indeed, whom the old Cheyenne brings to his tepee, and when he attempts to subject her she turns upon him with a knife, and leaving his lifeless form lying in the tent, makes her escape. When she reaches her own village, however, she fears the wrath of her father, and suddenly the thought occurs to her to seek refuge again in the trapper's cabin.

Evans, who has fallen in love with the girl, assures her of his protection. The Cheyennes, wild with anger at the death of their chief, call upon the Sioux to deliver the girl to them, and are assured that she is not in camp. They trail her to the cabin, and, while Evans is away examining his traps, break down the barricaded door and set the house on fire. As Evans is returning he see the Indians gallop off with their prisoner, and flying to the Sioux camp tells of what has occurred. The Sioux chief immediately calls out his braves who start in pursuit of the Cheyennes.

The girl is about to meet her death when the Sioux arrive, and a hand-to-hand conflict ensues, in the heat of which Evans rescues the girl and gallops away with her. As the sun is setting, standing on the crest of a hill, he points out to her a wagon train of emigrants, and hand-in-hand they go to his people—and safety.

GREAT ITALIAN-TURKISH WAR PICTURE TO BE RELEASED BY GEORGE KLEINE

George Kleine has a program of even more than usual excellence for the week ending June 8th. The Cines release for Tuesday, June 4th, is a split reel containing a very clever comedy-drama entitled "The Trifler," and a charming scenic which shows picturesque scenes in Padua, palaces, churches, scenes along the river, and many other places of interest.

The Eclipse for Wednesday, June 5th, a picturesque, costumed drama relating to a romance of the period "when knights were bold" is entitled "In Days of Old." But the big release of the week is a splendid Cines film showing scenes of the Turkish-Italian War. These scenes were taken on the actual scene of the conflict, and depict with true realism the attending excitement, the movement of troops, the firing of the great guns from the fortifications, the shelling of the enemies' positions, the activity of the cavalry, infantry, artillery, and the bombarding by the great modern warships of the towns along the Tripolitan coast. The action throughout is live and vivid and the photography excellent.

NESTOR

Three truly worth-while Westerns are being released by the Nestor Film Co. during the week commencing Monday, June 3d, "The Half-Breed's Way," the Monday Nestor, is a splendid production directed by Thomas Ricketts and ably acted by Harry Von Meter, George Beech, Donald MacDonald, Vivian Rich and others. "The Ranch Girl's Choice," released Friday, June 7th, directed by Alf. E. Christie and cleverly played by Lee Moran, George Fields, Russell Bassett and Victoria Forde, is a picture-play that delightfully blends the "beaten track" with original situations.

"The Mountain Daisy," for release Wednesday, June 5th, is probably the most striking of this excellent Nestor trinity. It deals with a sweet young mountain maid who loves and is loved by a young Easterner. The girl's father has strenuous objections to the match, however, and the young couple have to resort to strategy in order to become united in wedlock. The clever way in which they gain their end is most amusing and the story, combined with the usual excellent Nestor photography, makes the picture interesting from the start. Viola Barry and Jack Conway are the ones who portray the main characters, and very capably do they handle the most difficult situations.

SCENE FROM "THE MOUNTAIN DAISY"

VATICAN PERMITS

Moving Picture Shows in Churches Under Certain Conditions

Moving picture shows on religious subjects may now be given in Roman Catholic churches in America. The Vatican has just given its consent to this distinct innovation at the request of several bishops.

The conditions under which the pictures may be shown are that the Sacred Host be removed from the church during the performance, and that the women be separated from the men.

It is also ordered that the church be sufficiently lighted. Magic lantern shows may also be given under these conditions.

MR. GEORGE O. NICHOLLS GEM DIRECTOR

We're talking of George O. Nicholls. We'll have to talk of him because he said so little himself. We went to Mr. Nicholls for an interview, and all we got was the view.

Mr. Nicholls is to direct the new Gem releases. We all have heard of Mr. Nicholls, of course; such productions as "East Lynne," "Jess," "She," and "Cinderella," for which he was responsible, have poured fame over his name in spite of himself and his reticent modesty, but his connection with Gem presented his importance as a front-rank director in a new phase—which he wasn't when we called and explained our mission.

Curiously and covertly we sized him up—and he's an eyeful, too. Big, genial, amiable, with sunny, light, bright eyes and forceful features, he possesses a certain refined and defined charm and a quaint, deliberate decisiveness that stamp his personality with inherent interest and integrity.

It was when we quizzed him about his past achievements that we discovered that he belonged to the Sphinx family. We had to apply our patented news extractor before he broke the silence and the record for modesty. When he did talk he passed over some of his biggest attainments, things for which the average human would feel justified in hiring a press agent of his own, with such blase insouciance and calm impassiveness that you wonder how many other important achievements this silent, thinking doer has performed and forgotten about entirely. You wonder that a man with such creative and interpretative genius can withstand from permitting the world to know that he is what he is. And you solve the irritating riddle in the quiet confidence, the humorous smile and the tutored eyes as they disclose the secret when he says:

"The trouble with most directors is that they don't know what they're driving at until after the picture is finished."

He knows what he knows so well that he thinks for others to know it is superfluous.

We asked him the hackneyed question, "What, in your estimation, is the future of the moving picture?" We expected the equally hackneyed general answer. The decidedly unexpected occurred—we forgot we were talking to an individualist, an originator, an ego, not an echo.

"I don't know," was the terse and startling reply. "I don't care to worry about the future of the moving picture. Let's do the work now, let's nurse the present; the future will take care of itself."

Mr. Nicholls believes in portraying life on the screen just as it is, without exaggerating or idealizing it. He believes the picture is the truest mirror of life, and that we should not tolerate distorted reflections of the hopes and dreams and despairs of humanity, just because we would like them to be different. The moving picture is a teacher, and a teacher shouldn't lie about the truth just because it's got a black eye.

We're giving Mr. Nicholls' ideas in this regard in our own words for an unfortunate and regrettable reason. Just at this point the scribe's pencil-point broke, and before he had got a new lead Mr. Nicholls had taken the lead and finished the interesting view above expressed. If we had the faculty to transcribe the idea in Mr. Nicholls' dominant, at once pleasing and convincing manner, we would attempt it, but it would be a vain effort. No talker it has ever been our good fortune to meet could say less more convincingly than Mr. Nicholls. And none could say a great deal more more convincingly.

Personality and individuality is the twin answer to Mr. Nicholls' success and strength in moving picture ranks. Now that we have met him and realize and recognize the parallel, we discern that his personality is indelibly transferred to his work, and that the unusual force and gripping appeal with which they were instilled emanated from his broad mind and big heart.

Mr. Nicholls and Gem are to be mutually congratulated

Moving Pictures as an educational advantage to the Paducah public schools probably will be a reality at the next season. Already a sufficient amount of money has been raised by Miss Kate White of the departmental work, to purchase the machine.

VIRGINIUS.

Reliance Release June 15th.

A stupendous filmization of the famous Roman masterpiece of James Sheridan Knowles. There is little that need be said of the story for few are unfamiliar with it. The Reliance Company has secured a tremendous cast, among them many eminent dramatic actors and has spared no expense to make it the best production ever yet seen in photoplay. It is in two reels and follows faithfully the action and story as told in play form. The great forum scenes, the romance and death of Virginia, the despotism of Appius Claudius, the heroism and later madness of Virginius and the great mob scenes are all tensely staged and dramatically pictured.

TRICKFILM BY THANHOUSER.

A hotel clerk's love for a girl gives the Thanhouser producers opportunity for the creation of some fine trickfilm. It is called "The Night Clerk's Nightmare." The nightmare is caused by the love aforesaid—the clerk is so jealous that he dreams a rival tries to steal the girl's heart. There is a great comedy "assassination" scene in which the night clerk finds the rival dining with the girl and takes his life. After his life has been taken the rival arises from his deathbed—in this case a dining room table—removes all traces of the deadly deed, lights a cigarette and puffs his way back into the girl's affections. Again the night clerk pursues him. Rival jumps plump out of a window—Night Clerk follows—neither hurt! It is a film of miracles, which end only when the clerk casts the rival into the rapids—when the rival lights another cigarette and saunters blithely through the seething waters. The release day is Friday, June 14th.

A lease turning over the Broad Street Theatre Philadelphia, to the control of the recently organized Broad Street Theatre Co., of which Milton Hirshfeld, of New York, is the largest stockholder, was signed May 18th by Messrs. Haveson and Gilinsky, owner of the house, by the officers of the corporation. It is said that the rental will be $7,000 a year, and that the purchase price was fixed at $100,000.

WESTERN CORRESPONDENCE.

Hot Springs, Ark., May 30.—Not content with the natural heat that "Old Sol" will send down, or the still more natural high temperature of the hot waters of this famous resort, theatrical magnates of this city have decided to hook up in a little row all their own, and to add zest and ginger to the situation generally and to also demonstrate that there is no desire to show discrimination, the sheriff got after a motion picture house at the park and now there is "bushels to tell." So here goes.

Manager Frank Head, of the Princess Theatre, the biggest and best vaudeville house in the South, if you please, and the owners of that aforementioned temple where the "Varieties" shine, have agreed to disagree, and all because the said owners have decided to run vaudeville there the entire summer, the house being cool enough for this purpose. Now Mr. Head is the sole owner and proprietor of a very pretty airdrome, upon which he has spent several hundreds of dollars previous to the opening this season, and when the Princess closes he opens the outdoor theatre and gives a summer season of stock productions. He, too, is the manager of the Princess, and, I understand, holds stock in that company. The running of the Princess would materially effect the receipts at the Airdrome, so, believing that self-preservation was numbered among the first requisites of a wide-awake business man, as well as the intial laws of nature, he proceeded to hook up with those in control of the Interstate Amusement Company, the corporation of Western Vaudeville Managers, and got from them the vaudeville franchise, which is now in his name. In other words, this vaudeville booking office sends their acts to J. Frank Head instead of to the Princess Theatre. Now, when the Princess owners broke the news to Mr. Head that they intended to keep that theatre open all summer he asked them in a casual sort of way where they were going to get their vaudeville acts and informed them a moment later in reply to their look of blank amazement, as the truth began to dawn, that he had decided to place vaudeville at the Airdome, cancel the stock company bookings, and see if open air vaudeville would not also take. Can you imagine the session? The net result is that the Airdrome will take the Princess vaudeville, unless the Interstate Company goes back on Mr. Head and transfers the franchise he now holds to the Princess owners. Otherwise the latter will have to look around for another booking agency. Mr. Head is also the manager of the Auditorium Theatre. In case of rain at the Airdrome, he has announced that he will switch his vaudeville to that place, and thereby will not disappoint his patrons. What of the next winter season? Mr. Head states that if he is not the manager of the Princess—and there is likely to be a new man in charge there as manager—that he will continue to run vaudeville in the Auditorium Theatre, turning it into a Hippodrome, the biggest and best acts on the market, and all for ten cents. The "hats are in the ring" and we await the outcome of this managerial carnage with breathless interest.

And now for our worthy sheriff; I have stated some time since that Harry Hale has transferred his interests to the summer theatre at Whittington Park, because of the fact that he is busy putting up a new house on the site of the old on Central avenue. Well, Harry thought that, since every other amusement was running at the park, and since the place was "wide open," that it would be no more than right to give a picture show on Sunday. Ten feet away a shooting gallery was doing a nice business. Further on the Merry-go-round was grinding out its dizzy whirl. The ice cream and "pop" foundry was flourishing, and across the track the Dip-the-Dip was doing a land office business. However, Harry didn't want all the receipts, so he arranged with William G. Maurice, the well known banker and bathhouse promoter, who is also President of the United Charities, to accept a share of the proceeds, leaving him only his daily expenses. After that was deducted the United Charities took everything else.

It was a neat arrangement, and there didn't seem to be anything wrong, but the sheriff heard of the picture show being open and, accompanied by several deputies, he hied himself thither and gave as fine an exemplification, illustration and specification of discrimination as this nation has witnessed in many moons. Picture shows on Sunday have been the thorn in the side of the reform administration. He told Mr. Hale that he would have to close up. Mr. Hale informed Sheriff Hale that he didn't think it was right and flashed the Maurice epistle. The sheriff wasn't there to engage in a perusal of correspondence but to enforce the law. He had to talk a little loud for there was a Sunday baseball game running only a short distance away, but the sheriff couldn't see that. The result was that the operator and Mr. Hale were hauled before Justice of the Peace Joe Alford. No sooner did one operator leave than another took his place and the show went on. Manager Hale thinks he can win this case and will demand a trial by jury. Remember, dear, gentle reader, that the picture shows were the only thing molested—that it was the only violation of the Sunday law that the sheriff observed and that this move is prosecution, not persecution. Help!

Manager Sidney M. Nutt, of the New Central Theatre, being desirous of encouraging the "city beautiful" idea, has announced that his intention of co-operating with those in charge of this movement, and when the wide-awake clubwomen learned of this they told Sidney that he might give them the receipts for the day they specify. Sidney told them to "specify." They did. It was Tuesday. The crowd was big. The receipts looked big, and the paving on Central "may" be fixed.

Again I rise to interrogate the Imp Company in general and my friend King Baggot in particular. Oh, you King, what has become of the Hot Springs pictures? Here we have been waiting and waiting and then waited some more. Dost know that Frank Gould, who conversed with you so friendly when you were going to your "bawth" and the camera man was busy, wants a copy of that reel? Verily, he hath written to the Business Men's League asking where he could invest in a print of the same. And what could we tell him? Nix on the copy, for we had not seen it ourselves. Honest, King, was that all "bull," or where in the name of all that is patient, are the pictures. You have your good friend, John Barnett, doing handsprings every time anyone mentions the Hot Springs pictures. The reason for all this excitement is the fact that the people of this city saw the Lubin reel concerning Jacksonville and the two German comedians who visited that city, and they are most anxious that Hot Springs also get on the map through the medium of motion photography. You know, King, we have a habit out here of tearing our shirt on anything that looks good for the town. Barnett tells me he sent you a copy of my "Stroller's Dope." Hasten, lad, hasten, we pray thee. Make a noise like real activity and let us have those pictures, please.

The local Moose, four hundred strong, invaded the Airdome Friday night, when the Jack Hutchinson Company, in which there are four Moose, gave the local lodge a benefit. This is the last stock company to play there this season, as the vaudeville will hold the stage beginning next Monday. The company had a typical Moose bill, too, entitled, "Are You a Moose?" and the local members sure made things merry while it was on. The lodge requested yours truly to get back in harness and play the lead that night, but I had to side-step the proposition, as it would have involved too much study and my other work made that impossible. A neat sum was realized from the benefit, which will help some where the delegation to the national convention is concerned.

The pictures here the past week were all excellent. There were some reels that seemed a little overdrawn, and there was one feature that was both "cussed" and praised. Solax, for the time and work you put in getting into that pictorial "Sewer" you deserve credit, only the next time select a more worthy subject, please. The things that were shown there were a disgrace to the moving picture industry, yet its very rottenness made it a great picture. That is quite a paradox, 'tis true, yet such was the case. It was a stupendous production, but the things it brought to light should have come under the jurisdiction of the sanitary commission and not a clean, moral and elevating moving picture company.

There were any number of excellent independent pictures here the past week, Thanhouser and the American companies leading, while Vitagraph and Biograph held first interest where the trust product was shown.

THE MAN IN THE BATHS.

Manufacturers' Synopses of Films

ON THE STROKE OF FIVE
Thanhouser Release, June 11

There was nothing particularly romantic about her love story. She was a poor girl and had two suitors, both humble workingmen. The man she chose was the more worthy of the two, and loved her fondly. The other man, a brutish individual of ungovernable passions, became involved in an altercation with his foreman and savagely attacked him. Through the efforts of the successful suitor he was captured and sent to State's Prison for a long term.

When the prisoner was set free, eight years later, his first desire was to find the woman he loved and the man he hated. With very little difficulty he located them, for they had married and settled down in the quarter where they had lived most of their lives. The ex-convict rejoiced to find that his foe had met with an accident, was helplessly paralyzed, and while he still lived, could not move nor speak; only his eyes showed that he was alive.

Calling at the tiny cottage, the convict gloated over his foe, but was careful to conceal his feelings from the wife. In the presence of her or her little daughter, he was the sadly sympathetic friend. When alone with the helpless man, he gloated over him, and whispered insults into his ear. The invalid was unable to retort or complain, he could only gaze at the man, and wish that his strength might come back so that he could defend himself.

The convict found that his love for the woman still existed, and he proposed that she elope with him. She rejected his advances with scorn, and his love turned to hate. He brooded over what he regarded as his wrongs and planned a fiendish revenge.

He called at the house, pretending great friendship, and presented the little girl with a music box. She was delighted, and the mother was also pleased. Then while the two were playing with the new toy, the convict tiptoed over to the paralytic and whispered to him that the music box really contained an infernal machine, and that it had been cunningly set by clockwork to go off on the stroke of five. Then he pointed to the clock, which marked fifteen minutes of the hour, bid a pleasant farewell to the family he designed to destroy, and departed.

The woman and the child suspected nothing wrong; the man who knew was powerless to say anything. He suffered mortal agony as time passed on, and he was unable to warn them. Finally his little daughter came over to "cheer up poor papa," and noticed his intense gaze. He looked from her to her blocks, which were on the table at his elbow. The two had often "played spelling." The girl would speak a word, then hold up blocks. When she picked the right letter, the man would blink his eyes, and the little girl knew how to spell many words, having learned it in this unique way.

This pastime was now put to a stern use, and the man supposed to be helpless, was able to convey the warning. The woman hurled the bomb from the window in time, and it rolled down the steep hill to the feet of the ex-convict, who was waiting there for the explosion that meant the death of three innocent people. He had no time to escape, and the fate he had meant for others became the frightful death that Providence dealt him.

THE NIGHT CLERK'S NIGHTMARE
Thanhouser Release, June 14

He was the night clerk in a country hotel, and his one dream was of the time when he could wed the head waitress (she was also the only one) and they would own a little hotel of their very own. Under these circumstances the clerk was indignant when a drummer, one of the guests, paid marked attention to the girl. She was flattered by the compliments of this man of the world, and temporarily forgot all about the poor clerk, who, like a certain patent medicine, "works while others sleep."

The drummer, having the evening to spare, decided to go to the "opera house," (what would country opera houses do without drummers?) and being a sociable creature, asked the waitress to accompany him. She gladly accepted the invitation, and they strolled out toward the theatre, leaving the clerk to his tasks, which were few, and his thoughts of vengence, which were many.

Night clerks in country hotels usually receive small pay, partially because they generally sleep while on duty. This particular clerk was a faithful follower of the precepts of his order, and despite his sorrowful thoughts he dropped off to sleep before the stove.

In his dreams he followed the couple to the "opera house," just as a terrible fire broke out. The drummer was a coward, and would have left the girl to perish, had it not been for the brave clerk, who did a heroic bit of rescue work. The girl was led off in safety, and the drummer perished in the flames, BUT——

When the clerk had taken the girl back to the hotel, the dainty drummer trailed along, as spick and span as ever, and firmly led his partner away again.

The night clerk's nightmare led him into astonishing adventures, and he disposed of his rival in many novel ways, one by throwing him into the Whirlpool Rapids at Niagara Falls, a stream which no swimmer can navigate. Still, nothing phased the drummer, he was a persistent chap, in the dream.

The poor night clerk tossed and snorted and gurgled. Finally, just as the police arrested him for a series of crimes, he woke up. The girl and the drummer returned from the theatre, the drummer paid his bill, took his grips and departed to catch a midnight train, and the girl went up to her room, first stopping to blow a kiss to her fellow-employee and admirer. Then the clerk realized that it had all been a dream, and that the drummer was really a fine chap, did not love the girl, but simply was killing time between trains.

He also realized that the girl loved him, and he was happy, but his terrible experience spoiled his sleep for the rest of the time that he was on duty, which showed that his experiences made a profound impression on him.

WHY TOM SIGNED THE PLEDGE

Deacon Prim is as prim as his name, and a shining light in the cause of temperance. His son Tom, however, thinks along different lines. The deacon tries without success to get Tom to sign the pledge.

One evening Tom goes out with some of his fast friends, while the deacon attends a temperance meeting and is quite the star of the evening. On his way home, however, the deacon has the misfortune to fall, and break his eyeglasses. He also gets his clothing rather dirty.

As he blunders along the street, half blind, he meets with one disaster after another. He bumps into a lamp post, blackening his eye. Robbers despoil him of his belongings, and smash his hat. A man against whom he stumbles beat him. Finally a friendly drunken man pours a gallon of whiskey over him. So when the deacon arrives home, he looks as if he had been having a very gay night. His explanations are received with scorn, and his wife insists that he sign the pledge, which he finally does.

But good comes out of evil, for Tom is so affected by his father's supposed fall from grace that he signs the pledge himself, being sure that he will never want to drink again, after seeing his father in such an awful state.

MICKY'S PAL
Solax Release, June 12

After serving out their three-year sentence, Micky and his pal, Tom, are released from prison. Micky goes back to his former manner of living and tries to induce Tom to do likewise. Tom, however, is tired of an underworld existence and determines to be "straight." Hence he breaks with Micky and they both pursue different paths.

Tom finds employment with good folks, and gets along nicely, until one day while out walking with his sweetheart (the maid servant in the house where he is employed) he meets Micky. Anxious to forget his past and to avoid making explanations to his sweetheart, Tom snubs his former pal.

Micky decides to fix him. He goes back to his hovel and writes an anonymous letter informing Tom's employers that Tom is an ex-convict. Tom, after his outing, comes home feeling sorry that he snubbed Micky. He writes him a letter apologizing and encloses some money. Tom's employers disregard the letter which Micky has written; however, their suspicions are aroused, and so they decide to test Tom's honesty. Before going to the opera, they place on a dresser within sight of Tom an imitation pearl necklace worth fifteen cents.

Micky, who is "laying for" Tom, goes to the house that very night and steals the imitation pearl necklace. This happens about the time Tom's employers return from the opera. Tom is near their auto smoking a pipe. He is watching the car while the chauffeur is having a drink. Thus employed, Tom sights an object skulking in the backyard. He hides as the object approaches the car. Then when he recognizes Micky, he makes a spring for him and demands an explanation. Micky shows fight. During the struggle, Tom's pipe lands in the car and sets it on fire.

Tom's employers confront him and, although he explains, they are not satisfied. His record is against him. They have him discharged.

Micky returns home and finds Tom's letter of apology and the money enclosed. He is full of remorse and returns and straightens things out for Tom.

THE GREAT DISCOVERY
Solax Release, June 14

An old scientist is at work perfecting a "child incubator." He engages a young chemist as his assistant. The young chemist is attracted by the scientist's daughter. While the old man is busy with his scientific conferences and research work, the young pair go off and get married. A year later finds the scientist still at his labors, while his daughter in the meanwhile gives birth to a baby. The absent-minded and eccentric scientist is kept in ignorance of the circumstances. His son-in-law one day gets an idea. He places his baby in the old man's incubator and when the scientist discovers the crowning glory of his work he takes the kid and run off to spread the glad news to his associates of the scientific research societies—a superannuated collection of old fogies.

When the wife discovers that her baby is gone she grows frantic and naturally her young husband runs off to the scientific conference to rescue his offspring. He is of a diabolical turn and decides to scare the scientists by substituting a monkey for the baby. He succeeds splendidly. The film is a roar from beginning to end.

PRESIDENTIAL POSSIBILITIES
Imp Release, June 8

On June 8 the Imp Films Company release a unique record of the Presidential campaign. The three most picturesque figures in the contest are shown. These three are unquestionably Theodore Roosevelt, William H. Taft and Senator La Follette of Wisconsin.

In one part of the picture Roosevelt is seen vigorously talking against Mr. Taft. In another part Mr. Roosevelt is shown by himself addressing a crowd; while in yet another section of the film Mr. Taft has the field to himself.

Then Senator La Follette is shown with his characteristic smile of self-confidence. Governor Wilson, of Trenton, N. J., presents an austere appearance to the camera, while last and possibly not least, Champ Clark, the Speaker and possible Democratic nominee, is also depicted, minus, however, the celebrated "Dawg."

In view of the enormous interest that is attaching to the Presidential election in all parts of the world, tbis exceedingly interesting film will no douht prove a strong drawing card in all the Independent theatres in the country.

HOW SHORTY WON OUT
Imp Release, June 15

This is a story of college life in which the demon of jealousy enters into the academical life of the students. The various scenes are actually taken in and around a collegiate building and an idea is given of the lighter side of life that is led in high grade educational centers.

Shorty, like all fresbmen, is compelled to perform many little services for the sophmores, juniors and the seniors of his college, and while serving one of his classmates, he meets charming Betty Rossmore, and immediately falls in love with her.

His bliss is not of long duration, bowever, as his upper classmates force him to introduce them to the pretty girl, and then he is left out in tbe cold. A junior promenade hall is to be given from which poor Sborty, heing only a freshmen, is harred. Six students invite Betty to this affair, while Shorty invites her to a dinner.

Betty, hoping to have some fun, accepts each and every invitation. The six, one after another, drive up in their automohiles and enter the house. Such looks are exchanged as each comes into the room. Finally, Betty appears, shaking with suppressed laugbter. Then Shorty walks in on the scene, and triumphantly leads Betty from the room and house; they enter his auto and speed away.

The disappointed hoys, however, have a mix-up on the pavement, to decide who shall escort Betty, not realizing she has vanished with Shorty. A policeman is called, and the six are bundled into a patrol wagon and hurried off to jail. There they meditate on the perversity of woman, while Betty and Shorty are enjoying their dinner.

BULL FIGHT IN NUEVO LAREDO, MEX.

On the occasion of Washington's Birthday, which was celebrated in Laredo, Texas, in February, there was included among the festivities at Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, just across the border, a hull fight, which was very largely attended by tbose who took part in the celebration. The various scenes attendant upon this form of sport as shown in the picture bave no trace of cruelty or brutality.

Two or three sturdy hulls are turned into the ring and beset hy the nimble picadors, matadors and others whose duty it is to irritate the animal and escape risk of assault by bis horns.

The picture is vivid in the extreme but stops short of actual carnage, althougb in one part of it the hull is seen in the last extremity of his life. But there is nothing degrading or revolting in the picture, which is of a very sporting nature and illustrates the natural pastime of some Latin countries.

LET NO MAN PUT ASUNDER
Imp Release, June 13

Drink is fastening its arms around Frank Downing; he has broken promise after promise made to his wife to reform and she, in despair, appeals to a friend, who endeavors to persuade her to leave him and accept a position as teacher in the village school in a distant part of the state. One night Downing comes home helpless, having spent his week's wages for drink, and there is no food in the bouse for Edna and tbe hoy, Tommy. This decides the question and Edna and the little hoy leave the degraded man, to go forth into the world and earn their living.

Upon arriving in the village, where her school is located, Edna meets and inquires the way of John Stevens. He is a widower and is devoted to his little Doris, to whom be is hoth mother and father. Through this chance meeting a friendship is established between Edna and John, which grows stronger and stronger as time passes, until John discovers that he loves her very dearly, and asks her to be his wife. Edna then admits her love and confides her story to him. He is willing to wait until she can secure a divorce.

During vacation Edna and Tommy return to their old home town, and here she secures her freedom. And now queer fate enters the picture. While she is away, a man, a wreck and practically a tramp, is arrested in tbe village and tries to dispose of some carpenter's tools, which are recognized as heing the property of John Stevens. The man is Downing. He is taken to Steven's shop in order that the tools may be identified. Downing makes an appeal to Stevens—the appeal of desperation, and John, who is touched, saves the man from the law's grasp by stating he is a new workman whom he has just employed.

Downing is put to work and Stevens helps him to fight his curse. Finally, he is reclaimed and becomes a man in fact.

Edna returns to the village, full of hope, and Stevens, still ignorant of the relations that once existed between her and the man he has saved, is awaiting her with all a true lover's impatience. Edna enters the shop, and comes face to face with Frank. And thus does John learn the truth. The situation appals all—all but John, a man who knew his God and knowing Him abided His will. He joins their hands, saying, "Whom God Hath Joined Together, Let No Man Put Asunder." Downing, with the past before him, refuses the sacrifice and endeavors to leave, but John stops him. "It is God's Will," he says, and the reunited husband and wife pass out of his life together.

NOTHING SHALL BE HIDDEN

Imp Release, June 10

Fred Langdon, a young inventor, has a sweetheart, Lillian Stanhope, who returns his affections, but there is parental objection. Fred is poor and Mr. Stanhope has ambitious schemes for marrying his daughter to a man of present wealth and position rather than to one whose wealth and position are probably still in the making. So he parts the young people.

However, Fred is assiduous in his work and in the course of it makes one or two important scientific discoveries with regard to transmission of sound and light waves. Calling up his still loyal sweetheart, he makes the discovery that at that moment Mr. Stanhope's house is being ramsacked by burglars. So he calls up the police station and the burglars are captured. Fred makes his discovery in virtue of the fact that he could hear what was taking place in the room, although there was no direct telegraph connection.

The burglars having been captured, Mr. Stanhope, becoming aware of Fred's usefulness in the matter, offers to buy an interest in the invention, but the young lover told him nothing short of his daughter's hand would buy any part of it. Mr. Stanhope, anxious to get in on the marvelous invention, and realizing that his daughter was more than willing to trust herself to Fred Langdon, gave his consent to the union.

THE HALF-BREED'S WAY

Nestor Release, June 3

David Miller, a Western farmer, is betrothed to Marie Mantell, an Eastern girl. He is addicted to drink and his constant imbibing of whiskey brutalizes his nature. He goes East and marries Marie, bringing her to a desolate Western farm. He continues drinking and his young wife suffers much cruelty at his hands. A half-breed cowboy, who is employed on the ranch, becomes devoted to her to the extent of protecting her at crucial moments when the farmer, in a drunken state, threatens to strike her. Phillip Hall, an Easterner, comes West for his health and is given work by Miller. He is hurt in a roundup and nursed by Marie. He is a ray of light in her desolate life and the Easterner's heart is full of pity for the young wife. David goes on a drunken rampage and destroys Marie's little garden, which she has nurtured tenderly. When she remonstrates with him, he menaces her life. The half-breed again puts himself between them and David knocks him to the ground, kicking him as he lays there. The half-breed picks himself up and the sight of the weeping woman makes him swear Indian vengeance. Getting a rifle, he follows the farmer, who had mounted his horse and ridden away, and shoots him. Miller falls near Phillip, who has been reading in the woods, and when his calls bring the sheriff and his men, he is accused of the crime. The half-breed has returned to the house and when the sheriff stops at Miller's ranch with his prisoner, the half-breed maintains an Indian stolidity until Marie and Phillip, in the stress of the situation, divulge their love for each other. He confesses it was he that killed the farmer and makes a dash for liberty, with the posse in chase. They gain on him when a shot rings out. The half-breed prefers death at his own hands rather than give himself into the hands of the law.

THE MOUNTAIN DAISY

Nestor Release, June 5

Jack Spencer, a tenderfoot photographer, arrives on the stage-coach and the next day meets Daisy Layson, while he is out taking pictures. The young people are mutually attracted but Mr. Layson has already selected Bert Howard as his prospective son-in-law and will not give his consent to his daughter's marriage with Jack.

The young people plan to elope. Their plans, however, are overheard by Bert, who hastens to Mr. Layson and acquaints him of the fact. Jack has become a favorite with the boys and the stage-driver in particular, so when the young people tell him that they expect the old man to give chase, the driver at once promises to help them. Accordingly, he writes a note to the sheriff as follows: "Sheriff Carter: —I expect to be held up between here and Elveda by two men well known to you. Send posse quick, as I have a very valuable package aboard. Jim Ruskin." He sends the note post haste and the sheriff and his men at once respond, overtaking Mr. Layson and Bert just as they reach the stage-coach. Greatly to the amusement of the passengers, who are in on the joke, the sheriff and his men hustle father and rejected suitor off to prison until Daisy and Jack are safely made one.

THE RANCH GIRL'S CHOICE

Nestor Release, June 7

While Bess, the ranch owner's daugbter, is on her way to town, her horse goes lame. Bud, a wandering cowboy, happens along at this moment and takes a stone out of the borse's hoof. The girl hands him a flower which Tom, the foreman of her father's ranch, had given her. They part; the girl to go to town; the boy to go on his way looking for work. He stops at a sign reading: "Cowboys wanted at the Circle K Ranch." On arriving at the ranch, the foreman takes a dislike to him, recognizing the flower the boy is wearing as the one he had given Bess. The owner of the ranch, however, likes the boy's looks and engages him, much to the dissatisfaction of the foreman.

Bess returns home and is delighted to find the young puncher employed on her fatber's ranch. The foreman, observing the growing friendship between Bud and the girl, makes Bud's lot a hard one, calling him down whenever an opportunity presents itself and finally discharges him. Bess' father, when he hears of this action, re-engages the boy and discharges the foreman instead. Three other cowboys on the ranch, friends of the foreman, threaten to leave unless the ranch owner takes the foreman back, but the ranchman is obdurate and the four men ride off, threatening vengeance.

A week later, as the boy is returning from the bank with money for the payroll, he is seen by one of the ex-foreman's friends and the news is carried to the foreman at the Lone Tree saloon. They arrange to hold up the boy and give the ranch owner the impression that the boy has stolen it. Taking a short cut, they head Bud off and he is taken to an old hut, where he is bound and thrown into a corner while the men play cards and drink.

In the meanwhile, the ranch owner is becoming anxious at the prolonged absence of Bud and sends the new foreman to the bank to see what is causing the delay. The foreman comes back to the ranch with the news that the boy left the bank hours ago. The owner orders all his men out to find Bud, accompanied by Bess. Coming to the cross roads, the girl decides to go the other way alone and comes to the hut. Looking through the window she sees the men, and hastens to the cowboys. They follow her to the hut and Bud is released, while the men are taken to the sheriff's office. On returning home, the father of Bess gives his consent to the marriage of his daughter to Bud.

WAS HE A SUFFRAGETTE?

Republic Release, June 11

Mrs. Green and Mrs. Bibbs, two dyed-in-the-wool suffragettes are all aflutter over the coming suffragette parade, and are causing no end of trouble to their respective husbands by insisting that they participate in the parade and thus show their loyalty to the cause. Both women are typical "Amazons," and while Mr. Green is a normal-sized man and well able to take care of himself in spite of his wife's pugilistic tendencies, poor Bibbs is not so fortunate, as he measures a little over four feet and weighs but 110 pounds, while his wife tips the scale at 230. Like all little men, Bibbs is quite sure he can control his wife and make her do as he pleases. To prove his strength of will, he wagers $100 with Green that he will not parade with the suffragettes in spite of his wife's demands.

The day of the parade arrives. Green, like a wise fellow, has disappeared from town on pretense of business. Bibbs decided to stay at home and show his wife that he was boss. Imagine his great surprise when Mrs. Bibbs insisted that he join the paraders and when moral persuasion proved futile, the weaker sex grabbed Mr. Bibbs by his collar and in this humiliating position he was compelled to not only walk through the streets, but also join the parade of suffragettes up Fifth avenue, and what was more humilitating, when his spouse became tired of the struggle, there were plenty of volunteers to help her. The next day in his office poor Bibbs silently paid over $100 to Green.

A SHADOW OF THE PAST

Republic Release, June 15

Bess Brinkley is left an orphan at an early age, and but for an uncle, who has gone to the great West, is left alone in the world. Betrayed by a man whom she loved, she gradually becomes a partner in crime of famous pickpockets. Her early training finally gets her disgusted with the life she is leading, and when a home is offered to her by the long-lost uncle, who has returned a prosperous man, she gladly gives up the old life and starts anew.

She meets a handsome young foreman of the fire department, and is not averse to his attentions, so different from the attentions of the men in the underworld. Eventually, she marries the young fireman, who finally becomes chief of the department.

No cloud mars the happiness of the young couple until one eventful day a former companion of Bess's underworld acquaintances appears and hovers like a shadow in the vicinity of her home, seeking an opportunity to rob it. He finally breaks in and is interrupted in his work by Bess. The mutual recognition brings on a frightful struggle during which a disastrous fire occurs. Bess beats the man into insensibility and makes her escape from the burning building. After escaping, her conscience troubles her, when she thinks of the unconscious body lying amidst the flames, and she plunges into the fiery furnace to rescue him. In the meantime, the fire alarm has been given in the fire station, and when the chief learns that the fire is at his home, he becomes frenzied and taking the whip from the driver's hands, lashes the horses unmercifully, urging them into a maddening speed. The other drivers, seeing their chief in this state, urge their horses with voice and whip and in a little time they arrive at the fire, hook their hose in record-breaking time, and follow their chief into the burning building. None too soon, the unconscious bodies of the chief's wife and the stranger are rescued from the fire, as the flames have eaten into the entire structure.

When the wife gains consciousness, she explains to her husband the cause of the fire, not disclosing the identity of the stranger, who, after his recovery, calls upon the chief's wife to thank her for saving his life, at the same time assuring her that in the future he will follow the straight and narrow path. His action throughout conveys that he never met her before, and the shadow of the past is, therefore, dispelled.

THE DIAMOND PATH

Rex Release, June 4

It isn't always strategy that detects crime, and it isn't always strategy and skill. It's strategy, skill and courage; and sacrifice and sincerity; and stubborn strength. Mighty qualities! In this instance there was a quantity of each, besides a few others that have no real names.

There's something brave and bold and individual about the name Dorothy—so that's her name. Dorothy happened to be a reporter, and a reporter always happens to be where things are happening. That's why she's connected with the tale.

Her landlady happened to have a daughter who happened to be the maid of an heiress.

There were two impecunious scions of society. To be accurate, they were impoverished. They couldn't make any money, so the next thing to do was to get some anyhow. They didn't waste scruples on the exact method of obtaining the necessary. The Diamond Path looked not so worse to them.

They conceived the kind idea of convincing their social friends that paste was just about the same as diamonds, settling the argument by substituting the bogus for the genuine stones. However, one of their victimized friends was not entirely convinced—and the maid was accused.

WRITTEN IN BLOOD

Here's an appropriate subject for your glorious Fourth. The most stirring two-reel sensation ever offered. A real red story full of real red, live blood. Seething and surging with the tempestuous spirit of fiery revolution, imprisonment, revenge and terror. THE MOST GLORIOUS FILM OF BATTLE-FIRE EVER MADE.

Remember the maid? Her mother, with fears and tears, told Dorothy all about it and then a few sentences. Dorothy determined to detect the real thieves and exonerate the girl.

Diamonds, grit, cowardice, cruelty, criminality, bravery, the heart of a determined girl, vindictiveness, vindication, just deserts and gratitude play the leading part in the rest of the story. Dorothy and honesty triumph, and the end of the gentlemen thieves and the story are simultaneous.

THE PRICE OF PEACE
Rex Release, June 6

She was dying. Already Beyond was near. Her spirit was approaching the afterwards. Her soul was hovering on the far shore. Her mind was soaring in millions of miles of mysterious space. Her eyes were bright with the light of a great distant glory, and her face was radiant with the awful wonder of a far-away splendor. All but a fraction of her had already left the planet. With a brave effort she turned her face to her husband and sweetheart, to whom she was more than all, to whom she meant life and its purpose and the noble things that alone justify breathing. Feebly her trembling lips whispered, "It is cold." The icy finger of the skeleton with the scythe had already touched the body that was his forfeit. Into the man's eyes came a hard glint, the light of battle. His grief declared war against the invincible antagonist whose every defeat is but transient, whose victories are eternal. Night was descending upon the world, a beautiful night; a peaceful night to die—a glorious one to live. Again she turned to him. "It is dark," she murmured. Tenderly he kissed the faded lips and lighted the candle. And as the flame flickered in the shadows, a burning sermon on the evanescence of mundane mortality, her soul traversed the cosmos and found its refuge.

She was dead. With her had withered all the accumulated hopes and tender plans of youth and love. With her had died all of himself but his body. His being was minus.

He tried to forget, but memory was stubborn and cruel. Always he would see her in his tortured mind, with the tender smile of old on her lips and the soft glow in her eyes—and in desperate abandon, he would curse death. He wooed the silence, but always the stillness whispered her name. He sought the companionship of friends, but above the chorus of merry voices he heard the mourning wail of his heart! He devoted himself to business, but amid the Babel of babble in the mercenary mart, soft, and low, over and over and ever and ever, like the voice of an anguished soul crying in night and blight, he heard the call of his lost loved one.

Then he met the Devil. Bright lights, wanton women, careless kisses, vice embraced in the arms of sin, a carnival of corruption, a feast of folly—he came within a few hours of Hell. But stronger than the evil and the devil in him was the memory, casting its halo over the hollow haunts of hell—and the memory triumphed.

One day, his soul pitying the pathetic burden of his heart, it whispered a message of its immortality, the promise of reunion in the eternal sequel, and, eager and impatient, he went to meet her. He went to the country, and in the lonesome woods his lonely longing sought release. Revolver in hand, he was ready to send that which would remain and live after what had been he was dead across the oceans of space to the shores of eternity, where she was waiting. Twilight was mantling the earth with its soft veil. A few monks from the nearby monastery were walking through the woods, communing with their Master. They met him. His story was told and heard—and they offered him the peace that hides and abides. He entered the house of God, peace entered his heart, and a song sang in his soul.

On the precipice he found the price of peace!

BELLS OF PARADISE
Gaumont Release, June 20

Francesca Teresina, the beautiful daughter of a rich Florentine patrician, has been low for many months. In fact, there has been practically no improvement in her condition at all and the doctor deems it best to advise her family of her impending death. The last chill months of the Italian winter are fleeting rapidly hy when the physician announces these palling words upon the anxious and saddened family: "Excepting a miracle, she will not hear the bells at Easter." The Teresina home is cast in the most pitiable gloom, which soon claims and dispirits every member of the household. The mother spends every idle moment that she can at the Cathedral praying for the recovery of her loved one or kneeling at her bedside.

Sandrino, Francesca's brother, a year or two her senior, is sorrowfully troubled at the grievous outlook and broods unceasingly o'er his sadness. One evening, while passing through the courtyard, he chanced to meet Benedetta, his sweetheart, and unhurdens his tale of woe upon this gentle, sympathetic creature, who in girlhood had spent many days together with the dying girl and now that they have both grown up to women, still persists in her devoted friendship. The sad intelligence that Francesca can not live is shared equally in sorrow and pain by Benedetta, who had hoped to be united closer to her girl companion through her likely marriage to Sandrino. The situation proves too tragic for the faithful little sweetheart and after thinking out many plans of saving her comrade, finally decides to give up her chance of marriage and vows if only Francesca be spared to hear the bells of Easter, that she will enter the convent of San Felice and become a nun. At the same time she communicates her oath to her lover, who, loyal as she is to his sister, is nevertheless still more sorely grieved, inasmuch as now whichever way the matter turns he must necessarily suffer a forfeit. Should Francesca recover, he must then lose Benedetta, or if the Almighty allow him Benedetta, then it must be at the loss of his own dear sister. Poor Sandrino is most completely unhappy and ponders inconsolahly upon either terrible alternative. He is the epitome of misery.

As Easter approaches, the Teresinas have found great reason to rejoice. Francesca is regaining her health at a rapid and unpredicted rate, which delights both her parents and the anxious doctor. But, alas, Sandrino alone is disconsolate. The delicate, convalescing sister is sorely puzzled at Sandrino's perpetual sadness. She recalls the fondness and affection with which he always regarded her and cannot explain his present more than indifference. She is completely baffled, hut determines to discover the cause at all costs.

That night she tosses very restlessly on her bed, watching every moment for the first opportunity to escape from the vigil of her nurse. The occasion presents itself during the dampest hours of early morning and Francesca, in her eagerness, steals from her covers, and clad only in her nightrobe, invades the room of her hrother, where she discovers a letter from Benedetta explaining to Sandrino her vow to become a nun if his sister he spared her life. The revelation completely upsets the weakening Francesca and she hastens to the warm covering of her hed only after suffering fatal attacks of chills.

The next day is Easter—the morning bursts forth in all its glory—the golden sun fairly leaps with resplendence in the sky—hirds warhle a harmonious chorus in honor of the day that marks the anniversary of the rising of our Saviour and the Easter bells peal forth their tuneful anthems of praise and jubilation. So well has the patient been of late and so steady her improvement that the Teresina family, mother and son, enter the chamber of Francesca to hid the greetings of the holy day.

They hope to take her to the cathedral to worship. Noticing that she is not awake they cautiously cover her bed with Easter lilies, ferns and Italian Spring flowers, taking care not to disturb her placid sleep, but—alack—the horror! The mother discovers her daughter's body a deathly cold—she feels her pulse—it beats not. Her breath has stopped. She is dead.

The doctor is called. He examines the hapless body, but its life has fled—Francesca is no more. The miserable Sandrino is prostrated. He opens the shades to allow the sun to stream into the room of death. This discloses the bells in yon belfry, swaying to and fro, pealing their Easter morning song, but Francesca hears them not. Their notes are changed from joy to dolor. The Teresinas have suffered an irreparable loss.

"CAMILLE"

Champion Release, June 10 (2 Reels)

The story of Camille is quite a familiar one to those who are informed in things theatrical. It has been a household word whenever the drama has been discussed and has been played in nearly every theatre of importance in America. The locale of the story is in France and the characters of the nobility as well as those of the half world who live by their wits. Camille is a woman who belongs to the latter class and her associates are of the Bohemian sort, actors, painters and literary folk, and her male friends are an old Duke, who showers money on her, and a Count, who is her escort to places of amusement.

Camille is beautiful, accomplished, and at the period of the opening of the story, is satiated with pleasure and her better nature asserts itself. She longs for something genuine: a love that is good and pure. Armand du Val is the son of a nobleman and theirs is an old and honored family. He sees Camille and falls in love with her, worshiping her at a distance. He calls at her house in company of a friend and the visit is most opportune. Camille has returned from the Opera with the Count and he bores her with his coarse and unwelcome attentions. Armand is introduced and his frank, manly avowal of love comes like a revelation and is sweet music to her ears. For the first time in her eventful life she loves and is deliriously happy.

There is a season of bliss for the young couple. Camille removes to the country and Armand is in constant attention until their dream is shattered. A sister of Armand is betrothed to a young nobleman and the father of the groom learns of Armand's infatuation for Camille and breaks the news to his father. Camille is induced to break with Armand so that the young couple may marry and be happy and no scandal shall mar their bliss.

Armand does not understand and Camille will not explain. Armand denounces her for a flirt when her heart is breaking. He creates a scene in a gambling house, hurling Camille from him brutally and throwing his winnings in her face. There is a duel with the Count, her former love, and Armand is exiled in disgrace. The dread disease, consumption, lays hold of Camille and she is in the throes of death with her beauty gone. Armand is summoned by his father and goes to Camille, but, alas! too late! She sees him, imprints one long loving kiss on his lips and expires in his arms.

A WESTERN CHILD'S HEROISM

Champion Release, June 12

Bill Burton, a miner, with his wife and child, the later a girl of twelve years, lives in a little log cabin in a clearing of the Blockwood Hills. One day two rustlers, Mexicans, are being chased by a posse and one of them is shot from his horse and is thought to be killed, but as the party sweeps by, he crawls into the bushes and makes his way to the cabin of the miner, Burton. The miner is just leaving when the Mexican arrives and craves shelter. At first Burton refuses this, but heeding the pleadings of his wife and child, he consents to take him in, and when the searching party passes by that way, he pretends to know nothing of the Mexican's whereabouts.

Later Burton makes a lucky strike at the diggings. He returns to his cabin elated with his find. While explaining this to his wife the Mexican overhears, but pretending to sleep he averts suspicion and sees the secreting of the gold in the chimney place. Then pretending a sudden illness, the Mexican preys on the sympathy of the miner and the latter sets off to secure a doctor. Immediately, finding the coast clear, he makes ready to rob his benefactor. The miner's wife coming in unexpectedly on the scene a deadly struggle ensues. Dorothy, the daughter, now takes a hand and securing the villian's gun she forces him to desist from his fell purpose. He goes off, with maledictions on his lips.

He soon makes good his threats, for he enlists the services of a number of marauding Indians and they sneak upon the cabin. Luckily the child discovers their approach. A fight then begins and the miner and his faithful wife fire with deadly effect on their enemies. The Indians now prepare to set the cabin on fire. In the meantime the child climbs up the chimney, and, stealing a horse from among the bunch tethered by the Indians, she makes off for assistance. The fire now rages without the cabin and pretty soon the inmates will be consumed, but at this juncture on dash the cowboys led by the young heroine, Dorothy. The Indians are driven off, the family is saved, and in the meantime the Mexican is captured.

THOSE WERE HAPPY DAYS

Powers Release, June 12

It is Spring time and the flowers are in bloom and the woods and fields look inviting. Willie and Margery find the school room hot and stuffy and they do not wish to pursue their studies. Their parents intervene and they start to school with clean faces but with rebellious spirits. On the way they stumble over a can of black paint. Margery has an inspiration and they act on it. They will feign illness in order to avoid going to school. The little girl proposes that they decorate their faces to indicate they are afflicted with measles. To think is to act and they are soon tatooed in a manner to strike consternation to any one beholding them. They wander into the school room, take their seats and soon attract the attention of the fussy old pedagogue. He examines their faces by the aid of a magnifying glass and is frigbtened. He hastily dismisses school, admonishing the other children to flee for their lives. He rusbes to the huddle and seeks the services of a doctor. The parents of the children are notified and a general hunt for Willie and Margery is instituted. The children wander away to a cool and sequestered spot and are enjoying themselves eating a sumptuous lunch when the party descends upon them, timid and apprehensive of being afflicted with the contagious disease. The parents are griefstricken and boldly approach and take the schemers in their arms. The paint rubs off by contact with their clothing and the ruse is discovered. Willie and Margery are soundly spanked and the procession of villagers wind their way homewards, filled with resentment.

And on the same reel:

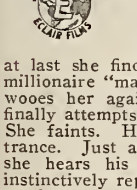
VIEWS OF THE HUDSON VALLEY

Showing pictures of quaint and picturesque scenes and historical points of interest. This section is rich in scenic splendor and students will recognize many points of interest of which they have read and which have furnished important material for the chroniclers of history.

ITALIAN FRIENDSHIP
Powers Release, June 15

Tony is an Italian laborer whose household is presided over by his sister Rosa. At breakfast Tony complains of feeling ill, but resolutely goes to his work. Guido is looking for employment and applies to the foreman over the gang with which Tony is working. He is given work and joins Tony in the task of removing heavy stones from a quarry. Rosa brings Tony's dinner and is introduced to Guido and they are mutually impressed. Tony gradually becomes fainter and stops to rest. John, the brutal foreman, appears on the scene and discharges him without pay. Tony returns home and tells his sister of his treatment and she is incensed. They debate the question and Tony leaves with only one desire—to obtain the money that is rightfully due him. He enters the office of the foreman and pays himself out of the cash drawer. Just as he is leaving the foreman steps in and—in the dim light—a fight ensues in which Tony is wounded by a knife thrust in the arm. He goes bome and his hurt is bandaged by Rosa. Guido enters just as a policeman accompanies the foreman to the cabin of Tony. Tony is accused of the theft and the foreman points to the wound on his arm. Guido takes in the situation and, noticing a knife on the table, he inflicts a wound on himself corresponding to the one on the arm of Tony. He then announces that he stole the money and engaged in the fight. The officer is in a quandary but finally settles the affair to the satisfaction of every one concerned. Tony and Guido have a feast during which the foreman broods over the occurrence and resolves to have revenge. He repairs to the hovel and, looking through the window, sees the gay party and is compelled to swallow his wrath and envy them their happiness. An intelligent dog figures in the story to lend interest.

THE HARDEST WAY
Eclair Release, June 4



Dolly, a beautiful English girl, comes to this country to obtain a position as a governess. On the dock she is swindled of every penny by two sly rascals. A young reporter and a fine old Colonel, with his spinster sister, befriend her. She goes to stop temporarily with the latter. But she is too proud to live on charity and so insists on starting forth to seek employment. Her adventures are many, but at last she finds a position in the office of a millionaire "man about town." He persistently wooes her against her maidenly rebuffs, and finally attempts to kiss her in his private office. She faints. He cowardly slips out a side entrance. Just as the girl regains consciousness she hears his private telephone ringing and instinctively replies. A message is sent for her employer to hurriedly buy all the stock of the Beryl Gold Mine, as its owner is to be bought out on trickery, with a fortune depending upon the shares. The owner happens to be the kind old Colonel, her benefactor. Dolly rushes out to warn the old gentleman some way, and finds the young reporter waiting to meet her at the door of the building. She confides her story. The reporter acts quickly. He phones the Colonel's house and learns that even now be is down town on the transaction. He orders his own broker to buy all the beryl stock possible. Then they rush downtown and intercept the Colonel just in time to prevent the sale—and to learn that the two swindlers who are trying to put the deal through are those who had robbed Dolly on the dock. Justice comes, and Dolly is adopted by the Colonel and his sister, while the reporter has made a small fortune from his own investment and it is safe to guess that he will have a wife of his own, as well.

TIT FOR TAT
Eclair Release, June 9

Two grenadiers are sent to the house of a rich peasant. They are admitted by the little girl of the house and are courteously received by the servant. She is quite pleased with them and has set the table for them. But the master does not like this. They should be served in the barn, with soup and water. To her great dislike, the servant obeys the order.

Through the window of the barn they see the master feasting with a friend.

They go into the yard, saw the boards in a little bridge which spans a stream, and then let the geese loose. They call the peasant. He runs after the geese, attempts to cross the bridge, when the boards give way and he falls into the water. Quickly the grenadiers go to the rescue. Grateful for their noble act, the peasant invites them to join him at his meal. Later, tbe peasant returns to the bridge to repair it. But what is this? A board is sawed! Ah, the deceitful rascals. The peasant understands all now. Now is his chance to laugh! Craftily he puts the boards back without fastening them and in a friendly manner calls the grenadiers. Not suspecting, they start to cross the bridge. They fall into the water and are struggling, to the great amusement of tbe peasant, who lets them struggle so as to enjoy his revenge the better.

THE HIGH COST OF LIVING
Eclair's Release, June 10

Mr. and Mrs. Consumer find that they have no food in the house. It is salary day, so they depart for the market, which is a monopoly and presided over by a syndicate representing the goods they controlled. Their motto is: "Our prices, all we can get." The syndicate is composed of Kings, thus divided: Milk, Butter and Eggs; Coal; Bread; Sugar; Meat; Clothing and Tobacco. At this market there is a great gathering which finally thins out to the few who have enough money to satisfy the grasping Kings.

The various types of consumers buy or try to buy their necessities at exorbitant prices. The Kings are greedy and cruel.

Finally unable to bear these impositions the people become impatient and resolve to do something to repair their wrongs. The Kings have a reunion and make a mound of their bags of gold which they worship. It is transformed into the God of Greed, around which they group and command the people to cease their complaints.

A meeting of the discontented people is in progress when the painting of Justice comes to life and, joining them, asks them to tell their complaints, and she, thoroughly aroused, issues an indictment for trial against the wicked Trust Kings.

Uncle Sam executes the warrant much to the joy of the consumers. He repairs to the market where the Kings are having a jubilee—arraigns them—calls upon the people to carry out the orders of Justice, points to sign which has changed to "Justice Triumphs at Last." The mob seizes the Kings and hustles them off to tbe bar of Justice. The Kings, handcuffed, are now arraigned before Justice. Uncle Sam enters as the people's lawyer, and in a short time (with the overwhelming evidence of their rapacity), has the jury pronounce them guilty and sentenced to hard labor for life. The people destroy the God of Greed and now that prosperity returns a few weeks later give a jollification feast at Mr. Consumer's bouse. In the meantime, the guards lead the Kings in convict garb to their labors which they do very lighty. They overcome their guards and escape. While the feast is at its height the Kings repair to Consumer's house and like a lot of vultures attack Justice, drag her from the house and make her a prisoner. The noise disturbs the merrymakers, they go out to ascertain the cause, are borrified to find Justice gone. In the meantime the statue of the God of Greed has been reconstructed. The Kings drag Justice before it and completely suffocate and obliterate her under bags of gold. The Kings return to their thrones. The angry people rush on to see the old order of things re-established and can only show their sorrow and misery. Justice is seen behind the bars, handcuffed, awaiting deliverance. Mr. and Mrs. Consumer are at their table again, hungry, all food gone. Uncle Sam appears, they appeal to him, be leads them forth and pointing up, shows them the promise of the future. Old Glory is seen waving and then Uncle Sam indicates that they may remedy matters by choosing from one of the Presidential candidates of the different parties whose pictures are thrown upon the screen.

TEARS O' PEGGY
Rex Release, June 9th

Did you ever study tears? Purely as a chemical composition, it's a simple thing to analyze and discover its why and how. But as so much material emotion, as the involuntary product of our feelings and senses, it's a young mystery. Tears may be drops of the soul, if it is possible for the soul to be liquid. But even more important than what they really are—jevver notice the effect of tears? Especially a woman's tears? Even if you're not married, we presume you know.

A pretty woman's tears are the greatest persuasive argument on the planet Earth. A woman's tears will melt the coldest heart, and will make the heart manifest itself when their isn't any at all. Tears are the conqueror of the boldest, coldest spirit. Tears always have their way.

But now for a few funny tears.

They were in love, and pa frowned on tbe romance. When a pa frowns on a romance between a pretty, determined girl and the man "she was born to marry," there's always an interesting story. That's why we're talking to you now.

The girl knew the power of tears—because she was a girl And she determined to cry her father into submission.

Such a weeping and wailing was never heard since Gomorrah went into the cemetery business. And the accompanying "gnashing of teeth" was contributed by pa.

The next few days were devoted chiefly to tears. Theirs was a happy home. His stubborn will was almost drowned, when it became so used to the flood that it learned to swim. And hour after bour, day after day, the crying specialty continued.

The tears and the girl had their way, and the mock sadness turned into a very genuine joy and a jubilant justice.

THIS WAS A LIVE ONE

When James H. Lasson, the beef baron, invited a party of friends for a cruise to Bermuda on his luxurious yacht, "Neda," he issued a sixteenth invitation, which concerns moving picturedom. This was for a camera man from the Special Event Film Co., of New York City, who has to make a film record of the trip. Fred Beck was strongly inclined to go himself, but he finally detailed one of his men on the job. The trip took six weeks, during which time five thousand feet of film was exposed. The fun on board the boat and among beautiful Bermudas is shown, all of the guests figuring in the pictures to their hearts' content, and in many novel and startling ways. The "Neda" won the three-mile race with the best yachts run every spring from St. George's, and Mr. Lasson is proud indeed to have a filmed record of his boat's prowess. After the films were shown to the party on their return to New York, just twelve of them decided that they wanted projection machines in their homes, and the Special Event Film Co. got a fat order for a dozen sets of film of five reels each.

The Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of Cleveland, Ohio, has indorsed the public library bond issue and, as a means of arousing public interest in the needs of the libraries, have agreed to exhibit two films all this week, showing the comparative size of libraries here and in other cities of the same rank.

* * * *

The Union Square Theatre, the first of the Keith theatres in New York, is going back to vaudeville. The re-establishment of high-class vaudeville in place of moving pictures and light vaudeville to which the Union Square has been given up for several years, commences June 3rd.

* * * *

Madison Square Roof Garden has been leased for a lengthy term to Mr. Rudolph Landauer. The roof will be put in order as an open-air amusement place at popular prices, after an expenditure of $50,000. Some of the features will be an Oriental garden, a large dancing pavilion, motion pictures, restaurant and a vaudeville entertainment.

STAGE KIDDIES THE GUESTS OF THE REPUBLIC FILM COMPANY

One hundred and fifty stage children were the guests of the Republic Film Company on Saturday, May 25th, and incidentally about one hundred big kiddies, their mothers and fathers, at a gigantic May-day festival at Central Park, New York. The occasion was the completion of a Republic production soon to be released and appropriately named "The Queen of May."

Broadway, between Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth street, never saw such a band of happy youngsters as the crowd that filled the three large Fifth avenue stage coaches, nor heard such cheering and yelling as the caravan started for the offices of the Republic Company. Here again the clamor was repeated, and in spite of the efforts of the director and half a hundred volunteer assistants, it took some time to stage one of the important scenes.

The coaches finally left for Central Park and, after finishing the production, the kiddies were filled with ice-cream, candy, Pasteurized milk, cakes and sandwiches. Here again the camera had splendid opportunity for a gorgeous setting during the crowning of the Queen of May, as the green Central Park was filled with thousands of little ones not of the stage, but when they became aware that the "movies" were taking their pictures, immediately jumped for their May-poles and began the beloved May-pole dance so dear to the hearts of kiddom.

Although the intention of the Republic Company was to have only 150 stage children doing their well-trained May-pole dance in celebration of the crowning of their King and Queen, their majesties witnessed, and the camera caught, thousands of volunteer subjects, each prettier than the other, their faces wreathed in smiles, and it made many an old fellow wish he was a kid again to join in the frolic. No mishaps occurred and no kiddies were lost, to mar this beautiful event.

Cinematograph exhibitions are popular in China. They are of three kinds—those given in buildings specially erected for the purpose or in other places adapted, and the third class is itinerant, after the manner of the old strolling players. It seems that the celestial prefers scenes from real life to the faked pictures. German films are said to be the most popular, showing military maneuvers, battles and street scenes. These pictures appeal to the imagination of the Chinese and call for the expressions of admiration. Great interest is also shown in pictures of the Rheims aviation week and the Paris floods of 1910.

TO WRITERS

The Editor

(The Journal of Information for Literary Workers) published in your interest for eighteen years, is the magazine of which Jack London said: "I may not tell a hundredth part of what I learned from THE EDITOR, but I may say that it taught me how to solve the stamp and landlord problems." It is a monthly stimulus to the production and sale of more and better manuscripts. Besides articles of concrete, practical worth by editors or by writers successful or about to be successful, each number contains in "The Literary Market" all the news of all the magazines, new and old, that pay for manuscripts.

Just now $1,500.00 is offered in prizes for poems. Full details in current number of THE EDITOR, which will be sent for 15 cents. The yearly subscription is one dollar.

Genuine Parts or "Dupes"

Do you know what is being used to repair your MOTIOGRAPH—Genuine parts or "Dupes"—

A genuine part is made by the manufacturer of your machine with care as regards quality and fit, and every genuine MOTIOGRAPH part is interchangeable with the part on your particular model—

A "duped" part is of the cheap "thrown together" variety made of cheap material by cheap workmen and made to sell cheap, without regard to fit or service.

It is up to you, Mr. Exhibitor, to see that only genuine long-wearing quality parts are used in your repair work.

We warn you but cannot force you to protect yourself—but if your dealer cannot supply genuine MOTIOGRAPH parts send direct to us.

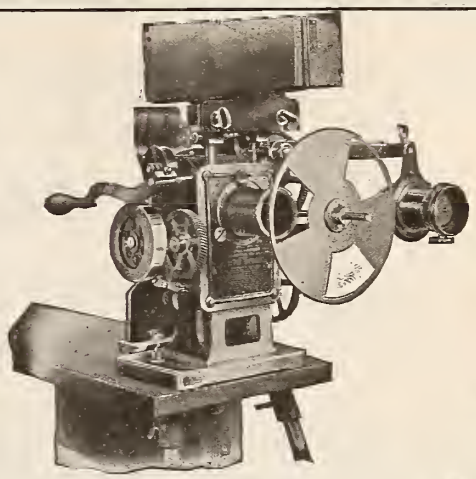
The Machine That Doesn't Come Back



POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH No. 6 sells itself on its reputation and holds its job on its merit.

Any machine may break down and it can wear out; but with proper care, our No. 6 will last a lifetime and its parts are all interchangeable and are made by us of the very best material obtainable.

Money and knowledge cannot build a more durable machine than Power's No. 6, and it projects flickerless, clear pictures; those are two good reasons why it never comes back.

Don't overlook the value of Power's Adjustable Inductor for use on alternating current in place of the rheostat. It will save enough current to pay for itself within four months and lasts a lifetime.

A GOOD SALESMAN

"Some of the buyers of Oliver Twist have asked us," says the General Film Publicity & Sales Company's representative, "the reason why we did not purchase the Nathan Hale film made in California. At the time Mr. Markowitz called at our office and offered the film for sale, he said:

"'All this film needs is to have the battle of Lexington taken, and put in it. Take the sky out of three or four scenes; have Goodwin thirty years younger so that he will look the part of Nathan Hale; retake six hundred feet; pay Goodwin $500 that I owe him; return to Jim Carlton $250 that I owe him. Outside of that the film is all right.'"

MICKY'S PAL

RELEASED WEDNESDAY, JUNE 12th

This is the film in which an expensive auto was burned for a spectacular effect. Micky comes out of prison determined to get even with society for robbing him of his liberty. Tom, his pal, is discharged from prison at the same time. Tom breaks with his pal and turns straight. Later when Tom snubs Micky, Micky "fixes" his old-time pal, but immediately sees his error and makes amends. The Story is compelling and vibrates with heart interest.

THE GREAT DISCOVERY

RELEASED FRIDAY, JUNE 14th

One of those unique comedies with comic situations that elicit laughter at every turn. The story concerns a collection of old fogy scientists who want to discover a means of making children with incubator and chemical mixtures. One of their young assistants plays a joke on them that is really funny.

WRITTEN IN BLOOD

Here's an appropriate subject for your glorious Fourth. The most stirring two-reel sensation ever offered. A real red story full of real red, live blood. Seething and surging with the tempestuous spirit of fiery revolution, imprisonment, revenge and terror. THE MOST GLORIOUS FILM OF BATTLE-FIRE EVER MADE.

The New Comet

RELEASE DAYS—MONDAY AND SATURDAY

The New Comet Company has not been sleeping—Oh! No—not for a second. We have been very much awake. From the 4th of Jan. to April 15th we had our stock company at Jacksonville, Fla., taking pictures with which to fortify ourselves when the inevitable crash came. We were prepared to meet it, no matter which way the wind blew. We had more than a score of negatives on hand, all high class in every respect, and after all the man with the A-1 pictures is the winner in the film game every time. THANHOUSER FOR EXAMPLE. While our Southern company was doing big things at Jacksonville, our New York headquarters were being reorganized and remodelled from stem to stern. Nothing was left of the old Yankee outfit (which the Comet succeeded) but the four walls. The studio has been converted into the newest and best equipped motion picture gallery in America. For up-to-date cinematograph apparatus THERE ISN'T A FACTORY IN THE WORLD that surpasses the COMET'S newly built plant. The office staff; all factory employees and studio experts were selected with the greatest care. When Mr. William Steiner retired, every member of the "old guard" found new fields as well. To-day the COMET stands on the pictures it is now releasing. Get acquainted with the following winners and see for yourself.

RELEASED MONDAY, JUNE 3rd

MY WIFE'S BIRTHDAY (1000 feet)

One of the Jacksonville comedies. It's a scream from the main-title to the trailer. You cannot complain about the scarcity of good comedies when "corkers" of this kind are being turned out.

RELEASED SATURDAY, JUNE 8th

THE ISLE OF STRIFE, (CUBA) (1000 feet)

Showing fifteen scenes of Cuba's most important points of interest, including MORRO CASTLE, HAVANA HARBOR, selected spots in HAVANA city; the arrest by Rural Guards of INSURRECTOS and the trial of same in a Cuban Court House. A Sugar Plantation in full operation making one of the best industrials in many a day.

RELEASED MONDAY, JUNE 10th

THE PRICE OF DECEIT (910 feet—Dramatic)

A squabble in domestic life that fairly lifts you out of your seat. Made by the COMET'S Western company. Watch for the Comet's Western every Monday.

RELEASED SATURDAY, JUNE 15th

AN INTERRUPTED WEDDING (1000 feet)

A comedy that is full of snap, bang and go. Taken by the Comet's entire Southern company in their happiest mood.

RELEASED SATURDAY, JUNE 22nd

THE TALE OF A RUBBER BOOT (1000 feet)

A crackerjack comedy that is not without its pretty little heart touches as well. This picture contains several surprises and will make many friends for the new Comet pictures.

RELEASED MONDAY, JUNE 29th

WANETA'S SACRIFICE (985 feet—Dramatic)

A Western masterpiece in motion pictures. A thrill is in store for you when you see this reel. By all means read the COMET'S synopses each week and keep in touch with the output of the most up-to-date film makers in New York.

One sheet posters for each release—Sold only through FILM SUPPLY CO., of America.

If you are not getting COMET literature, send us your name and we'll attend to it.

NAT C. GOODWIN
AS FAGIN IN OLIVER TWIST

What the Philadelphia Papers Say

PHILADELPHIA RECORD

"OLIVER TWIST" MOTION PICTURES—"OLIVER TWIST"—LYRIC

The motion pictures recently made of the principal incidents in Charles Dickens' story of "Oliver Twist" so adapted as to give in as clear and as concise a way as possible an idea of the novel, were shown for the first time in this city last evening at the Lyric. Nat Goodwin, who in the recent revival of the play made from the novel was seen in the rôle of Fagin, was pictured in that rôle in the films and a generally competent cast of players gave him support. Every spectator last evening appreciated the fine photography in the motion picture presentation. All the pictures were very clear and there was little, if any, of that oscillation that is often an annoyance to onlookers at an exhibition of projected pictures. A lecturer gave some idea in advance of the exhibition of the nature of the story, and he also instanced some of the famous players who have been seen in dramatic representations of the play made from the novel. Occasional comments also came with the revealing of the pictures, although for the most part explanations were hardly necessary, so intelligent has been the visualizing of the piece. The films, presenting the novel in five installments, were so nearly perfect as to warrant more than the usual commendation for careful photographic work. Goodwin at the conclusion of the presentation, is seen in his customary garb, on the screen, bowing his thanks to the spectators.

PHILADELPHIA EVENING TIMES

OLIVER TWIST MOVIES WITH NAT GOODWIN AT LYRIC THEATRE
Five Photographic "Acts" Show Vivid Scenes in Dramatic Story.

Oliver Twist, in five photographic "acts," and with Nat Goodwin as Fagin, drew an interested audience to the Lyric Theatre last night. While Goodwin is the only member of the all star-cast which has been presenting the revival of Charles Dickens' famous novel in New York to pose for the films, all the parts were cleverly portrayed.

One of the first things noticeable in the production is the fact that the films are remarkably distinct and without that oscillation which frequently proves annoying and hard on the eyes. A lecturer preceded the display of films, explaining the nature of the story, although this was hardly necessary, so completely is the plot set forth in the picture.

"MAKE-UP" IDEAL.—Goodwin's make-up for the part of Fagin, who taught youth to steal, is ideal. From the birth of Oliver in the workhouse until the finding of the will which restores him to his own, the entire story is given in an accurate, careful manner. The scenes of horror in Fagin's den, the incidents in the home of Mr. Brownlow and Miss Maylie, the murder of Nancy, the hanging of Sykes and the horrible death of Fagin are especially vivid.

Throughout the production particular incidents and situations were given in such a way as to illustrate the plot of the novel, although shown without regard for sequence. William Mason, the lecturer, furnished a clear, concise summary of the story, which permitted even those unfamiliar with the work to follow it closely.

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER

DICKENS PICTURES WITH GOODWIN AS STAR AT LYRIC

Remarkably dramatic and telling is the motion picture play of Dickens' novel, "Oliver Twist," which was seen at the Lyric Theatre last evening, with Nat C. Goodwin as the sinister Fagin. The production is noteworthy for its completeness and highly important incidents such as the magisterial viciousness of Justice Fang and the death of Agnes are filmed with resultant clearness as to plot.

The atmosphere of low brutality and petty criminality is also admirably conveyed, and the characters are, for the most part, enacted picturesquely and in such a manner as to make them stand out vividly. Mr. Goodwin's impersonation of the fawning old vampire is a superb and congruous piece of acting. The technical requirements of the motion picture art are generally observed and the photography is throughout beautiful and clear. The lecture which precedes the play is interesting.

EVENING BULLETIN

MOVING PICTURE EXHIBITIONS AND OTHER ATTRACTIONS OF THE WEEK

A novelty in moving picture entertainment is offered at the Lyric this week in the presentation of "Oliver Twist" as a photoplay, with N. C. Goodwin in the part of Fagin. Mr. Goodwin has recently been acting this famous Dickens character in an all-star revival of the play in New York, and while he is not accompanied in this "Movie" reproduction by the same players that have been appearing with him in the regular performance, all the other parts are well taken, and Mr. Goodwin's vivid portrayal of the old Jew, who instructs boys in the ways of crime, is highly effective and interesting. The continuity of the story is well preserved, the acting being so skillful that no point is missed, and the staging is complete in detail and picturesqueness. The performance is preceded by an explanatory lecture by William Mason, which, while seeming somewhat unnecessary, owing to the familiarity of the story, is unusually well done, Mr. Mason being a good speaker, wholly versed in his subject.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF THE MOVING PICTURE

We do not know whether we are quite right in using this term "psychology," which defines the study of the human soul, and all that appertains thereto, to the moving picture, but, as the human soul is swayed to and fro by the picture or pictures it sees, so we may be right in using the term—the soul of the moving picture. The taste of the American public is now being largely moulded by its literature, but its amusements, and even the legitimate drama, by the moving picture. Ten years ago we predicted that the public taste would be moulded altogether by the products of the manufacturers of films, and the proof of this lies in the fact that the human mind is being largely moulded in many ways by the public, as they show very plainly by their adherence to the moving picture palace, instead of the playhouse. This is largely due to the unique psychic influence of the moving picture, which acts upon the mind and soul (or psyche) of man, more directly, and with far greater lasting effects, than any other method of impressing a truth upon the mental conditions of the man, and when we say man we mean it in its broad sense—mankind.

Let us look for a moment upon literature such as is disseminated through our public libraries, and what do we find? The plain, bald, absolute fact that the moving picture is impressing the youth of to-day far stronger than ever did the literature of the ages. There is but one cause to account for this, and that is the book impresses opinions and contradictions of an individual upon his work, which may be read by some and rejected by many. The reader and the author may disagree and the book be thrown aside after the perusal of a few chapters. The appeal to the mind is indirect and requires a far keener concentration of thought on the part of the reader than does the picture upon the mind of the spectator. Again, the book is merely a statement of ideas that perhaps only a few of its readers are able to grasp. The picture, on the other hand, does not require any concentrated effort to grasp, but immediately impresses the psyche of the spectator with its truth.

We have many times made the remark that the influence of the picture over the ordinary printed page is far greater and still more lasting than is the printed page. The impression made upon the eye, and from the eye to the soul of the observer, makes a clearer and deeper impression than any other factor in use to-day. This question should be taken up by every educator and every exhibitor throughout the world, and should be fully impressed upon the consciousness of those who cater to the public, that such persistent and powerful appeals to the receptive and perceptive faculties are deeper and fuller in every respect to the psychic powers of sentiment, morals and will power. The moving picture theatre is the one institution which reaches hundreds upon hundreds, millions upon millions, of people each day, and the influence for good is so great, or so small, or so evil, that it should give us cause to pause, and make us ask to what does the psychology of the moving picture tend?

The responsibility of the film manufacturers, of which there are new ones coming into the market, as each week goes by we learn of some fresh one coming into the ranks, each having different ideas as to the utility of the picture, some coming in with a view and a great aim to elevate and uplift the industry, and the picture, from sordidness to spirituality. The film exchanges follow the run of what the manufacturers have put out, and the exhibitors show upon their screens the results of many thoughts, ideas and brains of the manufacturers. Upon their directors hinges a wonderful power for the solution of many problems that are before us to-day. The responsibility is great and cannot be declined. The responsibilities rest upon every man who has invested his money in the industry that only that which is of the highest order should be displayed, either upon the posters exhibited outside the moving picture theatre, and still more on that which is displayed inside. The vast educational field opening before us is so great that we almost hesitate to speak of the great possibilities before our mind.

We have been the pioneers in the work for the uplifting of the industry in its educational and broad sense. Our editorials have been quoted all over the world, and we want now to give another thought to those who are responsible for the products turned out from the studios of the film manufacturers. There is an ever-increasing demand on the part of the public for clean-cut pictures that can be exhibited anywhere and everywhere without the fear of odium from the Censorship Board. We will just take a few ideas of a nature that might set the thoughts of the manufacturers running in the same channel. First of all, let us take the public safety. What a wonderful scope is here! Let some of our manufacturers stand at the corner of, let us say, Thirtieth street and Fifth avenue and watch, as we have watched, timid old ladies standing shivering on the sidewalk, afraid to attempt the crossing owing to the danger from the dashing automobiles, cycles, buses and other like vehicles. We have seen several accidents arising from this cause. We have seen the intrepid rush of the motor cyclists trying to avoid traffic, dashing into an oncoming vehicle, with the only result of a broken neck to the rider. Take another phase, the accidents that occur around our public schools when the children are coming out in swarms, varying in numbers from 500 to 5,000—how many accidents could be avoided if only a film showing some of these accidents could be exhibited before the children! "First-aid" pictures might be taken and exhibited in the 10,000-odd moving picture theatres in our land, and still greater numbers abroad. The danger of stone throwing, etc., the resuscitation from drowning and other life-saving appliances could easily be photographed and exhibited, all of which would tend to the instruction of every individual soul, whether boy, girl, man or woman.

In our last week's issue we illustrated one of the most dangerous elements in our congested cities—fire—and showed how it was possible in its inception to avoid much of this danger. Every description of scientific instruction could be made a prolific source of revenue to the manufacturers. We recently saw, taken by Kinemacolor, a series of laboratory experiments, which, shown in their natural colors, was a wonderful revelation of the possibility of the cinematographic art. The psychology of this experiment would appeal to every chemist throughout the world, showing it was possible to blend two innocuous-looking liquids together, and by this experiment form a beautiful red liquid, another showing a brilliant green, another a beautiful orange. This could not be done in pure black and white; therefore the psychology of the Kinemacolor product appeals in a wonderful way to the soul of the scientist. Engineering courses for students could be taken up, etc., through the whole gamut of psychics and science.

Leaving this high subject, and coming down to the psychology of the everyday man, a series of pure dramatic works that appeal to the higher, diviner instinct of the spectator of the moving picture show would have a wonderful effect in lifting the vast population of our city from mediocre to divine. The cinematograph industry is only just on the fringe of its usefulness. It has, to a very large extent, ousted the public libraries, the magazine and, in many instances, the pulpit, as, according to one statement, "there are sermons in stones," so are there greater sermons in the films, and if the manufacturers would only arise to the present psychological moment and bring forward, even if only a film a month, that which the public is so anxious for and so eager to see, we feel sure that greater advances will be made.

In conclusion, we want to point out one great thought, which will be eventually evolved into a cinematograph film, and that is the actual photographing of a visitor from the invisible. We have knowledge that this is in the process of evolution, and when it is fully perfected we think that many startling discoveries will emanate from this source, and the psychology of the moving picture will indeed be the photographing of a soul.

CAMERA MEN—SLIDE COLORISTS

If any camera man sees this notice, and he is out of work, or wants a better position, and will communicate with the Editor, he will hear of something very much to his advantage. In fact, we can place two, but they must be high-class and extra good. We also want expert slide colorists. The better and the higher class they are, the more we will be pleased. Permanent positions in both capacities are offered. We also want our list completed of every camera man, every director, very actor, every actress, every slide colorist, in the business. Put your name, address and qualifications on a postal and we will make out a register of your name for publication.

FIRST GEM A GEM

Bearing out its name in every detail, the first Gem production, "The Princess of Lorraine," a two-reel costume play to be released Tuesday, June 11th, sets a standard that will be entirely gratifying to the exhibitors and the public. It might truly be said that its only fault is that it is faultless. Produced with the technical exactness of a master, emphasized by the adequately forceful acting that the subject requires, embellished by imposing, massive sets, it is a work that deserves and will elicit the strongest commendation. George W. Nicholls, the able producer who was responsible for the long line of Thanhouser successes, among which were "Jess," "Cinderella," "David Copperfield," "She" and "Dora Thorne" in two-reel productions, and "Called Back," "The Passing," "As It Was in the Beginning," "Last of the Mohicans,"

"Whom God Hath Joined," and others among the single reels, put the very best that is in him in the current production, and it must be remembered that his best is better than the average superlative.

The story itself is supplied by the synopsis, printed elsewhere. It is rather our desire here to tell the poise and gentle firmness with which the delicate and decisive features of the story were conveyed. Miss Margaret Snow, who played the princess, injected all the charm and vigorous dramatic emphasis of which she is capable. The acting throughout the entire production reflects careful and capable direction and direct merit on the parts of the performers.

If the Gem productions adhere to the promising standard established by "The Princess of Lorraine" Gem will truly be Gems!

GENERAL FILM PUBLICITY AND SALES COMPANY PERPETUATE DRAMATIC ART

One of the most commendable acts of mankind lies in the perpetuation of any good thing. By so doing he aids immeasurably the methods of evolution, and puts the unfading touch to the finger prints of Time as their impress falls upon the face of civilization.

The actor's art has been of the day, of the moment. The recollections of great actors and great plays have been but a memory lying in the minds of a few men who witnessed and applauded the actors' efforts. However, at this stage of the Christian era we are enabled to preserve for the future the greatest actors in their greatest moments, and by the art preservative of all arts, photography, practically reincarnate them for the admiration and applause of coming generations.

The General Publicity and Sales Company have taken the initiative in America, in a plan for the perpetuation of the dramatic art, for the immortalization of the foremost artists in the finest dramatic works. They have started well and wisely by advancing, first, America's greatest character actor, Nat C. Goodwin. In speaking of Mr. Goodwin's art, Joseph Jefferson, the most beloved actor the American stage has ever known, and for many years the dean thereof, said that Nat C. Goodwin was the greatest comedian America had ever produced, and probably the greatest that any country had ever produced.

IT HURT THE FLIRT

"Pride cometh before a fall." Which means that pride generally is the fall guy. Pride can't stand an awful lot—it's too shallow. Of course we mean vain pride. Such a thing as honest or honorable pride is a different story.

"The Flirt," Rex release of Thursday, June 13th, tells how a blow to her pride resurrected a woman's honor. When the flirt discovered that the man she had set out to ensnare was only a waiter, her pride was annihilated and she became a woman, with all nobility.

THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

The Motion Picture Exhibitors of the State of New York will hold a convention in New York City at the Union Square Hotel, Fifteenth street and Fourth avenue, Wednesday, June 19, 1912. The Convention will be called to order at ten o'clock A. M. by Mr. M. A. Neff, President of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. A large attendance is expected throughout the State of New York. Every Exhibitor is requested to attend the convention whether he has received a letter or not.

This convention is held for the purpose of organizing the Motion Picture Exhibitors of New York into a State Organization which will co-operate and affiliate with the National Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America. Matters which vitally interest the Motion Picture Exhibitors will be discussed at this meeting.

This is to be strictly a business meeting for the purpose of getting together whereby the exhibitors may become acquainted and through a strong, vigorous organization, co-operate together for the up-lift of cinematography and the protection of the exhibitors' commercial rights and the advancement of the exhibitors' interests. The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America is the rock upon which the whole business rests. Many who were at first antagonistic to the organization, now realize that the organization is based upon the high principle of justice to all and a fair square deal to each and every one engaged in our line of business. This is a day and age of organization and big things, the individual in the commercial world is but a grain of sand upon the beach. An injury to one exhibitor would be the concern of all exhibitors, therefore every exhibitor's interests can be looked after and every grievance adjusted honestly and fairly through organization.

I wish to urge the importance of every Motion Picture Exhibitor in the State of New York attending the meeting to be held on June 19, 1912, in New York City at the Union Square Hotel. A National Vice-President will be elected who will represent the great State of New York; First Vice-President, Second Vice-President, Secretary and Treasurer, will be elected and several important committees are to be elected. Do not wait to read about the convention, but let history record the fact that you were one of the charter members that linked your interests with hundreds of others who co-operated together to bring about a friendly co-operation through an organization that has proven to the world that it is capable of dealing efficiently with all things and conditions pertaining to the Motion Picture Business.

Do not forget the day and date and the place of meeting, Wednesday, June 19, 1912, at the Union Square Hotel, Fifteenth street and Fourth avenue, New York City, N. Y. Let the slogan be "On to New York where we will make history." Any one desiring information in regard to the Convention, will please write to Mr. M. A. Neff, President of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, No. 1003 Mercantile Library Building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Mr. M. A. Neff, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, left Cincinnati, Thursday, May 30th, for Chicago, where he attended a banquet at the La Salle Hotel, which was given by the Chicago executive committee on convention arrangements. It was a grand affair and everybody was highly pleased with the progress being made for holding the National Convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America which is to be held in Chicago next August.

Mr. C. M. Christenson, National Secretary of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, Cleveland, Ohio, met Mr. M. A. Neff at the La Salle Hotel Saturday morning in company with Messrs. R. R. Levy, W. J. Sweeney, L. Schindler. They went to Milwaukee, Wis., where they attended a big banquet at the Plankinton Hotel Saturday noon, given by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Wisconsin. Everyone had a most enjoyable time. Mr. M. A. Neff, National President; C. M. Christenson, National Secretary; L. Schindler, Chicago; Wm. J. Sweeney, Chicago, and R. R. Levy, Chicago, addressed the convention. Mr. Klein introduced the toastmaster, Mr. C. H. Phillips, after the banquet a group picture was taken, automobile rides and a visit to several of the picture theatres. At 6 o'clock the delegation returned to Chicago. Mr. Neff returned to Cincinnati and Mr. Christenson to Cleveland.

* * * *

The Ohio State Convention to be held at Toledo, Ohio, July 16 and 17, will come at just a time to especially please the Southern exhibitors, as the bathing and boating season will be on and the refreshing breezes from Lake Erie and the moonlight excursions will bring joy to the hearts of hundreds of the exhibitors from the inland cities and towns. A visit to the old fort and a view of the surroundings where only a few years ago the noble red man of the forest chanted his weird war dance and nailed the scalp of the pale-faced pioneers to the historical log fort at the junction of the rivers. This is where the important moving picture of the Convention will be taken.

In visiting Toledo every one will have an opportunity of seeing the residence of that patriotic, conscientious Toledian, Sam Jones, who placed the banner in the Mayor's office, "We practice the Golden Rule, do unto others as you would that others should do unto you." If courteous treatment and a special good time will attract, Toledo surely is offering a beautiful supply of entertainments, amusements and pleasure for visiting exhibitors. Big arrangements are being made to entertain hundreds of exhibitors in royal style and it is the proud boast of Toledo that once they secure a convention that the visitors are always glad to return to Toledo.

The efficient manner in which Toledo Local No. 3 is noted for handling and managing balls, banquets and other entertainments which they give, will be seen and enjoyed on the 16th and 17th of July. We hope that every member of the League who can possibly attend the Toledo Convention will be there, as a large amount of important business will come before the convention to be discussed and decided.

Manufacturers of every kind and description of articles pertaining to the motion picture business are cordially invited to attend this Convention and make their displays. All film men will be welcome. Toledo has made arrangements to take care of a large crowd and we take it for granted from previous conventions which they have handled that they know just what they are doing.

The Moving Picture League of America met May 21st at the Industrial Club at Cincinnati, Ohio, and perfected a local organization under the name of the Kenton and Campbell County Branch No. 1. Officers were elected as follows: President, Nat Rogers; First Vice-President, C. Tarvin; Second Vice-President, R. L. Griffiths; Secretary, Harry Brice; Treasurer, W. J. Halpin. State Vice-President Orene Parker, was elected a delegate to the National Convention to be held in Chicago in August.

The Moving Picture Exhibitors of Pennsylvania, whose headquarters are at 142 North Eighth street, Philadelphia, held a State convention at the headquarters of the league on Friday, May 21st, for the transaction of the regular business and the nomination and election of delegates to represent the State convention at the National convention of the Exhibitors of the United States, which will be held in Chicago the first week in August.

COMMITTEE OF ARRANGEMENTS, PENNSYLVANIA MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS LEAGUE. CONVENTION TO BE HELD AT PITTSBURGH JUNE 24th AND 25th.

The Pennsylvania State Convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, which will meet in Pittsburgh on June 24th and 25th, is attracting not only the attention of Pennsylvania exhibitors, but a large number from adjoining states will attend. Pittsburgh, no doubt, will have the largest attendance of any convention heretofore held and it is confidentially expected that the entertainment will surpass all previous attempts made by convention of this kind.

All the exhibitors of Pennsylvania and elsewhere are invited to attend the convention. Go to Pittsburgh and see the big doings, where you will be royally entertained and receive information which will be beneficial to every Motion Picture Exhibitor.

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE

Cincinnati Local Branch No. 2 of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, is doing things all the time. Their new code, which is to be presented to the City Council, will be completed at their next meeting. All the members of Cincinnati Local Branch No. 2 have agreed upon issuing a pass to their friends which is good at fifty-one (51) theatres; in other words, one of these passes will admit the holder to fifty-one theatres in Cincinnati and Hamilton County. This pass is issued by the Local instead of the individual theatre owners. Cincinnati Local Branch No. 2 is growing very fast, new members coming in at every meeting. Big arrangements are being made to go to Toledo to attend the State Convention which is to be held there July 16 and 17, 1912. They are also making arrangements to attend the Chicago convention which will be held August 13, 1912.

* * * *

Mr. Charles T. Beeching, of the Orpheum Theatre, a member of the Cincinnati Local Branch No. 2, has been in Chicago several days. The Waldorf Amusement Company, composed of some of the leading business men of Cincinnati, are erecting two-first-class moving picture theatres; one will seat 800 and the other one 600. All of the Waldorf Amusement Company's stockholders are members of the local league. Mr. Otto Luedeking, who is president of the company, is also treasurer of the local organization.

Dr. Kolb, president of the Empire Theatre Company, will open a new motion picture theatre at Fifteenth and Vine streets, Cincinnati, O., June 6, 1912. Dr. Kolb is a member of Local Branch No. 2 and is now running the Gayety Theatre at Fountain Square and Fifth avenue, which is one of the most prominent theatres in Cincinnati.

Mr. J. J. Huss, who owns five motion picture theatres, has decided not to remodel the Star Theatre but will run it into a business building. Cincinnati Local Branch No. 2 met at the Sinton Hotel Wednesday, May 29, 1912, and transacted a large amount of important business. Mr. Orene Parker, national vice-president from Kentucky, and several other visiting exhibitors, were present.

K. and C. Local Branch No. 2 of the State of Kentucky held a meeting at the Industrial Club, Covington, Ky., on Tuesday, June 4th, and elected permanent officers. Mr. M. A. Neff, president of the National League, was present and addressed the Local League. Mr. Dittman, of the Majestic Theatre, Louisville, Ky., reports that Louisville Local Branch No. 1 is in a prosperous condition and that he is working in the interest of his local organization. Mr. J. H. Stamper, Jr., president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Kentucky, reports that they are doing effective work in the State of Kentucky and that two organizers have been put in the field to secure new members.

SH-H-H-H! The following little appreciation is being slipped into the forms while the "Boss" is out of the city. When he reads it, he is liable to prance around some and the staff members will shift the responsibility until it reaches the office boy. It is the usual procedure in publication offices when there is some explaining due. We believe, however, that our editor has hidden his light under a bushel long enough, and we staff members have decided to give him a little deserved space even if we lose our jobs. What is to be, will be, says Confucius. It was foreordained that this tribute was to be prepared by a humble admirer and therefore, if his job has been jeopardized, so be it. Thus endeth the first chapter.

Alfred H. Saunders, Editor, Author and Scientist, has endured the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune quite frequently — all for the sake of principle. He has stood from the beginning to the end for the absolute independence of Cinematography, and has been the target for attacks, personally and financially, because of his stanch adherence to an ideal. Firm in his faith, courageous in a cause he believes is just and right, ofttimes he has stood alone fighting the battles of the moving picture manufacturer and exhibitor. Even his detractors have admired his courage and his honesty, and many are now wearing sackcloth and ashes for the man who was misunderstood.

"I have no enemies to punish; no private grudges to foster—I am only for complete independence in the industry; justice and fair dealing for all—the educational uplift and refinement of the moving picture," says Alfred H. Saunders.

ALFRED H. SAUNDERS

The above is a platform of broadmindedness; a platform of unselfishness; an honorable standard that will prove triumphant in the final reckoning.

"Saunders is probably the leading authority today in the Art of Photography in all of its branches," said a New York authority recently, and we think the assertion will go undisputed. He is the originator of many lantern effects and a pioneer in the field of Cinematography. It was Mr. Saunders who predicted the coming importance of the moving picture when the art was in its infancy. He founded the first moving picture trade paper and has been the acknowledged authority of the scientific end of the moving picture since its inception.

The Editor of The Moving Picture News was born and reared in Merry England. In his early life he was trained for decorative painting for churches and he has been highly complimented by press and pulpit in this line of artistic endeavor. His home was at a public house kept by his father, from which Saunders, Sr., retired into private life when young Saunders was about 18 years old.

About this time the "Good Templars" saw an influential member in young Saunders and he joined the temperance cause and soon became an active propagandist. Seeing the need for educating children in temperance truths, in 1883 he purchased a lantern and started forth to teach the young idea how to shoot in connection with "Band of Hope" work. His field of labor grew rapidly larger, and in 1886 he purchased a bi-unial with limelight fittings and from then until now he has never lacked speaking engagements and has been often obliged to refuse invitations to appear in public. He purchased a still higher-class outfit and to this he added improvements of his own invention and he now prides himself on being possessed of one of the finest outfits in the world. Exhibitions have been given by Mr. Saunders in nearly every town in the British Isles and in many of the larger cities of America. In the past he did much of the lantern work in connection with the Mason University College of England, and was one of the prime movers in the Sunday night meetings held by the Birmingham, England, Temperance Society, which meetings did much to promote the cause of sobriety in England.

The City School of Photography in Birmingham was later presided over by Mr. Saunders, and was at that time considered the foremost school of expert and artistic photography in the world. The first course consisted of twenty-four scientific, practical and theoretical details, and the second course was as thorough and as practical, with such additions as lantern slide work, retouching, hand camera work, copying oil paintings, lantern slide painting, etc. Mr. Saunders also became a manufacturer of lantern slides and was Lanternist by appointment to the University of Birmingham, Birmingham Athletic Institute, Birmingham Sunday Lecture Society, Birmingham Suburban Institutes, etc. It is estimated that he traveled one hundred thousand miles in England alone, with such dignitaries as, Sir Robert Ball, Professor Hillhouse, Dr. Andrew Wilson, Dr. Dallinger and others.

About this time our "Boss" got a sniff of Printers' Ink —and you know the rest. He became editor, in 1902, of the Optical Lantern Journal of which The Magazine and Book Review said: "Except in the lantern-land of Rabelais you would hardly think the magic lantern had an organ all to itself, now would you? But it has! And the Optical Lantern Journal is a very excellent monthly."

Finding his field of activity in England too small, Editor Saunders concluded to come to Uncle Sam's domain. He arrived about the year 1903, and was so cordially welcomed by Uncle Samuel that he has been busy in New York ever since. While looking over the field, Saunders took the leisure to dash off technical and other works, such as "Victorian Era," "Poverty and Crime," "Lantern Slide Making," "Lantern Slide Painting," etc. Each and every one of these books is a leader in its field and can be found on the shelves of every well-equipped library. His technical works are freely used in scientific circles and are known to every expert photographer and lanternist. In vulgar parlance, we think this is going some.

Editor Saunders, long before, seeing the possibilities of the moving picture, and being one of the first to realize its future importance, evolved the idea of instituting a publication for the trade. He was first engaged on the staff of the Film Index, which he left to found the Moving Picture World, together with the late J. P. Chalmers. He later left the World and founded the Moving Picture News. The editorial policy of absolute independence in the industry inaugurated in the News has never faltered. The News has proven a menace to those who have sought to profit by unfair means, and it seems that Editor Saunders's stand for an open market for everyone will be realized after years of editorial warfare.

The founder and editor of the Moving Picture News is a member of an English Masonic Lodge—a member of the Warwickshire Grand Lodge of Mark Masons. He demitted his chapter degrees in New York and in America took the Knights Templar and Consistory degrees. He is a member of Mecca Shrine and a thirty-third degree Mason.

Personally, Mr. Saunders is a congenial gentleman, a man of irreproachable habits, and a man whose word is as good as his bond. Despite petty persecutions, ridicule and opposition from many powerful sources, he has guided the News through the shoals and quicksands of adversity until now the publication boasts of thousands of subscribers and stands for independence, fair play and educational uplift in Moving Picture Land. Deserved prosperity has come to Editor Saunders and the Moving Picture News. Readers and many manufacturers have come to appreciate and admit the steadfast loyalty to principle shown by its editor, and two thousand new subscribers have been added to the subscription list within the past year. This fact proves the substantial growth of the News, for the subscribers came without elaborate advertising campaigns or prize-winning contests.

Film-land needs more men of the Saunders type—men of courage; men of unswerving loyalty to refined impulses and ideals; men unafraid of Big Business when vital interests of the humble are at stake. Cinematography is indebted to Alfred H. Saunders for the educational progress of the picture; for the elimination of the immoral and suggestive; for the advancement and protection of clean men and women in the profession.

And when the real Open Market comes—as it will come, sooner or later—Filmland's population should not forget the man who has stood so long, singly and alone, fighting the battles of the industrial downtrodden and with no hope of substantial reward other than the consciousness of work well done.

And this consciousness will be ample reward for Alfred H. Saunders—he will have fought a good fight for principle—and no man can do more than this.

EXHIBITORS NOTES

A new airdrome with a seating capacity of 3,000 people has been opened in St. Louis, Mo., at Cherokee and Iowa streets. This theatre will have vaudeville as well as moving pictures.

The New Favorite, the name under which the airdrome will be known, will have for its manager Basil Webb, press representative of the Talbot enterprises.

An added grievance to the affairs of the Moving Picture Exhibitor exists in the fact that Judge Nieman, of Nassau County, sitting temporarily in the County Court in Brooklyn, handed down a decision on Tuesday, May 28th, granting to hotelkeepers the right to run moving picture shows in connection with their hotels without paying the fee required for a "common show license."

The following is an amusing tit-bit for exhibitors from the Hazelton, Pa., Sentinel:

Two prominent young men of Hazelton, in a moving picture show one afternoon. One of the reels was that of a bitter war between two nations. After seeing the pictures they arose to leave the theatre and the manager halted them at the door and reminded them that the show was not yet over. In a spirit of fun one young man remarked, "We have sat here for the past thirty minutes and have not heard a shot fired yet." The manager said, "Well, you don't expect to hear shots in moving pictures, do you?" The reply was that as it was a war scene he certainly did. "And," he replied, "I want my money back." The manager was agreeable and handed him 20 cents.

The owner of reels who was present then took it upon himself to interfere. He questioned the young men and found them to be dissatisfied and he reminded them of the return of their money. This was too much for their composure and when he suggested that they again purchase tickets to see the balance of the show they left. It developed later that the man who received the money back was not the one who paid the admissions. Along the Rialto much fun is being had from the experience.

Seems to indicate that every library built by Mr. Carnegie is a monument to his memory; also a headstone to the commercial grave of a retail bookseller. 'Tis sad, but true. Consequently, this store will be closed for a few days preparing the stock for distribution by auction. As soon as alterations are made a modern moving picture theatre will be operated here under the personal management of Mr. R. E. Sherwood.

St. Louis, Mo.—A handsome picture theatre will be erected on Florissant avenue.

Brattleboro, Vt.—The new motion picture theatre to be erected on Canal street will be opened September 1st.

Milwaukee, Wis.—Plans have been made for the construction of a moving picture theatre for Francis Rogowski at Twenty-fourth and Lincoln avenues.

THE CONVICT'S SISTER

BY VIRGINIA WEST

Adapted from Lux Release

AS the evening progressed the conversation turned to jewels.

"I love them," said one of the ladies passionately. "I can never get enough. I want to wear all I have. If I hadn't been born with reasonably good taste I am afraid I'd make myself look like a walking jewelry shop. You never wear jewels, do you, Mrs. Hunt?" she finished, turning to another guest.

"No, but I have a great many."

The ladies and gentlemen turned toward her questioningly.

"I love them," she continued, "but I do not care to wear them. I have them unset and love to play with them, but I never wear them. I never seem to tire of putting the different stones side by side and watching the combinations of lights."

"Well, Mrs. Hunt, I hope you aren't envious of other people's possessions," laughed Mr. Fairweather, the host, "for I am going to show you something."

"What is it?" asked young Wadbrook of Mrs. Fairweather, by whom he stood.

She did not seem to hear him but stood looking intently at the window.

"You do not feel well?" questioned Wadbrook gently.

She came to herself with a confused start. "Oh!" she said, "I beg your pardon; I am all right—only a slight headache."

"There!" exclaimed Mr. Fairweather, emptying the contents of a small envelope into the palm of his hand, "Did you ever see anything prettier?"

There were exclamations, and moving toward the host.

In the palm of Mr. Fairweather's hand lay a diamond of immense size and remarkable brilliancy.

"Where did you get it?"

"It's a most unusual stone."

"Oh, how beautiful!"

Such exclamations came from the guests.

"Here, take it in your hand and hold it to the light," said Mr. Fairweather, putting the stone into the hand of one of the men.

From hand to hand it passed. Each person examined it closely and remarked upon its beauty. As they did so, Mr. Fairweather told the story of how he happened to have the chance of securing such a diamond at a remarkably reasonable sum.

Suddenly the electric lights went out and the room and those adjoining were in complete darkness.

A servant entered and announced that the trouble was only temporary. In a few moments the lights came on again.

"Thimble, thimble, who's got the thimble?" said some one of the guests.

"That was a fine opportunity, all right, for somebody," laughed another. "If the diamond hadn't belonged to you, Fairweather, I would have thought you had that light business arranged."

The joking went on for some minutes, everyone expecting at any moment to see the diamond appear, and everyone wondering which one of their number was able to deceive them for so long a time.

But the diamond did not appear. The jokes began to fall flat and the company became plainly embarrassed.

One of the men finally took matters into his own hands. "Look here, Fairweather, I don't like this. I don't see how that stone could have disappeared so mysteriously without somebody knowing it. And yet, we're all friends here and have absolute faith in one another. Gentlemen, I sugest that Mr. Fairweather search us all."

There was a loud assent.

"Why, my good friends," said Mr. Fairweather in great distress, "I could not possibly do such a thing."

"But you must. It isn't fair to us not to."

They all agreed that this was true and their host finally very reluctantly and greatly embarrassed, consented to search his guests.

The search was merely nominal, and Mr. Fairweather went hastily from one to the other.

Robert Wadbrook was the last. He stood with his head erect and his mouth drawn into a thin line. When his host reached him he looked straight into his eyes and said: "For reasons I cannot explain, I must refuse to be searched. Please excuse me, ladies and gentlemen. Good night."

He hastily left the room and in a moment they heard the front door close behind him.

The entire company stood as though turned to stone. No one could find words to express what he felt—grief, surprise, anger.

"My dear friends," said Mr. Fairweather, "even in the face of such evidence I cannot believe this man is guilty. My grief is not for the loss of a diamond but for the loss of a friend."

The next morning as Robert Wadbrook sat in his private office, after a sleepless night, he was surprised and confused to have Mrs. Fairweather's card brought to him.

"You are surprised to see me here, Mr. Wadbrook," she said when he had asked her to be seated.

"Yes, I must confess I am," he answered, nerving himself to meet a situation which he knew must be embarrassing, no matter what turn it took.

Mrs. Fairweather handled her muff nervously. "To come straight to the point, Mr. Wadbrook, I came to ask you why you acted as you did last night?"

"I presume there is but one explanation of my action in the minds of all who were present."

"That may be—with one exception. I do not accept that explanation."

"Then you think——"

"I don't think anything at all about it, Mr. Wadbrook—Robert—we are still good friends, aren't we? I don't know what your motive was, but I do know one thing, and that is that you have not the diamond."

"Oh, thank you for your trust. It means more to me than I can tell you. If you believe I am innocent, nothing else matters."

The man turned away from her. He had said more than he intended.

"Robert," she said gently, laying her hand on his arm, "Robert, you must tell me the reason. Don't you see that even though the diamond were found your actions last night must be explained."

He was silent for a time, then he turned to her and said, "Yes, you are right; I must tell you."

With a quick movement, as though he were afraid he might change his mind, he drew something from his breast pocket. "There," he said, "that is the reason I was not willing to have your husband search me before that crowd."

"My picture!" exclaimed Mrs. Fairweather. "Robert, I do not understand."

"I love you, Louise," he said simply, "I have loved you since we were boy and girl together in high school. I know your feeling for me was always just that of a good friend, and you have always treated me fairly. I had a chance to steal this picture recently and I did it. It was silly—perhaps even wrong, but I suppose I still have some of the college boy feeling that a woman's picture belongs to anybody who can get it. However, that isn't the point. I simply couldn't let your husband find that picture in my pocket. I think he suspects that I love you and the fact that the picture is such a recent one might have made him think you had given it to me. You see I didn't want——"

He stopped, confused.

"I see. It was very fine of you and I thank you, but—Oh, Robert, I have gotten you into a terrible situation."

"My dear Louise," he said earnestly, "you must not in any way accuse yourself. You knew nothing of this."

"I don't mean that. I mean—this."

Her voice dropped and she silently drew from her muff and held in her hand, the missing jewel.

"You don't—you cannot mean——" Wadbrook could not find words to finish the sentence.

Louise bowed her head in shame. "Yes," she said in a whisper, "yes, I do mean just what you cannot say—I took the diamond when the lights were out. I happened to have it then and I seized my opportunity. I never thought of anyone suggesting a search nor of the suspicion falling upon anyone else. It was very silly of me not to think of that."

"But why, Louise, why did you do such a thing? Surely the diamond was yours for the asking, and besides—Oh, why did you do it?"

Mrs. Fairweather sank into a chair and buried her face in her hands.

"Can't you tell me all about it?" asked Wadbrook, standing over her. "I can imagine no reason for such a thing, but I know that is only because my imagination is not good enough. I know there is a good reason."

She lifted grateful eyes to his face for a moment and then lowered them quickly.

"I will tell you, Robert, what I have never told anyone in all the world—not even my husband." She stopped in distress and then continued tearfully.

"I have a brother that no one knows of. He is a criminal—a thief and a forger. He is just out of prison and threatens to make himself known to my husband if I do not furnish him with a large sum of money. I felt that I could not let John know, for he is so proud and I deceived him in not telling him the truth before our marriage. But I didn't tell him and so you see I felt I could not have him know now. I did not know how to get the money, so I took this way of satisfying my brother. I was going to give the diamond to him to-day, but after the suspicion falling upon you as it did I could not do it. That is the story, Robert."

Wadbrook walked to the window and stood looking down upon the crowds below. For a moment the question seemed complicated—what Louise should do. Finally he turned from the window and went back to where she sat, her head bowed dejectedly. "Louise," he said, "there isn't any use arguing the matter, there is but one thing to do. That is, to tell your husband the whole truth. About your own part in the matter, I mean. I'll tell him mine. That is the only thing to do."

"But, Robert, what explanation can you make of your actions to the others?"

"I don't know, quite, but I'll talk it all over with Fairweather. I think perhaps it would be best to tell them the truth about my part of it. Of course, they can be told that the diamond was found after they left. You tell your husband as soon as you can, and I am sure all will be well."

"Oh, Robert," cried Mrs. Fairweather gratefully, "you have been so kind and helpful. I should never have had the courage to tell him if it hadn't been for you."

The opportunity Mrs. Fairweather wanted did not come until the evening. She knew that her husband was worried about the affair of the jewel, so she did not talk much to him at dinner.

When she thought he was in his study she went there quickly and knocked. She was surprised to get no response. Softly she opened the door, and found the room empty.

Thinking Mr. Fairweather had gone to the garden for his after-dinner smoke, she sat down to wait.

In her anxiety she nervously drew her handkerchief from the front of her dress, untied the diamond from one corner, looked at it, and tied it up again. Just as she was replacing the handkerchief she heard a step on the porch and sat waiting for her husband to step into the room through the long window.

As she looked up her eyes looked into those of her brother.

"Will," she gasped.

"Yes, it's me. I've waited long enough. Where's that money?"

"I haven't it."

"Then give me that jewel you've got in your dress. I saw you put it there just now."

Mrs. Fairweather put her hands to her breast. "No," she cried, "that belongs to my husband and I will not give it to you."

"You've got to," he answered. "I'm desperate, and I'm in a hurry, for I'm being watched. You've got to give it to me or I'll make you."

With a quick movement the man drew a revolver from his pocket and held it threateningly toward his sister. "I'm desperate, I tell you, and I've got no time to lose."

Mrs. Fairweather felt desperate, too; with a sudden courage born of that desperation, she seized the hand that held the weapon. There was a short struggle, a quick, loud report, and with horror-stricken eyes she saw her brother lying motionless at her feet.

She felt the strength leaving her. She could not cry out nor move. Just as she felt that everything was giving way, she was caught in her husband's arms.

"What is it, darling?" he cried in alarm. "Are you hurt?"

"No," she whispered.

"Thank God."

"I—I—killed him." Her head sank onto her husband's shoulder.

He loosened her dress and took the handkerchief he found there to wipe her forehead. Something dropped and he saw among the folds of her dress the lost jewel.

At that moment Mrs. Fairweather opened her eyes and saw the diamond in her husband's hand and on his face a look of astonishment.

"John," she said in a weak voice, "I have something I must tell you about—about this man—and—and the diamond. I have done wrong. I wonder—if you—can forgive me."

He held her close to him and kissed her brow. "I am very puzzled, dear," he said. "I don't understand things at all, but I can forgive you whatever you have done. I love you and that is why I know I can forgive you."

"Robert was right," she thought, as her husband lifted her to carry her from the room and her head fell back wearily against the shoulder that she now realized should have helped to bear her trouble all these years.

GAUMONT CO. ANNOUNCE CHANGE IN RELEASE DATES

"The Gaumont Company announces a change in its release dates from Sundays and Thursdays, as heretofore, to Tuesdays and Thursdays, commencing with the week of Tuesday, June 11th, on which date is released 'Nanine, the Artist's Wife,' a one-reel black and white production. The change from Sunday to Tuesday allows an improvement in the weekly program of the Film Supply Company of America, by offering some of the Gaumont handcoloreds, lion pictures and two-reel features in the fore section of the week."

New York, N. Y.—The Madison Square Roof Garden has been leased to Rudolph Landauer to be operated as an open air place of amusement.

Rochester, N. Y.—Pastime Amusement Company of 62 Clinton avenue North has been granted a permit to build a fireproof moving picture theatre.

GEORGE W. PETERS JOINS AMERICAN FORCES

George W. Peters, formerly of the Selig Polyscope Co., has joined the forces of the American Film Mfg. Co. Mr. Peters bears the reputation of being one of the best motion picture camera experts in the country. Of the several photographers who obtained pictures of the sinking of the Maine, Mr. Peters is generally considered the best. He is an ex-newspaper man, having handled the camera for such publications as the New York Journal, Chicago Examiner and American, Chicago Tribune, Denver Post, etc.

Kankakee, Ill.—The Remington Theatre has been opened.

Nicholson, Pr.—Bert D. Stephens has opened his moving picture show.

Modesto, Cal.—The Dreamland Theatre has been purchased by G. F. Alston.

Atlantic Highlands, N. J.—A. L. Gorlin will open a new open air theatre within a few days.

TREMENDOUS BUSINESS INTERESTS OF THE GAUMONT COMPANY

The Gaumont Company, one of the most flourishing of moving picture concerns, has perhaps a greater number of representative offices throughout the globe than any other concern of its kind. Eighteen years ago the nucleus of the present gigantic corporation took root in Paris in the shape of a camera and photographic supply manufactory and retail establishment. Today this manufactory has through course of an evolution of splendid business government and foresight developed into one of the largest and best moving picture manufactories in the world.

The hand-colored pictures, of which Pathe is the only other competitor on the market, are superb. The French process for the manufacture of these films entails the employment of 250 hands, of whom nearly all are girls.

The American end of the business, which was established some four years ago, has flourished in the most remarkable manner. Releasing first through the patents company, which they left January 1st, 1912, for the open market, the name of the Gaumont company appeared March 31st on the sales company's list, and is now lined up with the Film Supply Company of America.

The Gaumont Weekly, the first edition of which appeared February 22d, 1912, and which is looked forward to from week to week by moving picture audiences, is the finest organization of its kind in existence in point of camera men, 75 of which are stationed in and about the following centres: Chicago, Ill., Nashville, Tenn., New Orleans, La., Toronto, Ont., Vancouver, B. C., San Francisco, Cal., Washington, D. C., Atlanta, Ga., Denver, Col., and St. Louis, Mo. Some of the events filmed for the forthcoming editions are the death of the Danish King, Early Country Fairs, the Dolly Madison Breakfast, The First Mail Carrying by Aeroplanes, Santa Monica Auto Races, Meeting of Association of Advertising Clubs of America at Dallas, Tex., and other scenes and events of special interest.

Among the Gaumont coming releases are two splendid hand colors, "The Lion's Revenge" and "The Story of Chopin." The latter tells the life story of the great composer in brief from youth to death. Another good Gaumont to come is "Prison on the Cliffs," and last but not least a remarkable two-reel feature entitled "Written in Blood," which is a war picture taken from the period of Louis XVI. of France. Six films a week are being brought into America, while they are at present releasing only two, thereby keeping in stock a large reserve supply.

The officers of the Gaumont company are as follows: Leon

MANUFACTURING PLANT OF THE GAUMONT CO. AT FLUSHING, L. I.

Gaumont, president; H. Blache, vice-president and treasurer; William V. Goldie, secretary, and A. K. Greenland, traveling representative. Among the efficient office staff at Flushing, L. I., are Frank E. Holliday, editor of the Gaumont Weekly; Frank E. Balladur and Emile Houttmann. Raymond Gaumont, son of Leon Gaumont, has also taken his place among the working staff of the company. He is going to learn the business from A to Z and is now doing service as camera man.

At the removal of the Solax Company to Fort Lee the Gaumont Company will occupy also the quarters vacated by them.

STUDIOS AND OFFICES OF GAUMONT CO. AT FLUSHING

There will be a double studio and an enlargement of the plant in general. Changes are also to be made in the near future in the Vancouver and Toronto offices.

The Gaumont film stands out by itself for beautiful photography, shading and high light effects, and for perfect and finished production in every respect.

Within a week work on what is expected to be the finest five-cent theatre in the West will be started, and according to the plans of the proprietor, J. W. Baxter, the new amusement house will be ready for occupancy by next December. The building will cost $100,000 and have a seating capacity of 2,200.

It will be four stories in height, of fireproof construction, and occupy three lots at 1724 Curtis street, Denver. The interior furnishings and decorations will be of a costly design and the theatre will possess every convenience. It will be devoted exclusively to moving picture exhibitions.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

News Writers and Script Writers

"News writers and script writers, it seems, are synonymous," is a sentence contained in a letter received by the editor of this department recently. It is true that quite a number of news writers, another name for newspapermen, have entered the pictureplay field, and it is also true that they are making a success of it. Our friend is at a loss to know the reason why a newspaperman of his acquaintance can sell scripts while he cannot. There are several reasons why news writers, and others in the newspaper profession, drift naturally into story-writing and pictureplay-writing. First of all, the good newspaperman has learned in a hard school (not a pictureplay school) the art of condensation. A good news writer can tell a story in one hundred words that a novice cannot clearly tell in three hundred. He has to do it. Contrary to the general impression of outsiders, space in a newspaper is at a premium. More copy is crowded out or thrown into the waste basket during a day than ever appears in a newspaper's columns. Consequently brevity, condensation, "boiling down" in craft parlance, is the rule. This knack or talent comes in excellently well when the news writer turns his attention to script writing. Also, the general newspaperman has his powers of observation keenly developed, as also his art of putting down on paper what he sees and hears, clearly, briefly and entertainingly. In a day's work the newspaperman encounters many a good story, novel and worth while, so he has the material to make the plots for story of pictureplay. Nine out of ten newspapermen have a drawer filled with old manuscripts of all kinds that have been rejected by magazine editors. Some of these are doing duty in pictureplay form.

Questions Are Welcome, But——

The editor of this department welcomes letters from his many readers and will cheerfully answer questions to the best of his ability. However, kindly remember to enclose a self-addressed stamped envelope. We receive on an average of fifty communications weekly and the return postage amounts to quite a sum at the end of the month. Like the script editor, we could easily pay return postage on one or two letters, but it becomes another story when several hundred are answered. We want you to feel free to query us at any time, and communications for this department are gladly received.

N. B.—The Order of Optimists, recently organized, has increased in membership to sixty. President Van Buren Powell will shortly issue badges to all active members. These badges will bear the words "No Knocking."

Another Prize Contest

C. B. Hoadley, editor of the Powers Picture Film Company, notifies us that the Powers Company will inaugurate a prize contest and that $250 in prizes will be distributed among pictureplaywrights. The names of the prize-winning writers will be used on the screen. Mr. Hoadley welcomes meritorious work and assures all writers of prompt consideration. Mr. Hoadley proposes to continue the popular policies instituted at the Powers office by Giles R. Warren, who recently resigned for a rest before accepting another position, and the better class of writers will continue to keep the Powers Company in mind when submitting their work.

No Risk Whatever

A lady who says she is a beginner as a "pictureplaywrightess," asks if we do not acknowledge that it is slightly risky for photoplaywrights to submit manuscript to editors, who are expected themselves to furnish plays and plots? No risk whatever. Editors with legitimate concerns are honorable and would not stoop to filching the plots and originality of others. Some persons go through this world with the idea that all others are dishonest. It is a fallacy. Honesty is inherent, and you will find as many honest and honorable people in the editorial offices of film companies as in any other walk in life.

We Try to Be Fair

Editor R. A. Trudeau, of the Scenario Magazine, writing the editor anent a recent criticism directed toward his publication, says: "I think you were very frank and fair. You did not praise for there was very little to praise, but the only real bit of information in our first number was well spoken of." Mr. Trudeau also intimates that no more "protective" associations will be given credence in his columns, and we congratulate him upon that decision. One item is taken from the many excellent features in the latest issue of the publication. "No matter what your success, think twice before giving your whole time to plot writing. Very nice pocket money can accrue from it, but it is too fickle a proposition to depend upon for a steady income."

From some letters we receive, the writers seem to imagine that it will be the easiest thing in the world for them to earn at least $2,000 a year writing scripts. We have heard stories of free lances earning enough money at script writing to purchase large touring cars, take European trips, etc., but we will have to be "shown." A successful writer can make a nice income on the side at the business, but very, very few, outside of the editorial departments, can hope to make a good living from just pictureplay writing.

What Warren Wants

Giles R. Warren, editor for the Victor Film Company, is writing to the most proficient script writers he knows, asking for stories possessing a strong female lead, either comedy or drama. It should be remembered that Miss Florence Lawrence is now leading lady for the new Victor Company and those writers who have contributed while Miss Lawrence was with the Imp and Lubin companies will have an idea of what is desired. Editor Warren has a class of proficient writers who stick closer to him than a brother because they know that when Warren accepts a script it means prompt and good pay. First class scripts will now be directed to the Victor Company.

Here's the Latest!

A magazine down in the Hoosier State calls 'em "scriptplays." Now will "Spectator" and Sargent go away back and take a seat?

What "Spectator" Says

"Spectator," of the Mirror, hits the nail so squarely on the head on a recent issue that we take the liberty of using his statement for the benefit of our readers.

"It has always been a painful ordeal for the Spectator to take up the question of these irresponsible fakirs known as scenario schools. The most of them are such unconscionable rascals that one dislikes to dirty his fingers with them any oftener than necessary. It has been shown many times in these columns that their pretensions to teaching ability are mostly spurious, and it has been likewise explained that their advertised bait for suckers—the alleged glittering rewards for pictureplaywrighting—is shameless misrepresentation. Still they continue to multiply and to prosper, presumably, since they appear able to pay advertising bills. They succeed in getting the hard earned dollars of hundreds of persons in all parts of the country who have no chance whatever of ever developing into successful pictureplaywrights, and they string these poor dupes along for all the money they will stand for. If any hopeful and ambitious authors, who are leaders of The Mirror are inclined to fall for the alluring offers of any schools, let them take it from The Spectator that they will do far better to keep their money and go along doing the best they can by reading The Mirror and other papers devoted to motion pictures, and by securing such advice as they may be able to get from picture producing companies, a number of which have printed hints for writers. If the beginners cannot become successful pictureplaywrights by this means, and by the hard knocks of practical experience—submitting pictureplays or "scenarios" for the acceptance or rejection of producers—they will never become authors at all, and may as well give it up as a bad job. Almost, if not quite, as much to be shunned is any organization, so-called, of alleged 'scenario' writers for a supposed purpose of 'protecting' writers from the villainous manufacturers. The villainy of the producers is almost wholly imaginary. There have been cases where irresponsible employees of producing companies have done crooked work with submitted manuscripts, and there have been a few irresponsible producers, but in neither of these cases has the evil been of sufficient importance to call for organized opposition or 'protection.' Far more likely that the only protection that can result from an organization of inferior or unsuccessful authors will be to protect the pockets of the promoters. Successful photoplaywrights need no protection, and if the novices need it, it is not from the manufacturers, but from the swindlers who would make them their dupes."

The College Yarn Variety

"One class of stories that are the bane of the editorial existence is the college yarn—of hazing, cheating at examination and other trivial incidents, that go to make some college people egregious idiots," remarked a well-known editor in telling us his troubles the other day. "These stories always call for about a million students, college atmosphere and locale, and there isn't one in a hundred that has even a faint 'punch.' The usual run are meant to be funny or dramatic, and the writer generally slops over ten or fifteen pages explaining the drivel. Not one in five hundred find a market, and I, for one, shy immediately whenever the college script comes to the desk, and that occurs much too often during these seasonable days."

From the above, gentle script writer, it would seem that discretion is the better part of valor when a real good college "idea" springs into your brain; just about the time your brother or sister gets his or her diploma.

"PRESIDENTIAL POSSIBILITIES" A SCREAM

By M. I. MacDonald

The Imp split-reel for Saturday, June 8th, is one of more than usual merit. The first subject is a reproduction of the magnificent parade at Los Angeles, Cal., on the occasion of the Shriner's Convention there. A remarkable point about this picture is nearness of the views. The beautiful flower-covered floats seem so close in the picture that you feel you could almost touch the blossoms with your finger tips, to say nothing of the beautiful young women bowing and smiling at you from among them.

However, beautiful and refreshing as this picture is, the bright star of the firmament is on the last half of the reel, and is entitled "Presidential Possibilities." Everything moves smoothly and in the most dignified manner; one after another of the political satellites make their bow to the camera, and the familiar faces of such men as Wilson, Harmon, Dix, La Follette, Underwood and a number of others, are looked upon with admiration or disdain, according to the sentiment of the individual. As a forerunner of what is to come, Theodore Roosevelt is seen addressing in his usual energetic manner, large crowds of admiring citizens; but nothing ever seen in moving pictures can ever touch the comic situation produced by a double exposure showing "Teddy" and "Bill" side by side expounding each on his personal merits and the wonderful things each will accomplish for "the greatest nation on earth" if he gets in for President. The complacent self-satisfied smile of Taft side by side with the frowning enthusiasm of the "big game hunter," the leaders of one of the most intense political campaigns ever conducted, presented on the screen side by side as they thunder legitimate abuse at one another in different portions of the State, is something never to be forgotten. We predict an absolute riot whenever this film is shown. It's a scream! It's a money-getter!! Its release date is Saturday, June 8th. Don't forget it.

New York, N. Y.—H. N. Mason has leased the vacant plot at the northwest corner of Third avenue and 98th street, under the "L" structure, for a moving picture theatre.

Canton, O.—H. S. Cable and Charles Shearer took out a permit to build an airdrome at North Cherry and Fifth streets.

New York, N. Y.—G. Gorman will erect an open-air show on 145th street and Broadway.

FIRST FILMED, LATER STAGED

The Gaumont Company has as ever a large number of feature releases to appear within the next two months. Chief among these are "When the Leaves Fall," one-reel, hand-colored, on Tuesday, the 18th of June; "Bells of Paradise" and "By the Zuyder Zee," two-reel, hand-colored, on Thursday, June 20th; also "Lion's Revenge," one-reel, hand-colored lion picture which will appear on Tuesday, July 2nd. The most important and by far most spectacular and timely, is its July 4th release, entitled "Written in Blood." This production was originally three and a half reels long but has been boiled down and judiciously clipped to two thousand feet, black and white. An extremely elaborate array of posters in both one and three sheet sizes has been arranged for this feature and it is expected that they will do much to even increase the excellent standard that Gaumont films have in the United States. It is expected to confirm the predictions of many, that Gaumont is the most capable manufacturer in the Independent ranks. The story of "Written in Blood" is one that seethes and surges with battle fire sensationality. It is a story written of war and depicts the severest conflicts and the direst circumstances that result from it.

In preparing this production the Paris office of this French concern engaged the services of several performers from the National Academy and gave them the principal roles. This play was secured for motion picture purposes by means of a very profitable contract to L. Danzigeux, the eminent French playright. He has also sold it to the National Academy, which under the auspices of the management that is now handling Bataille's productions will present this play on the stage about the beginning of November, 1912. This is an innovation in film and dramatic stage relationships. There have been many occurrences of successful plays being filmed, such as "Garden of Allah," "Oliver Twist," "Tale of Two Cities," "David Copperfield," "Power Behind the Throne," etc., but this is the first instance where a play with all the earmarks of success is first to be put out through the channel of motion picture photography. This alone speaks volumes for its quality.

The Gaumont people have several other productions of a similar nature to release on the American market within the next half year.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Tom Moore is successfully demonstrating that cheapness of price of admission does not necessarily mean poor quality. He is not only running a vaudeville house where its patrons can see attractions for five cents that are appearing at more expensive theatres, but he recently closed a week's run with excellent financial returns of the Bernhardt and Rejane films at the Plaza. Think of it! These costly pictures, which diplomatic, social and educational Washington has been flocking to see at the Columbia Theatre for fifty cents, were placed before the public for five cents. Many who regretted their neglect or inability to see these two French actresses in motion pictures in previous exhibitions, but who under other circumstances would have scorned a five-cent show, could not resist this opportunity. Consequently the Plaza was patronized by a larger number from official and social ranks than had been its former custom.

Nor content with this break in costly picture enterprises, Mr. Moore has now installed Kinemacolor in the Plaza. Two reels daily are exhibited with changes three times weekly, and in addition several black and white reels are shown. In this connection much favorable comment has been made on the reel taken by the late William Harback along the Canadian Pacific, through the beautiful scenery of the great Northwest. Many of these scenes are toned and tinted. When the first Kinemacolors came to Washington less than a year ago, it was the universal opinion of those in the motion picture industry that the cost of these reels, as well as the installation of the apparatus, would preclude these views from entering the five-cent shows. Tom Moore, who has defied many other sentiments, has proved otherwise, much to the gratification and pleasure of the public.

With just a narrow hallway separating the two establishments, the Mutual Film Corporation, composed of independent companies that have seceded from the Sales Company, and the Washington Film Exchange, carrying the releases handled by the Sales Company, are quartered in the same building on Ninth street. Whether this signifies good fellowship or hostilities remains to be seen. From the Mutual, with Arthur Lucas at the head, comes the report of heavy business and lots of work, and from E. T. Lux, the new director of the Washington Film Exchange, comes an equally favorable statement. As the representative of the Sales Company, Mr. Lux, who arrived recently from New York, wishes his many patrons of this territory to realize that they will receive courteous and fair treatment with excellent service. A universal program will be offered. Owing to the changes, matters are being adjusted in both of the independent offices and the managers will have something more to say in a few days.

* * * *

The Plaza, which uses the service of the Sales Company, will make a feature of running the Animated Weekly as well as first-run pictureplays. There will also be thrown upon the screen nearby events of interest caught by the Tom Moore camera. In this connection the patrons were surprised the other day to witness the motion picture of a local fire which had not gotten cold in the Washington newspapers.

TEMPORARY INJUNCTION FOR WILLIAM FOX

William Fox, of the Greater New York Film Company, whose litigation with members of the Motion Picture Patents Company and the General Film Company, won a victory in the United States District Court of the Southern District of New York on Wednesday when Judge C. M. Hough ordered a temporary injunction against the Biograph Company and the General Film Company, restraining the former, "its servants, workmen and agents from delivering to the General Film Company any motion picture film for subleasing to exhibitors, or for any purpose unless said Biograph Company shall continue to furnish said film in equal quantities and upon the same terms to the complainant; restraining and enjoining the said defendant General Film Company from leasing from the defendant Biograph Company, or subleasing to any person, persons or corporations engaged in the business of exhibiting motion picture film, any motion picture film, or from purchasing positive motion picture films of foreign manufacture, to be used on machines licensed under the patent inventions owned by the Motion Picture Patents Company, or some of them; from procuring films from said defendant Biograph Company for export to foreign countries, unless said defendant Biograph Company shall continue to furnish motion picture film to the said complainant and permit the said complainant to exercise the same rights in all respects concerning said motion picture film as are granted by said Biograph Company to the General Film Company; and enjoining and restraining said defendant Biograph Company from conspiring and confederating with the General Film Company, the licensed manufacturers, the Motion Picture Patents Company, with the intent and for the purpose of in any way injuring or interfering with the business of the complainant herein by causing the supply of film by the Biograph Company to the complainant to be in any way curtailed or diminished or in any other manner interfering with the business of the complainant in supplying its customers with motion picture film; enjoining and restraining the said defendant General Film Company from conspiring and confederating with the said defendant Biograph Company, the licensed manufacturers or the Motion Picture Patents Company, from in any manner interfering with the business of the complainant herein, or curtailing or diminishing its supply of film from the defendant Biograph Company in such a way as to interfere with or hamper the business of the complainant in supplying its customers with licensed motion picture film, and from interfering with the customers of complainant, or inducing the customers of the complainant to leave the complainant and lease said supply of film from said defendant General Film Company, from doing any act or acts which would tend to bring about such a result, or that may in any way injure the complainant in the proper and lawful conduct of its business until the hearing of this motion or until the further order of this Court."

The defendants are ordered to show cause why the injunction should not be continued during the pendency of the action now filed.

Rogers & Rogers appeared for Mr. Fox.

UNIVERSAL ISSUES A STRONG PROGRAM

The plans of the Universal Film Manufacturing Co., now being carried out, are directed toward the framing of a quality program, according to the manager of the Universal. To a representative of this paper he outlined the aims of the company as follows:

"The success of any program must necessarily depend upon the financial benefit it is to the exhibitor. It must not only be of quality, but it must be of sufficient quantity, and be well balanced.

"The community of interests brought about by the Universal Film Manufacturing Co. eliminates at one swoop all personal barriers which have heretofore existed. It provides the means for perfect harmony in an organization whose sole aim is the production of high class film.

"In order to have uniform quality of photography all the work of printing and developing has been concentrated in the best plants, such as Rex and Bison, which have been enlarged to meet the requirements. This will insure perfect photography for every release.

"The production department has been placed upon a most unique basis, which, we believe, overcomes all obstacles heretofore perplexing motion picture producers. A scenario department has been established which will receive the manuscripts from the playwrights and give same careful consideration. Those selected will be well paid for, the minimum price being $25 for a single reel and $15 for a short, or half-reel, picture play.

"The selected scenarios will be distributed among the various directors, according to the nature of the subjects they have been assigned to produce.

"The interchanging of actors assures first-class dramatic work in the entire cast. Outside of the principals or permanent members of a stock company, heretofore actors have been engaged as extras, but now these extras will be selected with great care and will receive permanent employment as regular members of the Universal stock company. The leading actors will thus be supported by excellent actors at all times.

"In the West the Imp, Nestor and Bison have been practically consolidated, under the general management of Fred Balshofer. The already enormous personnel of the Bison company has been enlarged and single reel subjects are being turned out. If the Imp or Nestor stock companies need some heavy scenes in a picture, with horses, soldiers, Indians, etc., they will draw on the Bison for them. In the same way, if the Bison company should be in need of a certain type of actor which the Imp or Nestor companies have, he will be assigned to the Bison company.

"The same arrangement will work in the East, where the stock companies have been considerably strengthened. The new Gem company is all its name implies, producing meritorious subjects under the direction of George Nicholls, who has gained an enviable reputation as a producer of feature films.

"The Victor company hardly needs any comment, as the work of Florence, under the direction of Harry L. Solter, is well known throughout the world. Miss Lawrence has enjoyed a much needed vacation, and is back at work sparkling with vivacity and life, and exhibitors can confidently expect splendid pictures from this studio. Owen Moore, who has proven a popular favorite with the public, will play opposite Miss Lawrence, the two being supported by an all-star cast.

"The present program is composed of twenty-four reels, including two two-reel features. To this will be added two and three-reel features until there will be one released every day, and the program will consist of more than thirty-six reels.

"The resumption of the Itala releases places a split reel comedy at the disposal of exhibitors. The third Rex has been looked forward to for a long time, and the "101" Bison single reels have been clamored for since the beginning of the two-reel releases.

"Under previous systems an exhibitor did not know what kind of a program to expect, as each manufacturer was confined to the narrow limits of his own plant. A committee has been appointed by the Universal to balance the daily program, and instead of worrying about what kind of films he is going to get, the exhibitor can devote his time to improving his theatre and properly advertising it.

"All politics have been eliminated from among the members of the Universal company, and the energies of all its members are directed solely to the production of good film.

"The exclusive division of the territory, which has been harmoniously arranged between the various exchanges, will prove a great protection to the exhibitor. Too many times, as every exhibitor knows by bitter experience, a theatre will advertise and feature the coming of a certain subject and then have his labors and expense taken advantage of by a near competitor who sneaks the film in a day or so ahead of the other men. Taking service from a Universal exchange will mean protection from these annoyances, and the exhibitor will know what he is going to get some time in advance, and he can depend upon getting it.

"Users of the Universal program can give to their patrons the best in dramatic art, including such popular players as Florence Lawrence, Owen Moore, Ethel Grandin, King Baggot, Phillips Smalley, Anna Little, Vivian Prescott, Fred Mace, Francis Ford, Marion Leonard, Margareta Fischer, Lois Weber, J. B. Sherry, Jack Conway, Fritzi Brunette, William R. Daly, John Manley, William Shay, Edward Lyons, John Cumpson, Edward Le Saint, Lillian Christy, David Wall, Harry Pollard, Grace Lewis, Lila Chester, Lillian Leach, William Williams, Ethel Elder, Jefferson Osborne, Vivian Rich, Gertrude Claire, Earl Simmons, etc."

THE THANHOUSER TWINS

We have had "The Thanhouser Kid," "The Thanhouser Kidlet" and, lately, "The Thanhouser Poodle," but all this array must stand back for that which has just double the strength (numerically) of any of 'em—to wit, "The Thanhouser Twins." They make their first appearance in a film released Tuesday, June 18th, that is called "The Twins." The twins, of course, are the hit of "The Twins."

Likewise "The Twins" would be naught without the twins. As it is, "The Twins" is a success and the twins are a success.

The story relates that a grouchy old uncle adopts one of the twins when they become orphans, declining to have the other, who forthwith is sent to an orphanage. But the orphanage twin escapes from there and joins her sister at the uncle's. Here through consummate cleverness and their remarkable resemblance to each other, they fool the uncle into thinking just one sister is in the house.

"NO CHILDREN WANTED" (Powers.)

The Powers Motion Picture Company is filming a series of child pictures and "No Children Wanted" is one of the rare gems of the stories for release. It is a story that will appeal to all classes, as there is comedy interspersed with pathos all through the picture.

It is a travesty on the objection to children in city apartment houses. Hawkins, the father of nine small children, arrives in the city from a country town accompanied by his travel-stained and tired wife. He is hopeful and applies at several places to rent a flat. He is invariably met with the same answer, "No Children Wanted," and he is in despair. The family seeks the seclusion of a friendly park for the night and, on awakening the next morning, explain their troubles to a policeman. He tells them not to heed the injunction but to smuggle their children into a flat and take possession. Hawkins acts on the suggestion and they move into an apartment. Their effects consist mainly of baskets, hampers, barrels and the refrigerator. When the landlord is gone the children bob up from every corner until eight are accounted for. The baby is lost but is finally located in the ice box, to the joy of the mother. The little tots are enjoined in silence and they obey implicitly. The mother of the landlord is an invalid and is wheeled about in a chair. She is left alone in a room and a fire breaks out. The children smell the smoke and organize themselves into a volunteer fire brigade and save the old lady and the flat from burning. The owner of the house discovers the children and orders Hawkins to vacate instanter. He is packing up sorrowfully, when the landlord discovers the tots have saved his mother and he bids them stay as long as they like. The story closes with the Hawkins's being entertained at dinner by the landlord and his kind mother. It is a charming story, told in a convincing manner and will appeal to old and young alike.

Passaic, N. J.—The Garfield Theatre at 160 Palisade avenue, has opened.

COMING NESTOR RELEASES

Excellently photographed and splendidly acted, "The Belle of Bar Z Ranch" is easily one of the best little comedies produced the Nestor. This Western pictureplay was made under the direction of Mr. Thomas Ricketts, with Vivian Rich and Harry Von Meter portraying the principal characters. Very cleverly does Miss Rich handle the part of the belle who, although in love with one young cowboy, sets all the other cowboys' hearts thumping madly when she breaks her engagement with her fiancee, piqued because he paid a little more attention to another girl than she thought necessary. The incidents leading up to the reconciliation are most amusing. Wonderful exterior scenes and exciting races make this pictureplay, which is to be released on Monday, June 10th, decidedly worth while.

"The Squatter's Child," another most excellent Nestor production, is to be released on Wednesday, June 12th. This is a Western drama, with many tense situations. Viola Barry, as the sweet young mountain maid, is at her best, while William Clifford, depicting the character of a half-wit, does some very difficult work. Jack Conway portrays the character of a young landowner and, as usual, is very pleasing. The story is woven around the half-wit's jealousy of the young landowner, who is in love with Nell, the mountain maid. The love of Pete, the half-wit, is treated with indifference by Nell, who has given her heart to Ned, the young landowner. Presumably harmless, no attention is paid to the mutterings of Pete, and were it not for the intervention of Nell's little sister, the young couple would have met their death at the hands of Pete. This splendid drama is produced under the direction of Mr. Milton H. Fahrney.

Victoria Forde and Lee Moran appear under the direction of A. E. Christie, Esq., in the release of Friday, June 14th, entitled "The Ranch Girl's Choice," and very capably do they handle the difficult situations throughout the play. Thrilling rides over the mountains among most beautiful scenery make this rushing Western one of Nestor's best.

POWERS STUDIO NOTES

Director Matthews is busily engaged in putting on plays in which children are featured. He has produced a number of child stories with flattering success, as he is loved by the tots and has the needed requirement—patience with them.

Frank Powell is putting on the dramas, with an occasional comedy, and is displaying excellent taste in his selection of exteriors. The forthcoming Powers pictureplays will show marked improvement, for the directors have the services of talented actors and the benefit of some beautiful backgrounds in which to work. Charles Craig, formerly with the Biograph Company and the Lubin Company, and Miss Violet Reed, who has recently been in Lubin stock, are working in the pictures, Mr. Craig being a member of the Powers Stock Company. Harry Blackmore, a stock comedian and formerly with "The Traveling Salesman," is posing in comedy parts, and the stock company will be augmented soon by one of the most prominent actors in the moving picture business.

THREE COMING ECLAIR RELEASES

NOTES OF THE WEEK

What is supposed to be the only municipal film show in the country exists in a little town in Reno County, Kansas, called Hanen. Hanen was so small that no moving picture theatre had been established there. The only entertainment of the sort that Hanenites ever had the opportunity of enjoying was through a travelling show that occasionally visited the town. No one was willing to risk his money in building a moving picture house, so all the business men of the town "chipped" in enough to buy the machine and the show was started a month ago. It is a great success.

The pictures are shown in the town hall every night. An admission fee is charged to pay the operator and the license on the films, which are changed twice each week. When the receipts are larger than the expenses free shows are given until the fund is exhausted or additional and special films are purchased and the show is increased and kept going with more pictures until the fund is used up.

The town is now building an airdrome theatre. This summer the picture shows will be given in the open air and next winter they will be returned to the town hall.

* * * *

A recent invention of special interest is the Phonedeik, invented by Dr. Dayton C. Miller. This machine is capable of photographing air waves and throwing them on the screen as moving pictures.

* * * *

It has been announced that late in September A. H. Woods will present "The Miracle" in its filmed form at the Metropolitan Opera House. This is rather a startling announcement and will be the first time that moving pictures have invaded the sacred precincts of the Grand Opera headquarters, as well as being the initial appearance of "The Miracle" in America.

* * * *

Mr. Charles Kauffman, a well-known camera man, has devised the novel plan of taking a moving picture of his boy every six months, after the method of photographing flowers from bud to blossom. When the boy becomes a young man it is his intention to show this picture to the world.

* * * *

A distinguished gathering of scientists and others witnessed the demonstration of the "chronophone," a new invention which is a cinematograph and phonograph rolled into one. On the screen one saw Ian Colquhoun and heard him recite "The Camperdown." M. Gallipaux acted a comic monologue, illustrating the humor of an irate telephone subscriber who cannot get his number, and this was followed by a lion tamer cowing lions that roared and leaped about him. The act comedietta, which had a railway carriage for its scene, concluded the program.

The prelude to the entertainment was a wonderful living picture of a rooster that crowed. It appeared on the screen brilliant in its natural coloring, for all the chronophone pictures are in natural colors, so that one saw the bronze sheen of the plumage, the red comb and pale yellow spurs. It flapped its wings, rolled its eyes, thrust its neck upward and forward, and from its wide opened beak there came the triumphant crow. The whole audience could watch the characteristic movements of the rooster just as if it were real and living before them.

The picture of the lion tamer in his den was even more remarkable, for here there was a mixture of sounds, the man speaking, the crack of his whip, the thud of the iron bar falling on the floor of the cage and the terrible snarls and growls of the lions, all so lifelike that it seemed impossible that the actual lion cage had not been somehow spirited into the room.

Dr. I. Seth Hirsch, the X-ray expert of Bellevue Hospital, who sailed May 30th on the Kaiserin Auguste Victoria of the Hamburg-American Line to study during the summer months in X-ray laboratories at Berlin and Vienna, told the Sun reporter just before sailing that he has applied for a patent for a "moving picture" apparatus which will take at the rate of 100 a minute X-ray pictures of the heart or other human organs in motion.

A newspaper correspondent has written in the following manner of the musical accompaniment he recently heard at a moving picture show. The pictures represented Dante's "Inferno," and the pianist's selections always were appropriate.

His first selection was "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town To-night." When a picture was shown, depicting a nude woman jumping over a fiery pit and pursued by demons, he played "Oh, You Beautiful Doll." When the hypocrites appeared, pursued by huge mastiffs, the pianist burst forth with "You've Got to Quit Kickin' My Dog Aroun'."

At a convention of dentists from Indiana and Kentucky held at the Louisville College of Dentistry, a plan was discussed for educating the public in the proper care of the teeth by means of moving pictures.

In a communication from the Committee on Oral Hygiene of the National Association is a proposition to have the various State societies co-operate on having a series of thirteen films, costing $280 each, made and distributed among the moving picture theatres of the different States. These films will treat in a general manner things which the public should know about the care of the teeth. In the matter of affiliation with the national body it is supposed that delegates from the State society will be sent to the next national meeting to confer with that body as to the feasibility of the plan.

* * * *

Dr. E. Gustav Zinke recently exhibited before the Alumni Association of the Ohio-Miami Medical College, moving pictures demonstrating the use of Ultra-Microscopic Cinematography in teaching medicine. The veil that hides the inner workings of the body was severed and pushed aside and a journey was taken down the veins and arteries of the human body.

The dreaded germs of disease were seen to make their attack on human life, and also the valiant defense of the white corpuscles of the blood against the countercharge of the germs of death was seen. The mortal combat which has gone on in the human body in one form or another for ages, was also witnessed for the first time by the naked eye. The circulation of the blood, the blood dust which consists of small particles found in the blood, the germs of sleeping sickness which causes the death of hordes of Africans, and the action of the new drug, 606, or Salversan, in combat with the germ of blood disease which it attacks (the subject being a rabbit), were exhibited to marvelling physicians.

MANUFACTURERS' NOTES.

Mr. John Bunny, of the Vitagraph, has gone to England. His first work there will be in the character of Mr. Pickwick in a big Dickens production. In July he will go to St. Petersburg and will winter in Rome, Naples and Venice. The funny man of the Vitagraph will remain abroad for some time, and it is expected that his trip will result in thousands of dollars worth of new films photographed on foreign soil. The idea is Mr. Bunny's own. The proposition was submitted by him to the directors of the Vitagraph Company in January and accepted very readily by them.

STAGING FRA DIAVOLO

The three-reel Solax feature to be released July 12.

Billy Quirk (Fra Diavolo) and Darwin Karr (Lorenzo), struggled on a precipice 260 feet above sea level. They looked down the steep declivity, with hearts doing a turkey trot. The scenario called for a hand-to-hand struggle on a narrow ledge. As Billy gazed on the troubled waters of the Hudson, ominously splashing and beating against the rocks more than 200 feet below, his eyes began to tear. He thought of his prize French bull pups and what they would do without him. Darwin sadly shook his head and wondered whether Borough Park would use as many yards of crape as there were pieces of his shattered limbs.

And all this for the sake of realism! The climax of the Solax three-reel feature production is one of the most thrilling, most spectacular and most effective scenes ever shown in moving pictures. This part of the story deals with the violent death of the bandit, Fra Diavolo. He is the chief of Italian brigands. He is pursued and nearly cornered by Lorenzo, the lieutenant of the guard. Lorenzo follows him to the very encampment of the bandits, but the artful Diavolo uses a rope with which he tries to escape down the side of a precipice. Brave Lorenzo hastily follows and overtake him on a narrow shelf of rock. Two hundred feet in the air on this stone shelf, only two feet wide, they struggle. The slightest misstep meant death. Lorenzo, who is practiced in the art of self-defense, worsts Diavolo and sends him over the precipice and down headlong, dashing against the rocky projection, bouncing and turning somersaults in the air until he reaches the rocky edge of the breaking waters below.

It wasn't an easy matter to get this effect. Great care, exact science and expensive appliances had to be employed in manipulating ropes, ladders and safety devices. Billy Quirk actually makes the fall, but it took a good deal of coaxing and "spirit" to nerve him up. Tests were made of the strength of concealed safety appliances by Harry Harvey, one of the Solax directors, who, under the direction of Madame Blache, looked after the details of this scene. The picture was taken without a mishap, although Madame Blache experienced many heartaches.

Of course there were a number of ludicrous incidents in connection with the taking of this scene. While experimenting with a dummy, in testing the safety devices, the dummy was tied to a rope and hoisted. Harvey was at the foot of the declivity. He wanted to get up without climbing the 260 foot incline, so he hung on to the dummy. "Gee," said Laney, who was on top pulling the rope, "but this dummy is sure heavy!" It is hoped he wasn't personal.

Warren Down in the Mouth

One day, when Madame Blache had the company up near the country around Atlantic Highlands, Director Warren came up there to see Madame work. Madame had with her a small army of supers. In scouting around for locations Warren got detached from the main body and was lost to civilization for three hours. He finally came up to the hotel hungry and ready to eat fire. "Those —— mosquitoes in this —— country make me —— mad!" Warren certainly did use his big vocabulary, and it wasn't a holiday vocabulary, either.

The Properties

Energetic Menessier, with a corps of assistants, tirelessly worked for five weeks planning and building the special sets required for this big production. When he was finished he had four truck loads of scenery. There were exteriors and interiors and back-drops. Before he built his stuff he sketched his sets on canvas. Madame Blache passed on each plan and colored sketch before the work went ahead. Madame took a trip to Chicago, Philadelphia and Washington for special properties, costumes and stage coaches, all made expressly for "Fra Diavolo." Menessier built Italian inns, both exterior and interior; an Italian street scene, bell towers, parlors, drawing rooms and boudoirs. About 200 people were connected with the production of "Fra Diavolo" in one capacity or another, and at one time there are more than a hundred and fifty people on the stage.

The Cast

The cast in "Fra Diavolo" includes Billy Quirk (Fra Diavolo), Darwin Karr (Lorenzo), Blanche Cornwall (Zerline), George Paxton (Lord Allcash), Fannie Simpson (Lady Allcash), Lee Beggs (Chief Brigand), and a detachment of troops, servants, brigands, citizens and travellers.

At the Farm

Four wagon loads of scenery, besides a wagon load of "props," had to be transferred from the Solax studio to the farm, two miles from the studio, in Flushing. This farm has the appearance of a natural amphitheatre. The grounds represent the shape of a bowl. All of the Solax feature productions are staged in this place because it offers such fine facilities for the building of "deep sets," a thing desired by every exacting producer.

Days before the "props" were moved over to the farm Madame Blache eagerly watched the weather reports. Every now and then she would call up the "weather man" or consult all of the morning and evening newspapers. Her desk, at times, appeared as if she was interested in a murder trial or in Roosevelt's campaign, which, perhaps, is about the same thing. She even asked the Solax publicity manager to guarantee her fine weather. The entire company prayed for it, and the Good Lord answered their prayers. In fact, He answered them with a vengeance, for the weather was so fine that Madame Blache and the members of the company looked as if they had spent a week in a kettle of hot water. After a single day on the farm the publicity manager's nose matched the best that could be exhibited by the most enthusiastic members of anti-temperance societies.

Somehow the entire population for miles around heard that the Solax Company were at work "in the open." Thousands of them came to see "what it was all about." Farmers in jumpers, women with babes in arms, girls with chewing gum and kids with their "muts" or their sticks were all represented. The company had a hard time trying to keep them out of the picture. To these farmers it was the "greatest show on earth," even better than a circus. They sat around on the rim of the bowl-like amphitheatre and watched; others, more curious, tried to get closer.

One kid did get closer. He got so close to the stage coach horses with his "little mut" that the horses somehow shied, and off they went on a rampage. There was a real stampede. Like sheep, all the horses—ten of them—followed in the lead of the frightened stage coach horses. The place was in a turmoil, and for a while it did look serious, for had the horses come in the direction of the stage and the properties they would have done thousands of dollars worth of damage. There were brave men among the company, however, and they stopped the stampede. Two truck horses reined to their truch traveled four miles on a gallop and landed back in their stable without a driver.

In the excitement, George Paxton lost a part of his whiskers. The camera man was asked to take the scene—the stampede—but he turned round and said: "Aw, it's too much trouble to disturb the camera. I have it all set for the lines."

Newspaper correspondents, trade journal editors and reporters fairly swarmed around the farm and the studio during the taking of the picture. The Solax grounds was the Mecca, the news centre for two whole weeks. Everything they did was interesting and "furnished copy."

The production will be one of the finest ever seen in moving pictures.

FANCHON, THE CRICKET

Imp Release, June 17

Fanchon is a fascinating little girl, the grandchild of Mother Fadet, who is suspected of witchery by the people among whom she lives. At the opening of the story Mother Fadet is being attacked by a crowd led by Father Barbaud, the father of Landry and Didier, his twin sons; the former a handsome and bright lad; the later a little weak and foolish.

The old woman is about to be beaten when Fanchon arrives and she also is beset by the men and both are in danger until Landry appears on the scene and upbraids the mob. He is attracted by the beauty of the little madcap, who thanks him as he leaves her.

The foolish Didier is in love with Madelon, the belle of the village, who scorns him, and who is in love with the handsome brother. Didier is heartbroken and tells them he is going to commit suicide. He rushes away but is prevented from carrying out his intention by Fanchon, who follows him until he, tired, falls asleep in a clump of bushes. Landry seeks everywhere for his brother, even asking aid of the witch. She refuses to assist him, but meeting Fanchon, he asks for her help. This she promises if he will agree to dance whatever dance she may select at the fete to be held the next day. He, anxious to find his brother, consents, and she leads him to the spot where Didier sleeps.

The next day while the festivities are in progress, Fanchon dressed in the old fashioned clothes of her grandmother appears and demands her dance with Landry. This he is dancing with Madelon, but being a man of his word, he asks her to excuse him and then takes Fanchon as his partner.

Madelon, angered at the manner in which Landry has treated her, tells the others that Fanchon has bewitched him by the aid of a witch's claw she always wears around her neck in a bag. She incites the mob, and they attack Fanchon, demanding to see the contents of the bag. This she hands to Landry who reads on the paper "The Prayer of the Pure Maiden to the Holy Mother of Grace." Abashed, the mob leaves the unhappy girl, who rushes home and tears off the clothes which she feels are the cause of her misery.

To get away from Landry, whom she now loves, she accepts an offer to go to the city, although he begs her to remain and marry him. Later the grandmother dies and appoints Landry's father as her guardian. She returns to her home and going to Father Barbaud asks him if he will accept the charge. At first he refuses, but realizing that the happiness of his son depends upon his marriage to the now demure Fanchon, he consents, and the formerly despised madcap has the pleasure of being begged by the old gentleman to marry his son. Needless to say she does.

THE SCHEMERS

Imp Release, June 20

Arthur Dennison, the only son of a wealthy man, selects the stage as his profession. His father strongly objects to the choice, and arguments proving unavailing, finally threatens to disinherit him should he persist in his determination to enter the dramatic field. Lucy, Mr. Dennison's adopted daughter, pleads for her brother, but the father remains firm, and Arthur leaves hime.

While he is absent Mr. Dennison comes under the influence of a clever adventuress with whom he falls in love and, unable to resist her fascinating wiles, settles his fortune upon her.

Through this woman's scheming Lucy is driven from home, and she writes Arthur to return and save his father from ruin, for he is persuaded to make bad investments by the woman and her brother.

Arthur hastens home and finally succeeds in opening his father's eyes to the true character of the schemers. Mr. Dennison, realizing what a terrible mistake he has made, forgives the boy and willingly consents to his marriage with Lucy. Thus Arthur wins a bride and a prospective fortune.

CLOWNLAND

Imp Release, June 22

Boyland—Girlland—Clownland—who of us has not bad our dreams of all three. This film will rejuvenate the elders and rejoice the youngsters. It depicts in simple sequence the heartaches and joys of a poor, little newsboy, who seeing a circus parade is filled with longing to witness the wonderful deeds performed within the tent.

The small "newsy" finds himself on the great day without sufficient money to purchase a ticket, owing to a slump in trade. He sobs himself to sleep on the steps of his humble home—and the dream-fairies escort him to clownland. While he sleeps, he is conveyed to the stage of the circus and placed in the chair of "The King," where, dressed in the royal robes, he commands the clowns to dance and perform their special tricks for him. These to the delighted child are marvelous indeed. Finally with a puff of smoke, the "King" vanishes.

The dream is over, and Teddy awakes, a disappointed little boy. Picking up his bundle of papers, he wends his way once more towards the enchanted spot, and gazes forlornly at the billboards. A kind-hearted stranger in passing notices the boy, and realizing how much such an event meant to him in his boyhood days, hands Teddy the price of a ticket. The boy is surprised and wild with joy. Thanking the gentleman for his goodness and waving his cap in the air, he rushes off to join the merry throng entering the canvas where his dream will be realized.

PRINTING UNCLE SAM'S PAPER MONEY

Special facilities were granted the Company for making the pictures in the Bureau of Engraving at Washington and the film shows the entire method from start to finish, besides illustrating the actual printing of the paper money, stamps, etc., used in currency. It also shows the method adopted for the destruction of defaced bills.

The picture is very graphic and entertaining as well as instructive.

THE RUSTIC MAIDEN

Eclair Release, June 13

Nell Knickerbocker, a wealthy heiress, returns to New York after four years' study abroad, to find that the daughters of her friend, Mrs. Van Kleeck have been so spoiled by luxury and good times that they are unbearable. The talented Nell promises to cure them, by masquerading as a country cousin. She pays a visit to the Van Kleeck household, and by her "rustic" manners and pranks completely conquers the haughty spirit of the disagreeable daughters. They take her to dinner parties, theatre and a dance; at every place she monopolizes the attentions of the men despite her pretense at awkwardness and "greenness." In the end she shows her musical ability, and wins for herself a husband who she is sure does not marry her for her money. The film teaches the lesson of humility and good nature in a clean spirit of jollity which will bring happy applause from your audiences. More "Rustic Maidens" are needed in thousands of American homes!

A LUCKY FRIGHT

Eclair Release, June 16

The scene takes place on a rich farm. The farmer and his family have just finished their dinner. As it is harvest time, all go to the field, leaving the grandfather, who is a paralytic, with his twelve-year-old granddaughter at home alone.

Shortly after their departure, a knock is heard at the door. The child opens the door and is frightened on seeing two tramps, who ask for a glass of wine. The men go out and the little girl bastens to lock the door. She hears them go through the yard and inspect the place. Seeing that the old man and the child are alone, they plan to rob the house. The tramps crawl in.

Having searched the place and finding nothing, one of the tramps goes to the armchair and roughly grabs the child and tries to force her to give them money. The helpless old man watches the intruder beat the little girl. A shot rings out. The father has returned to the rescue. The fright has strengthened the old man's will and, suddenly cured, he rises and embraces his grandchild. It is a happy ending.

LUXOR AND THEBES, EGYPT

A Beautiful Travel Film

Nothing is more emotional than the view of all these splendid ruins, which visualize all the splendors of the past civilization. The temples of Luxor and Thebes; the gigantic tombs of Ptolemy and the Pharaohs; the colossal statues of Memnon, all make a very interesting picture.

THE ISLE OF STRIFE (CUBA

Comet Release, June 8

Ever on the alert for interesting and novel features of an instructive and educational description, the Comet's camera expert bas just forwarded to the factory a series of scenes which will bring to the world of cinematography, a succession of pictorial facts, which heretofore bave been rather hinted at than reproduced.

Aside from the multitude of advantages with which nature has endowed this beautiful isle of the sea, the continual strife and political turmoil with which it has been invested, affords limitless oportunity for study and reflection.

Is it any wonder that with such an eventful environment, that tbis Paradise of tropical beauty should present such opportunity for pictorial display?

A succession of scenes, arranged in barmonious sequence from the entrance to Havana Harbor, follow one anotber, dazzling the eye of the beholder, and carrying with them a conviction that is instructive and permanent.

The first thing which meets tbe eye in the beautiful picture film is a panoramic view of Havana Harbor, one of the most beautiful marine refuges in the world, picturing historic old Morro Castle, with towers majestically skyward, and Cabanas Fortress, together with other points of interest, which will be readily recognized by those familiar witb the location.

A close up view of the ancient cathedral of Havana, where for many years rested the remains of Christopher Columbus; two of the most interesting and picturesque spots to be found among the exceptionally beautiful in the world of plants and flowers; Columbus and Central parks; next in importance comes the monument to the "Nine Students," wbose beroic martyrdom every loyal Cuban loves and reveres.

A reproduction of a carnival on the Prado, where more than one hundred thousand persons, in fantastic garb, celebrate the independence of Cuba once each year. The picture then carries to a remote part of the island, and shows the arrest, imprisonment, and trial of insurrectos.

A sugar plantation is most instructively shown. From the fields of cane to the hemp sacks, this wonderful industry is pictured minutely. Train loads of sugar cane are emptied into the troughs, which lead to the crusher; the crusher is seen in full operation, separating the sugar from the cane; the evaporator, through which a million gallons of water pass every hour; the government expert testing the syrup, and a score of other interesting and instructive views, which form part of the daily routine of this beautiful land of unlimited opportunities.

THE APACHE BALL
Lux Release, May 31

A clever skit on a high society craze is worked off in this highly amusing comedy. The Marquis of Faison gives a ball. He invites all his friends, hut stipulates that they shall attend disguised as apaches. All the guests thoroughly enter into the spirit of the thing and turn up looking the roughest crew that ever gathered together in a ducal mansion.

Two real apaches turn this to good account, and thus make a good haul to the chagrin of their imitators.

On the same reel:

ARABELLA WORKS TOO HARD

Mary Jane was too slow so Mrs. Jones promptly gave her the sack. Arahella was the next household treasure; she was too quick. She executed all her household duties at express speed and this caused no end of disasters in the Maison de Jones. Many testimonials of Arabella's energy are displayed. This chapter of accidents must have caused sorrow in the bosom of the worthy Mrs. Jones, hut the effect will be just the reverse upon amused audiences.

AFTER MANY YEARS
Lux Release, June 7

A splendid drama which portrays in a vivid manner a fine story of circus life. Great delicacy is needed in dealing with a subject of this nature—a subject painfully true to life, and one which never fails to appeal to the picture-loving public. Great delicacy has therefore been exercised in the production of this film, thus making a strong dramatic subject which no showman need scruple to throw upon the screen.

The plaudits hushed, the arena empty, within their caravans the sprightly talent of the ring removes its make-up and becomes mortal once again. In his van Richard, the clown, is wiping the powder from his face whilst he jests merrily with his little son. In the friendly shade of the circus tent his wife keeps rendezvous with the man who has alienated her affection, and for whom.

One master passion in the breast,
Like Aaron's serpent, swallows up the rest."

Louisa, the clown's wife, was as happy as any woman until Carlo, the dashing lion trainer, came upon the scene and caused her to forsake her loving husband and her darling child. Poor Robert is so upset by his wife's flight that he is no longer able to follow his old profession. His little son takes his place in the ring, however, and meets with great success. Years roll on, and the little clown becomes director of the circus. In his employ is a certain Carlo famed for his skill in the lion's den. He has succeeded in casting off the woman he so hasely deceived and congratulates himself upon the fact that she will not think to find him back again in the same company in which they first met.

Returning to her old haunts Louisa finds the man she has sought so long, and with tears and entreaties implores him to take her hack to his heart again. He pushes her roughly aside and is about to strike her when Richard the old clown, comes to her aid. Thus Louisa is taught the treachery of the faithless lover and is brought face to face with her much wronged husband. Overwhelmed with the sense of her ingratitude she falls at his feet and begs forgiveness. Richard is adamant hut his son appears on the scene and finally persuades his father to forgive and forget. He yields at last, hut is almost too late, for his poor wife, worn ont with her terrible experiences, sinks into a deep sleep from which there is no waking.

declaimed as notoriously trouble making. She decided to test her wiles and to try out her charms on Mr. Danglade and soon comes between husband and wife and brings an end to the happiness that has so long characterized their home. Danglade proves susceptible to her flattery and soon is responsible for great grief and woe to his lovely wife. She, hoping that his fascination would prove short-lived, waits patiently for a turn to the better, which looks impossible, however. One day, while entertaining Mabel Morton in his touring car, Danglade meets with an accident. He drives his machine over the boundaries of the road and precipitates it and its occupants down a sharp decline. Mabel is only slightly wounded. The machine is wrecked and he is seriously hurt. He is brought to his home, where his wife does all in her power to save him, but the doctor extends no hope of recovery. Mrs. Danglade ministers to her husband throughout his long confinement but decides that as soon as he regains his health she will leave him. He, however, is brought to his senses by the accident. He realizes the magnitude of the outrage he has committed against his wife and asks for her forgiveness, but she finds it very hard to condone all past injustices. He pleads and promises to reform so she takes him back once more. As agreed he directs a letter to his inamorata, Miss Morton, acquainting her with the truth—that the accident has taught him the virtues of his wife and led to their reconciliation.

WHEN MONEY ISN'T MONEY
Gaumont Release, June 27

Poor little Jimmie is the only son of a poverty-stricken family. His father has died and Jimmie is the sole support of three or four, who, however, combine their efforts with him in selling and trading in rags. Fortune smiles upon him one sunny morning when he finds a pocketbook in which a huge amount of large bills are bulging. He hurries home with his find to Mama, who rummages through the money, much more than she had ever seen, and finds the card of its owner. Inasmuch as this humble family is blessed with the most scrupulous honesty, she takes her little Jimmie in hand, and with one of his sisters proceeds to the home of the rightful owner of the pocketbook. Jimmie delivers it in person to his hands and receives the reward in the form of a brand new hundred dollar bill. Pleased beyond description with this unexpected fortune he proceeds at once to the clothier and picks out a most tasty suit. What is Jimmie's dismay, when the proprietor refuses to allow the suit of clothes to go out of the house unless Jimmie presents him a bill of smaller denominations, because he suspects that such a poorly clad little urchin could never come by so large a bill legally. Sorely disappointed Jimmie proceeds to the nearest cafe to quench his thirst, but history repeats itself here and he fails to obtain satisfaction because nobody will believe that he has not stolen the bill or that it is not counterfeit. He again meets with the severest kind of disappointment, this time by not being allowed to obtain a meal in a restaurant. There is only one thing that he can do. That is to get a bill of smaller denomination, whereupon he summons up his courage and goes back to the man who paid him this sum as a reward and asks him to split up the hundred dollar note into smaller change.

SHOCKING HIS FLOCK
Majestic Release, June 9

Parson Jones is very anxious to fire his colored congregation with religous zeal and enthusiasm. But preach and rant as he may, the colored brothers and sisters fall asleep regularly during the taking of the colection. The Parson and Deacon Jackson put their heads together and decide that some desperate action must be taken to save the church from going bankrupt. Electricians are called in and wire the pew of the church so that the parson can shock the occupants of any row of pews he desires. The following Sunday the congregation gathers in goodly numbers, but during the appeal for money fall asleep as usual. Parson Jones asks who will donate ten dollars to the cause. No one responds but when the Parson throws on a switch the first row rise as if they were extremely anxious to give away their money. The other rows respond in turn with equal spirit and generosity and the church members starts a revival that is wonderful to behold. If some bad boys had not introduced a ghost through a front window of the church the exit of the congregation would have been quieter.

ROOM 257

A thief, having registered at the Grand Hotel, sneaks into room 257 to make a "haul." The occupant of the room surprises him at work and is shot. The thief arranges the appearance of the victim so that the police will dismiss that case as a suicide but he forgets the stub of a cigar and also leaves the imprint of his heel on a piece of hotel stationery lying on the floor. While walking in the lobby of the hotel, the floor of which is being mopped by the porter, the thief leaves tracks which enable the clever detective to find him. With the aid of the cigar stub and the heel-print a clear case is shrewdly made out against the guilty man and the manner in which he is quietly taken into custody wins the admiration of all concerned in what appeared to be a baffling case.

THE ARTFUL CURE
Majestic Release, June 11

The pretty wife of George Hoper is a very charming woman, an excellent housekeeper and, in fact, all that any man could desire for a life partner. But the breakfast food craze has taken complete possession of her and she has reached a point where the mere mention of meat as a food fills her very soul with horror. Her husband eats his vegetarian diet with forced cheerfulness but the craving for a nice big thick steak constantly increases and when he sees his wife give a large juicy pork chop to the cat, he can stand it no longer, and steals the luscious morsel for his own dinner. The pork chop gives him an idea: "If one cat causes wifey to buy one pork chop, twenty cats should result in twenty pork chops." Hoper goes to a bird-store and after playing with the monkeys and rabbits buys a litter of kittens and several pretty little puppies as a gift for his wife. He anxiously waits for the dear little pets to be fed so that he can steal their food, but feelings can't be imagined when he sees his loving wife feeding them on milk and breakfast food instead of meat. Hoper becomes desperate. A friend shows him an article in the newspaper giving an account of a bad case of rickets caused by eating vegetable foods. He immediately calls his servants togetber and they all pretend to be suffering from the rickets. They paint blotches on their faces and fool the wife completely but she will not believe that the lack of meat is the cause of their illness. Finally, one night while she is peacefully sleeping and dreaming of whole wheat biscuits, Hoper paints her pretty face so that she awakes to discover that the rickets have attacked her in vigorous fashion. This is an argument in favor of meat that appeals to her vanity and, thoroughly scared, she orders enough meat to feed a menagerie.

On the same reel:

UP A TREE

The wives of several members of a fashionable club have been invited to an affair at which no men will be allowed. The curiosity of the men is awakened but they will not admit to their wives or to each other that they care anything about the affair. Hamilton Roe sneaks off to the ball at which the women are to gather and with a large pair of opera glasses in his possession climbs a tree from the top of which he can get a good view of the interior of the building. A policeman happens along and hearing a noise overhead looks up into the tree and orders Roe down. To his surprise twenty men fall out of the tree, each with telescope, opera glasses and all sorts of "Aids to the eyesight." The policeman is about to arrest them when he is told of the woman's meeting. He accepts the largest telescope and climbs the tree himself, but what he sees is rather disappointing.

ONE MAN'S LOVE
Reliance Release, June 19th

Belle Grant, a beautiful American girl, goes to a ball at the embassy and wins the attention of the Russian Grand Duke Boris. During the ball he removes Belle's slipper and drinks champagne from it. Next morning her father reads this escapade in the papers and is very much annoyed over this. And when a vaudeville manager appears and offers the girl a thousand dollars a week to go on the stage, her father vows if she accepts this offer he will disown her. However, nothing daunted, she leaves her home and goes upon the stage. Her former sweetheart, a young ensign in the Navy, follows her and begs her to return with him. But he finds her with the Duke and she laughs at him. As the companion of the Duke she finds her place in the midst of a very gay set. But after going the pace that kills for a time she finds that her vogue has waned. Cast off by her gay friends, disowned by her father, she sinks lower and lower. One day she is arrested upon the streets for vagrancy. When she is brought up in court she is fined fifty dollars or one year on the island. Having no money she is about to be led away when the ensign, who hapnened to be in the court room, sees and recognizes her. He steps to her side—pays her fine and takes her to his home where his housekeeper cares for her and when he asks ber to be his wife she refuses—knowing her own unworthiness. But he finally persuades her to accept his love for he forgives her freely.

THE FORBIDDEN WAY
Reliance Release, June 22

Jeff, a mountaineer, has an argument with his neighbor, Creed, over the boundary between their lands. Jeff hires a surveyor, Graham, to survey his boundary line. Still Creed is not satisfied with the decision and after a quarrel he shoots Jeff. Graham carries him to his cottage where Jeff's beautiful wife, Judith, cares for her wounded husband. When he recovers, Jeff shows plainly that he is tired of Judith. Graham's heart goes out to the woman so neglected and hurt. Before long he falls in love with her and she reciprocates his affection. He reads a sonnet to her from a volume he brought from the city, but she realizes that they are drifting too close to the forbidden way and so sends Graham away from her. He decided to return to the city, and writes Judith a note telling her of this. This note makes her realize the loneliness of her life after Graham is gone and, without stopping to consider, she rushes out to his cabin. She begs him to take her away with him. Meantime, Jeff has returned and, missing his wife and finding the note, he starts after her and finds her in Jeff's cabin. He accuses her and the surveyor starts toward them. At this second Creed, passing by, sees his old enemy through the window and, raising his gun, he levels it at Jeff. Graham sees him and just has time to push Jeff out of the way and receive the bullet in his own body. He falls to the ground dying. He begs Jeff to allow Judith to kiss him just once. Jeff consents, and the woman kneels beside the man she loves and presses a kiss on his lips.

THE BELLE OF BAR Z RANCH
Nestor Release, June 10

Jessie, the belle of the Bar Z Ranch, and Jack Howard are lovers. On the day of the cowboys' "hoe-down" Jack presents Jess with a beautiful engagement ring and Jessie promises to marry him after the roundup. They go to the dance and while there Jack dances with one of Jessie's girl friends and, during the dance, the girl is taken ill. Jack leads her off to a side room and brings her a glass of water. In the meantime, Jessie is proudly displaying her engagement ring to her girl friends. She turns to call Jack and, finding he is absent from the dance hall, goes off to look for him and finds him with his arms around the other girl. Their backs being turned toward Jess, she does not see that Jack is trying to revive the girl with a drink of water. Jess comes to the conclusion that Jack is false to her. The next day she sends back his ring with a note, telling him she will not marry him and that she wishes him to come and get his letters and presents, which he had given her during their courtship. Jack goes to Jessie's home and finds her very unreasonable. She will not answer his questions and, taking his love tokens, he sadly returns to the bunkhouse. The cowboys scent Jack's trouble and manage to make things pretty lively for him.

As time goes on and Jack and Jess do not make up, the other boys make up their minds to take their chances on winning Jessie for a wife. They put the proposition up to Jess and, in order to quiet them, she tells them to meet her at the crossroads on a certain day and lift her from the saddle in a fair race. Jack hears of this and on the day of the race he watches the boys primping and polishing up. He makes up his mind to play a trick on them and be the only man at the crossroads to meet Jess. He finds their horses tied up outside of the bunkhouse and unties them and drives them off the ranch. He then goes to meet Jess.

Jess is suspicious when the rest of the boys do not show up, so she postpones the race for a few hours. At the appointed time the race takes place and Jack is the lucky man. The rest of the cowboys escort them to the Justice of the Peace and they are married. Jessie is pleased at the way things turn out, but she will not gratify Jack by showing it. When he comes for his husband's kiss Jess is cold and distant. Jack begins to realize that maybe he has made a big mistake. He tells Jess that the Justice of the Peace is still there and, if she wishes it, they can have the knot untied at once. As Jack turns to get the Justice of the Peace, Jess tells him that she was only teasing him and that he is the only man in the world for her; that she loves him and has always loved him.

THE SQUATTER'S CHILD
Nestor Release, June 12

Dan Brierly has built a shack on disputed land. He has two daughters, Nellie, a young lady of nineteen and Edna, a child of five. John Colby, a big landowner, claims the land upon which Dan has built and, accordingly, with his son Ned, calls upon Dan and advises him to vacate. Dan refuses and John Colby hurries away to call upon the law for aid. On their way to and from the shack, the two men meet both of the squatter's daughters and Ned is exceedingly pleased with Nellie. The next day, Ned, with the officers of the law, call at Dan's shack, and as soon as Ned realizes that Nellie is the squatter's daughter, he sends them back, declaring he will attend to the matter and report to his father. Ned then proceeds to make friends with the girls and their father, but not with their hired man, the "harmless" half-wit, Pete, who is jealous of Ned's attentions to Nellie. Ned then rides away to plead with his father to allow the settler more time. The friendship of the two young people ripens into love, while the jealousy of Pete increases, especially after Nellie has refused his flowers. Ned and Nellie's trysting place is upon a small bridge. Here Pete makes one last appeal to Nellie and is not only coldly received, but upon forcing his attentions upon her, Pete is knocked down by Ned. Knowing that preparations for blasting are going on nearby, Pete goes to the place and, hiding behind a rock until the foreman's back is turned, steals half a box of dynamite and places it under the bridge.

Waiting under the bridge until the time when the young people meet, he lights the fuse, but Ned and Nellie leave the bridge a few minutes before the end of the fuse is reached. In the meantime, little Edna has observed the little light under the bridge and extracts the fuse. Pete, unable to bear the strain of watching the child any longer, has rushed to the child's father and confessed. When the men reach the bridge, little Edna innocently hands the box of dynamite up to her father. The half-wit is locked up for safe keeping and John Colby is so overcome by having his boy's life saved by little Edna, that he swears eternal friendship with Dan and relinquishes his claim to the squatter's land, while the young people are happily unconscious of anything save themselves.

THE GIRL AND THE SHERIFF
Nestor Release, June 14

Bob Warren, sheriff of Grass County, Cal., and Jim Stearns, a young man with a weakness for gambling, are both suitors for the hand of Mary Evans, an orphan. Mary refuses Bob's offer of marriage and promises herself to Jim. Jim is sent to town to sell some cattle and after getting the money for the cattle, he stops in a saloon for a little game of cards before going back to his boss's ranch.

At the door of the saloon, he is met by Bob, the sheriff, who, knowing Jim's fondness for gambling, tries to keep him in the straight and narrow way on account of Mary. He tries to persuade Jim from entering the place but Jim tells him he just wants to play one game and Bob's pleadings are in vain. Jim enters the saloon, where he plays Big Pete, a well-known gambler, and loses all his money. On leaving the saloon, he remembers the money he has in his possession which he received for the cattle and decides to take one last chance in an effort to win his money back. He is cleaned out again and staggers out of the saloon. Standing outside of the saloon, brooding over his misfortunes he overhears two men talking of a large shipment of money coming in on the stage coach and, in desperation, decides to hold it up. Going to a lonely spot on the road, he terrifies the stage-driver into giving up the box and hastens away. When the stage-coach arrives in town, the news is spread quickly and Bob, the sheriff, and his men immediately start in pursuit.

Jim, in the meantime, has blown the box open and is going through the woods on foot. When Bob and his men reach the place where the hold-up occurred, the men separate and Bob goes on alone. Following Jim's footsteps, he comes across Jim and is stunned by the realization of the fact that Jim is the culprit. A moment's hesitation gives the latter the opportunity to make good his escape. The posse, however, seeing the fleeing man, give chase but Jim arrives safely at Mary's home. The posse arrive at Mary's home to inquire if she has seen the bandit, and Bob enters the house, to observe Jim, terror stricken, biding in the room. The unselfish love which he bears Mary tempts him to forget his duty and he promises to help them escape that night. On leaving the house, he tells his men that the culprit did not pass that way. That night he brings the horses to the couple and starts them out in their search for happiness in a new land.

FOUR FRIENDS
Solax Release, June 19

"Sport," the dog, was uneasy that morning. Before Mr. and Mrs. Wilkins left the house to go to the factory, he looked at them with entreaty—as if asking them to stay at home that day. But Mr. and Mrs. Wilkins were poor folks and it was up to them to provide for their three children—the pride of their life. So they left the house regardless of the entreaties of their intelligent dog.

Tom, the oldest of the three children, was the "big brother" and he watched over the younger children with great care. That particular morning, however, after playing in front of the house, he grew impatient of little Gertie's slowness in the game and left her alone, while he and his sister went into the

INDIAN SUMMER

Solax Release, June 21

Mr. John Courtley and his son come to the country to occupy their new home. Mr. Courtley is a widower and his son is on his vacation from the University. Widow Smith, at the time of Mr. Courtley's arrival, is in front of the house trimming her rose hushes and vines. She turns around with a glad and hospitable smile ready to greet her new neighhor. To her great astonishment she recognizes in him her schooldays lover.

Both are now in the Indian Summer of their existence. They have spent the best part of their lives. But their environments have a poetic effect. The spirit of youth enervates their slow-heating hearts. Once more the fire of a love that was once extinguished, is now rekindled. The old folks renew a courtship which culminates in a marriage.

It wasn't very easy for them to do their lovemaking. Mr. Courtley's son and Widow Smith's daughter looked askance upon the old folks' attachment. They did everything to prevent their parents from being left alone, hut "love finds a way." The old folks outwit the younger ones and elope, much to the chagrin of young Mr. Courtley and young Miss Smith. However, they hoth find consolation in each other's arms.

This story permeates with that quaintness and compelling humor that is difficult to forget.

NO CHILDREN WANTED

Powers Release, June 19

In "No Children Wanted" there is a sparkling travesty in which is depicted the trials and disappointments of a father with a large flock of young children who sets out to lease a flat. He arrives with his wife, travel-stained and weary, buoyed up with hope. He applies to several landlords and janitors who show him scant courtesy as they take mental stock of his nine children and inform him that "No children are allowed" in their apartments. The family wanders from one apartment house to the other only to be refused. Night is approaching and they seek refuge in a park and the comforts of a bench where they sleep until morning.

As they are arousing from their slumbers a friendly policeman appears on the scene and takes in the situation. On being questioned the head of the family unbosoms himself and pours his tale of injustice into the ears of the officer. The copper meditates and then has an idea which he imparts to the troubled father. Acting on the suggestion the husband leaves his little flock in seclusion and boldly applies for apartments in an imposing looking house. He is questioned and answers that his family consists of himself and wife only. The landlord is eager to have him for a tenant and arrangements are made on the spot.

The family moves in. The father and mother pass inspection but are worried. Barrels, boxes, hampers and, last of all, a refrigerator are brought in by the truckmen. The door is hastily closed and from every receptacle a head pops out. The children emerge and are cautioned to be quiet. Noses are counted and after a search the baby is found in the icebox.

The mother of the landlord is an invalid and is confined to a wheelchair. She is left in a room and the curtains catch fire. The children smell the smoke and effect a heroic rescue. The landlord discovers the children and is about to evict the family when he learns of the act of the volunteer fire company and decides to allow them to remain.

TWO GAY BOYS

Powers Release, June 22

Billings and Meeker are two browbeaten husbands who are dominated by their wives. The women are leaders in a "Rights for Women" club and they neglect their household duties to show the way to their sisters in the cause.

On the day of an important meeting of the club Billings and Meeker are forced to listen to harsh words from their wives and are in rebellious spirits and ripe for mutiny. The occasion presents itself for an attractive looking young woman calls on Billings soliciting funds for a charitable institution. Billings is favorably impressed and, besides, his wife has just given him a curtain lecture. The girl is susceptible to flattery and before she leaves the henpecked husbands have arranged a little supper at which Meeker and her chum are to be guests. Telephones are brought into requisition and the affair is arranged to the joy of the two husbands.

They repair to the restaurant appointed and have an uneasy half hour waiting for their fair guests. In the meantime their wives are spellbinding the members of the club at a stormy session. The young women arrive at the cafe and the dinner proceeds. Meeker succumbs to the influence of the wine and becomes tipsy. Just about this time a young man calls and takes the solicitor and her chum away. Billings pays the check out of Meeker's wallet and lugs him to his home, laying him on a couch. Mrs. Billings returns and Billings eludes her. She sees Meeker just as his wife calls. Billings bursts in and accuses his wife of an affair with his friend. The women indulge in a hair pulling match whereat the men wax jubilant and the scene closes with the husbands getting good and even with their wives—a very funny comedy indeed.

MY WIFE'S BIRTHDAY

Comet Release, June 3

Children and dogs have been companions from time immemorial.

Women, who are mostly children in substance and reality, are the true source and responsibility for that insane love of the dog, which seems instilled into most of human kind from birth.

It is not strange therefore that dogs should form such close and affectionate association with womankind.

Mr. Brown, a worldly man, filled with love and affection for his beautiful young wife, seeks with no little effort for a suitable present for her birthday. A necklace of considerable value first suggests itself, and at great expense he buys it.

Returning from his office on the evening prior to the memorable event, he encounters a dog fancier who is giving an airing to a magnificent specimen of bulldog, of the brindle undershot breed, and remembering his dear wife's often expressed desire to own a dog, he then and there purchases it, at great cost, instructing the man to deliver the dog on the morning following.

Mrs. Brown being popular, and having quite a social following, is the recipient of many beautiful gifts to commemorate the event.

The living room in the Brown mansion has been elaborately decorated. Flowers and ribbons in profusion are everywhere in evidence, and the loving husband enters and examines the various gifts, attesting the popularity of his young and beautiful wife. Mrs. Brown presently appears and expresses her joy at the sight of the many remembrances, but the greatest surprise is yet to come.

The maid announces the arrival of the dog fancier, and "Buster," the husband's special gift, is ushered in. In a moment everything else is forgotten. "Buster" is made the especial object of attention, and "Hubby's" efforts to engage "Wifey's" notice are fruitless.

At the table "Buster" is seen seated beside his mistress; a napkin carefully tucked into his elaborate collar, and the daintiest morsels are fed to him oy "Wifey."

If "Hubby" addresses "Wifey," she answers with a faraway look, as she feeds "Buster" another choice morsel of tenderloin.

In the music room "Buster" is seen perched upon a richly upholstered luxurious chair, while "Wifey" sings to him.

COMING "THE HOLY CITY" THE AMERICAN PASSION PLAY DOUBLE REEL PICTURE

In short "Hubby's" reign has ceased, and "vivi la 'Buster.'"

Driven to despair he consults an intimate friend, who advises him to steal the dog and return it to the owner. This in due course, through strategy and deep laid plans is accomplished.

And the end is not yet.

The wife's tears and entreaties prevail upon him and he inserts an advertisement, offering a handsome reward for the return of the dog.

This meets the eye of the fancier; his cupidity is aroused, and to the discomfiture of "Hubby," the dog is returned to the Brown mansion by a confederate of the fancier, who collects the reward.

Deep laid plots, plans and schemes are evolved and resorted to in quick succession, but they avail not.

As a last resort, Brown visits an asylum for orphaned and abandoned infants, and selecting a beautiful baby girl, he arranges for its adoption.

This is finally accomplished, the infant is delivered in due course, and when Mrs. Brown sees the baby, she at once abandons "Buster," and "Woman's instinct prevails."

A dog farm. The interior of a foundling asylum, showing a score of infants in charge of nurses, are some of the features of this film, which is certain to occasion continuous laughter from beginning to end.

VOTES FOR WOMEN

Reliance Release, June 26th.

RELIANCE.

The scenario for this photoplay was written by Mrs. Mary Ware Dennett, Mrs. James Lees Laidlaw, and Mrs. Francis Maule Bjorkman, and the entire production was made under the supervision of the National Womens' Suffrage Association. By this it will be readily understood that it is not a burlesque on the suffrage question. It exploits the favorite theories of the Suffragists—their reasons for demanding the ballot, etc. The suffrage workers are vainly endeavoring to win over Senator Herman to their cause as his vote on a certain bill they favor—means its passage. May Fillmore, one of the most ardent of the workers discovers that the father of a little motherless tenement brood has died of tuberculosis after having vainly importuned the owner, Senator Herman, to make building alterations that will remedy unsatisfactory conditions. She goes to the Senator's fiancee, Jane Wadsworth, and succeeds in securing her help. Jane accompanies May to the poor bereaved family and she is shocked at the terrible lack of sanitation. They find three little girls and a baby left to fight the world alone. Elsie, the eldest, is doing embroidery sweat-shop work at home and minding the baby, while Hester works in a department store. The other tot is a half-time scholar and in the afternoons assists her sister working on corset covers for another shop. All these fearful conditions are pointed out by May and have their desired effect upon Jane. She is further shocked upon learning that her fiance is the negligent owner. Jane goes to him and pleads that he do something in the matter. He waves her away and treats her like a child. Angered, she joins the suffragists and assists in bringing both her father and the senator to terms. Hester is insulted by a floorwalker in her father's shop, which proves another shock to Jane when her father does nothing in the matter. Later she is stricken with scarlet fever which she contracted from the embroidery on one of her trousseau gowns which came from her father's store. The father and senator upon learning that they were in part guilty, as the embroidery was made in the senator's unsanitary tenement, give in and most enthusiastically join the suffrage movement. They are seen with the girls at suffrage headquarters, at the Men's League and finally in the parade.

The following well known suffragists assisted the Reliance players: Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, Miss Jane Addams, Mrs. Mary Ware Dennett, Mrs. James Lees Laidlaw, Mrs. A. C. Hughston, Mrs. Harriett May. Mills, Mrs. Charles Beard, Miss Eleanor Byrnes, Mrs. Raymond Brown, Mrs. Marcia Townsend, Mrs. Frances Maule Bjorkman, Mrs. F. Maule Cooley, Miss Inez Mulholland, Miss Anna Maxwell Jones, Miss Ann Forsythe, Miss Mary Keegan, Mrs. L. H. Ozedam, Mr. R. C. Beadle, Executive Secretary of the Mens' League, Mr. James Lees Laidlaw, Executive Committee, Mens' League, Charles Wadsworth Camp, Editor Metropolitan Magazine, Whitter Bynner, poet and playwright, Max Eastman, Secretary Men's league, Frederick Nathan, Executive Committee Mens' League, also assisted.

Among the Reliance players who took part in the picture were: Miss Gertrude Robinson, Mrs. Balfour, Miss Delespine, Miss Pearl Egan, Miss Gladys Egan, Mr. Charles Herman, Mr. E. P. Sullivan, Mr. J. W. Backus, and others.

BEFORE THE WHITE MAN CAME

Reliance Release, June 29

This story deals with the lives of the Indians who ruled primeval North America for centuries before the white man came. Meene-O-Wa, the fairest maiden of all the tribes of the Utes, was called the Yellow Rose because of her beauty. Wahtuma, the leopard, loved her but her heart was not given to him. One day in the forests she came upon a handsome young stranger. They looked into each others eyes and Meene-O-Wa knew that she loved him. Leaving him there she ran away but he followed her back to her father's camp. He went to the old chief looking upon his headdress of a single feather, told him that the man who won his daugbter must be a chief. Then considering he told Wahketa the stranger, that if he could vanquish the famous warrior Wahyums in a wrestling match, he might claim as his reward the Yellow Rose. Wahtuma, full of hate for his rival put forth his best effort in the fight that followed. And Meene-O-Wa stood by, her heart torn with fear that Wahketa might lose. But the straight and supple stranger soon had the master hand and slowly forced his more powerful foe to his knees, amid the plaudits of the tribe. So Meene-O-Wa was given to Wahketa and Wahtuma left them vowing vengeance. A few days later Meene-O-Wa while waiting in the woods for her husband is thrown from the rocks by Wahtuma. And there it is that her husband finds her dead. The bereaved husband carried his wife's body back to the camp and after handing her to the old chief he begs boon of the Great Spirit that he be able to kill Wahtuma. Rushing out into the woods he comes upon the Leopard and he gives him just one chance to defend himself. Before the fury of the maddened husband the other man's weapons are powerless and he is overcome and killed. Wahketa then returns to the camp to mourn over Meene-O-Wa's body; she has been avenged.

THE SERPENT

Republic Release, June 18

The serpent in this story is a beautiful woman of royal blood whose infatuation for a young artist brings snake-like methods for a mind distorted by jealousy and desire.

Jean Malias, a poor but talented artist, while painting the picture of his blind sweetheart, is driven from the Countess' estate by the caretaker, and as he is about to leave, leading his blind sweetheart by the hand, he encounters the Countess herself—she grants him permission to make free use of her grounds and also honors him by posing for a portrait.

During the sitting, the Countess expresses her love for the young artist and is spurned by him. The proud woman's rage knows no bounds and in seeking vengeance she resorts to the lowest degradation of womanhood.

She writes a letter upbraiding the young artist for the liberty he has taken with her, and further tells him that his conduct is not only a gross insult, coming as it does from a plebeian, but that her honor and that of her husband has been attacked. She craftily arranged that this letter falls into the hands of the Count, who after he has read it, plans with his wife to get the young artist to visit the estate again. They do this by sending him a letter signed by the Countess asking him to call and finish the portrait.

The young artist cannot resist the beckoning finger of fame and fortune that will be his if he finished the portrait, and unsuspectingly he goes to the estate; he is set upon by ruffians and badly beaten. The Countess relents as she sees the boy lying unconscious on the ground and throwing herself across his body, she confesses the truth to her husband; the Count befriends the innocent victim of the woman's wile and assists him to fame and fortune.

HER FATHER THE SHERIFF

Republic Release, June 22

The Sheriff, father of the girl and a handsome son whom he is educating at an Eastern College and his good wife, constitute the Sheriff's family. The Sheriff's pay is not princely and he finds it hard to make ends meet. He is sorely tempted by a dishonest cashier of a small bank who is anxious to annex for his own use a consignment of gold that is expected at the bank. The cashier, to cover up his tracks is willing to let the Sheriff and his friends in on a good thing; the sheriff falls for the scheme temporarily and covers his track by means of a false telegram calling him out of town.

Of course the Sheriff does not leave town, he is too busy robbing the bank and hiding the loot in a rendezvous in the wilderness. The gold arrives at the bank on time and disappears the same night. The cashier is found bound and gagged and tells a glowing story of a daring hold-up by a masked band.

During her father's absence the Sheriff's daughter determines to take the trail and run the robbers down herself. With two hounds and her brother's Eastern chum she starts out. The dogs readily picked up the scent and follow it to the robbers retreat where the girl discovers that her father is implicated in the crime. Her father has already repented his step in the matter and has declared to the others that he will return the gold, resign his office and let the law deal with him. While he holds up the others, the Sheriff's daughter secures the gold and returns it to the bank. When the cashier learns of this, he accuses one of the men of breaking faith with him and they are soon in a deadly clinch and disappear over the brink of a mighty chasm. Later they are found lifeless at the foot of a cascade, thus paying for their sin.

Coals of fire are heaped on the Sheriff's head when the President of the Bank writes him and congratulates him on being the father of the bravest girl in the world.

THE FLIRT

Rex Release, June 13

She was a flirt. She was very much of a flirt. She would think no more of a little encouraging coquetry than we would of drinking tea. The flirtation was the greatest indoor sport. Remember, she wasn't immoral, or really bad, or mad; she was simply an innocent flirt. We are not generous when we say this—we are merely just. Respect of that organ of many tunes called a man's heart was lacking in her composition. Such an hypothesis as that a man's love is a serious thing would be as funny to her as humor.

She was pretty, one of the cardinal requisites of a successful flirt—and all flirts are successful. She was graceful and gay; yet sometimes she would be filled with a melancholy seriousness and a meditative wistfulness; and it was while she was in this ultra-feminine mood that we thought that the careless and ruthless manner in which she abused and abased Cupid was not related to her real self, but rather to a wild, warring spirit that had somehow become associated with hers, and that her genuine impulses and auto-suggestive integrity were tender and true. Yet—she was a flirt.

Among the men who loved, worshipped and pursued her was one not much more than a boy. To him she was the world and everything thereafter. He was the most ardent and the most faithful of her human toys. Yes, she was everything to him—and then the rest. And smiling, cynical men and women who could remember things themselves called him "her dog."

The flirt had an aunt, a haughty, snobbish aunt, who owned a very beautiful and equally expensive summer home in the country. She contemplated a sail to Europe, and invited the niece to take possession of the property in her absence. So the goddess moved her temple and her followers their shrine.

There came to the summer hotel near by—a real man. None with eyes to see could mistake that—and her eyes were trained and tutored. Her pride, or vanity, or the indefinite but emphatic desire for a new triumph, clamored for the attentions of the newcomer. By wit, wile and guile she was determined to attract and interest him. He observed her advances with a kind of surprised doubt, an almost unbelieving understanding. His attitude toward her was almost obsequious, polite and reserved to a degree of servility. That's what she couldn't understand.

Then he left, and she sent her dog to follow him. He reported that the quarry had gone to the Riverside Hotel, and there she, too, went. And there she met him. She was in the dining room one night, hoping that he might enter. She called the waiter—and he was the waiter.

Her pride learned its merited lesson; she accepted the love of the boy—and what is more important, she returned it.

THE DIAMOND PATH

Rex Release, June 16

It isn't always strategy that detects crime, and it isn't always strategy and skill. It's strategy, skill and courage; and sacrifice and sincerity; and stubborn strength. Mighty qualities. In this instance there was a quantity of each, besides a few others that have no real names.

There's something brave and bold and individual about the name Dorothy—so that's her name. Dorothy happened to be a reporter, and a reporter always happens to be where things are happening. That's why she's connected with the tale.

Her landlady happened to have a daughter who happened to be the maid of an heiress.

There were two impecunious scions of society. To be accurate, they were impoverished. They couldn't make any money, so the next thing to do was to get some anyhow. They didn't waste scruples on the exact method of obtaining the necessary. The Diamond Path looked not so worse to them.

They conceived the kind idea of convincing their social friends that paste was just about the same as diamonds, settling the argument by substituting the bogus for the genuine stones. However, one of their victimized friends was not entirely convinced—and the maid was accused.

Remember the maid? Her mother, with fears and tears, told Dorothy all about it and then a few sentences. Dorothy determined to detect the real thief and exonerate the girl.

Diamonds, grit, cowardice, cruelty, criminality, bravery, the heart of a determined girl, vindictiveness, vindication, just deserts and gratitude play the leading part in the rest of the story. Dorothy and honesty triumph, and the end of the gentlemen thieves and the story are simultaneous.

THE PRINCESS OF LORAINE

Gem Release, June 11

Somewhere in the West of Europe, laying on a cozy stretch of fertile land, was a principality where love was king of everything and everything was fair. Peace, plenty and promise lavished their bountiful blessings upon the people. Their world was Eden, their politics friendship, their religion sincerity. Old King Theold—and happiness—reigned.

There was a princess, a bright, blithe, buoyant, vivacious miss, to whom life was a toy and the world a playground. The fires and forces of youth firmly emphasized the dominant spirit and the tender strength of her charming femininity. The courage and confidence of youthful years reinforced the happy contentment of her care-free nature. One would say she was the happiest bit of femininity this side of Paradise. Yet—often when the twilight fell, hushing the din of the day, and a lone star glimmered in the Western sky, whispering with wondrous witchery of the day's decease, she would sit in pensive musing and gaze across more miles than the eye could see, seeming to listen to a vague voice within her—the soft, still call of slumbering love.

Across the mountains to the Westward, nestling in the lap of the foothills, drowsed a little municipality in peaceful but unproductive slumber. The ruling prince had brains—sometimes Nature condones the misfortune of being born royal. He was a statesman. A long hereditary line of political marriage and mirage had subdued whatever poesy or romance he might otherwise have possessed. Moreover, he had the advertising instinct. He was not a visionary, but he had the foresight to realize that an alliance with the striving, thriving community across the mountains would result in good and gain for his own dominions. So he dispatched his heralds to advise King Theold that he was coming to sue for the hand of the princess.

The king was old. The years had written their weary record on the scroll of his soul. He desired the princess to wed before the grave sent its silent summons. He exhorted her to marry the prince; but the wee whisper of that subtle power slumbering somewhere in her soul wakened and warned her to war.

She donned the peasant's garb, left the grim grandeur and the menacing mockery of the castle, and went out into the world. And there she met one whom ages ago Fate had coupled with her, one who kindled into flame the spark of love and longing that had flickered somewhere in her superconscious being, like a torch showing her soul its way through man's defiance and destruction of nature's prerogatives, to the haven that had been designed and assigned for it.

She did not know that he was the prince incognito, nor he that she was the princess—such is the mystery of fate's mastery. But it was given them to see and know and understand—and wonder at the strangeness of a world.

THANHOUSER MAKES STARTLING ANNOUNCEMENT

To Issue Two-Reel Feature Every Week Regularly—Enlargements in Factory

Thanhouser Company, pioneers in the production of feature subjects, announce a startling step in this field. According to a statement just received from them, they will release a two-reel feature film every week. The New Rochelle concern was about the first to specialize in "classics" and other subjects of the feature order, and of late have undertaken the regular monthly issuance of such films. They are the very first manufacturers to announce a two-reel picture weekly. This release will be in addition to a regular weekly single reel. The Thanhouser release days will remain as at present, Tuesday and Friday.

To cope with the new feature-a-week order of things, many enlargements have been made at the Thanhouser plant, the most important being in the factory, where new developing and dark rooms have been added.

AMERICAN FILM MOVES ITS OFFICES

Amid the hustle and bustle of arranging for a big two-reel subject, entitled "The Fall of Blackhawk," the American Film Mfg. Co. moved its offices from the bank floor to the fifth floor of the Ashland Block, Chicago. The new offices are beautifully appointed with a series of private offices for officials and a large ante-room.

THIRD THANHOUSER FOR SUNDAY

Sunday has been selected as the release day of the third Thanhouser weekly picture. Sunday, June 23d, sees the issuance of the initial Thanhouser Number Three. "The Farm and the Flat" is the picture to go out then. As the first Thanhouser Sunday reel, and a comedy, it will be sought by Independent exhibitors.

Rutherford, N. J.—Permit has been granted for the erection of a moving picture theatre at the corner of the Boulevard and Division avenue by Mr. Denton.

Genuine Parts or "Dupes"

Do you know what is being used to repair your MOTIOGRAPH—Genuine parts or "Dupes"—

A genuine part is made by the manufacturer of your machine with care as regards quality and fit, and every genuine MOTIOGRAPH part is interchangeable with the part on your particular model—

A "duped" part is of the cheap "thrown together" variety made of cheap material by cheap workmen and made to sell cheap, without regard to fit or service.

It is up to you, Mr. Exhibitor, to see that only genuine long-wearing quality parts are used in your repair work.

We warn you but cannot force you to protect yourself—but if your dealer cannot supply genuine MOTIOGRAPH parts send direct to us.

THE MODERN HISTORIC RECORDS ASSOCIATION RECEIVE CONTRIBUTIONS

One of the most important and dignified organizations of the present day is the Modern Historic Records Association, the recently founded organization which proposes to hand down to posterity authentic records of personalities and events as they actually existed and happened in their time. No century or period has yet attempted quite such an important work. Only recently G. Bernard Shaw contributed a script, written on parchment which, with other valuable records, will for the present be stored away in the New York Public Library. Other contributions which are expected to be made in a like manner are Admiral Dewey's, Andrew Carnegie's, John Burroughs's, J. M. Barries's, Thomas A. Edison's and many others. Moving pictures and phonographic records of the principal events of history will also find a place in the fireproof building which the association has set out to construct.

The announcement that the Imp Films Company is to follow up the highly successful two-reel picture, "Lady Audley's Secret," with another two-reel photoplay of a similar nature, will not cause surprise. "Lady Audley's Secret" is one of the most successful and best acted pictures seen in an American moving picture theatre.

Jane Fernley, King Baggot, William E. Shay, to say nothing of W. R. Daly, scored the successes of their moving picture careers, so far, in "Lady Audley's Secret."

The successor of "Lady Audley's Secret" chosen by the company is "It Is Never Too Late to Mend," which is slated for release in the near future.

"It Is Never Too Late to Mend" is a magnificent Anglo-Australian novel written by the late Charles Reade, one of the most renowned and powerful English novelists of the last century. It deals with life and adventure in Australia and in England and is as full of intense thrills as "Lady Audley's Secret."

Further particulars of this release will be given from time to time.

Abraham Lincoln

SAID

"You can fool all of the people some of the time, and some of the people all the time, but you can't fool all the people all the time."

So, with a moving picture machine, a poor one may please "some of the time," while the best machine pleases "all the time."

Power's Cameragraph has pleased "all the time." A few reasons for this are:

FLICKERLESS PICTURES RELIABILITY SUBSTANTIAL CONSTRUCTION
ACCESSIBILITY

"101" BISON HEADLINERS

ONE, TWO AND THREE REEL FRONTIER SUBJECTS
SENSATIONAL MILITARY AND PIONEER STORIES

"A SOLDIER'S HONOR"

IN TWO REELS, RELEASED SATURDAY, JUNE 15

All the stirring, martial splendor of a military fortress. The young lieutenant, under fire for the first time, runs away. His father mourns him as dead, and when he returns in the night his young wife turns from him but guards his secret. Later, he redeems the honor of the family in a sensational scene in which the soldiers and Indians engage in a desperate struggle.

"CUSTER'S LAST FIGHT"

IN THREE REELS COMING! IN THREE REELS

The incidents leading up to the most tragic and heroic event in the nation's history are reproduced in this wonderful subject, in which a thousand Indians and a thousand soldiers take part. Some of the Indians who participated in the Custer massacre are seen in this film, which is a revelation in sensationalism. We cannot recommend this subject too strongly as an overwhelming feature.

"MEMORIES OF A PIONEER"

ONE REEL. RELEASED TUSEDAY, JUNE 11

A thrilling story, in which the old pioneer lives again the days of his youth when he crossed the wild Western country as an emigrant. The Indians plan to capture the wagon train and a treacherous half-breed secures employment as a guide and tries to lure it into an ambush.

The AMBROSIO release of FRIDAY. JUNE 14 is a split reel, "IF I WERE KING," a gorgeously costumed subject, and "ITALIAN LAKES," unquestionably showing some of the finest photography ever seen on a screen.

COMET

RELEASE DAYS--MONDAY and SATURDAY

The one big sensation in the Independent Motion Picture industry to-day is the remarkable improvement in quality shown by the NEW COMET COMPANY. All we ask of exhibitors and exchangemen is to see for themselves what the NEW COMET films are like before passing judgment. Don't take anybody's word for it—such criticism may refer to films produced under the old order of things—everything is different now at the NEW COMET plant. It's the present and not the past that concerns you. Get in line right away and see one or all of the following pictures and you will be very strong for the New Comet releases.

RELEASED SATURDAY, JUNE 15th

An Interrupted Wedding

(1,000 Feet)

A riot of laughter and surprises. Gorgeously staged, superbly acted and magnificently photographed.

RELEASED MONDAY, JUNE 17th

A "Corking" Good Western Reel

A Plucky Ranch Girl

(1,000 Feet)

Plenty of cowboys, Indians and good chases—a real story of primitive days in the Far West.

RELEASED SATURDAY, JUNE 22d

The Tale of a Rubber Boot

(1,000 Feet)

A comedy with dramatic interest. The odd theme employed in making this picture takes us from a Florida Orange Grove and Carolina Turpentine Still to the White Light section of New York. Perhaps the most expensive negative produced by any Independent Manufacturer this season, but it is at your disposal as a regular release through any of the Film Supply Company Exchanges.

RELEASED MONDAY, JUNE 24th

A Realistic Rehearsal

(1,000 Feet—Comedy)

Every exhibitor south of Mason-Dixon line (and north of it for that matter) will find it to his advantage to get busy advertising this picture at once. Miss Mabel Paige, the most popular young actress in the South and Southwest, is featured in this film. Southern theatre-goers will turn out in full to see their pretty little favorite in a photoplay that fits her to perfection. Get your S. R. O. sign ready when you announce this Star and feature film. The Mutual Film Corporation of Washington, D. C.; Atlanta, Ga.; New Orleans, La., and Dallas, Tex., handle our prints in the South.

RELEASED SATURDAY, JUNE 29th

Here's a Saturday Western for You

The Wild Rose of the Hills

(1,000 Feet)

Full of thrills and sensations. A novel idea—unlike any Western story you have ever seen. Watch for the synopsis of this picture—it's a thriller.

RELEASED MONDAY, JULY 1st

Jenks and His Motor Boat

(1,000 Feet)

A Nautical Comedy produced by the entire Florida Company. The Explosion Scene is a scream. The St. Johns River proved an ideal spot for the necessary scenic detail of the story.

RELEASED SATURDAY, JULY 6th

A Heroine of Pioneer Days

(1,000 Feet)

Another hair-raising, breath-taking Cowboy-Cowgirl-Indian feature. One of the best our Western Company has sent in. Just what you need for Saturday.

EXTRA EXTRA EXTRA

ON MONDAY, JULY 8th, THE COMET will release one of the most extraordinary one-thousand-feet films ever produced. The title is not announced at this time for reasons that will be given later. Get your programme in shape to handle it. One-sheet posters with each release.
Sold only through FILM SUPPLY CO. OF AMERICA. Send for Comet literature.

"Custer's Last Fight"

COMING! Three Reels COMING!

This is the most thrilling and sensational subject ever produced, in which a thousand Indians and a thousand soldiers take part in a re-enactment of the most tragic and heroic incident in the nation's history. The events leading up to the Custer massacre are accurately shown, and the sensational fight of General Custer, showing his last stand and the entire annihilation of his command. The public will go wild over this subject and pack every theatre that runs it. Don't delay in arranging for booking with your exchange. You cannot afford to fail to run this picture.

"101"--BISON HEADLINERS--"101"

"His Punishment"

1 REEL RELEASED JUNE 18 1 REEL

A lieutenant carries on a clandestine love affair with an Indian maid. He is promoted and transferred to a distant fort, where he marries the daughter of an officer. Twenty years later, the daughter of the Indian girl, whose mother died of a broken heart, wreaks a terrible vengeance on him. The entire "101" Bison company is seen in this picture, which depicts thrilling battle scenes.

"On the Warpath"

2 REELS RELEASED JUNE 22 2 REELS

The Yuma Indians make peace with the Government and are attacked by their former allies, the Apaches. A Yuma warrior, in a sensational dash, reaches the fort and secures the assistance of the soldiers, who plunge into the raging battle and save the Yumas from death. A tremendous cast is used in this subject.

MOVING PICTURE LEGISLATION

There seems to be quite a moil, and turmoil, in the minds of some of the good people in this world to make the worst out of moving pictures. There is before the City of New York a Bill called the Folk Bill which some people specially want to legislate against and introduce amendments which, in our opinion, will spoil the effectiveness of the Bill. The following excerpts taken from "The Reform Bulletin" (the organ of the Civic League of New York) and the other from the "Searchlight" (the organ of the Citizens' Union) we leave our readers to judge for themselves which is best and most suitable, and which will help forward the best movement. The Reform Bulletin makes very serious charges against the administration of Mayors McClellan and Gaynor, and, as the Sunday laws are being observed more in the breach than otherwise, we think the time has come when broad-minded legislators should get a Bill passed making the exhibiting of moving pictures and sacred concerts legal. We think that the New York State Exhibitors League of America about to be formed on the 19th of this month in New York City should make it a special duty at this meeting to take up the question of the reform of these ancient blue laws. People have advanced far ahead of these measures, and that is the reason that broad-minded, honest Christian gentlemen like Mayors McClellan and Gaynor allow the public to judge what is right. We hold no brief for either the "Nickel" or the "Folk" ordinances. We present both sides of the case to our readers and allow them to judge.

Quite a large amount of misapprehension through injudicious newspaper scareheads have raised in the minds of some of the people worries for an infinitestimal danger which has been magnified from a mole hill to a mountain and the bugaboo cry of fire is made to look like a great big bogey to scare poor innocent children out of their wits. We have pointed out in these columns that the fire is the least danger of the cinematograph industry and that the percentages over all other fires have been so small, and that if a good fire extinguishing apparatus is used in every booth we feel sure that such a thing as a fire in a moving picture show will be a thing of the past and so we present the two sides of the question to our readers and ask for expressions of opinion thereupon.

MOTION PICTURE SHOWS IN NEW YORK CITY

Shall They Obey the Law? Shall They Ruin or Uplift the Children? Protestants and Catholics Unite to Fight this Great Evil

By Canon William Sheafe Chase, of Brooklyn, N. Y.

If every citizen of Greater New York City who reads this article will write Alderman Ralph Folks, 1030 Park avenue, New York City, the Republican leader, and introducer of the Folks Motion Picture ordinance, and ask him to amend his ordinance so as to incorporate an official censorship of motion picture films before they are exhibited, as is done in Chicago, and also to require of the motion picture exhibitors to obey the Sunday law, he will do an effective thing to help a movement already under headway to accomplish the greatest moral uplift which New York City has ever experienced.

The wave of moral indignation at the illegal power of the motion picture business over the city government is tremendous. Two Mayors of New York City, nominated and elected by Tammany, have been giving motion picture exhibitors common show licenses for $25 per year, contrary to law. These Mayors ought to have sent the applicants to the Police Department who, under sections 1472 and 1473 of the city charter, are the only officials authorized by law to grant licenses to motion picture shows. The fee for such a license should according to law be $500 per year. The city has been illegally deprived of $475 for every time Mayor McClellan and Mayor Gaynor have granted a common show license to motion picture proprietors for $25 a year, which according to law should have brought the city $500.

Under these two Mayors, these motion picture shows have been permitted to give shows for profit on Sundays, contrary to law. Any one who understands political conditions can realize how much graft and contributions for so-called party expenses this may have brought to those political bosses who, under the last two Mayors, have controlled the city government.

Mayor McClellan made a feeble attempt for a short time to obey the Sunday law. Beginning about the first of January, 1909, he inserted in all common show licenses the express condition that the show "shall not be open or operated on Sunday."

Mr. R. J. Cluse early in 1909 asked for an injunction to restrain the police from enforcing this provision of the license inserted by Mayor McClellan, on the griund that the Mayor acted beyond his power in requiring the clause in the license which forbids Sunday shows.

Mr. Justice Carr in his decision on April 30, 1909, said: "An injunction will be granted pending the trial of this action, but so limited in terms as not to restrain the police from making lawful arrest from any act of the plaintiff or his employees which constitutes a violation of the Penal Laws."

Mr. Justice Carr in his decision indicates that he believes that moving pictures are forbidden on Sunday not only by other statutes but also by Section 2152 of the Penal Law which forbids "any dramatic performance or exercise" on Sunday. He says: "Now it is a matter of ordinary knowledge that from time immemorial dramatic performances have been given without the use of spoken words, played by living or lay figures. . . . ."

"Most of the moving picture shows are but the manifestation of the same art and may be properly classified as dramatic performances, verging in their most common form of farce, or comedy to the gruesome tragedy. This much has been held by the U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals under the copyright law in Harper Bros. vs. The Kalem Co. (N. Y. Law Journal, April 13, 1909). Of course, there may be and doubtless are moving picture shows which do not constitute dramatic representations; but in any event the Penal Laws of this State should not be so construed as to discriminate between different forms of the statute, one is as innocent as the other."

No effective effort was made by Mayor McClellan or Mayor Gaynor to have this case brought to trial, though repeated requests were made by citizens and civic organizations to get them and the corporation counsel to do so. At last, when the requests for such a trial were becoming more numerous, and the lapse of two years was making the matter scandalous, the clause in the licenses granted by Mayor Gaynor forbidding Sunday shows was omitted.

The Republicans in Board of Aldermen now have a majority with the help of the fusion members. They now can do effectively what Mayor McClellan had a perfect right to do when he inserted the clause in the license forbidding Sunday shows. There is no doubt what the court would have said, if the case had been tried.

If the Aldermen of the city are made to realize what is the sentiment of the fathers and mothers of the city, and of the Roman Catholic, Protestant and Jewish clergy against the violations of the Sunday which have begun since Mayor Low's administration and tremendously increased, as the years have come, the Republicans will take speedy action and come again into political control on the wave of this moral reform. Mayor Gaynor was elected by the vote of 250,000 people, but there were 330,000 who voted against him, divided among the two opposing candidates.

The men's clubs, in the churches, the social service committees of the Men and Religion Movement, and the pastors, priests and rabbis should at once not only write Alderman Folks but also the Alderman in their own district, especially the Republicans, and urge them to follow in the lead of the Brooklyn Young Republican Club, in this great moral reform.

Cardinal Farley and Vicar General Lavelle of the Roman Catholic Church are undoubtedly in favor of cooperating in any reasonable and effective efforts to procure the prohibition of motion picture shows for profit on Sunday.

The convention of the Episcopal Diocese of Long Island last month adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Social Service Committee and the Men's Leagues of the Churches be requested to work for the enactment of a Day of Rest Law similar to that recommended by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and for a law, making it easier to enforce the present law which forbids Vaudeville and Moving Pictures which are exhibited for an admission fee on Sunday.

If every one who feels strongly on this subject will write his Alderman at once, victory will soon be won. The Motion Picture Trust can have little influence over the Board of Aldermen if the united religious forces of the city express themselves.

REASONS WHY THE FOLKS ORDINANCE SHOULD NOT LICENSE MOVING PICTURE SHOWS ON SUNDAY, FOR AN ADMISSION FEE

By Wm. Sheafe Chase

First, Because such Sunday shows are contrary to the law of the state. Through the neglect evasion and inaction of officials this law has not been enforced. The enactment of such a provision in the ordinance will prevent graft and the expense of unnecessary trials in the Court.

Second. The moving pictures shown on Sunday should be in keeping with the educational and spiritual influences of the day. This cannot be maintained if the shows are run for profit on Sunday. If they are displayed on Sunday, it should be by the Board of Education or by religious and philanthropic organizations.

Third. Because Sunday performances rob the employees of motion picture theatres of their human right to one day of rest in seven.

Fourth. The moving picture shows have in many cases been the cause for great immorality against children, as is evidenced by the recent report of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. They are particularly dangerous places to be open on Sunday, because they have none of the sanctity and moral restraints which should surround young people.

SOME PROMINENT DEFECTS IN THE PROPOSED FOLKS MOTION PICTURE ORDINANCE FOR THE CITY OF NEW YORK

1. The lighting provision in the Folks ordinance which forbids darkness in indoor shows excepts expressly all open air motion picture theatres, although adequate lighting is more needed in the open air shows than indoors.

2. The Folks ordinance expressly exempts all existing common show motion picture places from those provisions in the ordinance against fire, such as forbid them being in frame buildings, in lodging houses or factories or in being above the ground floor. Fully eighty per cent of existing picture shows are exempted from those provisions which concern exits, courts, galleries and stairs, fire escapes and the contents of the basements. In other words the ordinance fails to protect the public in these ways from fire in most of the existing shows.

3. It has a provision which forbids the bureau of licenses to allow any social, scientific, political or athletic club, not under the direct management of an educational or religious institution, to give a motion picture show for more than one night in the week, even if no admission fee is charged.

4. One provision would prevent any Sunday School giving a motion picture show before 100 persons unless the chairs are fastened to the floor.

5. It has no provision for an official censorship of all films before they are exhibited, such as is the case in Chicago and many other American cities.

6. It makes no attempt to remedy the scandalous non-enforcement of the Sunday laws concerning Motion Picture shows on Sunday, which have arisen since the administration of Mayor Low.

The Police department under Mayor Gaynor has been notoriously inactive in preventing the commercializing of Sunday by Moving Picture and Vaudeville Shows. Ought the Republican aldermen lose this opportunity to secure enforcement of the law?

Notwithstanding these glaring defects, many excellent persons have approved of the Folks ordinance without amendment! Is there not great danger in these days that organizations shall approve of legislation which they have not carefully examined and considered?

AMENDMENT TO THE PROPOSED FOLKS MOTION PICTURE ORDINANCE, IN NEW YORK CITY

Sub-Section C. The Bureau of Licenses shall issue all motion picture licenses good for six days each week, not including Sundays, and all permits good for week days and Sundays granted by the Mayor and, by the authority of the Mayor, shall regulate all motion picture theatres and open air motion picture theatres, provided,

* * * * * * * * *

4. Each Motion Picture License granted shall expressly state that no exhibitions of pictures or songs nor any entertainment of the stage shall be permitted on Sunday in any motion picture or open air motion picture theatre, and that any violation of this provision shall be ground for the immediate revocation of the license by the mayor.

This, however, shall not be construed as forbidding moving picture shows from being given on Sunday under the direction of the Board of Education in Public Schools or High Schools or under the direct management of religious institutions, with the usual offerings but without an admission fee nor in private residences or bona fide educational, social, scientific, political, labor union, political clubs or institutions without any admission fee direct or indirect, provided, however, that permits for such moving picture exhibitions shall be granted as provided in Sub-Section J.

CHICAGO'S OFFICIAL CENSORSHIP OF MOTION PCTURES

Jane Addams is my authority for saying that the Chicago ordinance adopted in November, 1907, has worked well. It forbids any motion picture to be shown in Chicago without a permit from the Police Department, but provides that the Chief of Police shall issue a permit to all pictures which are not obscene or immoral.

The Supreme Court of Illinois, the highest Court in that State, is my authority for stating that Municipal Official Censorship of Motion Pictures violates no Constitutional provision. Twice this court has by unanimous vote sustained the validity and constitutionality of every one of its provisions. It was done in April, 1909, in the case of Block et al vs. City of Chicago (239 Ill. 251). The court clearly sets forth the answer to the various criticisms of Official Censorship.

1. It holds that the Police Department does not discriminate unfairly in favor of stereopticon views, when it forbids immoral films, for immoral stereopticon views have no right to be shown.

2. The Court holds that it does not discriminate unfairly in favor of theatrical dramatic performances, because there is good ground for the difference.

3. The Court makes it clear that official censorship does not destroy property without due process of law for the reason that the censors only reject immoral films and such films have no legal right to exist and therefore have no value in law.

GET VOTES FOR THE CHILDREN

Safety of children from fire and panic in moving picture theatres is what the Folks ordinance means. Profits for managers and owners at the possible cost of children's lives is what its defeat means.

On which side do you expect to find your alderman when the vote is taken?

Can you think of a word or phrase that describes the alderman who places profits of a show owner above the lives and safety of children?*

Let your alderman know that you expect him to vote for the Folks ordinance. Greedy proprietors of moving picture theatres are trying to get his vote. Go after that vote and get it for the children. When you have his promise, let us know. When enough have promised, the ordinance will be brought up for passage.

*We have a phrase definitely in mind, but it is unfit to print.

It is no excuse to defeat this ordinance because it does not deal with censorship of films. What it does deal with is fire prevention for the children.

Every alderman who will not vote for the Folks ordinance is against the children. Parents will be interested to see how the aldermen vote.—The Searchlight.

MOTION PICTURE REGULATION

Six Hundred Small Theatres Responsible to No Proper Authority—the Proposed Folks Ordinance Now Before the Aldermen

The Board of Aldermen is hesitating before the performance of a pressing and obvious duty. This is the duty of taking some decisive action on the proposed Folks ordinance regulating motion picture theatres. The proposed Folks ordinance may not be perfect, but the conditions it aims at must be remedied, and the sooner the better.

At present, there are six hundred small picture theatres in New York, which are regulated practically by no law at all. Section 109 of the Building Code describes the construction of theatres seating over three hundred people, but the Building Code takes no cognizance of theatres seating less than three hundred. The six hundred picture theatres all seat less than three hundred. Just as the Building Code is silent on motion picture theatres, so is the Sanitary Code, and even the ordinance under which motion picture shows are licensed contains no mention of motion pictures, as it was drawn before the existence of motion pictures. Under court rulings, the Mayor licenses as common shows, at $25 a year, all those picture theatres which do not give performances in costume. He has arbitrary power over such places. He may revoke a license for cause without court review, and he may prescribe conditions for the enjoyment of the license. The remaining places seating less than three hundred, which give a mixture of motion pictures and vaudeville, are licensed by the police as concert halls at $500 a year.

All these places are jointly regulated by the Building Department, Fire Department, Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, and the two license bureaus which control them, but there are no ordinances to guide the various departments in their work. There is no general code even of an informal character on which the several departments can act, and as a result there is conflict and duplication and, on the whole, a rather low order of regulation. There are no charges of graft against the departments in their motion picture work, but, as the Commissioner of Accounts has pointed out, efficient work is hardly possible in the present lawless confusion in this field.

The Folks ordinance was drafted by a committee appointed by Mayor Gaynor. This committee had before it the report of Mr. Fosdick made a year ago, and the general lines of the Fosdick report are carried out in the proposed ordinance. The ordinance would concentrate al the licensing power for motion picture theatres in the License Bureau under the Mayor. It would establish a maximum seating capacity of six hundred and would prohibit mixed performances of motion pictures and vaudeville in motion picture theatres. The Mayor would retain his present power of revoking licenses for cause, without court review, except in those particulars where the ordinance makes specific requirements. The ordinance would provide for the general construction of the theatres; would safeguard the booth in which the picture machine is operated; would standardize the interior lighting, ventilation and sanitation of the theatres, and would confine them to the ground floors of buildings and prohibit their existence in tenement houses. The proposed ordinance bears every mark of careful and scientific drafting and has been declared by Commissioner Fosdick to represent the best piece of motion picture theatre legislation that has been laid before any American city.

Hostility to the proposed ordinance has developed because it does not provide for an inspection of picture films by some legal authority prior to the time when the films are first exhibited publicly. In reply, the advocates of the ordinance state that the Mayor is given arbitrary power to revoke the license of any show which displays an objectionable picture. They declare that the Mayor, under existing court rulings, could in special instances require the submission of films for inspection in advance of their exhibition. They object to the proposition that public officials be required to certify in advance to the fitness of picture films and otherwise to refuse to allow their exhibition even for one day. In brief, the proposed Folks ordinance would give the Mayor power to prohibit films and would make this power final without court review, the penalty being revocal of license.

Those who oppose the Folks ordinance on the ground that it does not provide for a censorship before publicity, have before them the proposed Nicoll ordinance, which they are free to push with all their power. Without going into the minute merits of the discussion as to censorship, it would seem plain that the proposed Folks ordinance, providing for general safety and comfort along with the moral regulation of films, should be enacted at once. Many of those supporting the proposed Folks ordinance are vigorously opposed to the proposed Nicoll ordinance on the ground that it would establish practically the principle of newspaper and dramatic censorship. They point out that motion pictures are now used to portray news events and present-day social and political problems, and they protest against the suggestion that a city official be given power to repress in advance, without publicity, a film which might offend against the official's political or religious views. Those who support the proposed Folks ordinance seem to have the weight of common sense on their side when they challenge the advocates of the Nicoll ordinance to make a frank fight for that ordinance, rather than attempting to hold back the proposed Folks ordinance because it does not include the Nicoll ordinance.

In any case, the present situation, as regards the regulation of motion picture theatres, is chaotic, and some constructive action by the Board of Aldermen should be demanded by all citizens.—City Life.

MOVING PICTURE PATENTS COMPANY'S BRIEF TO ATTORNEY GENERAL DENIES SHERMAN LAW IS BEING VIOLATED

The Motion Picture Patents Company has filed with Attorney General Wickersham a brief setting forth its position as regards the Sherman anti-trust law. During the recent hearings in Washington, conducted with a view to inquiring into the status of the Motion Picture Patents Company, the claim was made that business conducted by the organization was operated in defiance of the Sherman law.

The brief presented to the Attorney General covers all the litigation which has resulted from time to time by reason of alleged infringement of patents by motion picture concerns not allied with the Patents Company. The claim is made that the Patents Company in no way violates the Sherman law and that the business of the company is conducted in accordance with the United States patent laws.

In the case of the Greater New York Film Company, of which William Fox is president, Rogers & Rogers, attorneys for the plaintiff, and Samuel Untermyer, who appeared as counsel, argued before Justice Bijur in the New York State Supreme Court that the Patents Company was exacting conditions which were in violation of the Sherman anti-trust law. It became known that the matter at issue would be brought to the attention of the Department of Justice in Washington.

As in the case in the New York courts, where former Justice Leventritt appeared for the Motion Picture Patents Company, the matter contained in the brief presented for the information of Attorney General Wickersham, the Patents Company points out that its patents claims are duly authorized by the dictums and regulations of the United States Patents Office.

It is the contention of the attorneys who prepared the brief submitted to Attorney General Wickersham that the patent law gives the patentee absolute control of his invention during the life of the first grant by the government. The patentee is at liberty to do as he pleases with the creation of his inventive genius and there is no law to regulate his actions so far as the partner is concerned.

He may keep it out of use entirely or he may charge what he pleases for its rental, lease or sale. In other words, the patent laws make the inventor complete master of the situation.

On the foundation of this patent law the Motion Picture Patents Company takes its stand, and further claim is made that all who enter into business dealings with the Patents Company do so with a clear understanding of the obligations imposed by the company. A denial is made that the company is in any sense a "trust" as defined by the Sherman law, and the Attorney General has been provided with sufficient authorities in the work of verification.

The controversy presents many interesting legal points, the matter has been argued and presented by attorneys of such nation-wide repute that the outcome will be watched by all who take an active interest in the motion picture industry.

IMPS READY FOR BATTLE!

A baseball organization has been perfected at the Imp factory. On Saturday, June 8th, they played their first game against the Van Courtlandts. From the vim and vigor with which they played and defeated their opponents, it looks as though they were in the field to make as remarkable a record in the baseball world as they have of the Imp products. The Imp team is composed of—E. Roakam, manager; J. Brandt, acting manager; J. Cohn, right field; J. Deagan, pitcher; George Robinson, pitcher; L. Ahrens, catcher; A. Lang, short stop; J. Daly, first base; A. Heller, second base; S. Robins, third base; I. Stolzer, captain and left field; H. Deutch, center field. Utility players—E. Gaudie, M. Joseph, A. Nurse, Ed. Loring and H. Hoadley.

The team is prepared to meet all baseball organizations who are either directly identified with the Moving Picture Manufacturing Industry or allied interests.

HERMANN T. MAY

For the information of our readers, we wish to state that Hermann T. May ceased to be employed by this company on April 5, 1912, and since that time he has sustained no business relationship with the Cinematograph Publishing Company whatsoever.

NESTOR

David Horsley, founder of Nestor, "The Worth-While Film," has made his periodical appearance in the East and is on the eve of returning to California, there to take up his duties as general manager of both the Nestor studios and all the other studios belonging to the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. Mr. Horsley will incidentally resume aeroplaning, having but recently mastered the law of gravitation. 'Tis said that a thoroughly up-to-date hydroplane named Nestoria was recently bought by Mr. Horsley, who delights in aerial flights. Nestoria will play a prominent part in coming Nestor pictures.

OLD THANHOUSERITES BACK IN HARNESS

Among the principals engaged for the new (third) Thanhouser weekly release is the leading man of a year ago, William Garwood. Followers of Independent pictures will at once recognize this handsome ex-Thanhouserite, and will rejoice greatly at the news of his re-engagement. Garwood is a native of Springfield, Mo., and a graduate of old Drury College in that town. He jumped into the acting end of the show business as soon as he was tall enough to pass for a man, with the Elitch Garden Stock Company of Denver. He has supported such celebrities as Virginia Harned, Kyrle Bellew, S. Miller Kent, Dustin Farnum and Joseph Wheelock, Jr. He has served in such noted "stocks" as the Auditorium, Los Angeles, and the Alcazar, 'Frisco. Some of his best Thanhouser work is seen in "Adrift," "Checkmate," "For Her Sake," "Baseball in Bloomers" and "Pasha's Daughter."

Riley Chamberlin, while never with Mr. Thanhouser in his film enterprise, was principal comedian in the Thanhouser stock company at Milwaukee for many years. He is, of course, a finished performer of comedy parts and as real "funny men" are a "scarce article" in moving pictures, Chamberlin will be popular. Look for him as Tom's father in "Why Tom Signed the Pledge" (June 14) and the farmer in "The Farm and the Flat" (June 23).

THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

President's Office, 1103 Mercantile Library Bldg.
Cincinnati, O., June 4, 1912.

Alfred H. Saunders,
Editor, Moving Picture News.

Dear Sir:

The motion picture exhibitors of the State of New York will meet in convention in New York City at Union Square Hotel, Fifteenth (15th) street and Fourth avenue, on June 19, 1912, for the purpose of organizing a state branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. It is very important that you attend as matters vitally affecting your business interests will come up for discussion.

Every motion picture exhibitor in the State of New York and the adjoining states should attend this convention. Self-preservation being the first law of nature, it is natural and right that the exhibitors should organize and co-operate together to uplift cinematography and protect their commercial rights and interests. You will receive information worth many dollars to you. Do not fail to attend the convention and bring as many of your friends, exhibitors, with you as you can.

A national vice-president to represent the State of New York in the National League will be elected and all of the state officers will be elected. I want to meet you personally in New York and have a plain honest business talk with you. We need you and you need our organization. An injury to one exhibitor should be the concern of all exhibitors.

We expect to have Pathe Freres and the Gaumont's camera men there to take moving pictures of the convention. A splendid entertainment is being prepared. Come to New York and get acquainted with the motion picture exhibitors from all over the state who are interested in you and the business you represent. The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America is now classed as one of the strongest organizations of the day. Please remember the date—June 19, 1912. We are depending upon you to attend and hope you will not disappoint us. When the history of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of New York is written, I hope your name will be among the list that future generations may read and know that you were a progressive motion picture exhibitor and believed in the uplift and future greatness of cinematography.

Very truly yours. M. A. NEFF,
President, M. P. E. L. of A.

MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF PENNSYLVANIA

Headquarters, 233 Fifth Ave., Roberts Bldg., 3rd Floor
Pittsburgh, Pa., June 7, 1912.

Alfred H. Saunders,
Editor, Moving Picture News, New York.

Dear Sir:

We respectfully call your attention to the convention to be held in this city on Monday and Tuesday, June 24th and 25th, by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, Pennsylvania Branch No. 3.

The object of the convention is to elect new state officers and organize locals throughout the state and promote harmony and progress amongst the moving picture men and to swell them into one big organization.

Arrangements have been made at the Monongahela House for accommodations and headquarters, and preparations have been made for a large number of delegates.

The convention convenes at 10 a.m. Monday, and continues throughout the day. Monday evening is given to the social events.

Tuesday, 10 a.m., the elections of officers takes place. At noon the H. J. Heinz Co. tenders an elegant banquet at their huge plant.

A street parade back to headquarters follows, where business of the organization is again taken up.

Tuesday night a boat excursion on the Monongahela, Ohio, and Allegheny Rivers winds up what we claim is going to be the biggest and best moving picture convention ever held.

We ask you to give this convention notice in your paper, as we are aware of the wide publicity afforded by this appearing in your journal and will appreciate your prompt attention in this matter.

We presume you will have a representative present. We assure him an interesting and enjoyable time.

Yours very truly,
M. P. E. L. OF PENNSYLVANIA,
Per Harry E. Reiff, Cor. Sec'y.

Motion picture exhibitors, let your slogan be: On to the State Convention of the Pennsylvania Exhibitors' League at Pittsburgh, Pa., on Monday and Tuesday, June 24th and 25th, as the committee assure you a good time. There will be business of great importance to every exhibitor in the country, and the Pennsylvania exhibitors in particular, taken up at this meeting.

As the election of state officers takes place at the convention, also the election of delegates to the national convention at Chicago in August, it is not only your right, but it is your duty, to attend the Pittsburgh convention, so that the state officers will be elected by the exhibitors throughout the whole state; in that way the state would be represented, and not only part thereof, so come to Pittsburgh.

We assure all a good time if you come. As the committee has made arrangements for pleasure as well as business for those who attend, there will be a banquet given by the Heinz Company, of the 57 Varieties, and a sightseeing tour of Greater Pittsburgh, and on Tuesday, the 25th, we have made arrangements for a parade, also a boat excursion down the Ohio River. We have also engaged an orchestra to furnish music for those who wish to trip the light fantastic; this pleasure will be of no cost to the organization, as Pittsburgh promotes progress. Our committee has ordered five hundred badges, and we want to see them worn by the exhibitors from all parts of the state and the country, and we will order more badges if you say so by your action; so come to our city and help make the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania, one of the largest state organizations, affiliated with the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

We remain, yours for one big organization,
M. P. E. LEAGUE OF PENNSYLVANIA,
Per F. J. Herrington, President.

EXHIBITORS' NOTES

A meeting was held recently at the Prince George Hotel, Toronto, at which nearly 200 representatives of the moving picture industry were present. The purpose of the meeting was to perfect an organization which will be known as the Ontario Producers and Exhibitors' Moving Picture Association.

The election of officers resulted as follows:

President, John Griffin, Toronto.

Vice-Presidents, W. K. Hill, Toronto; W. Roegnik, Lindsay.

Secretary, Charles Wellsman, Toronto.

Treasurer, W. L. Joy, Toronto.

A $60,000 motion picture house, to be known as the Imperial Theatre, is in course of construction in Vancouver, B. C., in the 700 block, Main street, for the Canadian Theatres and Amusement Company, Ltd. It is being erected of reinforced concrete on a plot 50 x 120. The seating capacity divided between a main floor and balcony will be 1,400. There will be a mezzanine floor with elegantly furnished lounging, smoking and rest rooms for both ladies and gentlemen. The color scheme of the theatre will be gray. Gray tapestry and upholstered chairs will be prominent features. Stained glass will be used very generausly in the interior. The pictures shown in this glass will be scenes familiar to the people of that province. Scenes from Stanley Park and other points of interest in and around Vancouver will also be depicted in this art glass. Similar structures are to be erected in Victoria and Tacoma modeled on the same lines.

From the amount of mail being received by M. A. Neff, President of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, at 1003 Mercantile Library Building, Cincinnati, Ohio, it would indicate that the enthuasim in New York is very strong for a state organization. Several New York motion picture exhibitors have already sent in their application for membership in the new state league. Exhibitors in every part of the state seem to be making arrangements to attend the convention. The New York picture men hearing of the good results accomplished through the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League in other states, they have become aroused to the fact that Providence only helps those who try to help themselves and as every other line of business is organized it naturally follows that the Motion Picture Exhibitors of New York will get together in one grand convention at the Union Square Hotel, New York City, New York, on the 19th of June and perfect a strong organization, and from now on they will have their representative in the councils of the National organization.

Several letters have been received asking where the writer can send his membership fee and to whom it is to be sent. All communications should be addressed to M. A. Neff, President of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, care the Union Square Hotel, Fifteenth street and Fourth avenue, New York City, New York, as Mr. Neff will be at the above hotel on the 17th or 18th of June, making arrangements for the convention.

As there are several exhibitors in the state of New York who belong to the Ohio State Branch No. 1, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, they are requested, if possible, to attend the New York convention, that they may be transferred into the New York State organization from the Ohio State organization. Letters have been received from several New York City exhibitors stating their willingness to co-operate with the state organization which will be affiliated with the National organization. This would indicate that the local organization in New York City is ready for a state organization, and in fact, letters have been received from several of the members of the local organization stating their willingness to assist the state organization.

Every exhibitor in the State of New York is not only invited to attend the convention, but is urged to do so as every exhibitor is welcome. A splendid time will be had and business that directly affects the interests of every motion picture exhibitor will be transacted. There will be several visiting members of the league from different states. Remember the date, June 19, 1912, place of meeting, Union Square Hotel, Fifteenth street and Fourth avenue. Time of meeting, 10 o'clock A.M. Let us all get together and give one strong pull for the benefit of the exhibitor.

A BIG NOISE IN CLEVELAND

Free Picnic to Patrons of Over 100 Theatres

Jot down "Wednesday, June 19th" in your notebook and if you are within a thousand miles of Cleveland around that date, stop over at Tomjohnsonville and see the most novel and gigantic "stunt" ever pulled off in showdom, the Monster Picnic of Cleveland Local No. 1, Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, to be held at Forest City Park, Wednesday, June 19th.

On that occasion everything in the category of field-day sports will be ripped off the program with dazzling rapidity, and in Olympic-Marathonic time. The list of events and doings of the day is of such magnitude as to preclude the possibility of printing herewith, suffice it to say that this midsummer frolic will totally eclipse anything ever attempted in this line. Cleveland Local No. 1 is going to play host on a large scale. Every League theatre is donating free picnic tickets to its patrons—from 2,000 tickets and upward to each house. On over 100 screens the slides are run daily inviting "Ma, pa and the children to come out and have some fun." Will they come? You bet they will and the committee in charge wants everyone who is interested in any way in Cinematography to accept this invitation as "official" and COME or send their next best "jollier" along. The average weekly attendance of the combined moving picture theatres of Cleveland is over 300,000 (three hundred thousand) so we reasonably expect this affair to be of sufficient importance to attract Pathe's Weekly and kindred current event reporters. We also expect a number of pictureplay stars of the first magnitude to enlighten this monster gathering of picture "fans" on "How We Frame Up the Dope to Get Your Dime," and similar educational subjects.

Don't miss this tip, Mr. Publicityman, if you want to make a hit.

Proprietors Kohl and Heintz are arranging for demonstrations of both licensed and independent films in the big auditorium at the Park—one of the leading natural beauty spots on the Western Reserve—30 minutes' ride on Johnson's 3-cent lines from Public square.

The League Committee of Arrangements is as follows:—Messrs. Ed. Kohl, S. E. Morris, C. F. Schroeder, F. M. Kenney, A. P. Anthony, Sam Lustig, C. F. Christensen, F. E. Simmons, George Heinbuch and Mrs. Louisa Schmidt.

Come on along! Come on along!

Yours fraternally,

SAM BULLOCK.

Exhibitors all aboard to the State Convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of Pennsylvania, at Pittsburgh, Pa., on Monday and Tuesday, June 24 and 25, 1912.

The committee has assurance that all the live wires in the moving picture world will be in attendance, and while they have made arrangements for reasonable hotel rates, and accommodations for a large number of people, the entertainment committee says that between the business of the convention and the pleasure there will not be one dull moment.

The national officers of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America will be with us, and as we are mailing to the exhibitors whose addresses we have on our mailing list, we ask you to answer same by return mail, and to those that do not receive same we ask you to write to our headquarters for postcards, also programs, as we would be only too glad to furnish them to all the exhibitors. The convention headquarters will be at the Monongahela House, Pittsburgh, Pa., so come to the convention; then when you return to your home town you can tell the people about the good time you had, and you will also say, HO PITTSBURGH, HOW YOU MAKE ME SHIVER WITH YOUR FINE WIDE STREETS AND YOUR SNOWY WHITE RIVERS.

We remain yours for one
BIG ORGANIZATION.
M. P. E. LEAGUE OF PENN.,
233 Fifth Avenue, Roberts Bldg.,
Pittsburgh, Pa.,
FRED J. HERRINGTON, President.

To the exhibitors of Pennsylvania and all other exhibitors that can come. We invite you all to our State Convention, at Pittsburgh, Pa., on June the 24 and 25, 1912. We have arranged for a large number of exhibitors to attend, and as there will be many things of vital importance to all men and women interested in the moving picture business, we want you to come and get acquainted with the benefits obtained through organization.

Our national president, Mr. M. A. Neff, and Mr. Christensen, the national secretary, will be with us, and we guarantee to all a good time as our committee has made arrangements for reasonable hotel rates, and many of the manufacturers of motion picture accessories have made arrangements to display their goods at our headquarters.

The Heinz Company has promised to take care of everyone who attends our convention and that they will not want for anything at the banquet, and if necessary they will add to their 57 Varieties. They also promise to give some fine souvenirs.

We have got out a fine program explaining the business to come before the convention, also the joys and pleasures we will have while assembled in the Smoky City. The convention headquarters will be at the Monongahela House. They have arranged very low rates for the occasion. Now make up your mind to come to Pittsburgh, and as we need you. you also need us to make the convention one BIG SUCCESS.

I remain yours very truly, HARRY MEGOWAN,
2d Vice-President,
Pittsburgh, Pa. M. P. E. LEAGUE OF PA.

"PORTUGUESE JOE"

Imp Comedy Release, June 29, 1912

"Portuguese Joe" is a sailor-man story, and it has all the atmosphere of a waterside theme. Joe keeps a hotel frequented by Jack ashore who play pranks upon him. They pretend to be poisoned by some mysterious powder which finds its way into Joe's hotel, and so they get cheap drinks. They delude poor Joe, and at the same time make love to his charming wife. When they have fooled the poor man to the top of his bent, they go away never to return. And Joe has quite enough of the sailor-man and his jokes.

It is a bright and animated little comedy that will be noticeable for the free and easy air that pervades it.

"THE DIVIDING LINE"

Imp Drama Release, June 24, 1912

In "The Dividing Line" we have a clever story woven around the very fertile theme of the Civil War. We see again the conflict between the North and the South brought to the focal point between individuals—two brave soldiers on opposite sides of the field intriguing for the love of one girl. She ultimately falls into the arms of the Northern officer, not, however, before her Southern admirer has shown himself to be chivalrous both in love and war.

There are some very fine military scenes in the picture which is acted with spirit throughout. War pictures are always popular with American audiences, and this one will probably be no exception to the rule.

The director of the play is Mr. Herbert Brenon, who also acts the part of the self-sacrificing Southern soldier. Mr. Brenon is succeeding alike both in his directing and acting.

"THE DIVIDING LINE"—IMP

JUST A BOY

BY VIRGINIA WEST

Adapted from Solax Release

MRS. ARMSTRONG leaned back in her automobile awaiting the return of her chauffeur, whom she had sent into a shop. She was dressed in deep black, and on her face was an expression of inconsolable sadness.

Two little street urchins began talking outside her window.

"Say, youse do it—do it now."

"Naw, I ain't 'till he turns 'round."

"Well, I'm hungry."

"If yer hungry g'wan an' buy yerself food. Didn't ye jest win me money?"

"Yes, I did, but they ain't no use buyin' food when ye can swipe it."

"Whyn't ye swipe it yerself?"

"Youse is littler and they can't ketch ye so good. Anyway, Tommy, ye know yer de best swiper on de block."

"Ah, g'wan. Ye don't need ter waste that hot air on me. I'm a-gonna swipe 'em in a minute. De trouble wid you fellers is ye ain't scientific."

For a moment Mrs. Armstrong was aroused. She leaned slightly forward to see the small mouth that used so large a word with such evident understanding. She saw a very small and very dirty little boy. The upper part of his body was clothed in a few pieces of a once-white shirt and over one shoulder was a part of a suspender which held up what remained of a pair of trousers, originally made for a boy three sizes larger than the one now wearing them.

But the boy's face seemed to hold Mrs. Armstrong's eyes. It was difficult to tell the color of his skin, but his eyes, a deep reddish-brown, exactly matching his rich auburn hair, sparkled like running water. His mouth was soft and curving, with the look of babyhood still upon it.

Mrs. Armstrong felt for her handkerchief and leaned back against her cushions.

A whispered conversation which she could not catch took place between the two boys. Then suddenly she heard a gruff voice say: "Here, none of that. You can come with me now. This thing's got to be stopped."

Mrs. Armstrong leaned from her car window and saw a policeman with his hand on the boy's shoulder—the little boy. In a moment she had opened the door of the car and hurried to the officer's side.

"Oh, officer," she said breathlessly, "don't arrest that boy—please. Hand him over to me and I will be responsible for him."

The officer turned with a scowl. "I wish you ladies would——" he began, but stopped short. Something in the woman's face checked him. "I beg your pardon, ma'am, but so many ladies is always interferin' with me duty."

"I don't want to do that," answered Mrs. Armstrong anxiously, "but I would so love to take that little boy home with me—if he will come."

"Would you keep him, lady?"

"Oh, yes, if I could, and if he has no parents."

"You ain't got any folks, have you, boy?" asked the officer.

The boy shook his head.

"Do you want to go with the lady?"

"I got a hunch it's better'n de station house."

Mrs. Armstrong smiled and took the boy by the hand. "Thank you," she said gratefully to the policeman as she turned to the car.

"What is your name, dear?" the boy was asked as soon as they were on the way to Mrs. Armstrong's home.

"Tommy."

"And your other name?"

"I ain't got any."

"Then you shall have mine. Tommy Armstrong sounds pretty good, doesn't it?"

Tommy agreed that it wasn't so bad, but he added, "I don't see no use of havin' two names though."

All of Tommy's companions had fled at the sight of the policeman and none were visible when the boy was ushered into the automobile. He kept leaning from the window and looking anxiously in every direction.

"What is it, dear?" asked Mrs. Armstrong.

"I wisht de fellers could see me. It's jest like goin' to a funer'l," he replied as he turned a beaming face toward his benefactress. Then his face suddenly changed as he took in the fact that she was dressed in deep mourning. "Say, lady," he said apologetically, "I didn't mean to say that. I guess youse been ter a funer'l, and maybe you didn't like to ride in de carriage. Who was it dey took away, lady?"

"My little boy."

"Did ye like him a lot?"

"I loved him very much."

"Then I bet ye didn't like de ride." There was genuine sympathy in Tommy's words that kept them from hurting."

"I went to a fun'r'l onct," he continued. "It was only Bill's grandmother, though, so I had a good time. I jest snuck inter one carriage when nobody seen me and Bill's ma had so many kids everybody thought I was one of 'em. It was grand and green in the place where they planted her. Gee! I wanted ter stay on the grass."

Mrs. Armstrong struggled to keep back the tears as she laid her hand gently on the boy's head.

"Tommy, will you be my little boy now?" she asked. "You shall play on the green grass whenever you want to and your clothes shall be clean and you can have nice food to eat and all of it you want. And, oh, I shall love you so!" she finished, drawing the boy to her.

He did not yield to her demonstrations, but straightened himself and looked at Mrs. Armstrong very solemnly as he answered: "

"Ye don't know nuttin' about me, Lady. I'm a awful bad boy. I guess ye wouldn't wanta take me home wid ye if ye knowed."

"Tell me about it."

"Oh, I gamble and steal and—and swear and lots of other things."

"Why do you do those things if you know they're bad?" Mrs. Armstrong asked.

"Well, a feller's got to do sumpin'."

"Who told you these things were bad?"

"De guy at de mission."

"Did he tell you that a boy who does bad things isn't always a bad boy?"

Tommy looked puzzled. "Naw, he never said dat."

"Well that is true," insisted Mrs. Armstrong. "And don't think you are a bad boy even if you did do those things. You'll try not to do them any more, won't you?"

"I'll try, Lady, 'cause I like ye, but I ain't agonna promise nuttin'."

"I like you all the better, Tommy, for not promising when you don't feel sure. Shake hands and we'll be the very best of friends, won't we?"

"You bet," agreed Tommy, as he put his grimy little hand in the soft white one.

Upon the arrival at the Armstrong home, Tommy was hurried at once to Mrs. Armstrong's rooms. Her maid was summoned and the situation explained and directions given.

"Now, I ain't agonna let no skirt scrub me," exclaimed the boy, with insulted dignity. So he was given the necessary utensils and introduced to a large tub of nice warm water and left to his own devices.

After many sounds of splashing, scrubbing and groaning, Mrs. Armstrong opened the bathroom door a tiny bit and said, "Tommy, may I come in and see if you are clean?" No answer. Very softly: "My little boy always let me see if he had gotten himself clean, and you are to be my little boy now." No answer. Then—

"Won't you let me come in? Please."

"All right," came in bubbles from the tub.

All Mrs. Armstrong could see was a little nose and two bright eyes and a fringe of very wet hair.

Gradually she persuaded the boy to come out of the water. "Tommy," she said, very seriously, "you must never be ashamed of your body, and you should not mind showing it to any one who loves you. You should be proud of it and take the best care of it. Bathing is one way of taking care of the body and I want to be sure you have done the very best for yours this time that you could. Won't you let me? I love your body because that is where the little boy, Tommy, lives. We must take good care of his house, you know."

Tommy hesitated. He wanted to please the lovely lady who had been so good to him, but it was very hard to change his view of things so suddenly. After a few minutes of reflection he came a little farther out of the water. "Well," he said, finally. "Well—all right. But I won't let that other one come in."

Mrs. Armstrong assured him that the maid had gone down stairs, and all was well.

After a supper, such as the boy had never dreamed of eating, he was taken to a room which he was told was to be all his own. There he and Mrs. Armstrong talked until it was time for Tommy to go to sleep.

She had sent down word that she was not to be disturbed under any condition, and the household was only too glad that she had found something to take her out of her grief.

"Do you think you can sleep now?" she asked, when the boy's lids began to droop.

"I guess so," he answered, "only de sheets is so flat and white."

When Mrs. Armstrong left Tommy she went to her husband. "Perhaps you will think I have been very foolish," she said, "but the little fellow captured my heart at once. I couldn't let the policeman arrest him."

Mr. Armstrong drew his wife to him and said: "If the boy brings you happiness you must keep him. Your happiness is the first thought of my life."

When Mrs. Armstrong went to Tommy's room the next morning she found him seated solemnly on a chair, dressed in the clothes he had worn when he came. He had insisted upon their being brought there the night before and Mrs. Armstrong had it done to please him.

"Why, Tommy," she exclaimed, "I want you to put on some nice clean clothes."

"Well, it was time ter get up and I didn't see nuttin' else."

The clothes were brought and the boy gotten into them. "How do you like them?" he was asked.

"Dey don't feel jest right," he said, "but I guess I kin stand 'em."

As the days went by Mrs. Armstrong watched Tommy anxiously. He was obedient and tried honestly to please his benefactress. But sometimes she saw him move uneasily in his unfamiliar clothes or look wistfully out to the street.

When they went to walk or ride Mrs. Armstrong was always careful to avoid the section where she thought there was a possibility of Tommy seeing his old companions. But the good lady was not very familiar with the wideness of the territory covered by one boy or group of boys of the city streets.

One day, about a month after the rescue of Tommy, he and Mrs. Armstrong were crossing the sidewalk to the automobile when suddenly the boy stopped and stood as if on the defensive. He saw what was coming. In an instant he was surrounded by a crowd of boys, all yelling at once.

"Look at the goil."

"Ain't he de dandy?"

"Say, get onto de sissy."

Mrs. Armstrong soon dispelled the group and hurried Tommy. "That was de gang," was all he said.

For a week he said nothing of the episode, but Mrs. Armstrong knew he was thinking deeply.

Finally he came to her and said: "It ain't no use. I got to go."

"Go where, Tommy?" she asked, anxiously.

"Back to de gang."

"Oh, no, you cannot do that," exclaimed Mrs. Armstrong, in alarm.

"Yes'm, I got ter."

"I do not wish to hold you against your wish, Tommy, but, oh, I don't want you to go back." Mrs. Armstrong began to cry.

"Aw, say, don't yer cry. I'll promise yer I won't never swear ner smoke, ner steal ner any o' them things. Honest! But I jest got ter go. These clothes make me itch."

"Oh, Tommy," begged Mrs. Armstrong, "couldn't you stay a little longer?"

He shook his head positively. "No'm, I been tryin' hard ter stand it 'cause yer been good ter me, but I jest got ter go."

Mrs. Armstrong was in despair. "But, my boy," she said, "what can you live on?"

"I'll black boots. I can make a fine livin'."

"And will you come to see me sometime?" she asked.

"You bet I will."

"And if you ever want to come back to stay, will you come?"

"Yes'm. But, Lady, I ain't used ter clothes like these here, an' they don't feel good."

Mrs. Armstrong realized that she was powerless to hold the boy, even if she would. She knew she could have him put in an institution, but she had such faith in his innate honesty that it seemed best to let him shift for himself. But she determined to always keep a watchful eye over him.

"Come to see me often, dear," she said, as he was leaving, "and when you need help of any kind come to me for it. Remember, I will be ready to help you in anything. Will you come?"

Tommy lifted his honest brown eyes to her face and said, "Yes'm, I'll come. Don't you feel bad, Lady, 'cause I'm a better boy than I was when ye got me."

Mrs. Armstrong put her arms around the boy and drew him close for a moment. As she released him she slipped some bills into the little trousers pocket—something to help Tommy make a start in the world—his world that called him back to it.

THE FIRST THANHOUSER SUNDAY RELEASE

The first picture to make the plunge into the Thanhouser Sunday seas—that's the day the new third reel releases—is a city-and-country comedy, "The Farm and the Flat." A city man wants to lead a rural life for the summer and a farmer has yearnings for a city flat during the hot spell, so they "swap" homes. But the exchange just won't spell bliss. In fact, the farmer finds the flat such a gold brick and the flat-dweller finds the farm such a "lemon," they set out to get each other's scalp. Murder is prevented only by the police. Riley Chamberlin, the new Thanhouser comedian, plays the farmer. The release date of this, the first Sunday Thanhouser reel, is June 23.

The moving picture men these days are not confining themselves entirely to stories and imaginative themes. They are becoming practical and instructive—alarmingly so, to quote Alice Coon Brown. Some of them are regular Gradgrinds. They are placing facts before us, disseminating information; they are giving us propaganda and arguing for causes. The opinion oft heard expressed, that moving pictures have been a little overdone of late, is wrong. The possibilities of moving pictures haven't nearly been realized yet and we are apt to hear more and more about the cinematograph as time goes on.

Every day we read of some new exploit of the moving picture. A recent dispatch from Wyoming says that a member of the legislature of that state has gone into vaudeville, showing moving pictures of herds of elk which are needlessly perishing from starvation every winter, his purpose being to arouse public sympathy to force the government to feed them. A school professor in Pennsylvania has been giving moving picture shows to raise money for annual picnics. A new "votes for women" film has been released. In Georgia, the Catholic Church will operate a picture show for the benefit of the Cathedral's renovation fund. In London, church missionary meetings employ motion pictures of the heathen, and philanthropic societies of all kinds are using the moving picture camera.

A recent examination of theatres held by one of the Boston churches resulted in the decision that the moving picture theatres rank the highest morally, "offering little that is bad and presenting many scenes that are ethically effective." There is so much that is interesting shown in the picture theatre that it is no wonder they are becoming the forum of the high, the low, the rich and the poor.

* * * *

And in order to enhance the standard of cinematography and to foster the interest now being taken in the field by educational forces and heads of children's societies, care should be taken in chosing the subjects for the many feature films now flooding the market and being shown in nearly every theatre. A number of these features are neither educational nor elevating, to put it mildly. The manufacturers of some of these feature releases seem to be turning to the "blood and thunder" action, condemned in the single releases, in order to cater to the tastes of the minority. Knifeplay, dynamite and robbery is in the preponderance, and it will not be long, if these subjects are not curtailed, before the entire industry wll suffer. There are countless subjects suitable for the feature film without descending to the easily written and produced "Jesse James" type of story. Forewarned is forearmed. A change in the character of certain feature releases is needed or much of the prestige now enjoyed in the picture field will be lost and the hard work of years on the part of moving picture journals to elevate the business will be undone. Happily, these sensational features are as yet in the minority, and such feautres as "The Coming of Columbus," "The Odyssey," "Oliver Twist," "Martin Chuzzlewit," etc., are a credit to cinematography.

* * * *

An instructor in English literature in a well-known university was our guest at a moving picture theatre the other evening. It was the first occasion that he had visited a picture theatre in two years, he said. He liked the entertainment but passed out some comments which are interesting. During the evening a split-reel comedy was shown. It developed the old story of the frisky husband who fooled his wife in order to get out to dinner with a friend and two actresses. The other half was a French film which told the story of a wife, enticed away from home by a lover. Together they went to a roadhouse and while eating dinner in an upstairs apartment, were trapped by a fire. The woman's husband was a fireman and the woman escaped identification by throwing a tablecloth over her head and having her husband save her from death while ignorant of her identity. Alarmed over her narrow escape from death and disgrace, she resolves "never again."

The pedagogue made the point that such films were not elevating and were written around the weaknesses of human character. "I would not care to have my young daughter see such pictures," he said. "I think the comic story is the most insidious of any when the story is suggestive," continued the professor. "The humorous plot should be strictly clean and fresh because many will condone suggestiveness when placed in a comic situation that would be frowned upon when presented in any other type of picture."

Our college friend objected to the pictures where the characters were cut off at the knees. "Why is it necessary to ruin an otherwise perfect scene with people who are devoid of feet," he asked. We told him that all manufacturers did not deem it necessary to spoil otherwise beautiful settings by cutting off the feet of their casts of characters, and he was pleased. He also noticed that certain directors in their anxiety to get their characters "close up," seemingly forget that the make-up is close up, too. One principal supposed to be afflicted with typhoid fever, had flushed up his cheeks too generously and when he appeared kneeless and with a face streaked like a Redman, he presented an alarming appearance.

A long message on a Western Union blank, without check marks and not typewritten, although sent from a city office, was flashed in one story. The audience required a minute or so to read it. The character who received the message glanced at it long enough to probably understand one word and then was overcome by the complete text of the telegram. "He read that mighty quickly," commented my companion. It was not impressive. A scene in the Northwest was shown. An unfortunate, crazy for liquor, appeared at a bar, grabbed a bottle, was captured and the bottle taken from him. Immediately afterward he discovered a valuable paper in an old canister. The proprietor of the place took a roll of bills, gave them to the man who had an appetite, and he started at once for a long trip into the interior. In real life he would have begged a drink first and then the money. He needed both—but the drink first. The professor also called our attention to that point.

Only little details, you say? Certainly. But a stranger to the picture theatre spots them at once. Many little details, in the aggregate, assume prime importance.

* * * *

At last there is a moving picture that talks. It was tested in London last week. A gay old rooster was thrown on the canvas and he proceeded to erect his proud head and crow. Then a man who was talking through a telephone made an awful face and accompanied it with a petulant voice. Then there was a lion's den with lions roaring in it. The test was regarded as a great success, but more of a promise yet than a fulfillment. Still, it showed that in a short time the moving jaws in a picture show will break forth in human accents. Now if these voices are not natural, but mere automaton voices, they will not add to the realism or the fascination of the moving pictures. A machine voice is worse than no voice at all. One can imagine a rooster may be made to crow or a lion to roar, but when it comes to the dashing gallant breathing soft words of love into his sweetheart's ear, that is a different proposition. Will it ever be?

* * * *

The Board of Aldermen of New York, in considering the new moving picture show ordinance, proposed to prohibit vaudeville as a part of the entertainment. The usual experience is that vaudeville is the detracting element of the picture show. The song and dance turn and the suggestive monologue gives to the picture theatre an atmosphere entirely different from that of the pictures. In fact, the moving picture theatre vaudeville has frequently a moral objection. Vaudeville, if not closely watched, easily drops into a coarse and rude exhibition. The proposal to exclude vaudeville from the picture theatre is an excellent undertaking and should have country-wide observance. Not all vaudeville is bad, of course. Neither is all vaudeville, particularly cheap vaudeville, good. Protection of the minds of both young and old against the pollution of the vile and vicious, is a worthy undertaking.

THE GARDEN OF ALLAH

By M. I. MacDonald

A couple of weeks ago an announcement was made in this magazine on the wonderful moving pictures of the Garden of Allah, brought to this country by J. Parker Read, Jr. At the time the article was written the pictures had not been witnessed by any member of our staff. Since then, however, the fortunate one to be present at an exhibition of these beautiful scenes was myself. To anyone who has seen the play the scenes in the pictures are familiar, and barring the color lent to the staged production by the artist's brush, and the intensifying of the lonely desert atmosphere by the light effects, the howl of the storm, or the intermittent snatches of the conversation or muttered prayers of the wayfarers against the great silence of the Sahara, the scenes in the films are even more realistic than those of the Liebler production.

THE SPIRIT OF THE DESERT

The state rights for these films are being rapidly sold out. To see them is to appreciate the grasping of the best opportunities afforded the photographer, by Mr. Read and the choice of time, location and incident.

As a prelude to the pictures of the Garden of Allah proper, Mr. Read has given us in film a journey through the beautiful gorges of Chablet—so lovely and wonderful that one marvels at the picturesque resources of nature. Then come the scenes in the garden—the garden in the midst of the desert which Count Landos paid $100,000 to the French government to water from the oases—the garden in which each newly discovered beauty spot seems more of a paradise than the last. Here have been found and photographed, the real characters represented in the play, even to the flute-player, who makes music among the trees and flowers all the day long.

Of the many interesting scenes, including the fertilizing of the blossom of the date palm, perhaps the most interesting is the dance of the Howling Dervishers. This is most remarkable, and unlike the dance as it has been presented to us here in America. Self-hypnotized, the participants in this religious function, after having partaken of a peculiar drug, commence to shake from head to foot. They then dance incessantly on one foot and then the other, put daggers through their cheeks, burn themselves with hot irons, etc., until they fall unconscious from sheer exhaustion.

The moonlight scenes in these films are absolutely ravishing, and the series all in all is one of the finest ever shown to the public.

GENERAL FILM PUBLICITY AND SALES COMPANY OBLIGED TO TAKE LARGER QUARTERS.

"Actions speak louder than words," and the fact that the General Film Publicity and Sales Company have so early in the game found their offices at Room 1008, in 145 W. 45th street, inadequate to their rapidly increasing business connections, and have been obliged to take practically a half of the eleventh floor of the same building, formerly occupied by the Actors' Society of America, is a wordless demonstration of the marvellous prosperity that has attended this young and flourishing firm.

Nat C. Goodwin, in "Oliver Twist," is filling the bill from start to finish as a film production. This film is reported to be doing capacity business whenever it is being shown throughout the country.

During the forthcoming week the pictures will be shown in Cincinnati, Ohio; Philadelphia, Pa.; Syracuse, N. Y.; Portland, Oreg.; Los Angeles, Cal.; Seattle, Wash.; Dallas, Tex., and in Canada. One week from this date they will be startling London, Paris, Rome and Turin, Italy.

Never in the history of the film game has any film been so quickly snapped up by film exhibitors all over the world than the Nat C. Goodwin "Oliver Twist" production.

New Installations Furnished by J. H. Hallberg

Among the new installations furnished during the past week, J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," reports the following:

T. H. Dakin & Son, New Berlin, N. Y. One Simplex M. P. Machine, with Hallberg A. C. Economizer and full line of supplies. Haines & Wyman, Dexter, Maine, one Powers No. 6, with Hallberg A. C. Economizer and supplies. David Miller, Jersey City, No. 4 Standard. Covert & Diamond, Mt. Union, Pa., No. 5 Powers. H. Hirschfield, Philadelphia, one Edison and one Powers Mechanism; Chas. Beseler Co., New York, one Edison Mechanism.

MADAME BLACHE'S PRODUCTION OF AUBER'S FRA DIAVOLO

By M. I. MacDonald

The time has arrived, so it would seem, when woman must take her place beside man in the majority of arts and professions of the business world. In women of the calibre of Madame Alice Blache it has also been demonstrated that there is a possibility of their so doing without being shorn of that most desirable of womanly qualities, femininity. Like Schumann-Heink, Madame Blache is an exemplification of a successful wifehood, motherhood and professional ability and practice.

From time to time the moving picture world has been awakened to admiration by the splendid work of picture production exhibited by the feminine director of the Solax Moving Picture Company. It is not so long since the "Violin Makers of Nuremburg," with its artistic settings and masterly action elicited the warmest praise from the public as well as the trade. Later on came the filmed production of the opera "Mignon," and now to demonstrate even in stronger measure the masterly capability of her hand, Auber's "Fra Diavolo" flashes upon the screen before our astonished eyes.

SCENE FROM "FRA DIAVOLO"

ONE OF THE CLIMAXES FROM "FRA DIAVOLO"

This production of the dashing little opera imbued with the warm, emotional atmosphere of sunny Italy, is a masterpiece. The story so well known to Grand Opera lovers is spicy, full of color and comedy as well as dramatic situations. The story in film commences with the entrance of Fra Diavolo to the Italian inn where Lord and Lady Allcash have stopped over night. Here a flirtation takes place between Fra Diavolo and Lady Allcash. Here it is also that the sharp eyes of the brigand, disguised as a nobleman, discovers the jewels on hands, and neck, and ears of the lady. Scene 2 shows Fra Diavolo out on the piazza in the moonlight calling for the servant who brings his horse on which he disappears into the night. Scene 3 shows him riding at a furious pace along the roadway and Scene 4 brings him to the brigand encampment in the mountains, where a peasant carrying a basket of chickens and who has been captured by them, begs Fra Diavolo for leave to depart in peace, which is granted laughingly by the robber chieftain. Scenes 5, 6 and 7 deal with the departure of Lord and Lady Allcash from the tavern in a stage coach accompanied by Fra Diavolo, and of their being robbed in the mountains. Scene 8 is in the Inn Terracine, where are Lorenzo and a number of carabineers of which he is captain. The carabineers are scattered about at tables drinking, drinks served by Matteo, the innkeeper. There is a love scene between Zerline the innkeeper's daughter and Lorenzo, followed by the entrance of the Allcashs, who tell of the robbery. Fra Diavolo enters in Scene 9 and Lady Allcash also tells him the story, at the same time showing the money concealed in her dress and a beautiful diamond medallion containing her photograph, and which Fra Diavolo claims as a souvenir. Scenes 10 and 11 cover life at the brigand encampment. Scenes 12, 13 , 14 and 15 show Beppo and Giacomo friends of Fra Diavolo, arriving in disguise of pilgrims at the inn, their concealment in the closet adjoining Zerline's bedroom, where they lay in wait to steal Zerline's money previous to making a raid on the Allcash jewels, and the pretty bedroom scene where on being startled by a noise in the closet, she prays to the Virgin. Scenes 16, 17, 18 and 19 show Lorenzo's arrival without, Zerline throwing him the key, his inopportune presence in her room before she is yet quite dressed, the arrival of the rest of the household on the scene, the stepping forth from the closet of Fra Diavolo and his wiley deception. Scene 20 is in the barroom of the inn where Zerline is serving drinks to the soldiers and, where Lord Allcash and Lorenzo stir up jealousies each in the others breast. Scenes 21, 22 and 23 pass over interesting scenes previous to the trappings of Fra Diavolo at the bell. The remaining scenes 24, 25, 26, 27 and 28 deal with events, leading up to the subsequent capture of Fra Diavolo by Lorenzo and his fall to death over the cliff in the struggle that ensues.

This is a three-reel production and more than does justice to the Solax Manufactory.

"WRITTEN IN BLOOD"

A Romance of Napoleonic Days (A Gaumont Two-Reel Sensation)

By M. I. MacDonald

The Gaumont release for July 4th bearing the above title, is a splendid illustration of Gaumont art and capacity for accurate diagnosis of public taste.

"Written in Blood" is not merely a sensational, slapdash battle story. On the contrary, it deals largely with the psychological side of human nature. It is one of those things which is coming to us from filmdom that appeals to the intellectual as well as the sentimental side of man; and in so doing entertains, educates and drops a suggestion for deeper thought, all at the same time.

The filmed story which deal with the period of Napoleon Bonaparte, commences for us just previous to the battle of Vanchamps, in which encounter the army of Napoleon defended French soil against the invasion of British soldiers under the command of Wellington.

Lieutenant Gerard, about whose particular history the story centres, on receiving a communication to the effect that an inheritance amounting to the value of $800,000 awaits him upon proper identification, in his surprise and pleasure shows it to his friend, Lesparre. At the call to arms Gerard places the letter in the breast of his coat. The battle on, they are both shot down. After lying for hours among the battle heroes strewn on the field, Lesparre regains consciousness, and upon so doing is terror-stricken and grieved to find his friend lying not far from him, apparently dead. It is at this point of the picture that psychological interest is reached. Lesparre seeing the letter protruding from the overlap of his friend's coat, pulls it out, looks at it and, having satisfied himself that Gerard is dead, and becoming suddenly transformed from friend to fiend, proceeds to change his identity to that of his friends by putting his own notebook in the place of the letter and transferring the letter to his own pocket.

In order to prove his right to the inheritance he bribes Bersac, the ex-canteen keeper of the regiment, to come and testify before the lawyer. Upon securing the fortune he proceeds to live in luxury at Gerard's beautiful castle home, after dividing the spoil with the ex-canteen keeper and his wife.

Meantime, however, Gerard has been taken from the battlefield. Finding a faint trace of life in him the authorities send him to the hospital, where he is brought back to health. Later he finds out his friend's dishonesty and visits him at his castle, when Lespar· feigns a desire to return the property. However, while king him about to show him the property, he takes advantage of an opportunity to lock him in the round tower. Here Gerard suffers for days with only some tame pigeons, who come and go through the loop-holes, to cheer him. One day he hits upon an idea, and tearing a strip from a handkerchief, he takes a pin and writes in blood, drawn from his arm, the words: "Imprisoned in the Tower. Help!" and ties it to the foot of one of the pigeons. The pigeon, upon being released, flies to the window of the Imperial Prosecutor's daughter, when she spies the cloth, reads the words thereon and ties in its place a like piece of cloth bearing the one word, "Hope." She inveigles her father to bring her to Lesparre's estate, where they find Bersac and his wife, who have already given back their portion of the spoil to Gerard, with Lesparre. At the point of the pistol Lesparre is forced to take them to the tower. Gerard is released and Lesparre imprisoned in his place.

The strange manner of his liberation endears two forms of life to him beyond all description—the pigeons and the Imperial Prosecutor's daughter, whom he afterward marries.

This film is very excellent and must find a place among intelligent audiences.

The live figure of Gerard confronts the Bersacs who have perjured themselves for the sake of Lesparre.

The imprisoned Gerard finds company in the form of pigeons which later prove to be his deliverers.

Gerard is informed that another claimant has been granted the valuables.

Released June 28th.

ON THE RIGHT TRACK

That the General Film Publicity and Sales Company have the keynote in the motion picture field is evident from the notices that are being received in the daily press wherever the films are shown. There is no production so far in the moving picture field that has been received with such enthusiasm as the five-reel all-star production of Oliver Twist made by the General Film Publicity and Sales Company.

Believing that this is the keynote of future greatness in the moving picture field, below we quote some of the criticisms received during the current week.

"Oliver Twist"

Distinguished Cast Seen in Moving Picture Reproduction of Dickens' Novel at Temple Theatre, Rochester, N. Y.

It is quite in line with the evolution of the moving picture business, that a dramatic representation of one of the best known works of Charles Dickens should be made upon the films, "Oliver Twist," which will be seen at the Temple Theatre, Friday and Saturday, June 7th and 8th. The purely mechanical part of motion picture photography is now sufficiently advanced to make the picture drama realistic and convincing, and the story of "Oliver Twist" possesses dramatic and human interest qualities to make it appealing to all classes.

Perhaps the most interesting feature of the presentation is the fact that the same cast is shown as appeared in the recent revival of the play in New York City, including Nat C. Goodwin as Fagin, Constance Collier as Nancy Sykes, Marie Doro as Oliver and Lynn Harding as Bill Sykes. With such a cast of players, the performance could hardly fail to be unusually impressive.

"Oliver Twist" a Drawing Card

It was a great day for "Oliver Twist" in Rochester, at the Shubert Theatre yesterday. Throngs were seen coming and going from early morning until late at night. When the count was made after the last ticket was sold, just five thousand and four picture patrons had viewed the five reels of "Oliver Twist," his trials and triumphs. In the cast is seen Nat C. Goodwin as Fagin, Beatrice Cleveland as Nancy, Mortimer Martine as Bill Sykes and Vinnie Burns as "Oliver." To those interested in seeing Dickens' works illustrated in picture form by America's leading players, "Oliver Twist" will make a strong appeal.

WARNING

The following films have been stolen from the office of the General Film Publicity and Sales Company: Orphan of Messina, Binks Toreader, Electrified Hunchback, Drama Under Richelieu, The Invaders, Miracle of the Necklace, Royalists Wife, Two Sergeants and Masinello Loves the Ball.

In the interest of everybody connected with the film business, we will be under the greatest obligations to all film exchanges and exhibitors if they will, should they see any of the above-mentioned films run, or hear any information concerning them, if they will at once notify the General Film Publicity and Sales Company, 145 West 45th street. Prompt measures to check this theft will at once be taken.

WHERE WAS MOSES WHEN THE LIGHT WENT OUT?

In the Gem darkroom. That's just where Alfred H. Moses is. The man who took care of the technical and photographic end of George O. Nicholls' productions for the Thanhouser Company is now associated with him in the Gem productions. Whether Mr. Nicholls is stronger for Moses than Moses is for Mr. Nicholls is a pretty query, they're so strong for each other; suffice it to say that Moses is one of "the chosen people" in the new Gem personnel. The only thing that's disagreeable about their association—from Moses' standpoint—is that they can't disagree.

EXHIBITORS' NOTES

The length of films required for an average performance in England lasts from 1½ to 1¾ hours, approximates 4,500 feet. Prices of the films per 1,000 feet range from $2.43 to $24,33, according to the date, the release and the quality of film. Important and popular events are often shown on the same day as their occurrence. The Grand National Steeplechase race, for example, is held in Liverpool, which is a little over 200 miles from London.

The principal race begins at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and is over in about seven or eight minutes. That night the race is shown in a series at some of the London music halls, the pictures having been developed while the train was running from Liverpool to London.

It is now quite the custom for moving pictures to form part of the programme at the music halls, fifty-two of which were licensed by the London County Council during the year ending with September, 1910. Outside Greater London these theatres are licensed by the local borough councils. There is a considerable number of firms engaged in manufacturing moving picture films, the total average production being estimated at about 130,000 feet of film per week. Competition is said to be very keen.

* * * *

A draft of a moving picture ordinance was presented by Joseph G. Wolber to the committee on licenses of the Common Council of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Newark recently.

One of the changes that would be brought about by the passage of the ordinance would be the payment of the license fee in sums of $75 every three months instead of by the present plan of $1 a day.

Another clause provides that the building containing a theatre be constructed of non-combustible material, and shall not be used for any other purpose than a theatre. The building may not be more than one story in height, although the roof may be utilized as a roof garden, and there shall be no cellar under the stage.

The proposed ordinance makes provision for not less than two exits. It also requires that all aisles be not less than four feet wide and kept free from obstruction. Provision is also made for sufficient light to insure a clear view of the auditorium at all times.

Many of the provisions of the code are, in effect, what the various municipal departments interested in these theatres have been fighting for. There is, however, a provision affecting open-air theatres that is decidedly new. It reads:

"The floors of all open-air motion picture theatres shall be of cement construction, to consist of at least four inches of concrete and one inch cement top.

The Lyric Theatre in Minneapolis, a Shubert house, which has been playing road attractions for several years, has been leased from Herman Fehr, Milwaukee theatrical magnate, according to announcement yesterday by the Saxe Bros. Amusement Enterprise. The house will be operated as a moving picture theatre.

The deal is reported to have involved approximately $30,000. The house has been leased for seven years for moving picture purposes.

The Powers Studio is one of the most frequently visited moving picture places in New York. The studio and stage are located on an eminence near Spuyten Duyvil Creek with a grove and beautiful grounds. There is always a cool breeze, and actors come out for a day to enjoy the picturesque surroundings.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Successful Photoplaywright

A. W. Thomas, successful script writer, is the new editor of the Questions and Answers department of the Photoplay Magazine, and is also an associate editor of that publication. Much of the information published monthly in the magazine of interest to writers is compiled by Mr. Thomas. Like most of the other successful ones, A. W. Thomas is a newspaperman. He is now actively engaged as telegraph editor of the Marion (Ohio) Daily Star, owned by the former Lieutenant Governor of Ohio, Warren G. Harding. Thomas was born at East Liverpool, Ohio, has served as a feature writer on Cleveland and Pittsburgh newspapers, has written for a leading New York financial weekly, and is the author of many storyized films for motion picture magazines.

MR. A. W. THOMAS

Quite Entertaining

We read recently an argument to the effect that scenario editors should carefully foster embryonic talent, after the method of magazine impresarios. The article stated that the future of the motion picture industry depended upon the script writer and intimated that a fund should be maintained by each manufacturer to pay expenses of an agent who should travel about calling upon those who show talent for script writing. The author of the article said all first-class magazines had such an agent. Where he got his information regarding the traveling benefactor we do not know. The writer of this has been "milling" fiction, special articles, features, alleged jokes, jingles and picture plays for years, and never yet has he heard of the agent traveling around the country calling upon hopeful writers.

Occasionally a promising writer will be summoned into a magazine or publishing office with his expenses paid; occasionally some member of the magazine staff will be sent to see a writer who may be assigned to picture a special feature article, but for film manufacturers to keep a kindergarten manager traveling over the country is not practical. The fact is that the film editor can give the magazine editor cards and spades when it comes to discovering the diamond in the rough and encouraging promising talent. One of the best script writers to-day tried three times on his primary script before it met with the satisfaction of the editor, who had told him to try it again and again.

If that first script in the form of a story had been submitted to a magazine reader, the weakness would not have been pointed out and the encouraging "write it over" would not have been forthcoming. We receive letters nearly every day from new writers who allude to this and that scenario editor as the one who has encouraged their work. Not only are the scenario editors fostering new writers and developing their talent by kind words, but they are also developing new writers of fiction for the better class of magazines.

A magazine editor of our acquaintance, in writing us recently, said he believed that from the army of picture-play writers a number of able authors of magazine and book fiction would step forth. Script writing is the best training in the world for the author because it teaches condensation. The weakness of nine out of ten would-be magazine and script writers to-day is the fact that they hide the real story under an avalanche of high-sounding words, useless description, and supposed fine writing. Fine writing should be avoided in all cases.

Number of Scenes

Several of our readers have asked the number of scenes that a picturepleay should contain, and we cannot do better than quote from a statement made by R. D. Armstrong, editor of the American Film Company. His advice to the beginner in the Scenario Magazine is as follows:

"There is one thing the amateur motion picture playwright sometimes overlooks, and which is absolutely essential to success. I refer to the number of scenes in which the story is told. Some writers drag out scene after scene that has no bearing whatever on the working out of the plot, but are inserted only because they are pretty.

"A motion picture film of approximately one thousand feet in length is projected on the screen in about twenty minutes. It is obvious that the same length of time is required in the taking of the picture. Hence, a story written for motion picture production should be carefully constructed to tell the salient points of action in as few scenes as possible.

"A manuscript containing twenty scenes for a thousand-foot picture will have a possible average of fifty feet to describe the action in each scene, and fifty feet of pictures will be taken by a camera in approximately one minute.

"Of course, it is understood that some scenes are often two hundred feet in length, the action covering a period of four minutes, but it is also true that other scenes must necessarily be made shorter in order to not exceed the length of film on a standard reel.

"Manuscripts requiring thirty to forty scenes to describe a story must naturally suffer, as the time of action for each scene is shortened by each scene inserted. So far, I have not taken into consideration the subtitles, letters or other matter inserted in a film that give clarity to the story. Of course, the ideal picture is the one in which subtitles are unnecessary, but most pictures contain from five to fourteen titles, thus consuming a good average of one hundred feet of film that must be subtracted from the original thousand feet.

"If the writer of a picture story would visualize the scenes of his manuscript, estimating the actual time each scene requires to be enacted, he would readily see the value of a clear, concise description of action, without superfluous scenes, which will only be "chopped out" or "trimmed" in the finishing room of the factory, should they by any accident get by the producer.

"Each scene should have a bearing on the other, taking as few characters as possible to work out the idea, bringing them step by step to the climax of the story, and if the plot is a good one, the author will have little difficulty in finding a ready purchaser."

Try and See It

Our advice to Oklahoma City, and to several others, is this: Do not rush in where angels fear to tread. Try and see your action. Picture each scene in your mind's eye. Group the entire setting, the action of the characters, the logical development of the plot. If you will put down on paper just what you see in your imaginary picture, your style will care for itself. Condensation will come more naturally, and that fancy text teeming with impressive adjectives will be supplanted by good clear English, each word fraught with significant meaning. Did you ever lie in bed conjuring up mental pictures of this and that, in order to court sleep the more quickly? The mental process is the same in writing the pictureplay. Try and picture each character, each motif, each scene, and try and imagine yourself a principal, or one that is present during the action you seek to narrate. We know of one script writer who keeps paper and pencil handy by his bed, and when inspiration comes to him, he seizes the material and jots down his thought.

Everyone has a certain method of working out his ideas, but the successful writer, in whatever literary field he may labor, must have the imaginative power to see the creatures of his brain perform before he can hope to make others appreciate his ideas successfully. In writing a pictureplay imagine your work being produced, and with your knowledge of the picture screen, you will soon come to ascertain whether you have a simple, coherent story—the story with a "punch." Careful analysis of the pictureplays on the screen, their study with an attempt to learn the whys and wherefores of the playlet, is an indispensable custom for both the beginner and the writer further along in the script writing art.

As for plots and ideas, they come to one by inspiration. There may be a good idea or germ for a plot right in your front yard, at the corner grocery, in a street car. The original idea does not announce its presence. Soon it is gone. But it is before you every day if you will but seize it. Power of observation, a knowledge of human nature, the knack of looking underneath the ostensible surface of things that are, all these make inspiration and originality. These powers are all developed in the newspaper office. Therefore if you feel that you just must have schooling in the art of writing, get a job under some city editor. He will paste your copy on the wall with sarcastic remarks written on the margin; he will tear your most carefully written article into pieces; and he will "boil down" that five pages of stuff into one hundred words of good quick action. But you will be taught to write and instead of paying out tuition money you will get a pay envelope while attending the best school in the world for the literary aspirant.

Now Eighty-eight Optimists

"The Order of Optimists," originated by Mr. Van Buren Powell, has increased in membership to eighty-eight. A Massachusetts friend suggests the first convention for next summer in New York City—a sort of "barn raisin'" or "berry pickin'" as it were. All who enter the Optimistic Order, remember, leave ideas of "plot stealing," "favored writers," etc., behind. All are welcome. We herewith notify "Spectator" of the Mirror, and Sargent, of the World, that two of our most prominent members suggest these popular editors immediately institute chapters in their publications, so that the "Order of Optimists" many flourish like unto a green bay tree. We pass along the request certain in the knowledge that cognizance will be taken thereof.

GAUMONT POST CARDS.

Accompanying the two forthcoming big feature releases, "Bells of Paradise," a two-reel hand-colored release, Thursday, June 20, and "Written in Blood," a two-reel battle story to be released on July 4th, the Gaumont Company has arranged to have a full supply of post card illustrations. Two of these are already off the press, both being exact reproductions of the three-sheet lithographs accompanying each of these productions. They are particularly ornamental, and when passed amongst a moving picture theatre audience should do much to encourage their attendance upon the day on which these two productions are slated. They are purely a novelty arranged for the exhibitor and depending upon the eagerness with which the latter respond to this new form of patronage boosting, the Gaumont Company will base its judgment for similar novelties in the future. By application to the Gaumont Company they will be pleased to supply you with either design of post card.

THE BANDIT OF TROPICO.

Nestor.

There is a Nestor production to be released on the 17th of June, entitled "The Bandit of Tropico," for which much credit is due Mr. Thomas Ricketts, who directed this splendid drama. Mr. Ricketts formerly devoted his entire time to the production of high-class modern dramas, but owing to the great demand for Nestor Westerns, the program of Nestor has temporarily been changed to three Westerns a week and Mr. Ricketts' efforts in producing Westerns have been remarkably successful from the start. "The Bandit of Tropico" is one of Mr. Ricketts' best works, the theme of the story being rather difficult to handle. A highly respected citizen, William Blake (portrayed by Harry Von Meter), is really leading a dual life, this fact being unknown to even his own daughter, Kitty (Vivian Rich). Blake is even consulted by his neighbors as to whom this mysterious bandit may be, and not until his death does the fact become known to his daughter that her beloved father has stolen to make her pathway of life easier to walk upon. Her sheriff lover, Jim Sherwood, out of his great love for the girl, promises to keep the memory of her father sacred and a beautiful scene is shown where the sheriff and his fiancee burn up the note which her dying father left, confessing his guilt

SYDNEY ASCHER'S MOVING PICTURE ENTERPRISES

A man's success in business depends not alone on his integrity, but also on his ability for clean-cut manipulation and an unflagging energetic method of procedure.

Sydney Ascher, a very young man to have the large business connections which he has, is an untiring worker. In fact, he applies himself so assiduously to every task that happens to cross his pathway that one is impressed with the fact that at least one man in the world is trying to "put one over" on the million years that he may be dead.

Mr. Ascher is the proprietor of the "Nicoland" Theatre at Third avenue and 161st street in the Bronx; here he makes his headquarters. This is one of the nicest little moving picture theatres in the city. It is well ventilated, well lighted and clean. Every night of the week it can be found crowded to its capacity with a patronage of people who feel confident that they are going to be well entertained. Each night a little diversion apart from the pictures is given. Friday night's particular offering is sometimes a bit of fine cut glass, or an article of silverware—always something good and useful for which tickets are given out, and the lucky number wins the prize.

Two weeks ago Mr. Ascher opened his airdrome at Saratoga Park, Brooklyn. This is the most delightful place to spend a hot summer night. The place will seat considerably over a thousand people and decorations of flags and colored lights mingled with the soprano voices of white jacketed boys selling popcorn, ice cream cones and lemonade lend a gala tint to the atmosphere that is irresistible. Here happy-faced babies and tired mothers, men, young and old, girls in their teens and women nearing the sunset line, regale themselves in the cool restfulness of the tremenduous airdrome that is so well ordered with its wide aisles and comfortable seats as to make one feel within its precincts absolutely at peace. Pictures and illustrated songs provide entertainment for the vast crowds of people who throng there.

And again a week and a half later we find this enterprising young moving picture magnate throwing wide the doors of the well-known scene of many festive occasions, Terrace Garden, as a moving picture theatre and cabaret. This, too, has been made a delightful spot to spend an evening; with soft shaded lights and the hum of electric fans to add to one's comfort on the warm summer nights, and the silent drama and cabaret performance to soothe the tired body and brain with a much needed diversion, a pleasant couple of hours can be spent here at very small cost, to say nothing of the brilliant restaurant scene being enacted in the huge adjoining space, and of which a glimpse can be had now and then through the open doors, with its festive gleam of shining white cloths, bright lights and evergreens.

There are rumors that other large enterprises are on the calendar for Mr. Ascher of which we are not yet permitted to speak. We wish him all luck; for he is establishing in the proper manner the much needed sanitary entertainments for the people, where they may be amused for a few pennies. One of the things to be specially noted is the excellent projection of pictures in all Mr. Ascher's theatres.

RELIANCE NOTES

Mr. James Cooley, who was formerly a member of the Reliance Stock Company, is closing a season in dramatic stock in Rochester, and will return to the Reliance Company on June 17th.

Mr. Hector Dion, who was once a member of the original Biograph and Vitagraph companies, has joined the Reliance Stock Company.

* * * *

The Reliance Company has contracted with Mr. James Oliver Curwood, author of "Honor of the Big Snows," "Phillip Steele," "Flower of the North," and many short stories for a two-reel subject from the Phillip Steele stories. These stories deal with the Canadian mounted police, and the Northwestern country, and should make one of the most stirring two-reel subjects that has ever been produced. This subject will be a feature in the new policy of producing a two-reel subject once a month.

Some of the two-reel subjects to be released will be "Rip Van Winkle" and "At Cripple Creek"; also "Votes for Women."

"RIP VAN WINKLE"
Reliance release, July 6th.

"A MAN'S DUTY"
Reliance release, July 3rd.

Beginning Wednesday, July 3rd, The American Film Mfg. Co. will release three instead of two Western subjects. The new addition is the result of the steady, consistent demand for more Western subjects, which seems to be general among Independent exchanges.

The American has placed a new company in the field whose every effort will be bent toward the production of the highest possible grade of out-of-door cowboy, Indian and mining pictures.

The Ketcham Moving Picture Company is a new Arkansas industry which will take pictures of Arkansas scenery to be shown on the screen. The promoters of the new company have a number of plays prepared and the first tryout will be at the Capital Theatre on Friday. On Monday week the reels of this company will be shown also at the Crystal.

J. J. Kennedy and Perry L. Waters, the president and the general manager of the General Film Company, have resigned their positions as such. Mr. Kennedy was manager of the Biograph Company and president of the General Film Company, and Mr. Waters was general manager of the latter corporation.

OPERATOR'S CHAT

By Tom Costello

Auxiliary Local 35, I. A. T. S. E.

Officers

President—John F. Stephens.
Vice-President—Sam Kaplan.
Financial Secretary—Gus Durkin.
Recording Secretary—Morris Klapholtz.
Business Agent—Henry Weinberger.
Assistant Business Agent—Edward Phelps.

The Auxiliary meets at Teutonia Hall, No. 66 Essex street, the first and the third Monday of every month at 12 o'clock midnight. Dues can be paid to Bro. Weinberger at the Union Office, No. 133 Third avenue, or to Gus Durkin, care of Berkeley Theatre, No. 19 West Forty-fourth street.

The regular meeting of the Auxiliary was held at the above meeting rooms, Monday night, June 3d, at 12 o'clock. When Brother Sam Kaplan, who in the absence of Brother Stephens, called the meeting to order, he faced only a small gathering of operators. The day had been so hot the brothers were seeking a cooler spot than the meeting rooms. Business of great importance was transacted by the body, and as the next meeting will be a notification meeting and nomination of officers, I look forward to a large gathering. Four new members were obligated and ten new applications read. The carrying of reels by the operators was argued pro and con, and was carried unanimously, with a five-dollar fine for the brothers that persist in making expressmen of themselves. The meeting adjourned at 5 a.m.

Local 35 I. A. T. S. E. held their regular meeting on Sunday, June 2d, at the Weeona club rooms. The meeting was called to order by Chairman John F. Stephens at 2.15. The attendance was large and the election of officers made known. Following are a list of the lucky brothers that were elected to office: John F. Stephens, president; George C. Dodd, vice-president; John S. Clarke, recording secretary, No. 150 East Fourteenth street; Gus Durkin, secretary-treasurer, No. 19 West Forty-fourth street; Henry Koenig, Sergeant-at-Arms; Harold Williams, business agent, No. 19 West Forty-fourth street.

Trustees and Executive Board: Harry Dignam, Charles Hayden, Joe Magnolia Charles Armstrong.

Delegates to Convention: James Lee, Harold Williams, Joe Magnolia, Harry Dignam, Fred Thomas.

The meeting adjourned at 7 p.m.

Brother Jack Hauser and Jack Lieberman, of Local 96, Worcester, Mass., paid a visit to New York for pleasure, and you can gamble they enjoyed themselves. Well, if we were playing poker a pair of Jacks would be openers, and they were always under cover with the other three to make a full house.

The two Jacks have many friends among the old-timers and we were all glad to see them looking so prosperous. Brother Hauser is the electrician of the leading theatre in Worcester, and Brother Lieberman has been electrician of the Girl of My Dreams Company for the past two seasons and will take the same show this season.

They left for Tannersville, N. Y., to open an airdrome, and I wish them every success. They are hustlers from the word go, and advanced themselves rapidly in the theatrical business.

Brother Moss Levitt, known by all the operators as the heavyweight champion—300 pounds—is now a full-fledged exhibitor. He is half owner with his brother, Victor Levitt, who has managed some of the biggest theatrical enterprises in the country, and you can gamble when you pay a visit to the Victor Theatre, situated at Intervale avenue and Dawson street, Bronx, you will always find a good picture, as Moss was one of the old school, and a perfect picture is the only thing that will satisfy him, and the large number of patrons that daily fill this cosy little theatre speak as if the Victor was the only house in the upper section of the metropolis.

The house runs Association service, and the musical program is ably taken care of by (Doc) Bill Mosler, who has the reputation of being one of the cleverest ticklers of the ivory in the show business. Mrs. Levitt is also very active in the affairs of the Victor and has a pleasing personality and a host of friends.

The Wacko Theatre, No. 118 Rivington street, reports business very big. The reason isn't hard to explain, as the manager, Mr. Harry Marks, is a live wire with good contact. The audience is treated three times a week to a feature show consisting of three and four-reel features in conjunction with the regular performance.

The projection end of the Wacko Theatre is ably handled by the Schwartz brothers, both members of Auxiliary Local 35. The outfit consists of a Power's No. 6, and as the throw is only 45 feet, the projection is far above the average. The seating capacity is 299, but extensive alterations will be made this summer; the house will be enlarged to seat 600 and redecorated, and every new device that will add to the comfort of his patrons will be installed. The piano player watches and works up his pictures with appropriate music, and all the employees are neat, polite and obliging, and the future success of the Wacko Theatre is assured a good show; always a live wire for a manager and union men in the operating room.

Brother Theo. Greenberg surprised all the members of the Auxiliary by an up-to-date elopement Saturday, June 1st. He confidently told me he was going to have a June bride, and he kept his promise. When the rumor was confirmed I was surprised, but on behalf of the members of Auxiliary 35 and the Moving Picture News, we wish him many years of wedded bliss. Theodore is a son of David Greenberg, who owned and operated picture houses in different parts of New York and Brooklyn, and I understand his father is to present the Brooklyn house to Brother Greenberg as a wedding present.

Teddy, as the boys call him, was always a hard, conscientious worker for the union, and I can assure his bride, although I did not have the pleasure of meeting her, he will always work as hard and conscientiously as he did in the past five years for the union that he is so proud of.

Brother Harry Mackler, the business representative of the Simplex machine; Brother Mike Berkowitz, the proprietor of the Emergency Machine Co., and Brother Weinberger, business representative of the Auxiliary, were the best men. Theodore, I want to congratulate you, and I wish you the best of luck in all your future undertakings.

Mr. Rudy Kahn,
Succasunna, Morris County, N. J.

Friend Rudy:

I owe you an apology for not answering your letter sooner, and sincerely hope you won't think that I forgot a real pal, but have been busy. I'm glad, old pal, that you enjoy reading the Chat column; glad that you appreciate my crude attempts at journalism, but the old saying, "Where there's a will there's a way," and you don't know how good it makes a chap feel to receive a letter from a pal of the days that have long gone by, bringing back pleasant memories of many hours spent together, and a letter at any time from you will act as a tonic, and the news of your section will always find space in the paper with the union label.

I thank you for your good wishes, and in return wish you the best of luck, prosperity and health, and beg to remain, Your friend,

TOM COSTELLO.

Dear Sir and Brother:

Your letter to Mr. Saunders turned over to me and contents noted, and it is with pleasure I sit down to answer it. In your letter you inquired if I was the manager of Shea's Theatre, Troy, N. Y. For two years I held down the managerial end of Mr. Shea's house, but have not been connected with him for the past four years. I feel proud to think that the Operator's Chat has made such a good impression and hope in the future that it will be read by every operator in the United States of America and Canada that wears the union button.

I beg to remain,

Fraternally yours,
TOM COSTELLO,
Editor, Operator's Chat.

Brother L. Basch, of Local No. 35, and Brother J. Welch, of Local No. 1, I. A. T. S. E., have joined hands as partners in the Unique Electric Co., and as both brothers are A No. 1 mechanics, they should have no trouble in getting all the work they can handle. They will make a specialty of electrical contracting, plumbing, steam and gas fitting; elevators maintained and repaired. Their uptown office is No. 618 West 135th street, and they are thinking seriously of opening a branch in the lower part of the city. As both are members of the I. A., I wish them the best of luck and hope they will have branches in the near future in every section.

Dear Sir and Brother:

Your letter and subscription for the News received, and I want to thank you for your interest in the Chat. I will have your communication of April 17th published in full at an early date. With regards to all the members of Local 165, I beg to remain,

Fraternally yours,
TOM COSTELLO.

A NEW OPERATOR

Jimmy Girvan is the proudest man in Operators' Town. Why? Well, he's training an operator who came to town June 4th. His name is Bruce Girvan. Good luck to yourself, wife and boy, Jimmy.

A few days ago Mr. Robert C. Whitter, owner of the Golden Rod Theatre, College Point, L. I., held a nine-mile race. The start and finish were in front of the theatre. Maurice Costello, of the Vitagraph Company, presented a large silver cup to H. Parkinson, winner of the race; several other prizes were awarded. Mr. Costello spoke highly of H. Parkinson. A few pictures were shown of the runners and a Vitagraph release in which Costello had the leading role. H. Parkinson, who is a member of the Bradhurst Field Club, established a record for nine miles, his time being fifty-three minutes.

Connelsville, Pa—The Nicklet Theatre has been sold to J. J. Vandergrift and Robert Roberts.

Newark, N. J.—A permit has been granted to H. Hope for the erection of a moving picture theatre at 990 South Orange avenue.

"THE FORBIDDEN WAY"
Reliance Release, June 22nd.

As soon as the necessary machines can be obtained motion pictures will be made a regular feature in the public schools of Kansas City. Such subjects are geography, physics, physiology, history, natural history, and botany will be taught by means of the pictures. The machines will cost about $85 each. The pictures are printed in triple rows on non-inflammable film, and it is purposed to establish a regular film exchange so that a continuous change of subjects can be kept up throughout the school year. One room in each school will be especially fitted up to show the pictures, each class taking its turn at the exhibition.

According to Chester L. Lucas: "Within a few years' time a moving picture machine will undoubtedly be just as necessary a part of the equipment of a college as a microscope is to-day. It would even now seem feasible for a large number of trade schools or educational classes to confer as to what phases of their work could best be illustrated and taught in this way, after which several films could be made, distributing the expense. These films, with a machine for showing them, could be sent from one school to another for exhibition; thus all would derive full benefit at a minimum cost."

Milwaukee, Wis.—The Bijou Theatre on the West Side has opened.

New York, N. Y.—W. H. Heddendorf will build a moving picture show on 105th street and Columbus avenue.

New York, N. Y.—Cyril Cummings will build an open-airair theatre on the southeast corner of 156th street and German place.

Cincinnati, Ohio.—Plans have been made for a motion picture house to be built at the southeast corner of Reading road and Hutchins avenue.

THE FARM AND THE FILM

A Visit to Fairmead.

By Lindsay Bancroft.

Near the center of the sun-kissed valley of San Joaquin, whose broad expanse of fertile acres is flanked by the Coast range on the one side and the snow-capped peaks of the Sierras on the other, is being written a chapter in the advancement of California which is of more than state or even national significance.

The Farmers' Institute has taken its place as a necessary and integral part of the educational regime of the United States, but it has remained for the new irrigated colony of Fairmead to go one better than Uncle Sam in the practical teaching of modern farming for profit.

The earth has been ready for centuries to yield her increase; water has flowed in silent subterranean streams beneath the finest soil in the world for countless aeons, and the sunshine is there every day in the year.

Every irrigation project handles these three tremendous natural forces—soil, water and sunshine.

The only uncertain element in the combination is the farmer himself, who does not always know just how to regulate and conduct his operations so as to secure the best results.

And here it is where the Fairmead system has stepped ahead of the ranks, taken a firm grip of science in every available form, and turned it to account in teaching, demonstrating and developing.

When I first saw Fairmead two months ago, it was an unbroken expanse of wheat fields in early growth covering some 14,000 acres. The only buildings in sight were two barns, a pump house, a sort of shed, and a partly constructed row of rooms to serve as a temporary hotel. Now things are different, and activity is shown on every hand. The first three buildings on the new colony were a hotel, a garage and a Moving Picture Theatre.

The high tension wires of the electric power company pass directly through the colony, and the same force that is led to the pumping plants of the separate farms is tapped to supply current to the picture machine.

The picture house is unique, as the cut shows. The operating department consists of two rooms, one of which is completely equipped and finished according to the most rigid rules of any city ordinance.

The latest model Motiograph machine is installed, and the white plaster screen is being set up permanently on the end wall of the hotel, a temporary roll curtain with aluminum coating being now used.

The lower floor of the operating room is made with easy slope, and the front is open, so that the front row of seats is 60 feet from the screen, the space between being God's great out-of-doors. After a warm day, the balmy evenings of Fairmead form an added enjoyment to the show.

Let me describe an evening's program at this unique open air performance.

First, appear some lantern slides of happenings in and around the colony—the Gaumont Weekly idea localized in slides. The element of comedy is not wanting, either. Next the Motiograph begins to grind out a moving picture tale, and at the end the lights in the "auditorium" are turned up while the fifty or sixty colonists (the number is ever increasing) hold a few minutes' "talk-fest."

After a few more slides to explain the next reel, motion pictures of actual operations on the colony and elsewhere are shown. The Co-operative Land & Trust Company has some six colonies fully settled in this part of the country, and Fairmead reaps the benefit of the others' experience in different kinds of farming. Motion pictures of the doings at Winton, Merced, etc., are presented, and a profusion of titles explain each operation depicted.

Next follows a reel which tells the story of alfalfa, tracing the growth of this wonderful plant through all its stages, by pictures Taken Locally.

The farmer is shown how to sow, irrigate, cultivate, cut, store and ship the alfalfa, and this lesson is taught over and over again.

This closes the doings for the evening; but it does not end the Fairmead idea.

From the opening of the colony lands there has been something doing every minute, and the company has placed a camera man on the ground permanently. He has an automobile at his disposal, a camera and a liberal supply of film, and it is his work to film whatever may be of use or interest to the future colonists.

This is but a new experiment, yet already it has justified its adoption; so much so that the company is now installing a of sufficient capacity to take care of the films made locally.

When visitors from other points come to Fairmead, and are able during their two or three days' stay to see a moving picture record of their own inspection of these farm lands, they are not likely to forget the colony and its modern methods.

So far as I know, this is the first time that any concern not in the moving picture business has gone to the expense of setting up its own permanent producing plant, and the outcome cannot be doubted. I am sure that my own good wishes for Fairmead's educational and agricultural development are coincident with those of the Moving Picture News, and with all those who rejoice at any new educational use of the cinematograph.

THE SCHEMERS—IMP

In the drama of "The Schemers," to be released on Thursday, the 20th, the author of the scenario and the producer have adroitly taken advantage of the enormous power which a fascinating adventuress can exercise over even a hard-headed man of business—especially if she has the grand manner and can wear good clothes with distinction.

In the early part of the story, an old man cuts off his son because he is stage-struck. The boy goes away and gets a job in a traveling company. This clears the path for our adventuress and her good-looking partner, and between them they ensnare the old man and reach that point where the infatuated man is persuaded to sign a paper conveying to her the tangible sum of $300,000 on their marriage.

Meanwhile, the under plot is proceeding rapidly. The actor son has an adopted sister, Lucy, and she gets wind of the plot to ensnare her guardian. So she wires to her actor-lover, for lovers they are, and he gets track of the adventuress. In some doubt as to where and when to first meet her, he contrives to present himself to her in the role of an admirer, whilst she is playing double with his father. Assured that he has made no mistake in identifying her, he wires to the police. They appear at a critical moment, a double arrest is made and the old man forgives his son, who marries the girl who has been instrumental in shielding the father from the adventuress.

The charm of this picture lies, first of all, in its strong acting features, and then in the very beautiful setting against which the drama is mapped out.

Miss Allen is the adventuress and she is well backed up by William Shea. King Baggot plays the actor son, and Violet Horner is Lucy.

As may be supposed, when produced by Otis Turner, the scenes of stage life are very realistic. Purely as a picture, "The Schemers" must rank as a distinct Imp success.

WESTERN CORRESPONDENT.

Hot Springs, Ark., June 5.—Although we have not had the pleasure of seeing the pictures, I understand that the Imp reel, which has a local interest, and which I mentioned in my last letter, will arrive in this city some time during the week. It can be truthfully stated that there is no subject in the line of motion photography ever announced for Hot Springs that is awaited with more genuine interest than this same reel, for it deals with Hot Springs, you understand, and, besides, there are several hundred of us who desire to see just how we look in the "movies."

This reel has also received columns and columns of free advertising in the local papers. The reason is this: About every "scribe" in town managed to insert his handsome "mug" before the camera, and, naturally, they want the whole world to know it, whereas, had it been a private and individual venture, the promoter would have had to produce so much per inch or line to get the announcement out of the linotype machine. It makes all the difference in the world, as well as in the office, whose visage is involved, you see.

When it was announced that the Imp Company would release the Hot Springs reel, the two houses using Independent material immediately got busy and Swanson and Crawford, the New Orleans and Texas exchanges, were bombarded with all kinds of telegrams to be sure and have it sent here. The Princess, I understand, won out, and, for the sake of the picture, it is well that they did, for the Photo Play, while a very attractive and most loyal Independent house, has not the seating capacity necessary to handle this subject. The Princess will seat 1,800, while the Photo Play is crowded with 250 persons.

When this picture does get here, which it will by the time this is in the editorial department, it will be greeted with such a reception that will make the Imp people realize that they have not labored in vain, for the entire town is interested. I saw a letter from Miss Lulu Long, the Kansas City society queen, who had her horses in the horse show, and who was filmed with "The King," her prize winner, on one side and "King Baggot" on the other. It reads "Miss Long and Her King." Which one, brother, which one?

Miss Long wanted to know when the pictures would be released, and Frank Gould has written the Business Men's League again asking where he can buy a private print. He has a machine and full outfit and he wants to preserve that reel. Even Andrew Carnegie is not missing and, could he see himself in the moving pictures, I am quite sure that he, too, would be much interested.

For the first time in its history, Manager J. Frank Head placed vaudeville in the Airdrome, two shows nightly, with a change of bill each Monday and Thursday. He is using four big acts and two reels of Independent pictures. One opens the show, the other closes it. There was considerable rumor that he and the Princess people would get tangled up in a lawsuit over the change of the vaudeville from the Princess to the Airdrome, but he "copped" the franchise of the Western Vaudeville Association, so there you are. He is still manager of the Princess, too. Any night it rains, making the show impossible at the Airdrome, the entire four acts, pictures and audience are transferred to the big Auditorium theatre, which is some system, I think. Here's one show the weather doesn't stop.

The stock companies that have been to the Airdrome have not been doing the business that was expected of them, and the result has been that the change to vaudeville has boosted the stock of this popular open-air amusement place. The people wanted vaudeville and they are certainly getting it at the Airdrome.

Considerable surprise was occasioned the early part of the week when Harry Hale announced that he had abandoned his show at Whittington Park. The transferring of the acts from the Lyric to the Park did not carry along the patronage, and no man cares to dig for $100 or more each week just for the sake of keeping the actors busy. They are not built like that in these parts. Doc Owens, manager of the Park, took the vaudeville off his hands, as well as buying several facilities of the theatre he had brought with him, and the Park patrons are now getting free vaudeville and pictures. The acts there, however, are not as high priced as those of the Lyric circuit, but they entertain those who visit the theatre.

The Arkansas Travelers were here the past week, some 3,000 of 'em, and they visited every theatre in the city. In fact, they had the time of their lives and the picture houses did a great business with them. The stunt they pulled off at the Park will long linger with those present. There was a "Gridiron" dinner in which every house represented by the commercial delegates was royally "roasted" and there were several "frame-ups" that were a scream. The dinner was staged after the show in the big summer theatre, and the show they witnessed was one that wasn't on the usual program. 'Nuf said!

Never knew before that Elks were so fond of moving pictures. The State Association of Elks met here the past week. After the regular business session was over they swarmed all over the resort, and when the shades of night had wrapped the town in slumber, they started to celebrate. It was a merry session. Along about 4 a.m. ye antlered tribe decided that they wanted to see some moving pictures.

Sidney M. Nutt has the best house of this kind in the city; also Sidney is an Elk. I am informed he was not in the party. In fact, I don't know whether he knows they were there. Be that as it may, the Elks got into the house at 4 o'clock in the morning, switched on the lights, got an operator somewhere, and ran off two reels of pictures. That satisfied them, for looking at the "movies" so early in the morning is liable to make one dizzy, and they had enough after two reels were run off.

There have been many ways in which "easy money" was secured, but I respectfully doff my "skypiece" to the Eclair bunch, for when it comes to pure unadulterated nerve and gall, they are in a class by themselves. I saw their reel, "Saved from the Titanic," and if ever the public "fell" for an imposition, they tumbled good and hard on that one. There is about as much "Titanic" in that picture as there is in the Ozark mountains. Even the management of the Photo Play, where the reel attracted banner business, were deceived, and they placed a streamer across the front of their theatre, telling the people that one of the young ladies who was rescued from the Titanic would appear and tell her story. And it was such a "bum" picture, Eclair, I am surprised that you would utilize such a serious thing as that great catastrophe to put out the studio production you did when you didn't have one single feature that was real or genuine about the Titanic. It was the limit. If you intended to "fake" it all, you should have made it a good deception, but that reel was the positive limit, and the Photo Play came in for an awful "panning." They(like the "dear people," were not wise to what you were slipping them.

Edison's reel, "A Romance of the Ice Fields," came to the New Central the past few days. There was one situation, aside from the trick photography, that was rather novel. After ye hero had been pulled out of the water when at the brink of the falls, an instant later he showed up in the picture, his clothes as dry and "comfy" as if he hadn't been within a mile of moisture. Where are the details, Mr. Stage Manager?

"When Kings Were the Law" was the best costume feature of the week here, and it was done in the usual classy way Biograph has of turning out pictures of this nature. I looked at that and then at an alleged "Royal" production the Rex Company turned out, and then I went back to the Biograph reel for a second showing. The Rex pictures could not compare to the Biograph reel.

We had Max Linder here for the first time in months in "Max Is Convalescing," and the effort was well worth while. In fact, we are pleased to welcome Max after his serious illness.

BEFORE THE WHITE MAN CAME
Reliance Release, June 27th.

The Gaumont Company has as ever a large number of feature releases to appear within the next two months. Chief amongst these are "When the Leaves Fall," one-reel, hand-colored, on Tuesday the 18th of June; "Bells of Paradise" and "By the Zuyder Zee," two-reel, hand-colored, on Thursday, June 20th; also "Lion's Revenge," one reel, hand-colored lion picture which will appear on Tuesday, July 2d. The most important and by far most spectacular and timely is its July 4th release entitled "Written in Blood." This production was originally three and a half reels long but has been boiled down and judiciously clipped to two thousand feet, black and white. An extremely elaborate array of posters in both one and three-sheet size has been arranged for this feature, and it is expected that they will do much to even increase the excellent standard that Gaumont films have in the United States. It is expected to confirm the predictions of many that Gaumont is the most capable manufacturer in the Independent ranks. The story of "Written in Blood" is one that seethes and surges with battle fire sensationality. It is a story written of war and depicts the severest conflicts and the direct circumstances that result from it.

In preparing this production the Paris office of this French concern engaged the services of several performers from the National Academy and gave them the principal roles. This play was secured for motion picture purposes by means of a very profitable contract to L. Danzigeux, the eminent French playwright. He has also sold it to the National Academy, which under the auspices of the management that is now handling Henri Bataille's productions, will present this play on the stage about the beginning of November, 1912. This is an innovation in film and dramatic stage relationships. There have been many occurrences of successful plays being filmed, such as "Garden of Allah," "Oliver Twist," "Tale of Two Cities," "David Copperfield," "Power Behind the Throne," etc., but this is the first instance where a play with all the earmarks of success is first to be put out through the channel of motion picture photography. This alone speaks volumes for its quality.

JENNY NELSON

Jenny Nelson was born in Copenhagen, Denmark, and played for four years in the King's Theatre. During this time she also posed for the artists of the city and later worked in the studios of Paris, New York and Philadelphia. She is a clever musician, favoring the violin, and has been successful in concert and vaudeville. She is a fearless rider and would rather fight a bucking broncho than toy with "a bottle and a bird." The above picture shows her in a characteristic make up, a typical girl of the Golden West, which is her favorite line of work in the Lubin Stock Company.

Atlantic City, N. J.—The theatre on Main street near Washington avenue, for Joseph Cantes, will open shortly.

THE LION'S REVENGE
Gaumont Release, July 2

Mrs. Ramsay, the wife of a wealthy explorer, shares with her husband his love of the wild animals. In fact she has accompanied him on many expeditions and is quite as clever in capturing the beasts of the Arctics or the tropics as is her far-famed husband. It is only natural then that two such enthusiasts of hunting should have their own private zoological garden.

One day while performing the duties of her home, she hears the howling and growling of her lions and upon the continuation of the untoward noises, decides to ascertain the cause, whereupon she discovers that the keeper of the lions is cruelly beating them in their cage with his iron prod. She hastens to the scene of action and rebukes the cowardly attendant for his abuse, discharging him immediately. He, however, vows revenge, and intent on obtaining it leaves his cap behind as an excuse to call back at some opportune moment, presumably to claim his cap. The opportunity presents itself when Mrs. Ramsay gives a reception at one of the large hotels not far from her home. The keeper then calls for his headpiece, and is, of course, allowed admission into the grounds of the mansion. While there he contrives to set free Spartacus, a huge male lion, and three of the lionesses. His plan works. The animals are liberated, much to the terror of the servants of the house, who flee to spread the news to their mistress. She learns the tidings with great fright, particularly as she left her child asleep in the bedroom of her home and knows that the lion would be only too prone to scent her little one. She has left her in charge of a nurse, but then, who would not try to save themselves in a moment of such terror as when the lion makes its entry into the bedroom. She leaves the gathering just as she is and hastens home, rushes up to the room of her child, where she finds the lions have not yet appeared. She straightway holts the door behind her and starts out single-handed to drive the lions back to their enclosures. She succeeds with the three lionesses, but cannot find the savage Spartacus. Where could he he? She hunts and hunts, but almost in vain, hut at the last moment she does find him all bespattered with blood and gnawing and crunching the remains of some unfortunate victim. With her usual dexterity she succeeds in driving the king of beasts back to his cage, and then returns to see who the unfortunate victim could he. She recognizes the discharged keeper and the story is revealed to her like a thunderbolt. He has met his merited end. The lion has reaped his revenge for the mistreatment. The keeper was killed.

THAT TROUBLESOME BIRD
Gaumont Release, July 9

Cynthia Abernathy, an eccentric old maid, has one unpardonable hobby: her love for birds. Love for man has never fluttered in her breast, hence her admiration for the little feathered creatures amounting to a concentrated passion. She moves into a new lodging house where the landlord issued instructions that no birds he allowed. She refuses to obey, however, whereupon he orders the bird from the house, under expulsion. In her trouble she confides with a fellow-lodger, the eccentric and kindly Calino. He decides to espouse her cause and advises the landlord by writing a note as follows: "I have taken charge of the canaries. If you want them you will have to come after them." The landlord, worked up to a warm pitch of ire, starts in immediate pursuit of his recalcitrant lodgers and the objectionable birds. He enters the room of one, only to to be received by a large baboon laying in wait for his entrance. Plates, jardiniers, vases and crockery of all descriptions come flying in bis direction and usually manage to light on his head. He turns in haste for another entrance into Calino's quarters only to be confronted hy two large Numidian lions, that growl most angrily at his approach and clearly convey the dismal tidings that he had better get out of their reach and let the canaries alone. The terrorized landlord flees from the home and while out in the open thinking the matter over, decides that for the sake of peace he had better allow his rules to be broken. The old maid wins her point. The birds remain.

On the same reel:

A TENACIOUS HUBBY

Mr. and Mrs. Gadding lead one awful quarrelsome life. She insists on displaying her beauty and charms to all fellow pedestrians of Paris, while he begs in vain that she remain at home and perform the duties which he expected of her when they were married. She remonstrates further at the thought of cleaning house and cooking and so breaks jail every day. Huhby sees there is only one thing to do and that is to keep close tab, so he follows her all around. This proves the proper solution, for she finds her hushand's company quite irksome and even embarrassing. In the end she is only too willing to return to dutiful wifehood.

AN INTERRUPTED WEDDING
Comet Release, June 15

The eventful day bad arrived, and Jimmy McIlhern was all excitement preparing for his wedding which was announced to take place at the home of the bride's mother.

Jimmy, made more nervous by his haste as the momentous hour approaches, drops his collar button, misplaces his tie and experiences various other mishaps, which occasion him no little annoyance.

But the worst is yet to come.

His toilet finally completed, he surveys himself once more in the mirror and sallies forth. In his mad haste he turns the corner and bumps violently into a nurse girl carrying an infant. The impact is so forceful that she sprains her ankle and collapses in Jimmy's arms. He relieves her of the baby, and summons assistance from a neighboring drug store. The clerk makes an examination and discovers that she is severely injured, so an ambulance is summoned, the nurse, now unconscious, is placed within. Jimmy stands hy. baby in arms, and as everything is prepared for the run to the hospital, be offers the baby to the surgeon in charge, who refuses to accept it, not knowing that it was in the care of his patient. Jimmy next turns to the drug clerk and offers it to him. He indignantly refuses to accept it and walks away. Several bystanders are in turn appealed to, each laughingly decline. Jimmy now realizing the time set for his wedding has long since past, terror-stricken rushes from the scene. In his mad rush he encounters a big policeman, to whom he offers the baby, without any explanation. The policeman thinks him insane and scrutinizes him closely, which angers Jimmy, and he promptly knocks bim down. Pursued by the policeman, whom he succeeds in eluding, be seeks the seclusion of his own room, where he throws the baby on the bed, seats himself in an effort to gather his scattered senses. He decides upon a plan of action and is about to execute it when he glances out of the window and sees the policeman patrolling up and down. This arouses a new terror, which is further aggravated by the lusty yells of the baby, to whom he has given various articles with a hope of quieting it. The crowning feature is yet to come.

The waiting and expectant bride, growing angry and impatient at his non-arrival, comes to seek him. Hearing her approach he seizes the baby, throws it into a convenient closet and closes the door. She enters the room in a towering rage and demands an explanation, which Jimmy vainly tries to make.

Her suspicions being aroused by his extreme nervousness and hearing the cry of the child, she opens the closet, discovers the infant, roundly denounces him, hursts into a torrent of tears, and rushes from the room. In an agony of terror Jimmy follows her, calling out in despair. As she disappears from the scene the policeman enters aud catches Jimmy just as he emerges from the door.

The mother of the baby, almost distraught at its long absence, has telephoned to police headquarters, thinking the infant might have fallen into the hands of kidnappers. Jimmy is dragged before the desk sergeant, charged with kidnapping, and is locked up. The distracted parents are sent for to make a charge. They arrive at the station and Jimmy is brought from his cell to answer, when the nurse, whose injuries were slight, has meanwhile recovered, enters. Mutual explanations and apologies follow, and Jimmy is driven to the house of his bride-to-be, where the parents of the baby explain the unfortunate occurrence which was the occasion of so much worry and confusion. The expectant bride is mollified, forgives Jimmy, and takes him to her heart, and the wedding proceeds midst great rejoicing.

THE PLUCKY RANCH GIRL
Comet Release, June 17

Bravery and pluck under trying circumstances, is a matter of record among women. While the presence of a mouse invariably fills them with terror, the appearance of a lion would meet with opposition.

The Williams family consisting of father, mother, and attractive daughter Doris, on their way to Southern California by wagon, camp for the night in a fertile spot in Western Arizona.

While Mrs. Williams prepares to cook the evening meal, Doris goes in search of water. As she wanders away, a word of caution is given by her parents to which she answers with a little significant gesture, to the revolver swinging in its holster at her side.

Near the spot selected hy the Williams family is an Indian reservation, and a number

I'm Much Obliged!

I've never felt quite so good over anything in my life as I have over the many manifestations of good will and confidence made by exhibitors since I merged the "Imp" with the Universal Film Manufacturing Company and accepted exclusive territory from the same company for the Laemmle Film Service offices. I've received all sorts of letters and telegrams of congratulations, the tenor of them being, "Where you go, we follow. If the Universal is good enough for you, it's good enough for us!"

It goes straight to the heart—this sort of stuff. And it impresses me more than ever with the Big Fact that I am responsible to thousands of exhibitors for whatever I do. Consequently I herewith renew the promise I have made on several occasions—that I will look after your interests to the best of my ability and see that you always get a square deal. The Laemmle Film Service offices are now in better shape to give you a splendid service than ever in their history. Place your destiny in their hands and you can't possibly lose out!

Yours with best regards,

CARL LAEMMLE, President

The BIGGEST and BEST Film Renter in the World of them had surreptitiously smuggled in a generous supply of that deadly enemy of the Redman, "firewater." All have been indulging their appetites freely, and are in consequence in a dangerous condition. One of their number (a chief) has wandered away in his drunken stupor, and by chance his steps are directed to where Doris is in the act of filling a vessel with water from a spring. He sees the beautiful white maiden, and approaches her with a succession of suggestive grunts. As he is about to embrace her, with a well-directed blow, she knocks him down. In a frenzy of rage he struggles to his feet, draws a knife from his belt, and rushes toward her threateningly; she fires at him, and he falls. Doris does not linger to learn how badly he is injured, but hurries back to her parents, and tells them of the circumstance. Fearful of the result they immediately strike camp and hasten away.

Only a short distance is traversed when they meet a ranch owner, who offers Williams inducements to settle on part of his extensive acres. The conditions being advantageous, he gladly accepts them. Some months have elapsed since the shooting of the Indian by Doris and the incident is rarely referred to. The Williams family have settled down and are enjoying real happiness and prosperity. Doris has won the affection of the ranch boss and they are shortly to be married. The renegade Indian who insulted her, meanwhile recovers, and acquaints himself with her whereabouts. Possessed with a spirit of revenge, he gathers some of his following about him, and that night they plan an attack on the Williams home.

The cowboys are quartered some distance away, so when the Indians surround the house and begin the attack, only Doris' resourcefulness saves them. She succeeds in reaching the corral, where she mounts her pony, and after a thrilling escape through a rain of bullets, she reaches the quarters of the cowboys, who ride with a mad dash to the rescue and after a fierce battle with the redskins save the father and mother of Doris.

LOVE'S RAILROAD

Solax Release, June 26

A train of incidents, starting with the time lovers meet and following them through life, through their happiness and their quarrels, forms the larger part of this uproarous split-reel comedy. The first scene is "taking on fuel for the trip" and "taking water on the fly," which deals with the lovemaking of the couple. Then follows the "proposal for better service," the "double-heading of the passengers," and "the coupling up of the train." The couple soon take on excess baggage—a baby—and with that there are "orders misunderstood" and then there's a wreck—of the couple part. Next we see "the wrecking crew in action"—the divorce court—and this is followed by the "wreckage being cleared" and then "traffic is resumed on the old schedule"—and they live happy, etc.

On the same reel is

PLANTING TIME

This deals with the adventures of a college boy and college girl at home during a vacation. The girl and boy live in cottages adjoining each other. They are both nuisances to their parents. In order to keep them out of mischief the parents send them out into the garden to plant some seeds. In attempting to clean the garden they throw all of the waste across the fence. The boy and girl keep throwing it back and forth. They get into a row and, of course, there is roughhouse—water and the garden hose is brought into play. The story ends with the young folks getting together and an agreement is reached.

THE CALL OF THE ROSE

Solax Release, June 28

Robert Moore, a young Western miner, marries an Eastern girl and brings her out West to live. Before her marriage, Grace Moore was a musician and a professional singer. Her husband is devoted to her. The little Western cottage in which they live the husband tries to make as fine a home as his limited capital permits him. For a time the young wife is happy and fills in her time between watching her husband dig for gold and singing in the wilderness. Soon, however, the emptiness of her inactive existence begins to pall on her. She grows wistful and longing.

An operatic manager on his vacation hunting near the mining district is one day attracted by Mrs. Moore's wonderful voice. He follows the notes to their source and after having refreshed himself with the food and drink which Mrs. Moore graciously provides, he gives Mrs. Moore his card and tells her that he would be pleased to give her an engagement if she ever came back East.

The coming of the operatic manager awakens in Grace Moore her slumbering desire for a career. Her husband is adverse to her plans, but after months of arguments pro and con, Mrs. Moore leaves her husband and goes East. At their parting the husband plucks a white rose from an arbor and presents it to his wife with the injunction, "Whenever you can return to me as pure as this rose, my heart and my home are open to you."

Later, after a thrilling adventure with a claim jumper, the husband, who strikes gold, begins to feel the influence of the rose—the pressed rose which saved his life—an interesting by-play in the story. The wife, away East, wins success and fame as an opera singer—but her happiness is not complete. She feels the call of the rose.

The husband comes East and, in a pathetic scene which takes place in a cafe, and which succeeds a scene of great dramatic tensity, the two are reunited.

THE QUEEN OF MAY
Republic Release, June 25th.

Mrs. Bartlett, a widow, finds herself and little girl on the verge of starvation and is only saved by the timely assistance of Mrs. O'Grady, a neighbor as poor as herself, who nevertheless cheerfully shares what little she has with her more unfortunate sister. She assists Mrs. Bartlett to obtain a position at one of the theatres, and the little girl accompanies her mother, and being an exceptionally bright child, she learns by heart the part of Oliver, in "Oliver Twist," the show which is having a steady run in the theatre.

She reads in the paper that the stage children are going to Central Park for a May party and trise to obtain a card of admission. The secretary tells her she has to appear on the stage before she can join these children. She leaves, feeling very much disappointed.

That evening at the theatre, five minutes before the rise of the curtain, Oliver Twist has not arrived. Nancy Sikes brings the widow's child forward dressed as Oliver and says she is willing to stake her professional reputation that the child can play the part. Fagin, the stage manager, is doubtful, but the curtain signal has been given and he decides he will risk it—her appearance proves successful.

She returns the next day just as the stage children are getting in the car to go to the May party—her reputation has preceded her and they cordially receive her, and elect her Queen of May.

IN THE BALANCE
Republic Release, June 29.

Frank Dallas is secretly loved by Helen Mackey, a girl who is a frequent visitor at his mother's home. The girl shows her love for Frank, but is not regarded with any acknowledgment. Frank starts on his trip and joins his chum at his bungalow.

One day while Frank is hunting he meets the wife of Bob Black, a smuggler. The woman becomes infatuated with Frank and he with her. Thinking her single, he proposes to her and begs her to go away with him—the woman, realizing her husband's vindictive nature, insures herself against his revenge by informing the Secret Service officers of her husband's occupation. Black, while endeavoring to escape, is shot and falls over the cliff; believing her husband dead, the woman joins Frank and goes away with him—Black recovers and escapes from the Secret Service officers.

Frank brings his intended wife to his home and his mother takes her to her heart. Helen Mackey remains silent, although her heart is aching at losing Frank. Black sees the announcement of Frank's coming marriage in a paper and decides to repay his wife for her treachery. His wife sees him at the window and is overcome, believing she sees a vision of the dead man. She is taken from the ballroom and at her request left alone. Black forces an entrance into the house and denounces his wife. She at last prevails on him to leave, after bribing him with a large sum of money.

Two officers seeing Black leave the house by the window, call for him to stop. Black starts

THE FARM AND THE FLAT

Thanhouser Release, June 23

The young city chap had a month's vacation, nowhere to go and very little to spend when he got there. So he talked it over with his wife, and they evolved a great idea.

"We want to go to the country," the husband said. "Now the country is full of rubes who want to come to the city. It should be an easy matter to find one who will let us occupy his farm for a month, if we will let him use this flat and our installment house furniture."

They advertised, and it paid. Out at Dreamland Neck, which is inconveniently located in Connecticut, lived a farmer who had long yearned to see the great city. He had heard, however, that at the Waldorf, the best tavern, they often charged $1 a day for rooms without meals, and the cost of living appalled bim. Finding a chance to see the wonders of the metropolis for nothing, he jumped at it, and the swap of homes was made with great joy on both sides.

The trouble was that neither couple was suited for its new environments. The country people were so busy jumping out of the way of trucks and autos that they had no time to enjoy themselves, while the city folk wearied of chopping wood, and trying to bring up chickens by hand. And just as they were getting sick and tired of their bargains, real unhappiness entered their lives.

The country chap knew all about gas. You light it with a match and blow it out when you are through. He proved that it was possible to do this and live, but the flat was wrecked. Both he and his wife decided that it was time to go home, and they departed with a rush, just before the police, firemen and the ambulance arrived.

In the meantime the city chap had picked up a bargain in horse flesh, a nag and a buggy for $34. The countryman would have never made the purchase, for he knew that the outfit belonged to the sheriff, also that the pretended owner was a tramp. The sheriff arrived shortly after the transfer of his property, and there was a fight. It was the belief of the sheriff that the city chap should accompany him to jail, but the city chap overruled him, and after a heated argument that severely injured the furniture, he escaped with his devoted wife in the stolen buggy.

When the "swoppers" reached their respective homes, they called each other up by phone, and talked angrily. Still as each had injured the property of the other, they found that it would only be a waste of time to sue.

"The next time you get me to go to the country," the city chap said to his wife, "will be when I am dead. We have nothing left but honor now and durned little of that."

As for the countryman, it was long before he could convince his neighbors that he was not a member of a daring band of crooks, who had made their headquarters in his place, and he never wants to see or hear of the city again.

The moral of this would seem to be "There is no place like home, but you must understand it to run it."

IN BLOSSOM TIME

Thanhouser Release, June 25

It was blossom time in the country, and the girl was happy in her simple rural life, and in the love of her rustic suitor. Just then word came that her wealthy aunt desired to give her a home in the city, and the young woman jumped at the chance. She was able to see the beauties of the Metropolis of which she had often dreamed, and to be a "real lady," and not a simple carefree little country girl. So she went away, waving a careless farewell to the "man she left behind her," for just at that time she was not thinking of the apple blossoms of the country but of the orchids, the lobsters and the taxicabs of the city.

A year passed on, and again it was blossom time in the country; but the girl was in the city and had forgotten much of her former life. To her surprise, however, she was not happy in her new environments. Everything wearied her, and she often sighed as she thought of the days that now seemed so far away, and the good times she had almost forgotten.

A titled suitor had entered her life, a most presentable, desirable man, and for a time she thought she would marry him. Then one day she received from him a regular "city box of flowers," and at the same time her country sweetheart sent a fragrant branch with the simple message, "It is blossom time in the country."

The girl realized that she was losing much in life that had been dear to her, and in return had not received anything that really counted. She was stricken with homesickness and hurried back to the country where her grandfather, with whom she had lived, welcomed her gladly but could not undersatnd why she had returned, for he was a man who was slow to comprehend things. Later he saw them in the apple orchard and tben be understood.

The girl bad gone away in blossom time but she was one of the fortunate ones who returned before the blossoms life had for ber had faded; returned in time, to recognize that a faithful, loving heart is a jewel witbout price, and that one is the happiest in the station in life in which he or she bas been brougbt up.

The aged grandfather was more or less of a philosopher, and he often expressed himself on the situation, his confidant being the largest and most stable of the trees in the orchard.

"I'm glad my little girl came back in time," he said; "I am glad that the blossoms were still in bloom, and that everything came out all right, but it was a mighty dangerous experiment, and we must never say a word about it."

Perhaps it was because of the wind, but anyway it is an actual fact that at this time the tree nodded, and nodded vigorously.

The boy and the girl are happy, however, and always regard "Blossom Time" as the loveliest, and most important season of the year.

THE PROFESSOR'S SON

Thanhouser Release, June 28

The Professor was wealthy, which was a lucky thing, for his mind was always in the past. He had an intimate knowledge of what had happened in prehistoric days, but utterly ignored what was going on in his own generation. When his wife died it was naturally a shock, and he almost bated the helpless infant she left. Soon he returned to his studies, and having left word that his baby son must not be allowed to disturb him, soon practically forgot his existence.

In fact it rather puzzled him one day to find a boy of seven in his study, engrossed in a scientific book. He could not place the child at first, but finally remembered that it was his son and heir, and for the first time was proud of bim. It struck the professor that here was something to do that would be worth while. The child seemed to have a bright mind and to be fond of books. The more the professor questioned him, the more satisfied he became, and he plunged enthusiastically into the work of a tutor.

Now the professor was very brilliant, and the child was very young. Tbe course of study mapped out would have appalled a University Senior, but the child tackled the works with enthusiasm. He made wonderful progress for a time, and then what any sensible parent would have predicted happened. The boy suffered a nervous breakdown, and for a time hovered dangerously near the portals of the other world.

The grief-stricken parent could not comprehend what had happened or how much he was to blame. He sorrowed because lessons were neglected, and while the child was convalescing, blandly started to renew them. He was not a cruel fatber, it sbould be stated, only a foolish one.

By rare good fortune, the helpless child had a sensible nurse, who had loved and cared for him from his birth. She stopped the lessons, defied tbe father, and bluntly told him that his conduct would certainly cause the death of his child if continued. The doctor, appealed to, upheld the nurse, and the worried professor consented that the nurse try her way to restore the health of the son he now loved deeply.

The nurse and the boy went to the country, where books were tabooed and healthful exercises and enjoyment favored. Later the Professor, in response to a letter from his boy, went to visit them. He found that the child had forgotten all about cube root, integral calculus and the fourth dimension, but that he had learned to fish and wanted father to join him.

The worldlywise nurse came out of the farmhouse shortly after the professor arrived, shaded her eyes, looked off and smiled.

She saw a learned man and a happy little boy seated side by side at the bank of a stream fishing and having an enjoyable time. And she knew that the Professor realized that his ways had been wrong, and that infant prodigies seldom grew up to be leaders of men and minds, unless they were permitted to be boys when they were boys and not little priggish bookworms. There would be plenty of time later for study, she mused, but so far as the present was concerned, she rejoiced that the child she loved was to be permitted to have his time to play.

THE BANDIT OF TROPICO
Nestor Release, June 17

William Blake is a respected citizen of Tropico, California; a man looked up to by his neighbors and worshipped hy a devoted daughter, whose love he fully reciprocates.

The inhabitants of Tropico and other towns are much puzzled over the frequent rohberies of the stagecoach which runs through Eagle Pass in the Sierras. The hold-ups have been holdly executed hy a lone handit who has made several good hauls. The robber is known as "The Mysterious Bandit of Eagle Pass." So hold and frequent have his depredations become that the State offers a reward of $5,000 for his capture, dead or alive.

Neitber his neighbors nor his daughter, Kitty, connect William Blake with these robberies. They even consult him regarding tbe handit and the State's reward, yet Blake is the bandit who is committing these daring hold-ups in order to provide his daughter with comforts and make her future secure. Both because he regards Jim Sherwood, the young sheriff, as a suitable husband for Kitty, his daughter, and to further protect his dual life, Blake encourages the young man's suit.

Disguising himself in rough garments and a thick, black beard, Blake steals out at night, successfully robs the stagecoach and, covering his tracks with extraordinary cunning, he eludes his pursuers and gets home without exciting suspicion.

Blake has occasion to knock down Pete, a tough cowboy, who, whilst drunk, insists upon being introduced to Blake's daughter. Pete follows Blake into a saloon where Blake is "treating the boys" and, thrusting aside Blake's proffered hand, shoots and mortally wounds him. Realizing that his time has come, Blake sends for Kitty and the young sheriff. He then writes a note advising his daughter to tell no one but Jim Sherwood. Kitty arrives in time to see him alone. She gets the note and the false heard before her father dies. The young sheriff, on being informed that Blake is the bandit, slowly hurns the tell-tale evidence, saying: "Let us shield his memory and forgive and forget." He then takes Kitty into bis protecting arms.

THE LAND OF MIGHT
Nestor Release, June 19

The young home-seekers, John and Mary Anderson, come over the mountains in a prairie-schooner. They select a spot for camp, unhitch their horses and start supper. While John is gone for game, the horses get away and Mary is forced to run after them but before she comes up to them, both horses have been captured by three gold-seekers, Sid, Bill and a Mexican; and as their hurro has just died, the men are delighted to get the horses. As soon as Mary appears and claims them, Sid is only too willing to return her property. Not so Bill and the Mexican, however, and in consequence Sid and Bill retire a short distance to fight it out. Sid is victorious, without having done more than give Bill a slight wound, so sending the Mexican to look after his partner, Sid accompanies Mary on her way toward their camp. John returns in the meanwhile, misses his wife and the horses and at once sets out on their trail, overtaking Mary and Sid just as the young wife's strength has about given out. As a reward for Sid's kindness, John insists upon the other accepting his saddle horse and as soon as Sid rides away, the hushand and wife prepare to camp there for the night. Bill and the Mexican are, in the meanwhile, on the trail of Sid, so creeping up to where John and Mary have camped for the night, Bill is about to plunge his hunting knife into the sleeping husband, believing him to be Sid, when his hand is stayed by Sid himself, who, having passed his partner and the Mexican creeping toward the camp and fearing for the lives of Mary and John, returned in time to prevent the tragedy.

BENEATH WESTERN SKIES
Nestor Release, June 21

Col. Person's Mexican foreman, Pedro, is in love with his master's daughter, Helen, who appears to like his companionship. Pedro's old sweetheart, Juanita, becomes very jealous.

Jim Carson, a dashing Easterner, comes to the Colonel's ranch with a letter of introduction and soon occupies the biggest corner in Helen's heart, much to Pedro's displeasure. The foreman attempts to undermine Jim by letting him ride "Buck," an unmanageable bucking horse. Jim keeps his seat and, on dismounting, knocks the Mexican down. A fight follows with victory going to the Easterner, which fact makes Jim popular with the boys and gains him the enmity of Pedro, who vows to he revenged. At the first opportunity, he seriously wounds young Carson and carries Helen to a deserted shack. Jealous Juanita has not been idle. She follows the couple and lies in wait. Helen is soon left alone, a prisoner in the shack, to which Juanita fiendishly sets fire. She then overtakes Pedro and pleads with him.

Meanwhile, Jim has managed to ride back to the ranch and gives the alarm. Col. Person, his cowboys and the wounded man ride bard, bent on capturing the villain. They come upon Pedro and Juanita, but the wily Mexican gives them the slip and is only caught after a most thrilling chase. At the point of a gun, he is forced to tell of Helen's hiding place. The girl is saved in the nick of time and the Mexican is left to the tender mercy of the boys.

Imp Release, June 24

Fred Little and Charles Wright are both in love with Virginia Wrayburn, whose heart is at the beginning of the war pledged to the Southern cause. When Lincoln and Lee send their calls for volunteers, Fred goes with the North and Charles with the South, in spite of the fact that those two men have been lifelong chums and companions.

Charles learns before he leaves to join the Southern forces that Virginia is the fiancee of his old chum, Fred. This comes as a great surprise and he determines to forget her.

Early in the struggle Charles is given an important mission to perform hy his Commander-in-Chief, the carrying of dispatches to an important point. Northern scouts learn of Charles' mission and Fred, without knowing that he is pursuing his old friend, starts on his track. Charles, now realizing that he is being pursued, takes refuge in a deserted log cabin. Shortly afterwards Fred and two soldiers also come to the cabin to take a much-needed rest. Lighting a candle, he sees a foe is present. Charles, thus awakened, leaps to his feet, draws his revolver; then comes the recognition. For a moment they meet in an embrace in which all the horrors of war are forgotten; then comes the terrihle realization that they are enemies.

Fred, obeying his orders, demands the despatches; Charles refuses to give them up, hlows out the candle and tries to escape. In the darkness Fred shoots, and the troopers, hearing the shot, rush to the aid of their officer. They reach the cabin just as Fred shoots his friend, takes the despatches, and passes out into the night. Charles regains consciousness and, though mortally wounded, determines to try to recapture the despatches. Mounting his horse, he starts in pursuit.

He follows Fred to the home of Virginia and there getting him hy surprise, secures the papers. The house is soon surrounded hy Southern soldiers. This means capture and death for Fred. But Charles succeeds in persuading him to change uniforms with him and when the Southern officer enters the room, Charles is arrested. However, before he succumhs to the terrihle wound, he hands the officer the despatches.

Fred and Virginia mount their horses and escape to Washington after waving a last farewell to the friend whom neither will ever forget.

HIS OTHER SELF

Imp Release, June 20

A startling pictureplay with King Baggot in a dual rôle; he is the lover and Violet Horner is the girl.

On returning from a walk with her lover the girl is handed a hox of American Beauties which is accompanied hy a note. The lover asks to see it; she in a spirit of fun refuses—and tells him to guess the name of the writer. He then demands to know the name of the sender and she, refusing to divulge same, a quarrel ensues and he leaves the house in anger.

Arriving at his home, he seats himself hefore the fire and sadly ponders on the fickleness of women. Finally, he falls asleep and in his dream sees in himself another man. Suddenly awaking, as it were, he sees himself in evening attire leaving the room. Hastily arising from the chair and picking up his pistol, he follows his other self. His other self leads the way to the girl's home, he in pursuit, His other self enters the house and room from which he, himself, had departed in anger a few hours previous. He arrives on the scene just in time to see the girl struggling in the arms of his other self. No longer ahle to resist the temptation, he fires at his other self, who has dared to ill treat his sweetheart. Apparently the shot does not take effect for his other self, with a smile of satisfaction, turns and leaves the room.

The dreamer now awakes in reality and at once rushes to the telephone to he satisfied that his fears are unfounded. He, at last, succeeds in bringing the girl to the 'phone, and when assured of her safety a sigh of relief escapes him, and yet another, when she tells him the flowers were a hirthday gift from her father.

PORTUGUESE JOE

The sailormen patronize the saloon kept hy Portuguese Joe and his pretty wife and they put it over the simple dago in a peculiarly sailorlike fashion. They get their drinks and are not willing to pay. One day one of them carried the scheme so far as to get a drink on the nod and then to swallow the contents of the glass, into which he had poured a white powder that he carried with him. Feinting death he was dragged out of the hotel hy Joe, who was alarmed lest the police should appear and a dead drunk he found on the premises. So Joe put the man on the street.

Several of the sailormen habitues seeing the powder, tasted it and, finding it only sugar, pointed out how Joe had heen stung.

Joe's little wife, like himself, conceived a suspicion of sailormen in future and Joe thereafter was more careful of his naval guests.

This little play is taken from Edwin A. Locke's dialect poem, "Portuguese Joe," and it shows the perturbation of the dago boniface exceedingly well and the jokes which the sailormen had in his humble inn.

A CHILD'S INFLUENCE

Imp Release, July 4

Godfrey Clark, his charming wife and their pretty little daughter were impatiently awaiting the coming of his college chum, Andrea Sarto. He is met at the station by Godfrey and the two men show their delight at heing together once more.

On being introduced to Mrs. Clark, Andrea is immediately attracted to the fascinating woman, and while an honorahle man would have resisted the temptation, he seeks every opportunity to he with her. Clark, who is a civil engineer, is unexpectedly ordered to report for work in a distant part of the country. He regrets parting with his friend, hut has no hesitancy in leaving him with his wife and child.

Andrea now proceeds to make good use of his time and even goes so far as to intercept a letter from Godfrey to his wife and forges one to take its place, which duly reaches her. This forged letter announces to the wife that her hushand had gone away with another woman. Mrs. Clark is hoth hearthroken and mortified, and Andrea, realizing this is his opportunity, renews his suit with vigor.

He might have succeeded with the tortured woman had it not heen for an accident to her little girl, who fell from the window in the delight at seeing the form of her father in the distance. The eloping wife was called hack at the supreme moment by a maid who reported the accident to her. Mother-love triumphed over jealousy and she returned to the house.

Meanwhile, her admirer, while awaiting her coming, was thrown from his horse and killed. So when the civil engineer reached home it was to discover that his little daughter was not very seriously injured and to be greeted with unusual warmth by his wife who, in telling him of the death of his friend, kept the secret of that friend's attempted dishonor.

HIS PUNISHMENT

Bison Release, June 18

Lieut. Wade bas heen carrying on a clandestine courtship with Silver Star, a pretty Indian girl. Her father, Black Hawk, discovers that secret meetings are taking place, and endeavors to keep the lovers apart. Wade is promoted and transferred to a distant fort, and tbe Indian girl is forgotten in the whirl of the military and social life with which he is surrounded.

Silver Star dies of a hroken heart, leaving an infant, Little Dove, who is brought up hy Black Hawk.

Wade marries a daughter of a brother officer, the wedding being celebrated with pomp.

Twenty years elapse, and the press of civilization forces the Indians westward. Black Hawk's tribe locates in the vicinity of Wade's post, and one day Little Dove comes face to face with her father. Her startling resemblance overwhelms him, and he starts as if a ghost had confronted him. The Indian girl, not knowing the cause of the man's agitation, casts off his detaining hand and goes on her way.

Little Dove tells her grandfather of the occurrence, and he relates to her the sad romance of her mother. She becomes incensed, and vows she will avenge her mother's desertion and death. Black Hawk consents to aid her, and she goes to Wade and informs him that the Indians are discontented, but that she believes a demonstration of force will keep them from resorting to violence. Wade falls into the trap, and calling his troops together marches out to impress the redskins. As they reach a valley the concealed Indians pour a rain of fire into their midst, and the surprised soldiers retreat in confusion. Wade is dragged from his horse and made a prisoner, and is triumphantly carried to the camp hy the exultant Indians. Led by Little Dove, the squaws torture Wade until he is exhausted, and he is then led onto the blazing desert, and left to die, with his hands tied hehind him.

That night Little Dove, her vengeance satisfied, realizes what she has done. Wade's accusing eyes seem to haunt her, and, stricken with remorse, she steathily departs from the Indian village and goes to Wade. The still hand of death has preceded her, however, and she falls prostrate and caresses the still form of her father.

ON THE WARPATH

Bison Release, June 22

The film opens with a scene showing the old Indian chief, Arrow Head, selling head work at a railroad station. After the train departs he sits down in the shade and falls asleep, living again in his dream the days of his youth as a Yuma brave.

The Apache and Yuma Indians, as allies, had been waging a bitter warfare against tbe whites. The United States government massed large bodies of troops in the district, determined to crush out the guerilla warfare. The Apache were willing to make peace, hut feared their allies. A conference was held hetween the Apaches, Yumas and the government representatives, at wbich the Apaches defied the troops, hut the Yumas signed a treaty on condition that the government protect them against the Apaches.

During the conference Arrow Head met Red Feather, the daughter of the Sioux chief, and the two young people fell in love. Red Feather overhearing the plans of the Apaches to attack the Yuma camp, and fearing for the safety of her lover, sent her young hrother to warn him. Tbe Yumas, tbough outnumhered, were thus ahle to arrange a hurried defense, and the battle raged fiercely. Realizing that they must soon be annihilated hy their ferocious adversaries, Arrow Head volunteered to ride to tbe distant fort and appeal to the soldiers for aid.

Mounted on a fleet horse he dasbed through the Apache lines, and though sorely wounded managed to elude his pursuers. His horse dropped from exhaustion and he found himself in sight of the Apache village. Red Feather sees him and conceals him in her tepee, where he rests and is given water to quench his thirst.

The pursuing Apaches are told hy Red Feather that Arrow Head has gone hy and they follow the direction she gives. She then hrings her pony for her lover, and he reaches the fort without further mishap.

When the savages find they have been tricked Red Feather is punisbed hy being staked out in the desert. The rescuing soldiers find her, and then continue their mad gallop to the scene of hattle. A fierce encounter takes place, hut the Apaches, attacked from the top of the hill hy the Yumas, and from the front by the soldiers, are badly defeated. The old Yuma chief, mortally wounded, calls his braves about him, and as a reward for the bravery of Arrow Head hands the latter his head-dress—the insignia of rank—with the consent and the approval of tbe grateful tribe whose lives Arrow Head has saved.

A MAN'S DUTY

Reliance Release, July 3

When tbe Civil War between the North and South was declared it caused great consternation in the home of John Wilson. For while he was Southern hy birth and sympathy, his wife was a northern woman and she favored tbe federal cause. Their two sons were asked which side they favored. John, the elder declared he would fight for the South with his father while Dick, tbe younger hoy, upheld his mother's cause. Wilson hecame a Confederate Colonel and John a lieutenant under his fatber's command but Dick left his old home in the uniform of the North. At Union headquarters there was a call for a spy to enter the Confederate lines, Dick was glad to be given the commission. General Lee, commander of all the Southern forces, was warned of this step and he in return warned all his colonels. Wilson puts a scouting party under tbe leadership of his son and they search the woods for the spy. Dick in the meantime had overpowered a Confederate soldier and taken his uniform. The scouts had come upon him and think him one of tbeir soldiers until John riding up recognizes his hrother. Then they know he must be the spy they are looking for and he is captured. Tbey hring him back to camp and Wilson has to send his son to the guard house. After the court martial the spy is sentenced to he shot at sunrise. The fatber's heart is hreaking but it is his duty as a man and a soldier. The brother of the condemned boy has one last hope. He will appeal to General Lee for clemency. He rides wildly for hours and finally reaches headquarters. But upon telling his story he is refused; Lee will do nothing for a spy. He leaves, his last hope shattered. The sun rising, Dick is led out to be shot. In tbe meantime, however, Lee, thinking the matter over, has experienced a change of heart and be despatches a courier with a reprieve. It arrives just in time to save the boy's life. John, riding back to camp, cannot believe his eyes wben he sees his hrother alive. He is told of the reprieve and how his wild ride was not in vain after all.

RIP VAN WINKLE

Reliance Release, July 6

(Two Reels)

This revival in motion pictures of Joe Jefferson's own version of the old favorite "Rip Van Winkle," was made in the heart of the Catskill mountains. Tbe scenery in consequence is not only beautiful, hut appropriate. Rip's story is almost too well known to need repetition. How he came home drunk one night during a terrihle storm and was driven away from the house hy his wife, Gretchen. How he wandered up into the mountains and met Hendrick Hudson and his demons who urged him to drink with them. How he fell asleep after drinking and slept for twenty years, awakening finally to find himself an old man. How his false friend, Derrick Von Beekman, claimed his houses and lands while he was away, hy pretending to have a document from Rip turning them all over to him. How Derrick married Gretchen and made her very unhappy. How Rip arrived home after twenty years just in time to save bis wife and his home by producing an old faded document from his game hag which proved conclusively that nothing belonged to Derrick. The pretty love story between Rip's daughter Meenie and young Heinrich Vedderman, sweethearts since childhood, carries the same interest it always did.

THE HIGH COST OF LIVING

Eclair Release, June 18

Mr. and Mrs. Consumer find that they have no food in the house. It is salary day, so they depart for the market which is a monopoly and presided over by a syndicate representing the goods they controlled. Their motto is: "Our prices, all we can get." This syndicate is composed of Kings, thus divided: Milk, Butter and Eggs; Coal; Bread; Sugar; Meat; Clothing and Tobacco. At tbis market there is a great gathering which finally thins out to the few who have enough money to satisfy the grasping Kings.

The various types of consumers huy or try to huy their necessities at exhorhitant prices. The Kings are greedy and cruel.

Finally unable to hear these impositions the people become impatient and resolve to do something to repair their wrongs. The Kings have a reunion and make a mound of their hags of gold which they worship. It is transformed into tbe God of Greed, around which they group and command the people to cease their complaints.

A meeting of the discontented people is in progress when the painting of Justice comes to life and joining them, asks them to tell their complaints, and she, thoroughly aroused, issues an indictment for trial against the wicked Trust Kings.

Uncle Sam executes the warrant much to the joy of the consumers. He repairs to the market where the Kings are having a juhilee—arraigns them—calls upon the people to carry out the orders of Justice, points to sign which has changed to "Justice Triumphs at Last." The moh seizes the Kings and hustles them off to the bar of Justice. The Kings handcuffed are now arraigned before Justice. Uncle Sam enters as the people's lawyer, and in a short time, (with the overwhelming evidence of their rapacity) has the jury pronounce them guilty and sentenced to hard lahor for life. The people destroy the God of Greed and now that prosperity returns a few weeks later give a jollification feast at Mr. Consumer's house. In the meantime, the guards lead the Kings in convict garb to their lahors which they do very lightly. They overcome their guards and escape. While the feast is at its height the Kings repair to Consumer's house and like a lot of vultures attack Justice, drag her from the house and make her a prisoner. The noise

THE TITLE HUNTERS

Eclair American, Release, June 20

A number of charming society girls, at a house party in the residence of Mrs. Newgate, are so enthusiastic over titles and princely names that the young men decide to play a game on them. Accordingly, they persuade an itinerant organ grinder to dress up in a weird fashion and impersonate a count who has been invited to visit the Newgates. The Italian, Guiseppe, insists on carrying his monkey around with him, and the complications which arise from his sunny Italian temperament and his equally temperamental monkey, with the temperamental young ladies, are very ludicrous. At last the young society men disgust the girls with their title craze, just as the real count turns up. The joke of the whole matter is that Guiseppe, after he is thrown out of the Newgate mansion, proves to be a real count himself, in temporary hard luck. But he is disgusted with American society and he returns to his avocation, to console himself in the company of faithful Jock and the lute-like strains of his barrel organ.

WILLY WANTS A FREE LUNCH

Eclair Paris Release, June 23

A French comedy. Portuguese scenes and "Women's Work" on the same reels—the latter two being splendid educational subjects.

Willy, a little French gamin, causes a great deal of merriment by his efforts to obtain wherewith to satisfy the inner youth, and his combat with the gendarmes, the soldiery, the indignant trades people and servants of two thirds of Paris, makes a very droll and mirth-provoking release.

HILL FOLKS

Gem Release, June 18

Years before he had gone away, had crossed his native mountains into a country where might is measured by other things than the strength of arm and the amount of arms one possessed. He had gone and got cultured, that's what! He had exchanged instinct for intelligence, cunning for knowledge, stealthiness for strategy. He had bartered brawn for brain—but he had kept enough of the former for emergencies. He had studied the law, and was returning to introduce and enforce it in a place where the only law was the denial and defiance of it.

As he rode along the narrow road, he came across Judith, a playmate of the old years and the sweetheart of his kidhood days. She was now a woman; with the tender suggestion of young and yearning womanhood expressing itself in her shy recognition and bashful welcome. He gazed at her, and a dead memory of the young of yesterday was resurrected and restored. Then, his eyes feasting on her fresh, petulant, pensive face, as though reluctant to look away from the sympathy and sincerity growing and glowing there, he rode on into the town.

The mountaineers muttered sullen words when they saw the shingle, "Clem Parker, Attorney at Law." They resented his return and intrusion, and disliked the significant suggestion of the sign—to them a sign of no good omen. For between you and me, they were moonshiners, and his face looked too honest and earnest for their future prosperity and security.

It happened at Judith's birthday dance. The leader of the clan, inspired by a quantity of whiskey, attempted to kiss Judith, and Clem struck him down. That night the clansmen held council in the old barn, and decided to take peremptory vengeance on the offender. Judith, eagerly and anxiously listening, heard all, and quickly apprising her father, they hastened to prepare Clem, but arrived just in time to be a little too late. The wounded lawyer and the fleeing riders conveyed the grim, graphic tale.

The second attempt to wreak their wrath upon Clem, when they hurled him over the precipice, only resulted in the discovery of the distillery in the cave below. Even their attempt to kidnap Judith was frustrated by a kid who had learned their purpose and communicated it to the sheriff.

Determination and courage eventually triumphed over disorder and cunning—as they generally do. And the conquest included the victory of a greater law than that prohibiting moonshiners.

For one night, while the old moon was smiling down upon a silly earth, Clem whispered something to Judith that brought a sweet blush to her cheeks and a tender glow to her eyes; and Judith said yes.

ONE DAY'S WORK

Powers Release, June 26

An unique and charming story that tugs at the heart-strings. The story opens with sadness in the home of Grandfather Stevens. The sheriff has taken his only horse for debt, leaving the farmer with a field half plowed and the sowing season upon him. The farmer is in despair and his grief is shared by his little granddaughter. She wanders away in her sorrow and meets a trio of burly tramps who are enjoying a siesta in the shade. She boldly approaches them and they notice her tear-stained face. They are all sympathy for the sweet child and they cast about for methods to amuse her. One of them gets down on all fours and invites her to take a ride on his back. That suggests an idea and she sobs out the story of the visit of the sheriff and of his taking the horse with the field unplowed. They listen to her tale with interest and at the close cast about for a way to relieve her distress.

Going to the field they look over the situation and then enter into the spirit of the occasion with a trifle more zest than could be expected of idle nomads. They hitch themselves to the plow and drag it through the ground, never finishing until the last furrow is turned, when they drop to the ground exhausted from the strenuous work—a new sensation to them. The child is delighted and invites them to the house for supper, which they eat with a relish. The grandfather finds his plot plowed and is in a quandary until the child explains. The finale is a glimpse of the tramps as they file down the dusty road, their stomachs full, but with aching limbs. They are happy in the fact that they have been kind to a sweet child and their troubles are forgotten in their contentment.

On the same reel:

THE HELPING HAND

Little Madge attends Sunday School and becomes interested in a plan proposed by the minister in which each one of the scholars is furnished a book in which to record acts of kindness and charity performed, the youngsters being stimulated to greater work by the promise of a prize. Madge is bound to win first honors and sets immediately about it with a zeal that is commendable.

Her first act is to protect her sleeping father from the attacks of the flies. She drapes his recumbent form with fly paper and enters the action in her book. She meets a ragged tramp and he attracts her attention. Going into the house she takes down the hat, top coat and cane of her sister's beau and gives them to the hobo, who is profuse in his thanks. That is kindness No. 2, and she is getting on famously. Searching for other unfortunates she finds a cage full of rats that have been enticed into captivity. She liberates the rodents, elated and duly chronicles the fact in her record book. At this juncture there is consternation in the household. The young man is about to bid adieu to his sweetheart when he discovers the loss of his hat and coat. A policeman is summoned and just as the officer enters the parlor the rats creep in and scamper about. There is a panic among the women which awakens the sleeping father, and he has a busy moment with the fly paper, making an entre into the parlor which is spectacular to say the least. Little Madge appears on the scene and brings order out of chaos by explaining, in proof of which she submits her record of three acts of kindness. The family fails to appreciate her efforts in view of what has happened, but she finds solace in the kind words of the minister, who encourages her to continue the good work with a few gentle reminders.

THE POWER OF THOUGHT

Rex Release, June 20

Thought is the greatest force in and beyond the world. Through the door of thought we come into all our joys and triumphs, and pass out from them. It is the greatest medium for happiness or misery. It is life—and death!

How Lois loved Phil, and Phil worshipped Lois. It seemed as though they had loved as long as they lived, and would love until the Final Interruption. Call the tender tie that bound them love, destiny, imagination, or term it in the scornful, scoffing name of "joke"; we think it was pretty nearly all for which life was manufactured; and certain it is that it was more than mere breathing to them.

There was another chap whom we'll call Tooker, chiefly because that is his name—a handsome brute, with the graceful, careless ways that women like. He probably loved himself more, but he liked Lois a little, too—a little too much for Lois' comfort.

There was a rustic bench beneath an ancient tree in the near distance. There, of a moonlight night, Lois and Phil would whisper the old story, in the old, old way of a man and a maid. On such nights, at such times, it seemed as though everything in the world loved everything else. The very air, fragrant with the souls of flowers, seemed to woo the singing leaves; and its winged creatures serenaded the amours with a love song of some place happier than the earth; the low murmur of the peaceful waters of the lake was a whisper of music, and the stars smiled. Their hearts were as light as the feet of Youth, and the world was Arcadia! . . . Such a night was now, and they were parting, with all the tender regrets of the incident. Tooker had watched them, and when Phil went, he approached Lois and attempted to kiss her. In her anxious helplessness, she dropped the flower that Phil had brought her, and turning, fled. Tooker saw the flower—and his opportunity.

A little later he entered the tavern where Phil and a few companions were chatting and laughing. Proudly he waved the lying flower, and spoke wild words of her infidelity. Just after Phil struck him, the duel was arranged.

Fassett, in love with Cleo, Lois' sister, ran back and breathlessly explained what had happened. In desperate grief, Lois snatched her scarf, told him to run and give it to her love, and tell him if he lived to wave the scarf and ride back to the trysting place.

Tooker was a coward, as every man who lies about a woman is, and in craven fear he ran from the field of honor, where such as he have no place, mounted his horse and rode off in frenzied fright and flight. Lois, waiting in trembling anxiety, saw the wild rider, and her tortured thoughts at once conveyed to her the grim supposition of her lover's death; the last terrible grief that she was ever to know ate into her life and youth; the broken heart stopped, and the startled soul fled.

And there Phil found her, murdered by the power of thought, a martyr to cruel imagination.

THE VOICE OF THE MILLIONS

Rex Release, June 23

There were misery and poverty in those homes of the strikers, there were sickness and death. Happiness was not the issue of the strike: it was bread; not contentment: but life. It was the ancient struggle of the weak many against the mighty few, the inefficient millions against the invincible one. It is true that they had committed the unpardonable error of being born poor, but life was strong in them and sweet to them—though it was only existence. Their mouths were hungry, their hearts were red with rage and wrong—and their hands might have become that hue, too—but for a girl.

A girl who knew sorrow's misery and pain's distress, a girl who knew the meaning of love of life and fea rof death, and the torture of the destitution that exaggerates the one and aggravates the other. Like a Daniel of another sex, she championed their cause. She cautioned, encouraged, guided and guarded them. She taught them patience, forbearance and fortitude. She fought with a fierce, fiery devotion. She organized meeting after meeting, and from the platform she cried their truth to the world, and emphasized the neglected fact that they had as much right to live as he who took the work of their hands and gave them hunger for reward. But the mill-owner was obdurate. It did not occur to him that these were human beings asking only the right to avoid death. They were only a tool, a means to an end; and it didn't much matter to him if it meant their end, too.

At last she went to him, with the pathetic human evidence of the wrong, and pleaded for redress. The mill-owner's son saw and heard her, and something in the passionate, pleading, pleasing voice, and something in the sympathetic face, and something in the tender, thoughtful eyes arrested and interested him. He dressed in the clothes of the workman and attended the meetings. He listened to her, he was carried away by the bitter truth of her eloquence, and he saw the light and the right.

He enlisted in the fight, and she learned to depend upon him as an able lieutenant and a devoted sympathizer. You know, she thought he was one of the men.

The gods have a mill of their own; "they grind slow, but they grind exceeding fine." And it was decreed that the master of men meet the Master of Men. The thing that conquers conquerors, the enemy that vanquishes kings, that respects the mansion no more than the manger, entered the chamber of velvet and gilt and summoned the mill-owner to a tribune greater than all the millions who had judged him.

His son inherited the millions and their power, and he told and offered the girl all. She had almost learned to love him, but his justice and generosity completed the teaching. She gave herself to him, and he gave the millions to the millions.

THE HELPING HAND AND THEIR ONE DAY'S WORK

Powers Picture Plays

Director Matthews, of the Powers Motion Picture Company, is putting on some splendid stories in which a number of children are featured, and the coming split-reel subjects, "The Helping Hand" and "Their One Day's Work," are fully up to the standard.

In the former story a little girl attends Sunday-school and becomes interested in a plan proposed by the minister. Each scholar is given a book and told to record the acts of kindness performed. The child enters into the spirit of the occasion with a zeal that throws the whole family into a panic. She sees the flies are disturbing the slumbers of her father and she places fly paper on his robe and duly enters the act in her book. A tramp excites her sympathy and she gives him the silk hat and top coat of her sister's young man. Her third act is one in the interest of dumb animals and she releases a cage of rats from their incarceration. The garments have been missed and a policeman summoned. Coincident with the arrival of the officer the rodents wander into the parlor and there is a panic among the women. The father awakens and becomes entangled in the fly paper and he makes an entré that is spectacular. The little girl explains at this juncture and is consoled by the minister, who lauds her deeds although covertly enjoying the joke.

In "Their One Day's Work" the grandfather of a little girl loses his horse for a debt and the child finds a trio of tramps into whose ears she pours her tale of anguish.

THE AUTO SMASH-UP
Gaumont release, June 25th.

The hobos are interested and they go to the field left unplowed, hitch themselves to the plow, and turn the sod, finishing the work only to drop from exhaustion. They do it for the sake of the child, are treated to a hearty meal, and go on their way satisfied with their adventure, with weary limbs and blistered hands. A story which comes home and is true to life.

THE FEATURE FILM CO. OF AMERICA

The Feature Film Company of America report they have just opened a new office for the States of Indiana and Kentucky, at Suite 507 Terminal Traction Building, Indianapolis, Ind.

They state: "As you are no doubt aware, we control the State of New York rights, with offices at Rochester, N. Y., for all high-class motion picture productions, including Homer's 'Odyssey,' all Great Northern Special Feature Film Company's releases, and the '101 Bison' features, together with the coming 'Eclair' features, etc.

"Our buying office is located at Suite 705, 145 West Forty-fifth street, New York City, and our president, Mr. H. K. Somborn, spends several days of each week in New York City buying new feature productions.

"We are now serving the majority of the high-class accounts in the State of New York, and trust our office in Indianapolis for the States of Indiana and Kentucky will be just as successful in catering to the higher class of theatres that use the best of features.

"We might also mention that we have just closed contracts for the new Milano production, 'St. George and the Dragon,' for the States of New York, Indiana and Kentucky."

Rochester, N. Y.—A motion picture theatre will be built by W. H. Rowerdink at 72 North street.

Seattle, Wash.—Greater Class A Theatre has opened with great success.

Freemont, Ohio.—Gem Motion Picture Theatre is being enlarged.

Evergreen, Long Island, N. Y.—A moving picture theatre is being built on Fresh Pond road.

La Grande, Ore.—The new moving picture show house will open within a few days.

THE ART OF Scenario Writing

Second Edition By WILLIAM LORD WRIGHT

The MOVING PICTURE NEWS has secured the sole right to republish this standard work on Scenario writing, and offers it as a premium to all new subscribers of $2.00 for one year.

ART OF SCENARIO WRITING, separately, $1.00, post free.

Read what the Moving Picture World of February 25th, 1911, says of this excellent aid:—

The Art of Writing Scenarios

By William Lord Wright. Author of "Twixt Loyalty and Love," "Simon Kenton," etc., etc. Published by the Scenario Instruction Publishing Co., Bellefontaine, Ohio. Price $1.00.

In a very interesting series of articles published in our pages last month, Mr. G. R. Craw told the aspiring scenario author how to write scenarios. Those articles have been favorably commented upon as being of great practical value. Now comes Mr. W. Lord Wright with a little book of about 30 pages which still further adds to our knowledge of a subject that has perplexed many would-be moving picture authors, namely: How to set about work; how to acquire its technique; how, in fact, to prepare goods suitable for the market.

Mr. Wright, who is a successful scenario writer, first of all points out what is in demand by moving picture makers. Then he indicates what is not wanted. After reviewing the function of the scenario editor, he gives some of his own experiences, his failure and his successes. Then we come to some practical advice. He tells the author how to get ideas; where to market the completed scenario; how it should be written and presented, winding up by printing a sample scenario as a guide. Finally, he points out the value of action in this branch of dramatic work, and takes the view that, though unhonored, the moving picture scenario writer may some day come into his own in the way of publicity, fame and fortune. We hope he will, though we think this agreeable state of things a long way off.

Meanwhile we welcome Mr. Wright's little book just as we welcomed Mr. Craw's articles. These things relieve us of some responsibility. We are often asked how a scenario should be written, where it should be marketed, and how much money there is in it? Mr. Wright answers all these questions for us. We invite all our readers who are interested in this department of dramatic work, to get a copy of this book and study the formula that he gives. Of course, it is one thing to give a formula for a moving picture scenario, or plays, or a novel. These things may be delivered to managers technically correct in every detail, and yet lacking the one essential which no book on earth can teach: The selection of a theme which will get over: this is the divine afflatus referred to long ago by the author of the phrase: Poëta nascitur, non fit: The poet is born, not made. So we believe is the scenario writer. Still, for the benefit of those who are not born and who think they can be made, Mr. Wright's book should be of great value. It will sell well on account of that. It may have a negative value, too, in that it may possibly act as a deterrent to many people who think they can write scenarios and cannot realize their unfitness for the work. There are two or three books extant, and they have run through numerous editions, on how to write plays. It is not on record that any playwright who has succeeded during the last quarter of a century traces any of his success to these manuals, which, perhaps, have been instrumental in diminishing the output of unsuitable plays. It is no easy thing to write a good play; it is no easy thing to write a good scenario. So we hope Mr. Wright's book will encourage the aspirant who aspires to some reasonable hope of success, will discourage those who have no fitness for this form of work. There are too many of the latter kind in the moving picture field to-day.

THE ART OF SCENARIO WRITING contains a sample scenario recommended as the best form, by GILES R. WARREN, who is acknowledged as one of the most successful and original scenario editors of the present day.

A Mighty Traveler

POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH NO. 6 CIRCLES THE GLOBE.

POWER'S is found in every corner of the civilized globe. In the land of the Midnight Sun or the Antipodes—wherever the sun leaves its shadow, there Power's shines also.

Like Monte Cristo, "The world is mine" says POWER'S. ISN'T THAT GOOD ENOUGH FOR YOU?

Yes, and Paul Rainey and the Carnegie Alaska-Siberia Expedition use it; also all prominent lecturers—Burton Holmes, Dwight Elmendorf, Fred Niblo, etc. ISN'T THAT GOOD ENOUGH FOR YOU?

We handle 60 per cent of the moving picture machine manufacturing business of the world. ISN'T THAT GOOD ENOUGH FOR YOU?

Our No. 6 IS THE BEST FOR YOU, Mr. Exhibitor.

Let us send you catalogue D telling all about it.

A MINUTE AGO

we looked up the word "Gem" in the dictionary. Not that we didn't know what the word meant before, or how much it will soon mean to the trade, but—we did it anyhow! Mr. Webster, the man in the dictionary business, defined the word as

A JEWEL.....(They'll sparkle with life)
A PRECIOUS STONE.....(Leave none unturned)
ANY PERFECT OBJECT..(Mr. Webster was some prophet)

Our own idea of the word is that after the folks see "The Princess of Lorraine" Gem and Jam will be as correlative as Bryan and defeat.

YOU CAN'T REALIZE

what a giant parcel of effort and energy Mr. George O. Nicholls is contributing to the Gem productions in a sincere endeavor to beat his own flattering record; but YOU CAN REALIZE on the result of it!

TUESDAY, JUNE 18TH,

"HILL FOLKS"

a dominant drama of the Southern mountains, where might is measured by the strength of arm and the amount of arms possessed by one; with all the sway and surge of the wild, uncurbed spirit of the hills. Brain and courage finally conquer brawn and cunning, and the beginning of another and even greater story is told in the final kiss.

"THE REASON"

RELEASED TUESDAY, JUNE 25TH, is a very good one for demanding every Gem produced.

More Thrilling Than the Others

"Bonnot the Demon-Bandit"

The amazing reign of crime in history faithfully filmed in 2 Startling Reels! The actual battle with the French police and soldiers in the streets of Paris; the dynamiting and capture; ECLAIR'S photographs taken amid showers of bullets in the thick of the death struggle.

"Tom Butler"

2454 feet of exciting interest: Fifty Stirring Scenes, a Wonderful Detective Story more Absorbing than "Monte Christo."

"The Mystery of the Bridge of Notre Dame"

A tremendous tragedy in 2418 feet of Police Episodes and Enigmatic Adventures. Six-color posters in three, two and one sheets at cost price.

These superb productions come from the world's most remarkable studios, the ECLAIR FILM COMPANY, whose entire feature output is controlled by the Universal Features.

WE DO NOT LABEL THEM FEATURES BECAUSE OF THEIR LENGTH, WE BASE THEIR VALUE ON THEIR SUPERIORITY AND UNIQUE NATURE. EVERY ECLAIR SENSATION WHICH WE PROMOTE IS A "STAR ACT" ON THE PICTURE SCREEN.

"OLIVER TWIST" MOTION PICTURES.

"Oliver Twist"—Lyric.

The motion pictures recently made of the principal incidents in Charles Dickens' story of "Oliver Twist" so adapted as to give in as clear and as concise a way as possible an idea of the novel, were shown for the first time in this city last evening at the Lyric. Nat Goodwin, who in the recent revival of the play made from the novel was seen in the rôle of Fagin, was pictured in that rôle in the films and a generally competent cast of players gave him support. Every spectator last evening appreciated the fine photography in the motion picture presentation. All the pictures were very clear and there was little, if any, of that oscillation that is often an annoyance to onlookers at an exhibition of projected pictures. A lecturer gave some idea in advance of the exhibition of the nature of the story, and he also instanced some of the famous players who have been seen in dramatic representations of the play made from the novel. Occasional comments also came with the revealing of the pictures, although for the most part explanations were hardly necessary, so intelligent has been the visualizing of the piece.

The films presenting the novel in five installments were so nearly perfect as to warrant more than the usual commendation for careful photographic work. Goodwin at the conclusion of the presentation is seen in his customary garb on the screen, bowing his thanks to the spectators.

To Writers:

THE EDITOR

(The Journal of Information for Literary Workers) published in your interest for eighteen years, is the magazine of which Jack London said: "I may not tell a hundredth part of what I learned from THE EDITOR, but I may say that it taught me how to solve the stamp and landlord problems." It is a monthly stimulus to the production and sale of more and better manuscripts. Besides articles of concrete, practical worth by editors or by writers successful or about to be successful, each number contains in "The Literary Market" all the news of all the magazines, new and old, that pay for manuscripts.

THE EDITOR is especially helpful to the scenario writer. It publishes from time to time helpful articles by those who are successful producers of photoplays. A copy of the current number will be sent for 15 cents. The yearly subscription is one dollar.

PRODUCTION

WITH THE MUSICAL ACCOMPANIMENT MAKES AN ENTIRE EVENING'S ENTERTAINMENT

RELEASED, FRIDAY, JULY 12th

Two hundred people were used in the production of this massive feature. Scenery, properties and costumes were made to order. The production has all of the characteristics of an era-making feature. It is excellently staged, superbly acted and perfectly photographed. The principals in the cast are all stars and popular actors. The story holds the interest and its moments of suspense are full of thrills; a big sensational climax makes the grand finale. The action is full of variations. Tragic incidents follow scenes full of humor. Released through FILM SUPPLY COMPANY OF AMERICA.

"BETTY, THE COXSWAIN"

An exciting story of college days. At a critical moment, just before the big race, a college boy is injured. His sweetheart takes his place and rows to victory.

The Imp Follows Up Its Big Scoop

The Imp's big government scoop, "Making United States Currency," (released June 22) is to be followed immediately with another every bit as good. This will be and will be part of the Imp split release of Saturday, July 6. Our first government picture shows the process of washing, engraving, printing and counting billions of dollars. It's never been shown before. Our second shows the printing, perforating and cutting of postage and commercial stamps. All the other interesting operations are shown. You will be intensely interested in it yourself. So will your patrons. Book it quick and boost it with all your might! On the same reel you will get "HOME AGAIN."

"PRINTING and ENGRAVING U. S. GOVERNMENT STAMPS"

"LOVE, WAR AND A BONNET"

RELEASED MONDAY, JULY 1. This is a California Imp in which a corking good story is staged and enacted in a corking good way. If you've had any of the previous California Imps no argument is necessary.

"THE COLONEL'S PERIL"

ONE REEL Released Saturday, June 29 ONE REEL

A big feature, with heavy cast and stirring scenes. The colonel breaks up a love affair of his son and sends him to college. The youth runs away and enlists in the army. Later he is assigned to his father's post, but the colonel refuses to recognize him as his son. In a terrific battle with the Indians the son heroically saves his father's life and wins his forgiveness.

"HIS MESSAGE"

ONE REEL Released Tuesday, June 25 ONE REEL

Crippled by a landslide, the young prospector is attacked by thieves. While his sweetheart makes a wild ride to the settlement he fights for his life. Dying, he throws a bag of gold in the water, and with his own blood writes a message on a rock after the thieves have left him, telling of his action. The possé capture the desperadoes after a sensational pursuit.

"CUSTER'S LAST FIGHT"

COMING! Three Reels COMING!

The most comprehensive and thrilling reproduction of a battle ever conceived in the entire history of motography, faithfully following the government records and recognized historical authorities. The hordes of Indians and large bodies of soldiers in action, battling, charging, executing military maneuvers under fire, the great massacre scene, the retreat of Major Reno across the Little Big Horn River with the men fighting for their lives in the water, following the stirring incidents which led to the heroic sacrifice which plunged a whole nation in mourning, present a fascinating, blood-stirring subject that will attract millions into the theatres that exhibit it. The release of this subject has been withheld for the purpose of enabling exchanges to arrange for the renting of it. Exhibitors should therefore lose no time in telling their exchanges if they wish bookings on "Custer's Last Fight," as the demand will be tremendous.

THE POLICY OF THE NEWS

Questions put to us personally and by letter ask, "What is the policy of the Moving Picture News?" To this question we have always replied we are absolutely independent. "But, yes," said our querent, "you are an organ for the Independents only." To this we have invariably replied, no, we are strictly neutral. Our independence is, "An Independent Organ," free from the control of any organization, faction or individual connected with the trade. The paper is absolutely free. The only question we have dealt with so strongly is that we have opposed a monopoly of patents, but to say, or to think, we have opposed the Patents Company as a company, individually or collectively, is wrong. We never have done so and never will. Our principles have been on a broader basis than this. We have always contended that an American citizen should be free to live and let live, and not be hindered, prevented or stopped from earning an honest livelihood, wherever and in whatever capacity he may think his talents worthy of trying; more so in the Cinematograph industry, which offers such opportunities for advancement and conception that it should not under any condition whatsoever be bound down to any one faction or body of men, but that all who can make good pictures should be enabled to make and sell them.

Remember this, we said good pictures, and by good pictures we mean pictures that are open, educational, free from any incentive to crime or immorality of any description; a picture or pictures that can be witnessed by our wives, our sweethearts or our daughters without a blush or tinge of shame deepening their cheeks by any suggestiveness that may be in the picture. This is and has been its policy from the commencement of the News. We want every little bit of news that is of value to our readers, and when we say our readers we want it to be known that quite as many Association exhibitors read the News as Independent exhibitors, and we wish to cater to both. We will outline our policy more fully in the following remarks:

To the Exhibitor

The exhibitor is the man catering to the public and on him depends the quality of the exhibition given and the results accruing to him by their patronage. The exhibitor should be supreme, should hold the sway in the industry, and should dictate the policy of his house and should further be able to show any and every picture manufactured in that same house so that the public may benefit thereby. Further than this, the exhibitor should be an entirely independent unit, an individual unto himself with perhaps the exception of being allied to the National Association which will strengthen his hands more fully. We think that the exhibitor should not be harassed by film exchanges who own their own theatres because an exchange owning a theatre or theatres is in the position of a dog in the manger keeping the cow from partaking of good food. The exchange owning theatres is a monopolist because this theatre can show the best of films to the detriment of exhibitors who support the exchange, and we think that exhibitors should not support an exchange which puts itself and its theatre first before those who are its mainstay and backbone, and if our readers will send us the full particulars of exchanges who own theatres in their territory and are instrumental in preventing other exhibitors making a proper livelihood we will gladly publish the list in these columns so that the exhibitors may know where to get the best service for their money.

The Feature Film

also comes up for some degree of censorship. Some of the two-reel productions are worse than the one-reel exhibition subject and when exhibitors are mulct in rental first for a mediocre production in two and three reels we think it is time to put a very strong protest against this condition of affairs. We have time and again witnessed some of the state right productions which in our opinion are absolutely worthless and for which we would not pay 10c. for the privilege of exhibiting nor would we exhibit it unless it was specially good and educational. When manufacturers foist upon exchanges and the exchanges foist upon the exhibitors or hire a theatre to exhibit this film themselves to the detriment of the moving picture house in their neighborhood we think it is time for the Association to make a strong protest. If feature films are to be produced every exhibitor should have the privilege of using them at the present rate of hiring. It is a mistake to put some of the feature films on the market that are on as they only call forth words of opprobrium from the city authorities. Take, for instance, such reels as bull fights of animals between Spain and Mexico. They should be condemned on the ground that they are gruesome, shocking and brutal. The S. P. C. A.

as well as the city authorities should prevent these being exhibited, owing to the fact that between forty and fifty horses are killed by being inveigled on the sharp horns of the bulls. This is no sport, this is simply brutal, cruelty to animals in its strictest sense. Another picture we have in mind is "Buncoed." This presents an easy illustration of how to obtain money by dishonest methods. It never ought to have been placed upon the market and how it passed the Censorship Board is a puzzle we are unable to unravel. Again "The Fate of Mother" is another picture that never ought to be used by the exhibitors on the ground that it depicts a young girl staying out late with a married man and deceiving her mother. Knockout drops in films, attempting suicide or the hold-up at the point of revolver should also be debarred, let who ever will be the manufacturer of the film. These are some of the reasons why the News stands for principle and independence.

Fight Films

We are exceedingly pleased to learn that the measure providing heavy penalties for the shipment of fight films from one state to the other passed the Senate on the 15th. This bill prohibits the shipment on interstate commerce of films or other paraphernalias for the depicting of unmanly and unnatural fistic encounters and has obtained the President's approval. A fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year or both are provided as penalties. This inhibition against the pictures applies to all common characters and the recipient of the films is made equally guilty with the shipper if they are knowingly accepted. This news will be exceedingly gratifying to all who are trying to uplift the industry to a proper plane and that such brutal exhibitions as prize fights are now a thing of the past. We congratulate the Senators and on behalf of every decent exhibitor we tender them our thanks for passing this bill.

THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

New York State Exhibitors' Convention with "Our Roving Commissioner" Taking Notes

The convention held in New York City on Wednesday, June 19th, for the purpose of forming a state organization was highly satisfactory in that it accomplished the object for which it was called. The incident is one ominous of defeat to the enemies of the moving picture theatre, and portentious of success and prosperity to the future of the trade.

The convention was opened at the Union Square Hotel at 10.00 a.m. by the president of the local organization, Mr. Samuel Trigger. Mr. Trigger dwelt for a few moments on the position of the New York motion picture exhibitor, remarking incidentally that not so very long ago the exhibitor had been in the same category with the keeper of a dive, although to-day he has attained a respected position among intelligent business men. At the conclusion of his few brief remarks Mr. Trigger introduced M. A. Neff, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America, by whom the convention was called.

Mr. Neff struck right out from the shoulder on the benefits of co-operative organization. "Organization and co-operation make for the uplift of cinematography. We are in the cleanest and most educational line of business in the world," he said. "Where moving pictures are shown superstitions vanish as do the shadows with the morning sun." He then touched on the difficulties encountered in bringing the average exhibitor to see the necessity of organization. At the first convention called at Columbus, Ohio, only ten exhibitors attended; the next the number had increased to eighteen, and the next to thirty-five. One discouragement after another attended the efforts of Mr. Neff and others associated with him. Bad reports regarding the possibilities of organization placed many stumbling blocks in the way. But as the result of the dogged efforts of Mr. Neff and his followers Ohio has to-day one of the most vigorous organizations in the world. "You have in your control one of the greatest powers for good in the world," spoke the president of the National League to his brother moving picture men, "and what you need to place your business interests where they ought to be is strong, vigorous organization. You have great opportunities before you now which you must grasp while you have the chance."

Mr. Neff then proceeded to explain a few things that the exhibitors present for the most part were not aware of, and which demonstrated the power of organization, one of which was connection with a bill which had been introduced by Mr. Finrock, of Prospect, Ohio, which was known as Senate Bill 129, and which would have prevented the use of any but non-inflammable film, the passing of which would have been disastrous to the picture men under its jurisdiction. Another bill would have prevented children under sixteen from entering moving picture houses in the state of Ohio. Both of these measures were quashed by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League; in the last instance the author was threatened with having his picture displayed on the screen in every picture house in Ohio. These are the sort of things that Mr. Neff used as striking illustrations of the power of organization and co-operation.

"Our organization," said Mr. Neff, "is based on the principle of a fair, square deal to every one. We do not allow any man who is interested in the manufacture of films, or otherwise interested in the moving picture except in the exhibition end of the business, to become members of our league. And of the exhibitors belonging to the organization we have only bona fide men. Through organization you men become acquainted with one another; you get to know what each other is doing; you see a certificate hung outside a theatre and you go in and chat with its manager, discuss the question of booths and other things of mutual interest, and, by the way, when you have a strong organization you can build your booths as you like; you can make them out of iron, concrete, asbestos board, or any material you like as long as it is fireproof. The great trouble is that everyone knows better how to run the moving picture theatre than the exhibitor himself." Mr. Neff pointed out the value of organization in quelling attempts at forcing unconstitutional measures upon the exhibitors. Said he, "How do you expect to get in touch with Albany for relief and proper legislation unless you are banded together on a co-operative plan. You are answerable as you all know to no law that conflicts with the laws of your state. Of course," continued Mr. Neff, "maybe we ourselves are sometimes to blame for ordeals to which we are subjected—we don't say we are not. We have to be wise as a serpent and gentle as a dove."

"I am not talking to you as M. A. Neff," he continued. "I am talking to you as the president of the strongest organization in the world. We moving picture exhibitors are educating the industrial classes and the fact is as long as you have a prosperity in the tenements you have a prosperity that counts. Remember the millionaire riding down the street in his automobile does not make prosperity."

Mr. Neff states as his belief that after the National Convention, which takes place in Chicago in August, commencing on the 15th of that month, we will have every state in the Union affiliated with the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. "We are a world-wide organization," said Mr.

Neff, "when we enter New York." From time to time he begged the exhibitors not to allow themselves to be discouraged by paid agents and others whose business it was to try to influence them against organization. "The only way to get a square deal commercially," said he, "is to be in a position to demand it."

Following Mr. Neff's address, cards were passed in order to get the names of the exhibitors present, after which Mr. Ditmar, president of the Kentucky Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association, and vice-president of the local organization of his own city, Louisville, Ky., was introduced.

Mr. Neff then pointed out the advisability of belonging to the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, stating that in order to become affiliated with the national organization it would be necessary for each exhibitor to pay a fee of $5, which fee would go into the state treasury to be used only for the needs of the organization, and thereby still remaining the property of the exhibitor. At this point Mr. Arthur D. Jacobs, treasurer of the New York Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association, rose to say that they had at the present time in their local organization 117 members of good standing, and that it would be unfair to charge an individual fee of $5, proposing at the same time that they be admitted as a body for the nominal fee of $100, to which Mr. Neff replied that $100 in one lump sum would look good to them. It was thereupon carried that the New York Exhibitors' Association should become affiliated with the national organization at the nominal fee of $100.

Following this new members were taken on, and individual fees of new members paid over for what will hereafter be known as Local No. 1, Chapter No. 1, after charter has been applied for and granted.

An election of officers was then entered upon, which officers will serve for the term of one year. Mr. Samuel Trigger was elected president of the state organization, and B. C. Cornell, Syracuse, vice-president. It was then suggested that upstate men officiate in the offices of vice-president, secretary and treasurer, thereby giving the organization an opportunity of having prominent members stationed in different portions of the state, which arrangement would be of value in organizing local organizations. H. W. Rosenthal was elected secretary, and Mr. John C. Davis, of Saugerties, N. Y., treasurer. An adjournment of the meeting for ten minutes was then called during which time the camera man of the Gaumont Weekly busied himself with taking a few feet of likeness of the goodly throng as they assembled out in front of the hotel, after which the meeting was again called to order and the honor of national vice-president for the state of New York was thrust upon Mr. Sydney Ascher, the faithful secretary of the local organization.

An incident which happened previous to the adjournment of the meeting must not, however, be forgotten, and an incident which made everyone the staunch admirer of Mrs. Arthur, of the Practical Mothers' Society and the mother of ten children.

Mrs. Arthur addressed the Convention in the most emphatic manner, expressing her views on the subject of moving pictures in connection with the child question in a convincing style that was refreshing to say the least of it. "It is not because of my intellect, or my money or my beauty," said Mrs. Arthur, "that I have been asked to address this convention of motion picture exhibitors, but because I have ten children and ought to know by this time what is good for children. And when I talk to you men I know that you know what I am talking at, and that I will get the attention and respect to which I am entitled. Every other night for eight years I have attended a moving picture show with my children, and I tell you you men have got the schools skinned a thousand miles." Tremendous applause interrupted Mrs. Arthur for a few seconds, after which she continued to express her views on the attempted control of the moving picture theatres, and the keeping out of the children by those who had no understanding of the matter in any particular. Said she, in a manner characteristic of the woman, "They cannot understand my girl or boy any more than Mrs. Harry Thaw could. Do you like it? I don't. Just the other day," said she, "a mother said to me 'I give my boy a nickel to go to the picture show to keep him away from the "gang," they will not let him in and so he goes to the saloon around the corner and spends it there. Now what am I to do?' We must get this educational right for the children," continued Mrs. Arthur. "We must get a measure passed allowing the children in the moving picture theatres, and you exhibitors have got to stand up behind us and help we mothers to get this right for our children." After livening up things with a tale of woe about the tint on her nose, which she assured the company was not caused by the use of intoxicants, she told how the day previous she had gone out for a sail to get the fresh air and incidentally brush her nerves in shape in anticipation of appearing before the convention on the following day, and of how she had exposed herself to the sun much to the detriment of that most prominent and important feature, the nose. This intensely interesting and sensible woman sat down amid storms of hearty applause.

After lunch delegates were appointed to attend the Chicago Convention in August—three delegates and three alternates—which are as follows: Delegates, Miss Ida Mayer, Jamaica; Mr. Dey of Auburn and Mr. Anson of New York City. Alternates, Mr. Whitten, Mr. Louis Rosenthal and Mr. Swartz.

After the election of the delegates several interesting addresses were given, among them one from Miss Ida Mayer, a motion picture exhibitor of Jamaica. Miss Mayer is a shining example of the kind of people who should have charge of moving picture theatres, and in her clear, pleasant voice told her side of the story in the most concise and lucid manner. Chief Wallace, of the Bureau of Licenses, also addressed the convention. Mr. Wallace expressed himself as believing that the motion picture exhibitor of New York was doing a great service to the city. He said that complaints commonly came to him from people who would not enter a moving picture show, and therefore knew nothing whatever about them. He also stated that identical interests were ever in an attitude of attack, and stated that he was always ready to do anything he could to help the interests of the moving picture exhibitor along because he believed they were doing a good work.

Mr. Bracken, of the Bureau of Licenses, Brooklyn, also addressed the meeting. He said that not long ago a man had made protest against a moving picture show coming into his neighborhood because there was one about four blocks from there which Mr. Bracken describes as being a cross between a Chinese laundry, a tea store, and a barroom. These inconsistencies often occur according to Mr. Bracken; people do not stop to consider the difference between the man who intends spending $15,000 or so on the erection of a theatre and the man who puts up a shack. He stated also that he knew lots of good things about moving picture shows, "But," said he, "why not stop the knockers? If there are any members in your organization who are keeping improper places, bring them up before you and make them answer for it." Mr. Bracken had previously startled the convention by telling them to beware of the people whom they employed, stating that he knew of one exhibitor in Brooklyn who had in his employ a man who sold cocaine. "And if this exhibitor is here to-day," said he, looking around with a glance that would pierce the very walls, "I would advise him to get rid of this man as speedily as possible."

Mr. Rodgers, Deputy of the Bureau of Licenses, also spoke, but in his own words, "there was nothing much left for him to say." It had all been said. Mr. Rodgers did, however, make the following interesting assertion, that in the three and a half years which had transpired since the drastic measures taken by Mayor McClellan it had been rather a pleasure than a burden to work in the interests of the moving picture in New York City.

Mr. Neff then explained the relationship of the local and state organizations to the National, stating that the business of relief and protection worked from the individual on up. What can not be settled by the local organization is passed on to the state organization and eventually, if settlement in this way is not effected, action is then taken by the National organization. A summary of the ingredients of a moving picture film was then read by Mr. Neff, showing the absolute impossibility of film explosion.

The booth question was discussed by Mr. Keppler, attorney for the local organization. Some very interesting facts were stated by him in this connection which placed in a most ridiculous light the legislation governing moving picture booths. "The moving picture booth," said Mr. Keppler, "as stipulated in the present legislation, requires an operator to spend his days in a loft which is to have only one door, which must always be kept shut. The only other openings in the booth are an aperture for the lens and another small one for him to look through at the screen. There is absolutely no provision made for ventilation. Mr. Keppler was most emphatic in his denunciation of the existing laws governing moving picture booths. He drew attention to the fact that only the other day an operator lost his life because of the inadequacy of proper regulations controlling booth construction. He advocated the placing of a flue in the top of the booth connecting it with out of doors. In this manner he insisted that a film might take fire and the fire be put out without the audience knowing anything about it, panic and not fire being the chief danger in the moving picture theatre. The door of the booth could be kept closed until all the smoke had vanished through the vent in the top.

At the close of the meeting Mr. Neff extended the most cordial invitation to one and all to come to Cincinnati, where, he assured them, the latch strings of the organization would always be on the outside of the doors.

Letters of regret were sent in by several prominent men who were obliged to forego the pleasure of the convention.

At the close of the afternoon session an automobile trip was taken to Coney Island, with dinner at Henderson's, after which after-dinner speeches brimming over with wit and jollity by Mr. Trigger, Mr. Keppler, Mrs. Arthur, Mr. Bedding and Mr. Rodgers turned the already gay restaurant into a bedlam of laughter and general good humor. Three cheers each for the two presidents, Mr. Neff and Mr. Trigger, rent the roof and echoed far out among the adjacent buildings. A vaudeville show, a cabaret performance, and a return trip in the automobiles that brought the New York exhibitors and their out-of-town guests into the city in the wee sma' hours of the morning.

It would not do to close without a word about the dignified manner in which the general proceedings of the convention were carried on. It may be that the presence of the ladies shed an atmosphere of concord over the occasion, but at any rate it was all that could be desired in respect to orderly and systematic ruling. A great deal of credit is due to Mr. M. A. Neff, and to Mr. Jacobs, the chairman of the convention.

W. M. NEFF

As an organizer Mr. W. M. Neff is O. K. At the conclusion of the New York State Convention, we asked him what he thought of the outlook. Fine! Fine! Fine and dandy! Couldn't be better. I am more than pleased with the results of our meetings, and predict great return to all the exhibitors. The whole of the state was well in line and the way the New York people took care of us was excellent. Special mention must be made of Chairman Jacobs, who handled the arrangements splendidly. Not a hitch occurred to mar the program. I shall always remember with pleasure my visit and work in New York State. The delegates sent to Chicago will well represent the boys. I feel that the ball set rolling will gather in volume, and that when we all know each other better many acquaintances will ripen into friendships.

Mr. Neff had a herculean task before him when he came first to the city. The way he took it in hand and brought order out of chaos is a story we must tell in a later issue.

San Marcos, Texas.—A moving picture show has opened.

Marion, Ind.—The New Orpheum will open within a few days.

San Bernardino, Calif.—The Unique Theatre has been purchased by Stutz Bros.

Red Bank, N. J.—Harry A. Sculthorpe was granted a license for a moving picture theatre on Bay avenue.

Reading, Pa.—Wm. H. Reick will convert the Betz Building on Front street into a moving picture theatre.

Warrensburg, Md.—The new picture show being erected by C. F. Bueneman and John T. Bruce on South Holden street is about completed.

THE QUESTION OF LAW GOVERNING THE TRANSPORTATION OF MOVING PICURE FILMS

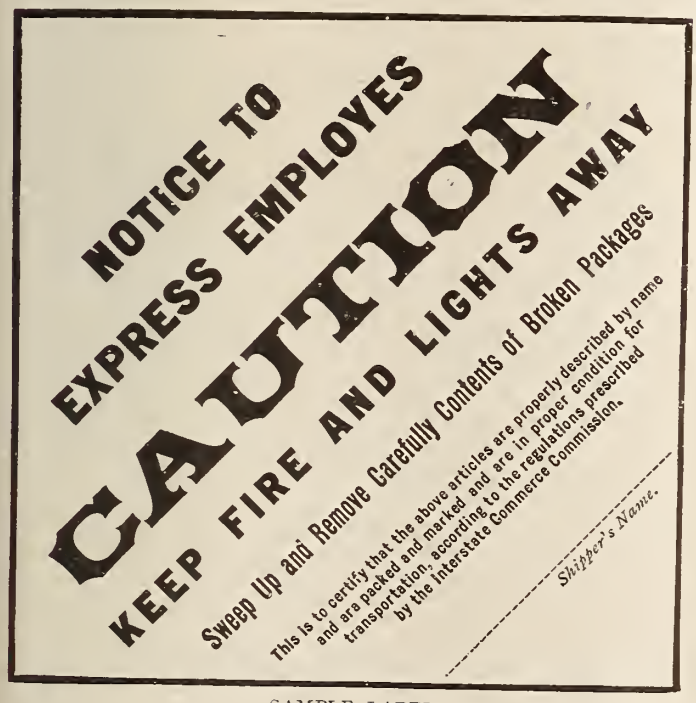
It has recently been brought to our attention that many shipments of films are being sent throughout the country in violation of the Federal law governing this industry, and as this is a matter of great importance to our readers, we desire to present to them the true facts and requirements of the case.

Section 235 of the Penal Laws of the United States, approved March 4, 1909, provides: that a penalty consisting of a fine not to exceed $2,000, or imprisonment not to exceed eighteen months, or both, may be imposed for violation of the law or of the regulations prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The regulations covering the transportation of dangerous articles by express became effective on March 31, 1912, and every manufacturer, exchange man and importer should obtain a copy of the law and regulations for his guidance. The Bureau of Explosives, 30 Vesey street, New York City, has published them in B. E. Pamphlet No. 10, and a copy may be obtained by remitting 17 cents, which includes the cost of mailing.

The regulations prescribe that moving picture films must be placed, first in metal cases, and then packed in strong and tight wooden boxes or fibre board pails. The customary method of packing in sound fibre telescopic boxes, provided the films are first placed in metal cases, is considered as satisfactory. No single outside package must contain more than 100 pounds and any shipment of films exceeding 100 pounds, net weight, must be placed in two or more packages. (See paragraphs 34 and 43, I. C. C. Regulations for the Transportation of Explosives and Other Dangerous Articles by Freight.)

Each package must be plainly marked on the outside, "MOVING PICTURE FILMS," and in addition to this marking, each package must bear a yellow label as follows:



NOTICE TO EXPRESS EMPLOYES
CAUTION
KEEP FIRE AND LIGHTS AWAY
Sweep Up and Remove Carefully Contents of Broken Packages
This is to certify that the above articles are properly described by name and are packed and marked and are in proper condition for transportation, according to the regulations prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.
Shipper's Name.

SAMPLE LABEL

It is imperative that this label be of standard size, color and wording, and a sample of the standard may be obtained from the Bureau of Explosives, 30 Vesey street, New York City. Supplies of these labels may be obtained from the Bureau of Explosives, at the following rates, including postage:

100	.50
500	.80
1000	1.14
5000	3.75

It is illegal to ship moving picture films as baggage unless properly packed and marked and labeled as required for express shipments. A trunk or suitcase does not meet this requirement.

If a package entirely conforming with the requirements previously described as to packing, marking and labeling should be offered to a common carrier, it would not be illegal to check it as baggage, but it is probable that the rules of individual carriers would prohibit the checking of baggage marked in this way. The prescribed legal method for transporting such packages is by express or freight.

These films may be shipped by freight with no restrictions other than those prescribed by the classification of the individual carrier. Shipments sent by freight must not bear the yellow label.

A strict and true observance of the above regulations will save delay in transportation. We desire further to call attention to the fact that this is not the law of a single state, but applies throughout the entire country, and even though a shipment in violation thereof might possibly be accepted by some forwarding agency through error, it would probably be held up in transit and result in delay.

By complying with these regulations, no exhibitor or exchange man need have any delay in getting his films on time, and in good order, and for their own protection a compliance with the law is considered advisable if deemed necessary.

MORT. H. SINGER ENTERS MOTION PICTURE FIELD

Mort. H. Singer, before sailing for Europe to-day, announced his intention of entering the field of motion pictures. He yesterday bought the Chicago and Illinois rights to exhibit the Carnegie Alaska-Siberia Big Game Hunt pictures, and same will open in his Palace Theatre, Chicago, next Monday evening. While in Europe Mr. Singer will complete arrangements for the American exhibition rights for several of the big motion pictures of Italy, France and England. That this branch of the amusement field has made great inroads into the dramatic and musical production business is a recognized fact, and Mr. Singer's step is one which has long been considered by other theatrical magnates.

SHOCKING HIS FLOCK

By Virginia West

(Adapted from Majestic Release)

The Reverend Joshua Jones shuffled along the street leading to his church. On his face was a look of mingled determination and anxiety. The sparse bunch of grizzled hairs on his chin moved spasmodically as he expressed his thoughts to himself.

Only that morning as the Reverend Jones was putting on his frock coat preparatory to starting for church, Mandy had said to him, "Josh, de pervishuns is a-gittin' mighty slow. Ain't dem low down niggahs gwine to pay you no sallery?"

The Reverend Joshua Jones had replied that he didn't know.

"Ah done prutch to 'em en prutch to 'em 'bout it. Ah done tole 'em dey all gwine burn in hell fire, en it don't do no good. What's de use a-preachin' to a niggah 'bout fire in de early springtime? Ef ye tell 'em dey all gwine go sumwhers like Sibery, den mebby dey han' over a leetle cash. But when dey hears talk 'bout hell fire dey jest sits an' grins to deyself. It mought do for a Eskymo, hell fire mought hit, but she won't do fer no niggah what ain't never got too warm yit."

Mandy had realized that what her lord and said was deep wisdom, nevertheless, having the problems of housekeeping on her shoulders, she also realized that some way must be found to extract the salary from the congregation.

Two hundred dollars is not a princely salary under the best of conditions, but when it, or any part of it, fails continually to appear at the stated intervals, something must be done.

Joshua had used all his persuasive powers many times over, but invariably when collection time came the heads before him, to the far and rear, began to nod.

"Ah done hinted to Miss Ann an' Miss Kate an' de othah ladies 'til I can't git nothin' mo' 'less I ax right out," said Mandy, "an' dat seems kinder ondignified fer a parson's wife."

Josh agreed that it did seem beneath her and so they put their heads together to see what could be done.

"Whyn't yuh ax 'em fer a new cahpet. Mebby dey'd give it ef dey know'd dey own feets was agwinter walk on it," Mandy suggested.

"How's dat gwinter put food in our stummicks?"

"Squeeze 'em fer de bes' cahpet dey'll give, den git de cheapes' one yuh kin an' take de res' fer de pahson's sallery."

"Yuh got a good haid on yuh, Mandy," said the parson with admiration. "Ah'll do what Ah kin."

So it was the thought of the red carpet that gave the Reverend Joshua Jones the look of anxiety and determination as he walked from his house to his church.

"You's lookin' mighty thinkful dis mornin', Brothah Jones," remarked Deacon Jackson as the parson came into the vestry room.

"Yas, Brothah Jackson, yas, Ah's got a task to perform an' wid de Lord's will Ah gwine to perform her."

"May de Lord he'p you, Brothah Jones."

"Thanks, Brothah Jackson."

Brother Jones preached with all his might. He told his flock how the Lord had given them each a certain portion of this world's goods and how he expected back a certain percentage of it. "An' He gwine git it, too. He gwine git it ef He got ter sen' you to—to Sibeery! It's colder, Brethern an' Sistern, an' ef yuh don' do what's right de Lord, He gwine put yuh on a big chunk o' ice and den He gwine leab yuh."

The congregation moved uneasily for a moment and then settled a little closer down into its coat collar.

The flock of the Reverend Jones' church did not deliberately plan to sleep during the collection and the appeal that came before it. It was simply that they relaxed their control, as it were, and sleep was the natural consequence.

"Brethern an' Sistern," the parson continued, "de Lord's cahpet am agittin' holey. As yuh walks along de narrow isle fer to heah de Lord's words, de holes in de Lord's cahpet am gwine trip yuh and break you haid."

No sound came from the congregation. Brother Rastus Brown looked questioningly at the parson, the parson nodded and he arose to get the collection plate. From pew to pew he went, without result. Now and then a nickel or a dime was put on the plate, but usually it was unobserved. Now and then a snore came from some brother or sister.

When the plate was handed to the Reverend Jones he knew at a glance that it contained sixty-five cents. With one snort he turned and left the church without pronouncing the benediction. He never knew how long the congregation stayed, and he didn't care.

The next day, when Deacon Jackson found Parson Jones standing at his front gate he stopped to discuss the church problem.

"Brothah Jackson, dey's got to be sumpin' done. Ah got tuh rouse dem niggars, an' wid de Lord's help Ah——"

The Reverend Joshua Jones stopped short with his eyes raised and his mouth open.

"Wot am de trouble, Brothah Jones?" asked Deacon Jackson in an awed whisper.

"Trouble? Trouble, Brothah Jackson? 'Taint no trouble. De Lord hab answered prayer."

"Amen an' praise Gawd," exclaimed Jackson fervently. "Yuh sees dem wires up dah?"

Deacon Jackson saw them.

"Dey's 'lectric," continued Parson Jones.

The deacon nodded.

"Ah don' know much 'bout 'lectric t'ings, but de Lawd don' tole me ef yuh puts 'em under a niggar, dat niggar sholy gwine rise up."

"Amen," said the deacon devoutly, "de Lawd am sholy answer prayer. Go on, Brothah Jones, go on."

"You am got to 'range dis, Brother Jackson, an' yuh gotter do her cahful like."

"Ah'll han'le er like a newborn babe, Brothah Jones."

"Den come inter mah sanctum an' we'll lay de plans."

For two or three days after this conversation there was much mysterious goings on in the church of the Reverend Jones, but the nature of the work was kept so secret that not a breath of it reached the ears of the congregation.

When the next Sunday arrived the flock promptly assembled. Nothing disturbed their equilibrium. They seated themselves in pleasant anticipation of the soothing influence of their pastor's voice.

Parson Jones, too, was smiling. He preached a sermon that made his listeners think they were ready for a crown and a snow-white robe. Believing themselves so blessed, their eyes closed in peace and they slumbered, almost to a man.

At last the sermon was finished and the parson stepped to the side of the pulpit.

"Now, Brothern and Sistern, Ah wanta speak agin 'bout dat leetle matter ob de cahpet. Who will gib de sum ob ten dollahs?"

No one answered. All heads were bowed.

Slowly Parson Jones ran his finger along the side of the pulpit. One finger touched a little white button. Instantly the first row of the flock sprang to their feet, eyes blinking.

"De Spirit am move me. Ah—Ah'll gib ten dollahs," cried one member excitedly.

"Me, too, praise Gawd," said another.

"An' me."

"An' me, glory be."

One after another on the front row responded.

"Am dey any one else?" asked the parson.

Many looked uneasy but no one responded.

"Let us wait a leetle; mebby de Lawd will move othahs in de same gen'rus way."

Another row arose, and another and another, until Brother Brown was kept busy taking collection from those who had money with them and the signatures of those who had not.

"De Holy Spirit am sholy among us," cried some one.

"Amen."

"Hallelujah."

"Praise Gawd."

"Lawd ansah prayah."

No one heard a snicker under a window in the front of the church nor a hurried conversation in boyish tones.

Suddenly through the window came a tall white object.

A cry went up as from one throat. Then:

"Not yit, Lawd!"

"Please, Blessed Gawd!"

"We'll pay de sallery, yas we will Gawd!"

"An' git de cahpet, Lawd!"

There was a great scrambling toward the door and in five minutes the church was empty of all but Parson Jones and Deacon Jackson.

The parson turned to the deacon and said:

"Ah don' know whethah dat was de Spirit ob de Lawd, Brothah Jackson, but de spirit of 'lectricity am surtainly entahed inter dem niggahs."

THE STORY OF FRA DIAVOLO

Absorbing Plot Alive with Sensational Incidents—Between the Scheming of Fra Diavolo and the Plans for His Capture, there is a Stage-Coach Hold-up and a Sensational Struggle on a Precipice

With the graceful swagger of a cavalier, with the confidence and self-assurance of the man of cunning and deviltry, Fra Diavolo, the bold brigand of the Italian forests, the outlaw whose real identity is enveloped in mystery, boldly enters a frontier tavern in defiance of the $10,000 reward offered for his capture. He lavishly bestows smiles on some of the waiting maidens, and between chucking others under the chin and ordering refreshments, he combs the tavern with his penetrating and diabolical gaze.

Between one of the waiters and Fra Diavolo there passes a glance of recognition. The confederate edges closely to his chief and points out to him "objects of interest." Diavolo's face lights up. From now on his attention is focused on a rich English nobleman and his bride. Lord and Lady Allcash are on their honeymoon and are at the tavern for a short rest and refreshments. Diavolo casts covetous glances at the jeweled-bedecked throat and fingers of the noblewoman.

Assuming all the courtly manners of the gallant, before long he becomes acquainted with the young Lady Allcash, much to the chagrin of her jealous elderly husband. After crafty Diavolo flirts and ingratiates himself with the lady, he draws her out, and chatty, like most women, the lady informs him of her itinerary. Diavolo soon departs on his horse and in haste makes his way to the encampment of his cohorts. He makes known to them his plans for the hold-up and robbery of Lord and Lady Allcash. The brigands promise to be on hand and he gallops off.

In the meantime, Lord and Lady Allcash prepare to proceed on their travels. The old stage coach is ready for them. They enter the coach and are surprised to find the gallant Diavolo on horseback beside the coach. He keeps up his flirtation with Lady Allcash along the road until they reach a watering place. He then rides on ahead and at an appointed place meets his band and informs them to be ready. He asks two members of the gang to report to him at the tavern at Terracine, the next town. Diavolo rides on to await developments. The coach is held up as planned, and after divesting the pair of their money and jewels, the bandits permit them to proceed.

The coach reaches the tavern of Terracine and here they excitedly tell of their highway experience. Lorenzo, the lieutenant of the Guard who is in love with Zerline, the landlord's daughter, is sure Diavolo is at the bottom of the hold-up and sets out in pursuit. His efforts are energized at the reward offered—for the landlord objects to giving away his daughter to a man with no funds—and if he could capture Diavolo, Lorenza would no longer be a man without funds. Lorenzo finds his way to the brigand encampment and is successful in getting back some of the stolen property, but does not find Fra Diavolo. He returns with the valuables and as a reward the grateful Lord Allcash gives Lorenzo a rich gift.

Fra Diavolo here makes his appearance amidst all this excitement, and with hypocritical sympathy endeavors to console the weeping lady. Lady Allcash takes him into her confidence and informs him that the bandits did not take all of her valuables—in fact, they took very little—as her treasures were all hidden in secret recesses of her traveling gown. Diavolo is vexed but conceals his vexation. As the hour grows late members of Fra's band make their appearance in the guise of beggars, and although the landlord eyes them with suspicion, Fra assures him that he will pay for whatever they eat. Diavolo and the two thieves interchange information and appoint a rendezvous after midnight, so that they may get the rest of the swag. Fra in the meantime gets the lay of the land.

At midnight, Fra Diavolo, hidden in a wardrobe closet, adjoining the bedroom of the landlord's daughter and the sitting-room of the nobleman and his wife, gets the signal from his men. He sends them a rope-ladder and they join him in the closet. They are interrupted by Zerline, the landlord's daughter, who after finishing with her chores in the tavern, has come to her bedroom for her night's rest. The bandits indelicately watch her from the curtained closet and jocosely imitate the vain girl disrobing before the mirror.

The girl soon goes to sleep. The bandits enter her room but are again interrupted by Lorenzo, who comes to spoon with his sweetheart. His coming is accompanied by considerable noise, which awakens Lord and Lady Allcash. The Lord and Lady come to make inquiries and find Lorenzo and Zerline in embarrassing embrace. Fra Diavolo and his men eagerly watch developments. One awkward and over-anxious bandit slips and upsets himself in the narrow closet. Attention is centered on the closet. Lorenzo is about to rush in with drawn sword but Fra Diavolo, with dignified bravado and great presence, steps forth to face the music, after arranging for another meeting and permitting his confederates to escape. Both men confront him for an explanation. Quick of thought, diabolical Fra Diavolo draws Lord Allcash aside and informs him that he had an appointment with Lady Allcash. Both gentlemen are amused by this bit of scandal and all retire.

The next day, both Lorenzo and Lord Allcash get together to compare the intelligence imparted to them by the midnight visitor, and naturally both are infuriated. Lorenzo accuses his sweetheart and Lord Allcash accuses his wife of infidelity.

The scene shifts later in the day to the front of the tavern, where the townsfolk congregate, and on tables on the sidewalk and lawns partake of food and drink. Fra Diavolo had arranged by written messages to meet his confederates, when they signal to him from the village bell tower that the coast is clear. The two bandits sit around the tables and drink more than is good for them. They are served by the landlord's daughter. Remembering her poses of the night before, the drunken bandits imitate her to her face. She connects this incident with the accusations of her lover. She takes Lorenzo aside and tells him the brigands must have been in her room the night before with the stranger. Lorenzo collars them and has them searched. They find on their persons the note from Fra Diavolo. After sunset Lorenzo orders all persons off the streets and at the point of a revolver the brigand is ordered to ring the village bell.

Fra leisurely saunters on the scene and is almost trapped; however, he matches swords with Lorenzo and makes a get-away. Lorenzo and a troop of soldiers follow in pursuit over hills and stream. Lorenzo gets detached from his followers and keeps close to Diavolo's trail. They meet on the precipice and there have a hand-to-hand struggle. Diavolo is worsted. Lorenzo sends him over the precipice, rolling down, bouncing against huge projections of rocks to a watery grave two hundred and sixty feet below.

Philadelphia, Pa.—Plans are being prepared for the erection of a moving picture theatre at 23 North 52d street.

The decision of the big theatrical managers a few weeks ago that "we are not giving a dollar and a half show for a dollar and a half," is something we can all agree upon. Theatrical attractions that play the larger cities for $1.50 are now no better than the "Number 2" companies that play the smaller cities for the same prices of admission. But the $1.50 now goes a long way with the butcher, the baker and the groceryman. Even the $1.50 show is not worth potatoes enough to last a week; butter enough to last an ordinary family two weeks; sugar enough to sweeten the coffee for a family throughout a fortnight—and a $1.50 seat in a theatre takes more money in two hours than will pay the grocery bill for a country family for twenty-four hours. With the influx of theatrical companies under one management, playing on the strength of what some "star" has done, or how many nights may have been put in on Broadway, practically came to the bursting point last season. The coming season, so the influential managers announce, will see "the hook" for $1.50 shows in one-night stands. They have to come to it. With such stars as Bernhardt, Nat Goodwin and others playing the picture films, and with the many classical feature pictures being released, smaller cities can expect a drop to the popular dollar price for theatrical attractions as advocated by influential managers, or a return to the "rep" show.

How Dear to My Heart

(To be sung feelingly to the tune of "The Old Oaken Bucket"

How dear to me heart
Are these late moving features—
Yes, almost all theatres
Present them to view.
There's hardware and harness,
And all of God's creatures;
Our classic directors
Have found something new!

The orchard, the meadow,
The deep, tangled wildwood,
And all the loved spots
The old-time scenes knew;
These now are passe and
Fit only for childhood,
Since the feature in five reels
Has flashed into view!

The moving picture show and the hurdy-gurdy provided scientific instruction for the men and women who gathered in Cleveland June 12-19, to consider scientifically the question of charities and corrections. At former sessions of this national conference many exhibits of the various lines of work were on display. Now moving pictures instead of stationary exhibits have been inaugurated. Playgrounds, with real children playing, pure milk campaigns with the campaigners in action, and other features of the work in various cities were shown in films. The humble street piano was utilized to illustrate folk dancing and to urge better folksongs for hurdy-gurdy manufacturers. The National Board of Charities and Corrections believes in the moving picture as an education for children, and much interest was taken in the Cleveland exhibition.

John Bunny is going over to London to get proper atmosphere for a classic production of "Pickwick Papers." Bunny should enact the chubby round-faced Mr. Pickwick to perfection. Mr. Pickwick gained a great reputation among antiquarians by discovering an old stone bearing the mystic characters, "B. S. H. M." Enemies of the great man asserted that the letters stood for "Bill Stubbs, His Mark," but this plain effort to take credit from Mr. Pickwick for his discovery merited the contempt it deserved. "Pickwick Papers" is one of the first works of Dickens. Strange to say, it is among those less read although dear to the heart of the Dickens student. We are delighted that Vitagraph has acted upon our suggestion of some months ago, and has determined to film "Pickwick Papers." It should be better known not only to students of English literature but to the great public. More power to Mr. Bunny, is our wish!

ONE STANZA A-PLENTY

The Pictureplay Philosopher says there is an airdrome next to his house and it's hard for him to weed the radishes. He Silas Wegged into poetry yesterday and handed this in. It sounds like Riley but it isn't. One stanza is a-plenty. Let 'er go!

In the Spring when the green gets back on the screen,
When the sun comes out and stays,
And you help pay rent for the circus tent,
And you think of your urchin days.
When you're out to work but do it not—
Keep a-thinking of the scene
At the airdrome on adjoining lot—
In the Spring when the green gets back on the screen.
Isn't it a happy thought—
The Spring and the screen and the picture scene!

In many of the cities there has been little complaint of the character of the moving picture films that are exhibited, but complaint is heard in some instances and a movement has been instituted in Indianapolis, Ind., to prevent these popular resorts from becoming demoralized through questionable pictures and second-class vaudeville. The movement in Indianapolis to this end is interesting. There a censorship has been proposed—a commission of three consisting of a member of the Court of Appeals, one person appointed by the picture interests, and a third by the police authorities. It would be the business of this commission to pass on all films complained of. Another suggestion is that all films before being exhibited at all be judged by the commission and a standard be thus established which would serve as an assurance to all patrons of these places of amusement.

Whatever the plan adopted there or elsewhere, one thing is certain—there are more clean-minded people in the world than there are persons of unclean mind, and the picture theatre that strictly excludes the questionable is the one that is going to last the longest and make the greatest profits. It is a pleasure to assert that the great majority of exhibitors in this country are bearing this fact in mind.

Governor Harmon, of Ohio, Democratic Presidential aspirant, does not think, like Governor Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey, another Presidential aspirant, that his appearance in a moving picture film is detrimental to his dignity. Governor Harmon even assumed the role of a motion picture actor the other day, and in a short time pictures of "Uncle Jud" will be flashed in many theatres throughout the country.

"Governor Harmon Pardoning a Convict" will be the film's title. There were two actors in the playlet put over by a New York film concern at Columbus, O., but the name of the convict is withheld. The Governor sat in a corner of the executive office while hundreds of feet of film were turned off showing him carefully perusing the contents of an application for pardon The convict did not appear until the second act. He was brought up from State's Prison and the discussion of a parole was really serious.

Although the thousands who probably will see the picture in nickel theatres throughout the United States will not realize it, the story told by the film is truer to life than most of which they pay their money for. The convict in the picture was the genuine article, and what of talking, posing and the like which he did was also the genuine article, said and done with a heart.

ENTHUSIASTIC CROWD AT COOPER UNION INDORSE FOLKS ORDINANCE

The crowd of intelligent and interested citizens which gathered at Cooper Union, New York City, on Monday night, June 17th, to discuss matters pertaining to the Folks ordinance, though not as large as the occasion deserved, at the same time displayed enthusiasm enough for twice the number; and these people were a credit to New York City in their enthusiasm regarding a matter which deals with proper sanitation and the protection of human life.

The meeting opened with the reading of letters from Mayor Gaynor, several of the aldermen and other prominent citizens who regretted their inability to be present.

The first speaker of the evening was Michael Furst, a member of the Mayor's committee which prepared the draft of the proposed ordinance. Mr. Furst explained the provisions of the proposed ordinance, referred to the strenuous measures used by Mayor McClellan in dealing with the moving picture houses some three or four years ago, dwelt lightly on circumstances and conditions either continuous or in course of development since that time, stated briefly the position of the motion picture exhibitor, the heads of seven different departments attempting to control them, and which overlapping of necessity cause confusion, and stating in conclusion that as a result of a realization on the part of the Mayor and other intelligent people of existing conditions, a committee of five was appointed to draft an ordinance, the resume of which is contained in the proposed Folks ordinance.

Next came Henry Moskowitz, whose fervid enthusiasm almost raised the audience to their feet. Mr. Moskowitz referred to the moving picture theatre question as being "the most vital question before the City Fathers to-day." "The recreation of the poor," said he, "is a vital question. The tenements in which they live are mere caricatures of homes. The people, under our industrial conditions, work to exist." Continuing Mr. Moskowitz said, "These City Fathers, these friends of the people, will run to the home of the widow and give her a five dollar bill after the husband's life has been sacrificed through municipal neglect, but they will not try to prevent the making of the widow. These stupid good people, canons and others, who oppose a measure proposed to provide for the safety of the masses at their amusement, are not only stupid but criminal in the bargain. Those who would provide for the safety of the patrons of moving picture theatres are blocked by Tammany henchmen and confusion members of the Board of Aldermen, and we want you to exercise the impression of public opinion to force them to pass this ordinance.

Dr. John R. Elliot marvelled that intelligent people should even dream of opposing a sane proposition such as the Folks ordinance. "There are many tears shed at times of calamity, there is a tremendous interest in the dead, but at the same time there is a wonderful indifference to attempted provisions for safety." Dr. Elliot also gave as his opinion that people learn in the moving picture theatre as they do in few other places. Said he: "There are lots of educated idiots who have gone through the motions of education who are like the little boy who was asked what he did in school. 'I just sit there and wait for school to let up,' replied the little boy." People learn in moving picture theatres, asserts Dr. Elliot, when their sympathies are aroused, and for the love of a picture they drink in all they see. He also asserts that poor people live between Saturday noon and twelve o'clock Sunday night, therefore that is practically the only time they have for recreation or education.

The moving picture entertainment, says Dr. Elliot, is the new "Pied Piper," which attracts the masses. Dr. Elliot also asserts that to expose the people to the influence of the hideous, yelling, squeaking vaudeville acts that frequent moving places is nothing less than criminal. "It is an unpardonable neglect of the morals of the people. Change the amusements and you change the people. Give them what is decent and wholesome, and you have a correspondingly wholesome people." Also he asserts that the neglect of the protection of the bodies of the children who may grow up to be good citizens is criminal. "What we want," said Dr. Elliot in conclusion, "is centralized authority to govern the amusements of the people."

Rabbi Nathan Krass in his droll manner tells that he is ashamed of himself as well as of our democracy to think that in this American democracy the safety of life and limb should be a debatable question. "It is a peculiar thing," said he, "that an ordinance that makes for such a noble object should meet with opposition. Those who are our fathers before election become our stepfathers after election, and instead of being their beloved children, we become outcasts, no better than swine. I passed a woman in the country road the other day," continued the Rabbi, "she was feeding her swine which were housed in a beautifully clean pigsty. I could not help comparing it to the pigstys that human beings are permitted to pass so many hours of their lives in." "To my mind," bravely asserted the Rabbi, " the lowest human being is better than the most beautiful swine."

Rabbi Krass kept the audience in roars of laughter with the drollness and truth of his remarks. Said he: "The American nation is a nation of gamblers. We eat impure food that would give to swine all the different diseases in the most fastidious medical libraries. We take great risks when it comes to the safety of human lives. Millions of lives are maimed annually because of the risks we take. In the Board of Aldermen we have a disinterested committee. The Folks ordinance is not supposed to be perfect neither are the people who drafted it. The Bible, the Book of all books, is not perfect and through different translations and interpretations becomes infallible, how then can we expect an ordinance designed by mere men to be without its flaws. In the struggle for earthly chattels even the spokes on the wheel of Pharaoh are sold for gain, to say nothing of the golden horns of the sacred calf."

Rabbi Krass also asserts that we cannot have sanitation by spraying perfume through the theatres, but we can have it by admitting plenty of God's good fresh air. "The ozone," says he, "is something that no one can barter for gain. I believe in sanctification," spoke the Rabbi, "and I don't believe that it should be limited to the church. Sanctification makes for human betterment and uplift, and moving picture shows are capable of moral and educational attributes that should better the community. Being a minister, I endorse letting in the light. The moving picture shows are the amusement of the poor and the middle classes, therefore we must give them the best that is to be obtained. The clergy find no fault with the uptown shows, but they are quick to interfere with the poor man's amusement. But," spake Nathan Krass, with the fervor and enthusiasm that befitted the occasion, "I would rather see the theatres on Broadway closed than those moving picture theatres in the congested districts of the great city. The men who are opposed to the Folks ordinance are, for the most part, those who are making an indecent living out of the moving picture theatre. Is pork superior to human flesh?" warmly queried the rabbi, and again he repeated the words, "I believe the human being in its most deplorable state superior to the finest swine."

Following Rabbi Krass came Sydney Ascher, the only representative of the exhibitor who ventured upon the platform. Mr. Ascher explained the exhibitor's plight in the most common-sense manner. He said that though the exhibitor was in the game to make money, still there were men enough among them who had an honest desire to do what was right and best for the community at large. He explained in a very few words how it is in the present condition of affairs impossible to keep pace with the numerous departments which pretend to control the moving picture theatres. Said Mr. Ascher, "I violate the laws that are every day that I live, simply because there are no uniform laws to abide by. I have signs in my theatre, 'No standing room allowed,' but at the same time I stand as many people as it is possible. Why? Simply because I could not keep in business any other way. We have no laws."

He continued: "One day a representative of the fire department comes to me and says, 'You must put a metalic lining in your booth.' The next day, after I have complied with his request, a representative from another department files in and requires me to take that out and put in asbestos board instead; and the day after that someone else comes along and tells me to do something else. After I have complied with the requests of all in turn the representative of the fire department comes back, and the ball starts rolling all over again, and there you are. What are we to do under such fool conditions? We want to give the public the best we can. I am in favor of the 600 seating capacity, because it gives us a better chance all around.

"Give us larger houses," said he, "and we can give you better shows. In fourteen years," said Sydney Ascher, "there has not been one death caused by fire in a moving picture theatre in New York. We want at the same time better houses. We are not jackals, we are business men, and we want a uniform law that we can abide by. The real men among us want this ordinance passed, but we'll never get it unless the people help us. It's up to you," said he to the audience, "If you want us to take better care of you, you must help us to do it by making a consolidated appeal to the Board of Aldermen of this city."

Last but not least, came Chief Magistrate Otto Kempner of Brooklyn, who shared Rabbi Krass' sentiments regarding our democracy. Said he: "Is it possible that there is sufficient selfishness in New York City to establish a desire to defeat such an ordinance? This is a measure designed to regulate sanely and rationally a sort of amusement that has come to the civilized world to stay. The moving picture entertainment was not designed as a theatrical form of amusement; it was the demonstration of the marvels of an invention, which has developed. It is the amusement of the poorer classes, and has as such spread to tremendous dimensions. Therefore the time has come to place this industry under proper regulation. It is large enough and important enough to be standardized. It should be standardized. There should never have existed the slightest doubt of the passing of this ordinance. Public education is needed in order to bring a public legislation into action.

Every part of the Folks ordinance should have commendation. The world marches on, and those who stand in the path of progress must suffer. I cannot fully express to you my fervent belief in the possibilities of the moving picture theatre for education and for general good. I would even favor retaining the moving picture theatre without law to eliminating it altogether. In Brooklyn the consumption of liquor has been materially reduced since the advent of moving picture theatres; also the issue of licenses has been reduced. All they need is proper regulation. Film censorship is another matter with which we are not dealing at this juncture, and will come later."

Magistrate Kempner closed, as did every other speaker, with the hope that each and every one of the audience would make a personal appeal to the aldermen of their individual districts on behalf of the Folks ordinance. A resolution was then passed which dealt with the betterment in general of the moving picture theatre condition, after which a prominent member of the Board of Aldermen addressed the meeting, explaining the difficulty of securing a united vote on any subject of such vital importance. He also demonstrated the inconsistency of public opinion by telling that one day he received letters from one woman's club requesting him to vote for the ordinance, and on the following day one from another requesting him to vote against it. Said he: "I am between the devil and the deep sea, although I staunchly assert to one and all that I have every intention of voting in favor of the ordinance."

The meeting broke up about 10.30, and it was felt that at least some headway was gained in that a unanimity of opinion had been expressed with regard to a measure of great moment.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By James Girvan

Auxiliary Local 35, I. A. T. S. E.

Officers

President—John F. Stephens.
Vice-President—Sam Kaplan.
Financial Secretary—Gus Durkin.
Recording Secretary—Morris Klapholtz.
Business Agent—Henry Weinberger.
Assistant Business Agent—Edward Phelps.

The Auxiliary meets at Teutonia Hall, No. 66 Essex street, the first and the third Monday of every month at 12 o'clock midnight. Dues can be paid to Brother Weinberger at the Union Office, No. 133 Third avenue, or to Gus Durkin, care of Berkeley Theatre, No. 19 West Forty-fourth street.

* * * *

The regular meeting of the Auxiliary was held at the above hall, Monday night, June 17th, at 1 o'clock. Brother Frank Brennan called the meeting to order, and it was some meeting, too, believe me. Brothers William McVey and L. Weinberger were appointed sergeants-at-arms pro tem. It being election of officers and delegates to the convention, there was a fairly good crowd there to vote for their favorite candidate. Those elected to serve for the present term were: Vice-president, Robert Goldblatt; recording secretary, Sydney Dignon. Trustees: H. Mackler, A. Polin, A. Kesseler. Board of Directors: Albert Buck, Bert Leroy, H. Youngswick; and last, bust most important to my way of thinking, was delegate to the I. A. convention. Brother Robert Goldblatt was elected.

* * * *

All members in arrears for dues, fines, or assessments over the three-month limit stand suspended until same be paid. The initiation fee remains at $10 until July 15th, at which time it will be raised to $25. The meeting adjourned at 5:10 a. m.

* * * *

"Everybody's doin' it," and it seems as though Brother William Strickler wasn't going to be left out in the cold. Yes, by Hick! Brother Bill took the hull town by surprise when he sent out the invites for the grand affair held at Golden Star Hall, 81 Columbia street, this city, on Saturday, June 8th. The hall was filled to capacity when Brother William and his lovely bride, Miss Lillian Warowitz, were united in the holy bonds of matrimony to the tune of the wedding march. During the ceremony and march beautifully colored effects were used. Among those present were Brother Joe McAree and lady friend, Brother Max Werner and wife. Say, Bill, you must have been saving up some time so you could get things done right. Twelve taxicabs is sure going some. Best wishes and good luck to Mrs. William and yourself.

* * * *

Being in Newark on business the other day, and concluding same in a very short time, I made up my mind to look around the moving picture theatres just to see what kind of work was being done by the operators, and I was greatly pleased to see excellent projection at the following theatres:

Belmont Square Theatre, Belmont avenue and Court street; Frank A. Wiegers, operator; William Bender, assistant. Two Powers No. 5 machines, one Hallberg and one Levine economizer, and one dissolver.

The proprietor of the above place is to be complimented on having put in an operating booth that is big enough to work in. The projection in this particular may be equaled but it simply can't be beat.

* * * *

The following Newark operators deserve credit for the projection in their respective theatres: Edward Wiegars, Gem Theatre, 216 Fifteenth avenue; Jack Wayland and Arthur Whelpley, Sea Shell, 230 Market street; Gus Benner, Odeon Theatre, 100 Springfield avenue; American Theatre, 151 Market street, Herman Metz, chief operator; David McCracken, second man; Charles Straley, third man, and Harold Gehling, assistant.

* * * *

Brother Crowley, Augusta, Kan., would like to hear if the boys are willing to bury the hatchet and meet in friendly contests in our Chat Column.

Brother operators, let us hear from you as to what you are doing in your locals and in the operating rooms. Come on, get acquainted.

* * * *

There will be a continuation meeting on Monday night, June 24th. All Auxiliary members are requested to attend as there is to be another vote taken on the delegate that is to be sent to the I. A. T. S. E. convention.

Mr. John H. Crowley,
Augusta, Kan. June 7, 1912.

Dear Sir:

It was not my intention to hurt the feelings of the brother operators in Kansas, when I wrote that small article in the "Column," and I must say that I am very sorry to hear that they feel sore. When I wrote the offending article I thought it might make them come back at me with some real good news for our operators' page and show me what a "boob" I was. And if they would send in a few hints like yours it would prove to everyone that I was the only "boob."

Brother Crowley, I wonder if you can square me with the boys once more and let us meet through the Column in the near future and shake hands, and tell them that any time they have any news for the Operators' Page they wil be given all the space they want.

Hoping to hear from you soon, with best regards to all the boys, I remain.

Fraternally yours,
"CANUCK."

WILLIAM PALEY

One of the pioneers in moving pictures and the only one in harness to-day is laid up after an accident and surgical operation. When in the Sierra Nevada Mountains eight or ten weeks ago, making pictures for David Horsley, of the Nestor Film Company, through the upsetting of a rig coming down the mountain, he received several cuts and bruises and had his right foot injured, but as no bones were broken the old veteran plugged along, spending a week in San Francisco and Santa Barbara, finishing up the program, of course, but limping and in pain and attending to two or three cuts on the right big toe.

When he arrived at his home in Los Angeles Mr. Paley was practically "down and out" and it was found necessary to call in Dr. Albert W. Moore, who, upon examination, discovered that the bone was seriously injured and recommended an operation. Mr. Paley was taken to the Good Samaritan Hospital and four pieces of bone extracted. He remained at the hospital for ten days and was then removed to his home, 1460 West Temple street, where he is recovering as rapidly as could be expected. Although unable to put his foot to the ground as yet, Mr. Paley has hopes of being up and around within two or three weeks.

It seems the irony of fate that Mr. Paley should have had to undergo the operation at that time, as during his stay in the hospital he was offered a very lucrative position, with a two-year contract and all expenses, and was also called upon for special work for Shriner week.

THE UNIVERSAL WEEKLY

The Universal Weekly, which is the organ of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, will appear forthwith as a weekly publication. It incorporates The Implet which for the past five months was issued by the Imp Films Company. The Universal Weekly will embody all those features which made The Implet popular with the exhibitors and will include many others designed to help the exhibitor in his business.

It is the object each week of The Universal Weekly to present the releases of the allied manufacturers in an attractive and informative manner. In addition there will be printed each week in the Universal Weekly synopses of all the twenty-four releases. There will also be illustrations of the pictures, together with brief stories written from a study of the pictureplays on the screen. Whenever feature films are to be issued by any of the contributory companies, they will be fully dealt with in the pages of the Weekly.

Besides representing the vast interests centered in the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, it will be an object of The Universal Weekly to exert itself to the utmost in assisting the progress and uplift of the picture as the most popular and intelligent form of entertainment and instruction now before the world's public.

"LOVE, WAR AND A BONNET"
Imp Drama Release, July 1, 1912

"Love, War and a Bonnet" is a story which is placed in Civil War times. The bonnet is instrumental in finally uniting a pair of lovers.

But before this consummation many events take place. For example, an invading soldier disguises himself in the bonnet which he finds in the house he is invading. Off he goes and is pursued by the owner of the hat, pretty Sallie Batte, on horseback. He throws the bonnet away and it is recovered by the girl. And when the bonnet has found its rightful head, the owner of it, after more adventures, becomes the willing prey of her soldier lover.

Scenically the picture is full of charm; it is pretty and exciting to look at and the story is distinctly above the average of motion picture scenarios.

"BETTY, THE COXSWAIN
Imp Release, July 4

"Betty, the Coxswain," is a sporting story woven around college life. It is not the first time that a similar theme has been used in short story form and it is also popular on the moving picture screen. The outstanding feature of the picture lies in the fact that the technical work is done under the direct supervision of Mr. Rice, the celebrated Columbia coach who engaged himself to give his exclusive services to the Imp people for this picture.

The race is realistic and exciting. The story is simply that of a coxswain of a boat who just before the race is inveigled away and placed beyond hope of getting to his boat. However, Betty, his sweetheart, has been practising in the boats and learning of the trouble, with the connivance of the coach, dons rowing garb and steers the boat to victory.

The acting in the picture is strong and decisive; it is a clear and interesting story and the settings are well chosen. It will unquestionably be a popular picture.

AMERICAN FILM MFG. CO. NOTES

Efforts are being directed toward the production of the highest possible grade of distinctly Western subjects, and three companies are now bending their energies toward that end.

It is the American's intention to place three good Western subjects on the market each week; also to add a two-reel subject each second week and to cover a number of scientific and educational studies as well. Some of the best negatives of a scientific nature ever seen will be announced for release in the near future.

"The Fall of Blackhawk," the historic two-reel feature recently completed by the American Film Manufacturing Company, will be given the public as a state right feature. This is due to the unprecedented excellence of the subject and to the fact that a large sum of money was required to produce it in its present form.

No other subject can possess more of those features which draw the public than "The Fall of Blackhawk." The great names of Abraham Lincoln, Jefferson Davis, Zachary Taylor and General Winfield Scott are always vital in their appeal and mean money to exhibitors. The subject has other than an exact historic appeal, too, in that there are an abundance of thrilling Indian fights, a glorious stockade scene in which the blockhouse and stockade are seen to burn to the ground. Lincoln and Davis are also central figures in a very unique love affair which terminates in the marriage of Jefferson Davis and Sarah Taylor while the fort is in flames.

The American is receiving offers for state rights and will make shipments after July 6th through the Film Supply Company of America.

The originator of the "No Bonus; No Hold Up" for state right privileges. He is on his way West with a line of special features.

In fact, we understand that he has about ten good samples with him, and anyone wishing to meet him can get his route from the main office.

Mr. DORE HOFFMAN

Mr. Doré Hoffman has assumed control of the advertising and assistant managership of the General Film Publicity and Sales Company. Mr. Hoffman was formerly advertising manager for G. Melies, and prior to that time was connected with the Film Index as advertising manager.

EDISON RESENTS 50-CENT WITNESS FEE

"Darn it! My time is worth more than fifty cents." So spoke Thomas A. Edison, inventor, when he was handed a subpœna and a 50-cent piece to appear to give testimony in a suit between John Schemmerhorn and James White, formerly connected with the Edison works in West Orange, against T. C. Waters, head of the kinetoscope enterprise at the works.

The suit involves a large amount on contract, and the hearing will take place on Thursday at the home of Supreme Court Commissioner Emil Schultz in Park avenue, Orange.

The suit will be fought out later in the Supreme Court of Court of New York.

FIRST REVIEW OF PICTURES AT THE NEW PROJECTING ROOM OF THE FILM SUPPLY COMPANY OF AMERICA

The first review of releases of the Film Supply Company of America for the press and National Board of Censorship was held in the fine new projecting room of the company on Tuesday morning, June 15. A splendid showing was made by the manufacturers whose films are to be released under the wing of this company. Among the films shown was a Thanhouser of special merit, and one of the most wholesome pictures that has been seen in a projecting room for many a day—would that there were more of them. "In Blossom Time" is the title of this picture, and truly it almost breathed the perfume of the blossoms out into the room. It is a beautiful little romantic bit, full of the human interest that counts in a commercial way.

There was also exhibited an "American" of merit, entitled "The Inheritance." This splendid effort dealt with the life of a young man who had inherited the taste for alcohol, and with the thoughtless bantering of his companions when he refused to drink, and the terrible climax where they fill his canteen with liquor instead of water. The audience is, however, left to surmise what the ultimate result will be.

Solax also had a good offering in "Indian Summer," a farce comedy dealing with love in old age. It may be said that if the Film Supply Company of America continue to make such a splendid showing, there can be only prosperity in store for them.

SCENES FROM "THE MERCHANT OF VENICE
Thanhouser release of July 30th.

PLENTY OF THANHOUSER FEATURES

There is no famine in the New Rochelle feature market, if reports from there count for anything. Report No. 1 gives "Merchant of Venice" as the two-reel Thanhouser release for Tuesday, July 30. Report the second announces "Put Yourself in His Place," the Charles Reade story, in a pair of reels. Next is notice of "Lucille" in two. After that, "Under Two Flags" is slated for release, also in two reels. They are doing some tall hustling up at Thanhouser Company!

"The Merchant of Venice" is said to surpass "Romeo and Juliet," to date the most noted Thanhouser Shakespearean production. It is said to illustrate convincingly the progress that has been made in New Rochelle film-making in the year that has elapsed since "Romeo" was undertaken. The Thanhouser lithographers are shipping the exchanges two kinds of one-sheets and a three-sheets, and there are also heralds and free "feature frames" from the Thanhouser offices.

ADVERTISING MATTER FOR FRA DIAVOLO

The Solax State Rights Three-Reel Feature Ready for Shipment July 12th

Exhibitors throughout the country, since the announcement of the production of "Fra Diavolo," have flooded the Solax mails with requests for advertising matter and information. For this three-reel state rights feature the Solax Company has prepared a special musical accompaniment for both piano and violin, and will also provide exhibitors with a vocal accompaniment. Other advertising matter for this state right feature includes elaborate heralds which have the appearance of theatrical programs, decorative lobby displays, two kinds of one-sheets, one three-sheets and cuts, "still" pictures and magnets.

Exhibitors in featuring this production would do well to engage a vocalist to sing selections from the opera during the exhibition of the pictures. The majority of the scenes have been produced with such fidelity to the opera that its musical accompaniment will be easy. The production makes an entire evening's entertainment.

The Solax Company has announced that it will advise exhibitors who are interested of state right buyers in their territory. In a number of states, exchanges buying the product of the Film Supply Company of America will rent the film in their territory.

THE ENTERPRISE OPTICAL CO.

We have been asked by the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company to state that, through an error, their advertisement in the official program of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Pittsburgh was incorrectly printed, giving credit for this ad to the Riley Optical Instrument Company, of New York City, with whom the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company has no connection.

To compensate for this error the program committee of the Exhibitors' League of Pittsburgh have had 5,000 handbills printed in which the advertisement of the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company appears as it should have appeared in the program.

GAUMONT PHOTO POSTERS

The Gaumont Company is starting another innovation in the publicity line by getting out a photo-poster, half-sheet size, depicting several views from the various feature productions. The first of these will appear in conjunction with "Written in Blood" and contains six different views from this colossal production, including four of the various characters: Procureur-General, Lieutenant Gerard, the regimental ex-canteen keeper and wife, Mr. and Mrs. Bersac. These parts are portrayed respectively in the film by Mr. Jean Ayme, Mr. Oscar Julien, Mr. Robert Manson and Mlle. Rene Carl. This innovation is expected to be rapidly taken up by exchangemen and exhibitors throughout the country. A modest supply of samples of this work is being sent to exchange men operating under the Film Supply Company of America.

Brattleboro, Vt.—Emma C. Farrington expects to open a moving picture show on the ground of the Miner Building, Church and Elliot streets.

Denver, Colo.—A new moving picture theatre is being contemplated on Champa street, between 14th and 15th streets.

JOE BURKE, COMEDIAN

Eccentric Character Fun Maker Posing in Powers Picture Plays

Joe Burke, the eccentric comedian, is posing in Powers picture plays with great success. Mr. Burke has been acting before the camera for about eighteen months, working with Harry C. Matthews, and has recently appeared in the child-stories put on by Mr. Matthews. He has been for the past eighteen years one of the headliners in vaudeville, playing a wide range of parts—Irish, Scotch and coster characters. During the winter season Mr. Burke has worked in and around New York in benefit entertainments given by secret societies and is well known to members of the Masonic, Knights of Columbus, Royal Arcanum and other societies. He has also appeared in female impersonations. His recent picture successes were in the Powers child-pictures, "No Children Wanted" and "Those Were the Happy Days."

HOT WEATHER HASTENS OPENING OF AIRDROMES

Mr. J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," reports that the present hot spell has precipitated a big rush in the opening of airdromes, and the demand for moving picture machines and Hallberg Economizers has been very large. The closed theatres not already fitted with proper ventilating equipments are buying exhaust fans and ventilating fans to compete with the open-air shows.

Newburyport, Mass—Forest Kimball, of Manchester, N. H., will erect a moving picture theatre on Main street.

Winsted, Conn.—The new moving picture show at Highland Park will be completed shortly.

"KID" WITH DOGS AND MONKEYS

The Thanhouser Kid appears with a real dog-and-monkey circus in the Thanhouser release of Sunday, June 30, "Doggie's Début." She witnessed the performance of the animals at a variety theatre near her home and was so impressed with their work that she asked the Thanhouser management to engage them to "do" a picture with her. Engaged they were. The story that was written for the Kid and the animals showed her as a little boy who lost his home and all else when a wealthy grandfather dies. Wandering in quest of work, the boy meets his late grandsire's groom. They were "pals" in the good old days of affluence, and now the ex-groom is quick to aid the boy. He has become an animal trainer and offers the boy a job as assistant. So the Thanhouser Kid joins the act and is "safe" financially ever afterwards.

"GRANDPA"

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

An Interesting Statement

We have the permission of a leading script editor, now serving with one of the best known film companies, to use extracts from a letter which he recently sent the editor of this department. The statements contained therein are of interest to every photoplaywright. The letter, in part, follows:

"I am reading stories right now that I read over a year ago when with the ——— Company. They are still going the rounds. The concerns putting on the poorest stories invariably pay the least for manuscripts and consequently they get last readings. Several of the supposed leaders are falling down. They submit their stuff to favorite concerns and, if refused, it goes the rounds and then has been placed in cold storage only to be resurrected a year later. Instead of revamping, the same stories are recopied under another title.

"I do not notice any appreciable improvement in the class of scripts. There has been little improvement in the last eighteen months, notwithstanding 'correspondence' schools; sample scenarios, etc. What most writers need to be instructed in is the simple things. They continue to send pen scripts, write on both sides of the paper, and neglect to send stamps or return envelopes. This is a fact despite the efforts of the trade journals to give them a better idea.

"In many cases, the names and addresses of the authors do not appear and the offerings go to the 'morgue.' I know of one editorial desk in New York that has probably two hundred scripts awaiting indentification, and it is these authors, probably, that are besieging the News and World to print letters to prove how shabbily they have been treated, and their ideas filched.

"I received a letter recently in which the writer complained bitterly because his script had not been bought or returned, and he threatened all sorts of personal violence and litigation if he did not get some action. This letter was unsigned. The second and third letter came from the same party and he waxed more vehement. The last letter was signed by an initial and a name, but no postoffice address. We had preserved the envelope and wrote a letter directed to the general delivery of the postmark on the envelope. In due time this was returned with the usual notation that the party could not be found. All this time the script was reposing in my desk among unidentified scripts.

"I get many scripts accompanied by letters nicely typewritten, but with the signature so illegible that no one in the office can read it. Of course, there is no name on the script, and if there is, it is in the same scrawl. The name is guessed at and the script comes back to us and joins the others remaining unidentified."

No Comment Necessary

The above statements need little comment. Every trade journal department editor has been working overtime to urge writers to observe the simple things, which in the aggregate become immensely important things. Writers have also been repeatedly urged to enclose stamped self-addressed envelopes with their scripts and to type name and address of author on first page of every manuscript. Evidently a great many have not heeded these first principles in literary work—and there is no excuse to be made for such persons. "I do not notice any appreciable improvement in the class of scripts" is a significant statement coming from the authoritative source that it does. It means that despite the kindly efforts of script editors, directors, trade journals, etc., that many of those active in the scriptwriters' army have not ceased the custom of "dashing off" photoplays without giving them due thought or study.

The editor would be pleased to hear from other script editors on the statement that there has been little improvement in scripts within the past eighteen months. We believe a thorough discussion of this subject would be beneficial to everyone concerned.

Difference of Opinion

Here are two opinions written us by two well-known editors and writers:

> "You have the wrong steer. If you could see some of the stuff I get, you would wonder at the game. I can get from $20 to $35 for the average 3,000 to 5,000-word story. It takes me a day to write it. I can make the same money with the same idea in an hour writing a photoplay. One author I know gets $100 to $150 for his fiction stories. He gets out two $75 or $100 scripts with less time and work than he used to spend on the $100 story. They would all be writing photoplays if they could, but half of them have tried and the other half do not dare."

Then the other statement:

> "You are right when you say that first-class fiction writers have not yet turned their attention to the photoplay field, and I look for some top-notchers to get busy when market prices become tempting (if they ever do). It is true that many magazine writers cannot formulate a photoplay, and it is also a fact that the man or woman who has won his or her spurs in short story writing can turn to script writing much easier than can the average photoplaywright turn to the magazine field. Both fields require the art of condensation and fertility of plot, but the magazine story writer is born and the average script writer is often just made."

The above comments were caused by our recent assertion that, in our opinion, many professional writers of first-class fiction have not endeavored to seriously enter the photoplay field and that they had no incentive so to do at present market prices paid for scripts. If such writers as Chambers, Wood, Morris, Paine, Parrish, Chester, Davis, and many other top-notchers now getting from $250 to $500 for a 5,000-word fiction story, should turn their attention to photoplay writing, they would probably make good in a short time because they already possess much of the know-how. We know of but one or two men that can write a good photoplay in an hour; and there are but a lucky few who are getting $75 to $100 for their photoplays at this time. The average prices paid for scripts are from $25 to $35. While it is a fact that many of the writers of the second class stories for magazines have failed in the photoplay game, just as they have partially failed in the magazine game, still the rule would not apply to the high-class writers who have failed to take an interest in script writing.

About Text Books

There seems to be a superabundance of text books for script writers and every few days another is announced. Now there are text books and text books. The editor of this department has refused to advertise three books within the past few months for the simple reason that they were deemed of no benefit to the army of beginners in the photoplaywright field. So far as we could ascertain, not one of them had been written by an author who had ever turned out a successful photoplay. If you will take the trouble to look over the advertising pages of the News you will find that no "correspondence schools" are exploited. Offers of such advertising are turned down frequently. The News does not score a "skin" game in its reading columns and boost such institutions in the advertising columns. It claims credit for this policy. To resume: A number of the readers of this department have queried us from time to time anent the merits of this or that text book written for the benefit of the photoplaywright. We have answered these inquiries honestly. There are two text booklets in the market to-day from which the purchaser will derive full value. One of these is the "Art of Scenario Writing," second edition. published by the Moving Picture News. The other is the "Technique of the Photoplay," written by Epes Winthrop Sargent, Box 70, Madison Square Station, New York. One seeks to develop the idea of the author with less attention to the technical arrangement, while the other while paying attention to originality pays special notice to the technical side of the script. Purchased collectively, these booklets will furnish all the theory that any new writer can desire on each and every side of the game. Both have been recommended by leaders in the profession and both are standard. We mention these booklets here, not with any free advertising intent, but to answer numerous inquiries received lately on the book subject. We have no business understanding with Mr. Sargent and mention his book in this department together with our own, for the information of our readers and because both are worthy.

The Merwin Scripts

Mr. Sargent in writing of the technical side of the photoplay recently called attention to the Bannister Merwin scripts. His statement attracted our interest. He says the Merwin scripts do not follow the present form of the photoplay, but the action is more fully and clearly narrated so that any one of two or three directors could easily read the action and catch the exact idea of the author. Like Mr. Sargent, we believe that a radical change in the form of the photoplay is about due. It must be made if the originality and inspiration of the author is to be clearly presented by the director. We contend that Mr. Merwin's early training as a writer of magazine fiction has helped him greatly in his new form of script. The art of putting down clearly and concisely the action and motif intended, so that the director can readily grasp the writer's precise idea, should also be readily undertaken by the newspaperman.

SIMPLEX PROGRESS

Lyric Theatre, Evansville, Ind., June 11, 1912.

Precision Machine Co.,
317 E. 34th street,
New York City, N. Y.

Gentlemen:—

I purchased a Simplex machine from your representative, Mr. Drollinger, of this city, five months ago and wish to say I am delighted. It has not caused me a moment's trouble in the whole five months of a steady grind every afternoon and evening seven days of the week. Last week I had Mr. Drollinger take the machine entirely apart, so I might see, and am glad to state that not a part was worn, all bearings and gears were perfect, and every piece so perfect that there was no trouble in reassembling at all and machine runs as free and easy as before. I should have written you before, but have been fooled on wearing qualities of other machines and wished to give Simplex a thorough test. I am satisfied that the machine is all you claim for it, and when in the market for another machine it undoubtedly will be Simplex. You are at liberty to use this letter.

I remain, with best wishes for your success,

Very respectfully,

M. G. PERRIN, Mgr.

WESTERN CORRESPONDENT

Hot Springs, Ark., June 12.—The one great feature of the week in the moving picture line was the Imp reel, "The Breakdown," which contained a number of scenes taken in this city, which I mentioned in my last week's letter. The Princess Theatre "scooped" the other houses on this reel, after a campaign that resulted in communications to every exchange west of the city of St. Louis and far into Texas. It was a lively fight that the theatres waged here for this reel, and the Princess Theatre won out.

There was a great crowd out the first day the picture was shown, and business during the three days was of the top-notch order, which shows that Hot Springs people want the city advertised in motion pictures and would like nothing better than a full reel of one thousand or more feet, with all the resort's attractive features in the same. The picture as a whole pleased, but there are always to be found the chronic kickers who want everything for nothing, and it was the fact that so many scenes in this city were taken and not shown in "The Breakdown" that caused a howl of protest. For instance, there was the horse show—nary a view reproduced, together with many, many other features that were left out, and the scene showing King Baggot on his way to the baths might just as well have been omitted, for there is not one man out of a hundred outside of Hot Springs who has never been here who could recognize what that brief view actually was. It was a case of "on again, off again, Finigan," so far as any value to the city is concerned, while the views of the "bird's eye variety," which were taken from the top of the Eastman tower, were so dark that they were practically useless. Even the Majestic Hotel, where the "King" registered, was exceptionally brief, and the Maurice bathhouse was the only thing that was really "the goods," and that showed up plain. There was one laughable feature in this reel and the crowd is still having a lot of sport with the Western Union people. One scene shows a blue-coated and brass-buttoned son of Mercury delivering a telegram to King Baggot, and the manager of the Western Union company sent one of his brightest lads to play this part. The kid made good, too, but if you will look at the reel you will note that while a Western Union boy delivers the telegram, when King Baggot opens and reads it the message shows it to be a Postal Telegraph wire. Possibly Brothers Baggot and Kauffman desired to be eminently fair to both corporations, which is duly appreciated by the Postal company.

I had the pleasure of seeing this reel run off in the Princess for a dress rehearsal, and there was a lot of sport at the same. To begin with there was something wrong with the sprocket wheel of the machine and when it came to the scene showing Baggot conversing with Frank Gould, with Secretary George Belding standing nearby, the film jumped off the wheel seven times in quick succession.

"I guess I must queer that picture," commented Mr. Belding, "although when it was taken I tried to pose so calm and serene."

The Hot Springs views, however, were received with round after round of applause, and it has made the people "hungry" for a good local picture, something on the order of the Jacksonville reel that was seen in this city a short time ago. The local press is advocating this, and the New Era said editorially the day after the picture came to this resort:

"Now that we have had a sample copy of Hot Springs in moving pictures, why not spend a sufficient amount of money and get a good one? There is no better medium of advertising than that of motion photography, and one must remember the old adage that 'it takes money to make money.'"

The same paper a few nights later also contained the following, which may be of interest to the friends of gentlemen concerned, especially those in the general film exchange of St. Louis, where he gets his pictures. It's about Sidney M. Nutt, proprietor of the New Central Theatre. Yes, Sidney is the real happy boy of these "diggin's," and this is what his press agent on the New Era wrote about him the past week:

"Ladies and gentlemen, the Stroller next desires to call your attention to an expansive, brilliant and most striking exemplification of the 'smile that won't come off.' The possessor of this golden indication of supreme joy is our good friend, Sidney M. Nutt, proprietor of the New Central Theatre. You will notice that Sidney cannot concentrate his mind on the moving pictures. See, he watches them for a moment and then leaves his seat, goes to the telephone and calls up his home. He returns, but remains only for a few moments. Now watch him closely. Note that exquisite look of happy contentment. See, he is watching a moving picture now. Ah, a baby is being shown on the screen. What, the baby in the picture is seen to be crying. Mr. Nutt is also worried. See him hasten again to the telephone. Note the look of anxiety on his face and the excitement in his voice. Let's play close to the 'phone, too. He is talking to the nurse. Now, ladies and gentlemen, can you guess it? The baby in the picture made him hasten to ask concerning the baby at his home. Yes, and it's a boy, and it arrived Sunday night, and it weighed eight pounds, and Sidney says that it's just the brightest, finest and——! But what's the use? You know how all new fathers act. In closing the Stroller is pleased to note that his estimable little wife is getting along finely, and the baby—well, if you want to know anything about the baby, ask Sidney."

If it will be pleasant for the Bison people to hear, I will state that there has been such a demand for another one of your great "101" Ranch pictures that the management of the Photo Play has announced the coming of the "Crisis," which will be seen in Hot Springs the latter part of this week. They are billing it heavy, too, and, as usual, there will be a great mob out to see it. I like this little theatre, not because the gentlemen in charge of it are all that men should be, but for the reason that they put the picture on as it should be shown, bright as a new coined dollar and steady as a rock, and, notwithstanding the hot weather, the little Photo Play is doing its share of business, and good Independent reels are getting the money.

A tempting morsel in the moving picture line was held out to the church people the past week by Eddie Gavrel, of the Lyceum, who secured the "King David" special in two reels and realized a big patronage therefrom. It will be noted, too, that this is an Independent production. Never knew a good Independent picture that wouldn't add to the box office receipts. Eddie sent out invitations to the "Deacons and Deaconesses" and the clan responded. It was too good to miss, and some of those stalwart brothers and sisters who have been waging war on this industry without ever going to the picture shows to see their real worth and be educated, had their views altered and are now enrolled among the loyal band of "boosters" for motion pictures. It makes all the difference in the world, you know, just when, where and how we get our information.

I want to hand Rex a little bouquet for their reel, "Lost Years," which came to the Photo Play Theatre the past week. It was a decidedly interesting production, and the acting of the leading "loidy" was most clever. Rex, we liked that one immensely. Give us some more like it.

Thanhouser, kindly bring "Jess" forward and accept a blue ribbon! The Photo Play featured your three reels of this masterpiece and the theatre wasn't big enough to hold the people, for it packed 'em to the doors (Thanhouser News please copy). Joking aside, however, it was one of the most worthy productions that Hot Springs has seen in many, many months and is deserving of the highest praise. Go to the head of the class, Thanhouser, after that one; for you certainly have won first place.

Edison, there were no flies on your "Western Prince Charming," either, which the New Central had the past week. It was a pretty story well told and exceptionally well acted throughout. I wish I could say the same thing for the Melies' "Rustler's Daughter," but I "'jes' kain't," for it had more inconsistencies in it than is usually found in a reform faction in politics. Send that "sheriff" out to the "valley of vapors," Melies, and let us give him pointers. Possibly, though, it wasn't his fault, but the fault of the producer. Out here the sheriffs, when they make a raid, wade right in and don't let their deputies run the chance of getting plugged first. Siest du?

"THE COMING GENERATION"

A Delightful Child-Story Produced by the Powers Motion Picture Company

Among the series of child-pictures being produced by the Powers Motion Picture Company "The Coming Generation" is perhaps the most delightful in the way of plot and acting and the story will interest all classes because of its originality of theme and clever interpretation.

Madge and Willie resent a fancied slight and cause their parents a few anxious moments before the mystery is solved. Their parents are entertaining at dinner and the children are ignored, being forced to partake of a simple meal in the seclusion of the nursery. They rebel and Madge steals downstairs and gets a glimpse of the diners. Returning to the nursery she unfolds a plan to Willie and they decide to dine out in a sumptuous manner. Madge dons some of her mother's finery and ransacks dressing table and commode to find articles of wearing apparel. Willie makes a surreptitious raid on the hall rack and secures his costume. Thus arrayed they go stealthily out and hail a taxicab, giving orders through the tube to the sleepy driver. They are taken to a swell restaurant where their appearance causes some excitement but, as they seat themselves and order lib-rally, they have entre to the place.

In the meantime the butler has filched a bottle of wine and is sharing it with the nurse. The check is presented to Madge and she is in a quandary for a moment, but is equal to the occasion. Hunting in the purse belonging to her mother, she finds a visiting card and hands that to the waiter, saying her papa will pay the check. The waiter telephones to their home just as their absence has been discovered by a search which has satisfied their parents that the house has been robbed and the children kidnapped. There is a rush for the cafe and the children are discovered just as they have finished their repast. All is explained and the parents are happy and the guests feel relieved.

TO PHOTOPLAY WRITERS!

In this issue of the Moving Picture News, a leading Photoplay editor asserts that the general average of scripts submitted to him during the past eighteen months has shown no improvement. He gives some reasons. William Lord Wright deemed the statement one of unusual interest to Photoplaywrights and he queried other well known Photoplay editors as to their experiences and opinions. Editors and experts have kindly responded. They all wish to aid the aspiring author, and their forthcoming views and suggestions will be found of absorbing interest. Writers cannot afford to miss reading the statements of these authorities. Tell your author friends about it!

INTERESTING THANHOUSER SITUATIONS

In "Out of the Dark," released by Thanhouser Tuesday, July 2, a lawyer's wife hides some jewels when robbers come. The shock attending the housebreaker's call unseats her reason and she cannot tell where she placed the valuables, which, by the bye, were merely being held by her husband in safekeeping for a client. While looking over some papers in his safe one night the lawyer is called to the 'phone.

Later the wife awakes with a start. Again she steals down stairs to the library invaded by the thieves, and gazes with terror as a pane of glass is broken and a hand is stealthily stretched through the opening. She remembers the jewels, and thinks that they must be protected. Gliding into the library, she opens the safe, takes out a package of papers and hides them where the other package—the one with the jewels—is. Then, as the lights are turned on, she falls fainting into her husband's arms, her mind and his honor restored. The accompanying scene shows the wife gazing wonderingly from package to package.

"Ma and Dad," the Thanhouser release of Friday, July 5, illustrates well the matrimonial "chances" of the manicure girl. In a palatial metropolitan hotel she meets —and may fascinate—many men. Men of affluence, of course. The manicure heroine of this particular picture is here shown charming the heir to a million, who, in the end, succumbs to her eyes and—touch. The photo may teach the prosperous unmarried to beware of manicure tables!

LOVE, WAR AND A BONNET
Imp Release, July 1

It is wartime and little Sallie Batte, finding herself without a bonnet, and unable to purchase one, decides to trim one all herself. She consults her old Mammy, who suggests a visit to the attic, where the needed material may be found. To their delight an old hat with heaps of roses is discovered lying in an old trunk. These are seized by Sallie, who soon has a pretty bonnet fashioned from the relics of the past.

While busily engaged in her work the little girl is trying to decide to her satisfaction whether she really and truly is in love with Walter Berry, a young Confederate captain, who has long been devoted to the petted child, but the masterpiece is completed before she comes to a decision.

Being called from the room, she leaves her new bonnet on the table and in her absence there enters an unexpected visitor in the shape of a youthful Northern spy, who is seeking a disguise in order to safely reach his camp. Seeing the bonnet seemingly awaiting an owner, it is the work of a moment to place it on his head, wrap a cape about him and quietly make his exit from the house. He swiftly mounts his horse and races for his life.

When the loss is discovered, Sallie, in despair, makes inquiry of all, and upon being told by an old servant in which direction the strange man, clothed in her garments, had gone, she immediately gives chase. She rapidly gains on the masquerader and he, as a last resort, drops the bonnet and cape in the road; these are found by the brave girl and hastily donned.

Meanwhile, an alarm has gone forth that a Yankee spy is in the country, and Captain Berry is appointed to effect his capture. After riding some miles, he sees in the distance a figure, whom he thinks is the man he is in search of, and spurring his horse rapidly gains upon him. Poor Sallie, for it is she, hearing the clatter of hofs, thinks the spy is pursuing her, and, dismounting, seeks a hiding place in a house she is passing. She has just concealed herself behind the sofa, when Captain Berry enters the room. Of course she is discovered, and when dragged forth by the angry man, who is prepared to handle her roughly, she removes the wonderful bonnet, and to his astonishment and chagrin there stands revealed the girl he loves.

Realizing this is his opportunity, the Captain determines he will force the stubborn girl to admit that she loves him. She at first denies this strenuously, but finally he conquers, and when they leave the house together, he has Sallie's promise to be his wife.

HOME AGAIN
Imp Release, July 6

A convict makes his escape from prison, and upon being missed is immediately pursued by guards, who rapidly gain upon him. He realizes this, and seeing a tramp bathing in a pond, quickly exchanges clothes without the hobo's consent, and continues on his way unmolested.

The guards discovering the poor tramp in the water, immediately jump to the conclusion that he is their man, at once opening fire upon him. The poor man quickly emerges from the water, and, seeing only the convict's clothes, dons them and runs with the guards in pursuit.

In the meantime the convict has escaped detection, but seeing a detachment of guards coming down the road, he takes refuge in a hay wagon, which is fully loaded, hoping by this means to make his escape good. The driver of the wagon mounts to his seat, and soon the town is left behind them. When the destination is finally reached and the convict cautiously peeps out, to his consternation he finds that he is in the jail yard, which he left only a few hours before. Now that escape is impossible, he enters the prison again and makes his way to the cell, where the guards find him calmly smoking a pipe when they make their rounds.

PRINTING AND ENGRAVING U. S. GOVERNMENT STAMPS
Saturday Imp Release, June 6

Approx. Length, 400 Feet.

Copyrighted, 1912, by Imp Films Co.

The second of the two releases dealing with the work done at the Washington Bureau of Engraving illustrates the making of the United States postage and commercial stamps. The printing, perforating, cutting and the other operations are shown, the various mechanical and typographical processes being well illustrated.

This particular picture was taken under great difficulty with regard to the lighting. Nevertheless, it presents a very vivid idea of the great business at the Bureau of Engraving in the making of U. S. stamps.

BETTY, THE COXSWAIN
Imp Release, July 4

Young Ned Dean, the coxswain of the Barton University Rowing Crew, is in love with Betty Marshall, a pretty, athletic girl, who is a great favorite in the college town. Her father gives his consent to the marriage, provided Ned and his eight win the annual 'Varsity boat race.

Ralph Cummings, a classmate of Ned's, is heavily in debt to a bookmaker who forces him to get Ned out of the way before the start of the great race in order that it may be won by the opposite side. He is anxious for the Barton University to lose, as he has gambled heavily against their crew. Ralph, therefore, sends a note to Ned a few minutes previous to the race informing him that his mother has met with a serious accident and wants him. Ned rushes out to the place where the accident is said to have occurred, but instead of finding his mother he is confronted with two men, one of whom strikes him a blow which knocks him senseless.

When he regains consciousness his first thought is of the race, and soon he has succeeded in breaking the window and is on his way back to join his crew.

In the meantime, both crew and coach are in despair, until Betty appears and begs to be allowed to steer for Ned. She disguises herself as a boy and takes her place in the coxswain's seat. Their crew is victorious, and when Ned arrives he as well as the other boys is surprised to find that their coxswain is Betty.

THE STORY OF CHOPIN
Gaumont Release, July 11

To give an idea of this film, one need but recount the salient experiences of the eminent Polish composer and pianist, Frederic Chopin's, sorrowful life. This musician seemed to be entirely too sympathetic and delicate in structure for the cold and thoughtless age in which he lived, and the narration of his experiences only convinces one of the justification for much of the life embitterment that the eminent composer wove so dexterously into his compositions. The film recounts the story of his life from the year 1830, at which time his love for Marie Wodzinska was thwarted by the cruel commands of her parents, who had selected for her a hand of less worth but more power. Again we see him in Vienna and Dresden, and also in Paris in the year 1831, where he finds his fame but loses his health. Here he became the idol of the salons, employing his leisure time in composition. In 1836 he makes the acquaintance of George Sand (Madame Dudevant) through Liszt. The intimacy lasted for seven years, when George Sand gave her butterfly the congé. Enfeebled by consumption that had been feeding on his weakening body, he dies at Paris, only after having composed one of the most expressive funeral marches that has ever emanated from the finger of a man.

LOVE'S SUREST PROOF
Gaumont Release, July 14

The noted lawyer enters his office on this particular morning, and, as usual, reads through his mail. Three letters, however, hold his particular attention, one from the Amalgamated Union of Domestic Servants, which delivers the ultimatum to the effect that unless he contributes generously to their funds, his servants will be called out on strike at 10:30 a. m. on the following day. The second letter, from his brother-in-law, advises that the latter's daughter, Amelia, arrives in his town to-morrow to commence a private course of studies, and at his request has arranged to take the noonday meal at their (the lawyer's) house. The third letter, from an old friend, imparts the information that Mark Willoughby, a local promising young jurist, will drop in at their home on the morrow and take the noonday meal with them. The writer of the letter advises, in concluding, that the lawyer's daughter be on the scene at the time of this call. The meaning of these three letters is thoroughly understood by their recipient, and he hurries home to tell the news to his beloved daughter, Susie. On the following day 10:30 marks the departure of the servants of the house. They have left on strike. At the same time the cousin, Amelia, arrives on the scene, but, unlike Susie, she is homely and uninteresting. Susie takes her out in the kitchen and explains that she will have to pardon her for culinary duties, that the servants had gone on strike and necessitated her busying herself in the kitchen, unless they were to starve that day. Amelia takes the explanation but learns from Susie's father that a suitor is expected. She hastens to her room to fix herself up, believing that she might profit by the embarrassing situation in which Susie has been placed by the strike of the servants.

In the meantime young Willoughby arrives, and after finding no one in the house, inasmuch as Amelia had not yet finished dressing, invades the kitchen. He is captivated by the charming beauty of the cook and quite forgets her rank and station. Conversation with her only proves to intensify his admiration, and before he knows it he has proposed. However, the cook does not promise to accept him, never for one minute revealing her identity. In the meantime Amelia has arrived. She makes known her presence in the adjoining room and young Willoughby, in the height of embarrassment, proceeds to call on her. The contrast is too marked and he cannot help but feel that he would far prefer the charming little cook to the homely Amelia. At this point Susie's father enters the room and explains the situation, much to the delight of Mark Willoughby, who commends himself the more for his choice and carries out his plans. This was the surest proof of his love.

DOGGIE'S DEBUT
Thanhouser Release, June 30

The little boy's life was all happiness up to the time that he was nearly nine years old. He lived with his grandfather, who seemed to be rich and gave him all the pets that any child could ask for. So it was quite a shock to him when dear old grandpa died, and he found that all the money had flown away, for the old man had suffered unexpected reverses in Wall Street, which was really the cause of his death.

Perhaps the pangs of poverty might not have been so severe had it not been for the fact that the cruel creditors seized everything. Jack saw the expensive furniture disposed of without a pang, but when they began to dispose of his pets to the highest bidder, despite his protests, things began to look serious. Several of his loved ones had gone under the hammer before he decided what to do. Then he took his poodle, the only pet left, and fled from the accursed house.

It is pretty hard for a little boy to make his way in the world, and especially difficult if there is another mouth to feed, even if that other mouth is satisfied with dog biscuits. So it was not long before the youngster began to fear that he would be compelled to ask charity, to keep his little home together.

Luck came his way at last, for in a nearby town he saw posters advertising an Animal Congress. Convinced that his pet was bright, far more intelligent than any other dog, he decided to apply for an engagement, knowing that the poodle would gladly work to get bread for his kind young master.

Much to his surprise there was a distinct tendency at the theatre to jeer at him, but his troubles ended when the animal trainer appeared. For in the days of carefree wealth, the now trainer had been the groom at the boy's home and they had been great friends. The groom was mighty fond of the child, and only too glad to do him a favor in the time of his need.

The youngster joined the former groom, and became assistant trainer. His friend and partner never regretted his kindness, for as he often said, "The act is fifty per cent better now that I have 'Little Pal' with me."

There are many stations in life worse than that of an animal trainer, if you like animals, and the happy little boy found it so.

OUT OF THE DARK
Thauhouser Release, July 2

A young lawyer receives word from abroad that a packet of jewels, valued at $20,000, which has figured in a lawsuit, has been shipped to him from Europe, to be held for a client. He meets the steamer, receives the valuables and starts with them to a bank, meaning to place them in the vaults. He has forgotten that it is Saturday, and a half holiday, and the result is that he discovers that he must keep the custody of the gems over Sunday. This does not worry him, for he has a safe in his own home, and he does not dream that any one knows of the treasure in his possession.

The fact is, however, that the messenger has been trailed from Europe by a celebrated crook, who vainly seeks a chance to annex the valuables. He witnesses the transfer, and follows the lawyer, and is pleased to note that he takes the jewels home with him.

Late that evening the lawyer receives a telephone message that his father, who lives many miles away, is seriously ill and hurries off to see him. Until he reaches the house he does not realize that he has been tricked, and then he hastens home again, full of gloomy forebodings.

In the meantime the lawyer's wife, who has gone to bed, suddenly awakens with a start. She imagines that someone is trying to get into the house, and fearful for the security of the jewels, slips downstairs to investigate.

The lower hallway is in darkness except for a dim light from the street. The doors have glass panels, and as the woman watches one of them falls inward, and a hand appears and feels cautiously for the knob.

It is a lonely neighborhood and the woman does not dare to call for help, her one impulse being to hide the jewels. She rushes into the room hurriedly, opens the safe, takes the packet and hides it in a crevice at the top of the mantelpiece. As she turns to flee the burglar enters. There is a struggle and a scream which fortunately brings help. The criminal is captured but the shock has driven the woman mad. She remembers nothing, can tell nothing.

It is clear to the police that the burglar has been successful, for there is the open safe and the jewels have vanished. Undoubtedly his pal escapes with the booty, they figure.

The lawyer finds that he is held responsible for the loss of the gems, which cripples him financially. Besides he has no hope that his wife will ever regain her senses. Yet in the hour of his deepest despair happiness re-enters his life.

While looking over some papers in his safe one night he is called to the 'phone. His maniac wife watches him curiously, and a troubled frown comes over her face. Her perplexity deepens as he goes out and she starts upstairs to bed. Some recollection is trying to find expression.

Again she awakens with a start. Again she steals downstairs, and gazes with terror as the pane of glass is broken, and a hand is stealthily stretched through the opening. She remembers the jewels and thinks that they must be protected. Gliding into the library, she opens the safe, takes out a package of papers and hides them where the other bundle is. Then, as the lights are turned on she falls fainting into her husband's arms, her mind and his honor restored.

"It was the hand of Providence that caused me to forget my keys," the husband said later. "I had to break in the door, and the sight of my hand, as shown in the moonlight, was what restored memory to my wife."

MA AND DAD
Thanhouser Release, July 5

Things are not always what they seem to be, and here is the story of four persons which proves the truth of this statement.

First, there was the Manicure Girl. Anyone who saw her polishing away in the grand, scrumptious hotel knew in a minute that she ate only at cabaret restaurants, and had bushel-baskets of diamonds.

The fact was that the moment her day's toil was over she hustled out to Bronxville, where her mother had a tiny little chicken farm, and the two lived there very happily together.

Second, there was the Boy. He was the regular Rah Rah type, and persons frequently pointed him out as a gridiron star, or a celebrated pitcher, when the fact was that the longest time he had ever been in college was two weeks.

Third, there was "Dad," father of the Boy. Dad had oodles of money and a sad face, whereat every one talked of his blue blood, and how an ancestor came over on the Mayflower. The facts were that "Dad" himself came over on the Cunard Line Steerage, but he knew how to make money and save it.

Fourthly, there was "Ma," who lived in the country, and no one ever suspected for a minute that she was the mother of a manicure girl. The Girl polished the Boy's nails, and he told her that she had won his heart. He proposed, she accepted, but the Boy was afraid to tell Dad, fearing he might object. So the young couple ran away, and sent Dad a note, which conveyed among other information the statement that the Girl's mother was a "Countess," which was a lie. Dad didn't object to the marriage; in fact, he didn't give a hoot about the title in the family, but he was glad his son had settled down. Besides, the girl seemed all right, and he grew quite fond of her.

While the young couple were on their wedding trip Dad went out on a rural tour in his auto. As he traveled along a chicken tried to demonstrate the old question, "why does a chicken cross the road?" In this particular case the answer was "To get killed." Dad was very sorry, of course, and offered the owner, an elderly woman, money to pay for it. She refused at first, but finally accepted, on condition that he take the victim with him. There were more or less arguments and finally the woman agreed to cook the chicken for him.

The chicken tasted pretty good to Dad, and he felt more at home every minute. Then the postman arrived with a card from the woman's daughter, who was on her honeymoon down South. Proudly she showed it to her visitor, and he recognized the pictures of his son and the son's bride. Also he realized that the comfortable old countrywoman before him was the much-maligned "countess."

He was mighty glad she was not a countess, for if she had been she never could have cooked chicken so divinely, he reasoned. Dad decided that it was about time that he had settled down, too. There was a rapid-fire courtship, and when the young people returned they found that Ma was no longer a "countess," but something far more important.

She was Boss, for she and Dad were married.

THE WEIGHT OF A FEATHER
Rex Release, June 27

A feather doesn't weigh an awful lot, but to the feminine contingent a feather may weigh more than anything else in the world. Not that a woman's soul is to be taken lightly, but sometimes a feather has outweighed it.

Cleo was young, pretty and poor—a dangerous combination. She was employed in a fashionable millinery establishment, a disastrous environment. And she was unhappy, a discouraging climax.

We can preach that happiness comes from within, that pretty clothes don't do the soul any good, that contentment is the greatest religion, but a pretty girl who knows it has other views—and desires. True, it had been given her to love and be loved, but that only aggravated her discontent. Her youth and beauty cried for the tributes they deserved—for the things that are Caesar's.

Saturday afternoon: The store was filled with gay, frivolous, extravagant women who squandered sufficient money on a feather to save a few suffering souls from toil. Cleo's heart hungered.

Saturday night: Cleo was instructed to deliver a hat to a purchaser. She took it to the peacock's home, and finding her out, decided to take it home with her.

Sunday: Her sweetheart called. She looked at the old, soiled black straw hat, and thought of the tempting thing in the box. The call was strong to her eager ears too willing to hear. She hesitated but a moment, and the lure conquered. She wore the hat.

As she was entering the house on her return a careless smoker dropped his cigar through the window, and the Nemesis that pursues all Fate's toys caused it to fall on the hat. With a shriek she threw the burning hat from her head. The delicate feather was ashes.

She knew what to do. She could not face her employer and explain, she could not pay for the loss of the ruined hat, she could not escape from the relentless clutch of the desperate circumstance. There was only one escape, only one refuge.

But it was discovered that she had attempted to destroy her life in time to preserve it. The story was told, the old story of the serpent's voice and the yielding yearning. But even pretty peasants have hearts, so she was forgiven. And she realized that her sweetheart's love was of greater weight than all the feathers in the world—and a great many other things.

LOOKING BACKWARD
Rex Release, June 30

When to-day is long ago and to-morrow is far past, when the sounds and sights about us are hushed and vanished, when the throbbing realities of to-day are but the faded phantoms of an old yesterday, when we look back upon the vista of dead years, and all the ghosts of past hours glide into the memory—it is quite a thing, let us tell you, to see and remember an incident such as the old sweethearts do in "Looking Backward."

Sitting by the hearth they see in the flames the happy record of their youth. How he met and loved her, how his father refused to consent to their marriage, and her plan to win his reluctant approval. She remembers how she went to the farm with the bogus plea of being ill and needing country air. She recalls all the wiles and guiles she exerted in her effort to win his good graces. And—now they laugh—she remembers—it is amusing now that they have children of their own, though it was a mighty serious thing then—how his father fell in love with her himself, and proposed! She asked him to give her a little time, and she came to the city and told her sweetheart all about it. They visited a minister, and the son no longer feared his father's rivalry. Then they boldly returned to the farm, and told her other lover all about it. It was a serious surprise to the father, but it was even more humorous, so—he took his sweetheart-daughter-in-law to his heart.

They remember it all, and their minds are busy with the happy recollections when their children rush in upon them. There is a bashful boy with their daughter, and the story that started fifty years ago is continued is the romance of the newer lovers.

THE REASON
Gem Release, June 25

They were a successful family — because they were happy. Their home was the greatest temple in the world, because it sheltered contentment. And then the child came. They loved each other so much it seemed they couldn't spare enough for the little stranger. But they did—love multiplies itself. They were happy!

Then he met her, the pretty, dark-haired, dark-eyes, sweet-voiced Italian girl. She worked on his strawberry field, and he saw much of her. And something stirred and awakened in her and clamored in her heart for freedom—the imprisoned love that had smouldered in her being all the years of her youth. All the pulse and impulse of her race, all the fire and faith of a first love, all the timid tenderness and trust and truth of a woman-child molded into a blind passion.

He took an interest in the girl which she mistook for affection. He placed her in charge of the pickers; he was kind and gentle to her, and in her eagerness to do so, she recognized his kindness as love.

Later he began to feel the strange power overwhelming him, and gradually submitted to it. There was fascination in her, a luring challenge, a dominant seduction. Her lips were inviting in their freshness, her voice soft and sweet, her eyes contained forgetfulness—and he forgot. In those eyes were all the innocence and all the sin of the world; in their black mystery was conflict, the soul-struggle of all humanity on the battlefield of the world; yet —in their dark depths was peace.

His wife first doubted, then suspected, then realized the bitter truth. Almost at the same time the girl learned of his wife and child. But her love was too strong, too reckless, to be conquered by her knowledge of right and wrong, and her passion was only increased by the furious rage of the realization. Once she saw the child, with its sweet little face and laughing blue eyes, and realized in it her most dangerous rival for the love of the man she loved. But—had he not told her that he loved her? Yes, and had he not asked her to go away? Ah, his wife, his child, were nothing. It was she! And their love!—their love that was stronger than his soul.

Then Something took the matter in its own Mighty Hands. The child walked down to the sea one day, and in childish daring was about to step into the water. The girl saw, and felt a fiendish, inhuman delight at the promised destruction of the greatest obstacle in her path. Then God permitted her to see her error; she realized a human life was even greater than a great love, and she flew to the bank and rescued the child from the impending peril. Almost tenderly she led it from the threatening danger, straight to the arms of the distracted parents anxiously searching for it. The father pressed the child to his heart, and in the vast joy of its safety drew his wife to him and kissed her. Then the three walked off, forgetting the girl and her sacrifice, never thinking of the bitter cost of their happiness. But God whispered to the girl that she was right, and her heart sheltered a giant joy.

THE GREAT BANK FAILURE
Itala Release, June 29

This is a highly dramatic subject, with splendid settings and a monster cast. It is presented in exquisite photography, effectively bringing out beautiful tones and light effects.

Helen Gordon is the adored daughter of a banker, and is engaged to a Captain Blake. She is gifted with a wonderful soprano voice, and at a reception at her home Garrett, a music composer, falls desperately in love with her, but conceals his affection.

The cashier of the bank absconds with the bank's funds, and in the crash that follows the Gordons are deserted by their former friends. Even Captain Blake turns from the prospect of marrying a penniless girl, and father and daughter are dropped from affluence and adulation to lonesome poverty.

Helen utilizes her musical education to earn a living for herself and her father, by teaching children. Garrett, who has remained loyal to the girl, has been perplexed to find a way in which he could assist her without wounding her pride, and, having written an opera which is being produced, he persuades the theatrical manager to offer Helen the leading role.

A creditor of Gordon's has harassed the broken old man and threatens to bring criminal proceedings against him. Helen knows that he would never consent to have her appear on the stage, so she assumes a stage name. She secures an advance sufficient to take up her father's notes, removing the specter which has been hovering over their humble home, but fearing to tell her father of her action.

The first performance is given, and Helen makes her triumphant debut. An immense theatre is shown, with the audience wildly applauding Helen, who is supported by a large company on the stage.

Radiant with her success, Helen goes to her dressing room and is visited by the manager, who forces his attentions upon her. As she is struggling in his embrace Garrett enters and hurls him aside, and after a highly dramatic scene orders him away.

In revenge the manager writes an anonymous letter to Gordon, telling him to come to the Lyric Theatre if he wishes to see his daughter on the stage. The next evening Gordon is among the audience, and when Helen appears he leaps upon the stage. Helen retreats to her dressing-room, followed by her angry father. Garrett tries to pacify him, and at length makes him understand that Helen has done it all for her father.

Ashamed, the old man drops on his knees and asks Helen's forgiveness, which she freely gives, and Garrett takes advantage of the moment to ask for Helen's hand.

HIS MESSAGE
Bison Release, June 25

Holmes and his daughter, Nell, live in a cabin, while he works his claim. Haven, a young prospector, has pitched his tent in the vicinity, and the three become friends. Haven is fortunate in his quest for gold, and the pile of yellow metal accumulates until he has a goodly fortune in his possession.

The mining operations have been secretly watched by a trio of desperadoes who await a favorable opportunity to steal it. One day Haven is severely wounded by a landslide, and his cries bring Holmes and Nell to his assistance. The girl nurses him at her home and completely wins his heart.

A week passes and Haven is about on crutches. Holmes goes to the settlement for supplies, and the thieves seize this opportunity to carry out their scheme. As they are forcing an entrance, Nell escapes through a back window and makes a desperate ride to the settlement for help.

With the gold, Haven, by means of a table and a chair, reaches the attic. He then knocks a hole in the roof, and, crippled as he is, slides to the ground. The thieves pursue him and mortally wound him. He continues his flight to the edge of the river, where he falls dying on a rock, throwing the gold into the water. The thieves come up and, not finding the gold, turn back. Haven, feeling himself passing away, laboriously writes a message on the rock with his own blood: "The gold is in the water."

Accompanied by a score of men from the settlement, Nell is hurrying back at break-neck speed. The thieves are captured and Haven's body is found, and the gold recovered.

THE COLONEL'S PERIL
Bison Release, June 29

This is a feature production, with a large cast, showing splendid battle scenes. Tom Norman, the son of the colonel, falls in love with pretty Nell, the daughter of a corporal. The colonel frowns upon the match and sends his son to college. Six months serve to completely tire Tom of college life and he enlists in the army. The colonel is hurt over Tom's conduct and refuses to communicate with him.

Two years later Tom, who has won his sergeant's stripes, is assigned to his father's post. The colonel refuses to recognize him as his son. Nell and her father, however, welcome him back.

A sudden uprising of the Indians sends the emigrants and settlers scampering for safety. Blazing cabins dot the surrounding country. At the head of a squadron of cavalry Colonel Norman sallies forth, confident in the belief that short work would be made of the redskins. He is surprised and ambushed, however, by a horde of redskins who outnumber the soldiers ten to one, and is himself shot from his horse. Tom picks up the unconscious body of his father and carries it away, pursued by the relentless foe.

Down a precipitous cliff Tom slides with his burden, and concealing his father behind a huge rock makes every shot count.

A score of wounded and frenzied soldiers escape and gallop back to the fort. The sad story is quickly told, and the second division is called out, riding like the wind to save their comrades. The Indians are routed and Tom and his father rescued from their perilous situation.

The next day, propped up in bed, the colonel is visited by Tom and Nell, and he smiles his forgiveness as he tenderly draws them to him.

MARCA DEPOSITATA

This is a split reel, composed of a laughing comedy and a beautiful scenic subject, the latter showing Benares, the sacred city on the Ganges River, India, with its thousands of bathers, the quaint structures, centuries old, etc., etc.

In the comedy subject Brown watches a picture on the screen of a theatre and decides that acting is easy work. He applies for a position at a studio and his ability is tested in various strenuous ways. He is thrown through a window, ducked in a pond, compelled to ride a horse which throws him, etc., etc. At the end of the day, swathed in bandages and walking on crutches, he goes to the office to receive his pay and is handed the munificent sum of two dollars.

THE KNIGHT AND THE FRIAR
Majestic Release, June 23

Lady Alice, a fair maiden of the 15th century, is being serenaded by the brave knight, Tristram, who sits upon his prancing steed beneath her window, within the castle gates. The jolly Friar Tuck interrupts the lovers and calls the maiden's father, which causes the knight to ride for his life, as his family and the maiden's are deadly enemies. Swearing vengeance upon the Friar, the knight sends him a message by a peasant girl who is taking a basket of food to his cell. Later the Friar is surprised by the knight in his cell and is made to lend the knight his robe. Lady Alice enters and confesses her love for the knight to the supposed Friar, and is surprised when she learns that she has been talking to her lover disguised in the monk's gown. Friar Tuck is forced to unite the two sweethearts at the point of a sword, and thus is the feud between two noble families happily ended.

MEALS BY WEIGHT

Business is bad with Herr Sauerkraut. He thinks of an advertising scheme that will make him wealthy and puts up a sign which tells his customers the glad news that they will only be charged for the actual amount of pounds they gain while eating. Weary Willie is attracted by the new method of paying for a dinner, and with the aid of a large cobblestone hidden under his coat, finds that he can eat a good meal and be paid for the pleasure, as well. He informs his many pals of the new restaurant, and they visit a large pile of bricks before entering for their mid-day meal. Herr Sauerkraut becomes suspicious when he finds so many of his customers weighing less after they eat than they did before, and he drops a dollar bill on the floor, just out of the reach of a particularly fat-looking guest. The sight of the money is too much for the fat man, and when he reaches for it enough bricks fall on the floor to build a small church, much to Herr Sauerkraut's surprise and the general disruption of business.

PAPA'S DOUBLE
Majestic Release, June 25

In a card game at the club, Jim Thomas has the misfortune to quarrel with his prospective father-in-law, who forbids Jim to ever enter his house again. Madge Jones, his fiancée, meets him without her father's knowledge, but is found out and sent away to boarding-school, where Mr. Jones gives strict orders that Madge be allowed to see no one but her father. Jim learns of Madge's plight, and, disguising himself so that he looks like Mr. Jones, calls upon Madge and completely fools the boarding-school mistress, who thinks he is Madge's father instead of her sweetheart. Jim, while disguised as Mr. Jones, takes one of the pretty inmates of the boarding-school out for a walk and buys her a box of candy. Mrs. Jones happens along in her automobile and sees Jim with the boarding-school miss. She thinks it is her husband, and poor Mr. Jones has trouble waiting for him when he returns from business that evening. Mr. Jones calls at the boarding-school and meets Jim made up as his double, but as Jim and Madge have managed to get married, and Mr. Jones is too busy straightening up the complications that his double has gotten into to object, nothing very serious happens to the young folks.

GETTING RICH QUICK
Majestic Release, June 30

Splivins and Gelvis, two live wires who live by their wits, find themselves without any funds. By borrowing all of the office boy's small change they advertise for a partner with ten thousand dollars to finance a mail-order business. Mr. Simp reads the advertisement and, much against his wife's wishes, becomes a member of the firm. The partners immediately become prosperous with their newly found capital, and in order to give Mr. Simp a good run for his money launch a mail-order scheme which gives promise of being a dismal failure. Much to everyone's surprise, the scheme turns out to be a wonderful success. Thousands of letters arrive at the office of Splivins a Gelvis, and it takes the combined efforts of the firm, the stenographer, the office boy and all their sweethearts to open the mail. When a farmer arrives at the offices and insists upon leading his old gray mare into the inner office a climax is reached which is a real surprise.

THE GAMBLER
Lux Release, June 21

Tom Bradford was well known to the habitués of Luke Stamford's saloon as an inveterate gambler; nevertheless, he is not devoid of some redeeming features. A change takes place when Alice Redmond comes from the East with her father and Bradford gambles no more. Alice falls in love with him at first sight, and her love grows stronger when Bradford saves her from the cowardly assault of Lister, the bad man of the district.

One morning Bradford decides to sell out his gambling outfit, and his old friend, Jess, the dancing girl, seeing that her chances of winning his affection are no more, goes off into the woods to hide her sorrow. There she sees Lister attempting to run away with Alice Redmond, who is in his power, having been surprised by him upon a lonely road. Jess rushes back to the saloon and tells Bradford, who, with the aid of the boys, dashes after Lister, and finally catches him. This paves the way for an introduction to Alice's father, and finally to a happy marriage, and Bradford is known as "The Gambler" no more.

WHAT AN ASS
Lux Release, June 14

An erratic old gentleman makes the life of his servants so unbearable that finally nobody will consent to wheel him out in his bath chair. He is finally obliged to employ a very intelligent donkey. The latter takes the place of a servant in an admirable fashion. However, he also finds it impossible to tolerate the old gentleman's ill-humor, and proceeds to show the old fellow that he is not the only one who can make himself unbearable.

Paddy Fiddlesticks induces the fair musician to elope with him, and the result is one amusing medley of situations, musical and otherwise.

THOU ART THE MAN
Lux Release, June 28

A foolish son fondly imagines that he can do without his parents' help, so goes forth into the world after breaking their hearts and disgracing himself generally. Shortly afterwards he writes to his mother and tells her that he is in trouble and greatly in need of money. His fond mother is much distressed, as she is unable to persuade his father to let him have any money, and all is sadness in the little household. That night, footsore and weary, the prodigal son returns home. His father relents, his son takes his supper and retires to rest. His father is a gamekeeper, and therefore goes forth to his duties directly after supper, leaving his wife reading a newspaper. Presently a tramp comes to the cottage and asks for something to eat. He is invited in, food is laid before him. As the tramp eats the woman reads of a murder that has been perpetrated in an adjacent town. A photograph of one of the supposed murderers is given and the woman imagines that she recognizes the original of the photograph in the tramp. As a reward is offered for his capture the woman realizes that, if she can inform the police, she will get the money tht her son needs. She therefore sends her daughter to fetch the police and in the meantime plies her visitor with wine. Her son, too uneasy to sleep, comes down from his room. He enters just as the police burst in and are about to seize the tramp. The good woman is horribly surprised to see the tramp snatch off his wig and false beard, point to her son and instruct the police to arrest him. Thus in endeavoring to obtain the offered reward, the woman brings the real culprit to justice—her own son.

BETWEEN TWO FIRES
Solax Release, uly 5

Clarissa Howland, a young married woman, has written foolish letters to Henry Harrison, a blackguard who later forces money from her on his threat that he will send the letters to her husband. In an interview in which, failing to produce a thousand dollars he demands, she is forced to promise to give him a valuable emerald necklace, she agrees to leave the library window open so he may quietly enter that evening and receive the necklace in exchange for the letters. This interview is overheard by Bill Burke, a burglar, who follows Clarissa home.

That evening Clarissa opens the window and leaves the room to procure the necklace. During her absence Burke enters, and on her return is forced to conceal himself behind the curtains. He sees her place the emeralds in a desk, which she does not lock, and leave the room. Burke thereupon removes the necklace from the desk and is about to leave, when Harrison enters through the window. Again Burke is forced into concealment. An instant after Clarissa returns, finds Harrison waiting, and demands her letters. Harrison takes them from his pocket and asks for the necklace. Clarissa opens the desk and discovers the jewels missing. She instantly accuses Harrison of having taken them, and in frantic rage tries to take her letters from him by force. As they struggle Burke stuns Harrison with the butt of his gun from his place of concealment and coolly takes the letters for himself. He is about to leave when Clarissa's three-year-old son, in his night clothes, enters the room.

Clarissa begs Burke to give up the letters at least, if only for the boy's sake, and after a struggle with himself Burke throws the letters into the fire. He seems interested in the child and finally picks Harrison from the floor and kicks him out through the window, following himself. Clarissa is seated before the fire with her son asleep in her lap, when Burke returns. He stands looking curiously at the mother and son, and then, taking the necklace from his pocket, reaches over her shoulder and drops it upon the child's breast. As he is about to leave, Clarissa's husband enters, and Burke is once more forced to conceal himself. Clarissa, child and husband leave the room. Burke emerges, takes a cigar from a box on the table, lights it, shrugs his shoulders and exits.

THE TALE OF A RUBBER BOOT
Comet Release, June 22

Colin Campbell, an honest and thrifty Scotchman, has acquired a small competence, through judicious investment in Florida lands.

Being of an impressionable nature, and longing for companionship, he ignores "Sam Weller's" advice, and succumbs to the wiles of Mignon Galligan, a widow with a grown-up son, who owns some adjoining property.

Now Mignon's consent to the union was not the result of real affection on her part, but a spirit of cupidity induced her to marry Colin, hoping to add to her already generous acreage, and at the same time increase her bank account. Colin, true to his natural instincts, soon became aware of her real motives and was wary. But, alas for the uncertainty of human calculations, a contretemps occurred, which led to a disruption and Colin's complete undoing.

He disposed of part of the possessions, for which he received a cash payment of six thousand dollars, and it being after banking hours, and having no safe in his home, he displays quite some uneasiness about the security of the money. Seeking a place to foil robbers should they enter his house during the night, and also to guard against any effort on the part of his wife to get possession of it, he conceals the money in an old rubber boot, and throws it with its mate carelessly into a corner of the room.

About this time Walker Tracks, a specimen of the genus tramp, enters the grounds, and is in the act of helping himself to a drink of water at the pump. Mignon, having a natural aversion to tramps, sees him, and attacks him with a broom. The husband, hearing the disturbance, being of a kindly nature, comes to his rescue, and after reproaching his wife with her ungenerous behavior, invites Walker into the house, where he bountifully supplies him with food and drink, gives him some change, and with wholesome advice dismisses him.

In the meantime the wife has found the muddy, well-worn boots, and in a rage carries them out to the barn, and throws them in, all unconscious of their valuable contents.

It so happens that Walker has sought refuge for the night in this self-same barn, and being discovered there by the stepson, is ignominiously ejected, and various articles are hurled after him, among them the boots. As the latter come his way he realizes they are an improvement on his well-worn shoes, and in an effort to draw them on, he finds the money.

A succession of interesting incidents follow the discovery, ending in a hurried visit to the metropolis, where he quickly provides himself with an elaborate wardrobe, and arrayed in the extreme of fashion, he visits the white light district and squanders his easily acquired wealth in princely fashion. He finally meets his Waterloo, at the hands of a confidence queen and her confederate, who relieve him of the greater part of his easily acquired wealth. The lesson thus taught proved the making of Walker, for he shortly after seeks honorable employment, and through thrift and industry eventually develops into a wealthy and useful member of the business community. About this time an accidental meeting with his old-time benefactor acquaints him with facts hitherto unknown to him. The money he found in the boot belonged to the old man, and its loss reduced him to poverty of the most direful sort, and made him a wanderer and outcast in his old age. When Walker learns the truth he returns the amount with liberal interest, and assures the old man of his eternal friendship.

of light housekeeping utensils, when he receives a hurried "wire" from one of the ten per cent cormorants with which the dramatic world is infested, to call, referring to an engagement. He immediately adorns his person with the most attractive of his stage wardrobe and hastens to the agency.

As he enters the outside office he encounters the usual assemblage of "histrions," all waiting anxiously to be summoned to the inner sanctum. His attire being of a loud and unusual pattern, Hughy attracts much attention, and when the office boy approaches and learns his name, the obsequious and deferential manner of his reception occasions many snarls and sneers on the part of those less favored.

A brief conference only is necessary to convince the purveyor of dramatic genius that Hughy is the "very man for the part," so he is given the manuscript, and a contract, with instructions to present himself for rehearsals at ten o'clock the next morning.

Swelling with pride at his achievement, Hughy returns to his room, where he unfolds to his wife the story of his success, and begins at once to familiarize himself with the lines. As an inspiration for realism in the several scenes, he asks Mrs. Ford to impersonate the characters with whom he is brought in contact, during the action of the play, and as the plot develops, Hughy becomes so entirely absorbed that in his abstraction he completely loses himself, and the strenuous manner in which he handles his wife in the many startling situations alarms the neighbors, who believe that murder is being committed, and they summon the police.

Just prior to their arrival, at a particularly blood-curdling situation, where Hughy seizes his wife by the throat and drags her about the room, an oil stove is overturned, the curtains take fire, and an alarm is sent in, resulting in the arrival of several engines at the scene. The ensuing excitement and confusion attracts a great crowd, the police and firemen enter the room, now a scene of great havoc. Explanations are in order, the crowd is dispersed, and Hughy and his wife are left alone to brave the wrath of an irate landlady.

Mabel Paige, an actress, whose name is a household word in every Southern city, forms an important part of "A Realistic Rehearsal," which is said to be as nearly original in theme and construction as it is possible to reach.

THE TOY PHONE
Reliance Release, July 13

Mr. Webb, struck by the novelty of a little toy 'phone offered for sale by a street peddler, buys one for his daughter, Ruth. The child is delighted with her new plaything when her father shows how it can be run from her bedroom to the nursery of her little friend, Gladys, who lives across the street. On the day after the 'phone is installed Mr. Webb has occasion to discharge an impertinent gardener, Pedro. He leaves the house vowing revenge. And on the following day, when Mr. Webb is at the office, the Italian returns and steals into the house. Mrs. Webb is alone, sewing, in Ruth's room. Pedro enters and secures her hand and foot. Then he attaches his revolver to the door so that the first one to enter will set it off. He leaves by the window, closing it after him. The woman is terrified and cannot move. Suddenly she remembers the toy 'phone close at her side. She calls through it to her little girl, who is playing in Galdys's nursery. Ruth finally hears and understands her mother's cry for help. Eclair Release, June 30

Emile Vaillant loves Miss Lamarck, the daughter of the man for whom he works as clerk. He dares not express his love, however, despite the kindness and evident reciprocation of Miss Juliette. Her father is a hard man, and by his very selfishness brings himself into a position where he is robbed—enforced "charity," as one might say, and on the other hand compelled by his daughter's strategy to do more good with his money. He is so embittered against his clerk that he accuses the clerk of stealing money which Juliette had used for charity, and it is through the young girl's love that all is eventually adjusted right, and papa is willing for the match.

THREE MEN AND A GIRL
Eclair Release, June 27

John Henry Dubbs, a jolly, successful man of fifty, and Bob Andrews, a young electrical engineer, are fellow-lodgers at the house of Mrs. Scrubbins, where also dwells a winsome little school teacher, Eleanor Edwards. Both men are in love with her, but have kept their sentiments pretty well covered. Andrews is unfortunate in the work of promoting an invention for electrical uses, and he is dislodged by the landlady from his room. In fact, she keeps his belongings to insure early payment, and his model for the patent is locked up with his other "duds" in the closet of his room. Now, it happens that George Haviland, a prosperous theatrical manager, is riding in his auto, and sees the beautiful young teacher walking home. He follows her and becomes a boarder at the table of the thrifty Mrs. Scrubbins, in order to meet this girl, with whom he has fallen desperately in love. He is assigned to the room of Bob Andrews, and investigating the closet he finds the model. As a theatrical man he realizes its great value for stage lighting effects, and he immediately begins interesting a number of capitalists and promoters in it, as his own discovery. Poor Bob Andrews, during this time, is wandering jobless, and altogether "down and out," when he is discovered by jolly John Henry Dubbs. The bachelor rehabilitates him, buys a new outfit of good clothes and reinstates him financially. He takes him to the boarding-house again, where Haviland is making strenuous suit for the hand of fair Eleanor. They arrive in time to save the rights of the patent ownership, to thwart the sale by Haviland, and to land a snug fortune and more fame for Bob Andrews. John Henry Dubbs proposes, and learns that his suit is hopeless, for the schoolmistress loves Bob, whose proposal is at last accepted, while old Dubbs retires to his library to dream in clouds of tobacco smoke of what might have been, comforted in the generous thought of his own help to the two young people.

GRANDPA
Reilance Release, July 10

RELIANCE.

Tony is a cross and exacting old man who works on the large dry docks of New York. His pretty daughter, Gertrude, is in love with Captain Jim, whose ship is anchored nearby. While on her way to the docks one day with her father's lunch, Gertrude meets him. They go off for a stroll on the docks and forget all about Tony—who every moment is growing more peevish over the non-appearance of his lunch. When the pair finally do turn up it is way past his lunch hour. This makes him even angrier at the sight of Captain Jim, whom he always had a grudge in for—because he wanted to marry Gertrude. The old man forbids him ever to see his daughter again. Jim returns to his ship, but that night he sends a note to Gertrude proposing that they elope. The girl agrees. She and Jim are married, and then they wire to the old man, who refuses emphatically to forgive them. So they go off on Jim's yacht. They return a year later. An old friend sees them and their baby. He rushes off to tell Tony—but Tony wants nothing to do even with the baby. A few more years elapse. Jim and his wife are going on a long cruise and decide to put the little girl, Rosanna, in a convent school. On this cruise the mother and father go down with the ship. The old man hears the news and for the first time he breaks down. Knowing where Rosanna is, he decides to get her and bring her hom with him. He goes to the school, but the child takes a great aversion to her grandfather. However, she is given into his charge and in the days that follow the old man does all in his power to win the little one over to him. But the child is as hard as he once was. He cannot awaken one spark of love in her heart. At the end of his resources and breaking down under his weight of remorse and loneliness, his sobbing attracts the child's notice and for the first time she goes to him of her own free will and puts her arms about his neck. To his question, "You love grandpa?" she nods "Yes," and tightens the clasp of her arms. And the old man knows that he need be lonely no longer.

REAPING THE WHIRLWIND
Nestor Release, June 26

Tom Ainslee has a charming wife and a dear little baby, still he is a discontented husband, only too ready to see as much as possible of Nina Harrington, the flirtatious wife of kind-hearted, good-natured Jim Harrington, who had but recently arrived in the West and rented a cosy shack near the Ainslees. Of course, the inevitable happens; Martha Ainslee comes into a room unexpectedly and discovers her husband embracing his neighbor's wife. As soon as the woman goes, Martha pleads with her husband, but to no avail, for no sooner is his wife's back turned than he follows Nina and again tells her of his love. Martha, when she discovers his absence, takes the baby and follows him. This time she pleads with Nina, who merely laughs at her misery and turns gaily away.

The next day, as soon as Tom leaves the house to meet Nina, which fact Martha has learned from a note which she had deftly extracted from her husband's pocket. Martha takes her rifle and follows Tom. From the other side, Jim, who had the day before witnessed Martha pleading with his wife, carefully loads his revolver and keeps Nina in sight. Martha is taking careful aim when Jim comes upon them with his revolver. Quickly Nina springs before Tom, pleading with her husband not to shoot. Tom endeavors to run, and it was this which decides Jim—the other man is not worth shooting; so commanding them to go, the outraged husband returns to pack his belongings and leave forever. No sooner is Nina's husband out of sight than Nina upbraids Tom for running. Tom, feeling assured of Martha, frankly tells Nina that she means nothing to him and returns home to find, instead of the patient Martha, this note pinned to the door: "Tom—It is all over between us. I have taken the baby and gone forever. Martha."

YOUNG WILD WEST LEADING A RAID
Nestor Release, June 28

Young Wild West arrives in the town of Big Echo with his party and makes an enemy of the mayor of the town because he will not buy drinks for the crowd. The mayor and Wild West fight, and Wild West shoots the gun from the mayor's hand to teach him a lesson. A short while after, Wild West saves his cook, a Chinaman, from the clutches of the sheriff, who had arrested him in mistake for a thieving Chinaman. This action of Wild West incurs the enmity of the sheriff. The mayor and sheriff, with two accomplices, have been robbing the town and have been letting their positions shield them. They had planned to rob the Golden Giant mine on the day that Wild West and his party arrived in the town. The Chinese cook overhears the plot in the saloon and hurries back to the camp to tell Wild West. They decide to lay low and capture them later.

Meanwhile, the robbers, headed by the mayor and the sheriff, make their way to the mine and with the help of the night watchman, who belongs to their gang, they carry the gold away and hide it in an old shack in the canyon below.

The next morning the news spreads that the mine has been robbed, and the superintendent of the mine, hearing that Wild West is in town, sends for him. The mayor and sheriff arrive at his office at the same time that Wild West puts in his appearance. The superintendent gives them what information he can and tells them he will take them to the scene of the robbery. The sheriff and mayor object to Wild West going, but the superintendent's suspicions have been aroused and their objections are useless. They arrive at the scene of the robbery and question the night watchman, who breaks down and confesses all. In the meantime the sheriff and mayor have sneaked off and are making their way to the shack. Wild and two of his men, with the superintendent and his sweetheart, follow them, and Wild West, climbing to the top of a high cliff, sees the shack in the distance and knows he is on the right track. He and one of his men go to the canyon, while one man goes to town for help, leaving the superintendent and his sweetheart behind. The mayor and sheriff, who have been hiding close by, hold up the remaining two. Outside, the posse joins Wild West and he leads them toward the shack. The men realize their safety lies in flight, but after a few short chases the four are captured. Wild West returns the gold to the superintendent and receives his thanks.

PAT'S BREECHES
Champion Release, July 1

Pat was a street cleaner, and with it a "devil" among the "gurls." One day he left his hose for a quiet little chat with a fair creature who lived in a doctor's establishment in the district where he plied his daily cleansings. The doctor had gone out and so had the doctor's wife, so this was a fine opportunity for a little spooning. While Pat was thus engaged, some street urchins began taking liberties with the street hose, much to the consternation of passers-by. Pat dashed upon the scene and they turned the hose on him, whereat he beat a hasty retreat to his girl's house.

Nora procured a dressing-gown and put his breeches before the fireplace to dry. Meanwhile the doctor returned and threw his overcoat over the chair on which Pat's breeches reposed, Pat hiding behind the screen. Back to their spooning went Pat and Nora, only to be disturbed again by the homecoming of the doctor's wife. She took her hubby's coat from before the fire and inadvertently Pat's breeches were carried away by her into the doctor's room. Pat was in consternation, but Nora sneaked her hand through the curtains and brought forth—the doctor's trousers. Before the exchange could be made the doctor was aroused by a hurry call, and the room being dark he put on the white ducks of the Irish street cleaner and sauntered forth.

Arriving at his destination, he found his patient in the final throes of dissolution, but one look at the doctor's white ducks, which were half-way to his knees, sent her into a fit of laughter. Discovering his ridiculous appearance, he dashed away through the streets like a wild man towards home. Pat, in the meantime, had put on the doctor's trousers, and when the latter arrived, raving and wild, with drawn revolver he shot at the man who dared to destroy the sanctity of his home, but he only succeeded in shooting off Pat's official hat.

Nora flung herself on her knees before the doctor to explain the peculiar aspect of the case, and all parties became hilariously humorous over the amusing situation.

LITTLE OLD NEW YORK

The scenes presented in this picture must at once be wonderfully instructive and interesting. There are three market-places shown, the like of which could not be seen in any other portion of the globe. The Jewish market-place gives us an insight into the thriftiness of this remarkable race in the environs of New York. The bartering—the criers—the itinerant peddlers—all are seen here in their glory. Next comes the Italian market. Here again we see the teeming multitudes, jostling one another and hustling to and fro like so many human bees in a monstrously large hive. We gaze on the scene with wonder.

But next and last comes the great market-place of the world, "The Rich Man's Market," as it has been aptly called. What a contrast there is between this Wall Street environ and the places we have just left behind us! Here the world's greatest transactions in finance are daily juggled. What an object-lesson these three market-places should be for us, the market-places of the poor and that of the rich.

THE COMING GENERATION
Powers Release, July 3

An unique and breezy child comedy, in which two youngsters resent a fancied slight in a manner quite out of the ordinary.

Madge and Willie are children of parents who shine in society circles, and are quite precocious. Their parents entertain at a recherche dinner, to which their select friends are invited. The children are taken by their nurse to dine in their playroom and are given a cereal to start a frugal meal. Madge resents the slight and steals down to the dining-room, where she gets a fleeting view of the table fairly groaning under its weight of delicacies, and she is up in arms. Returning to the nursery, the children discuss their wrongs and then decide to go out and dine at a restaurant. They have no well-defined plan, but resolve to submit to chance. To think is to act, and, while Madge arrays herself in her mother's finery, Willie goes stealthily downstairs and appropriates a costume from the hallrack. Thus arrayed, they go out unnoticed, and hailing a taxicab, they give orders through the tube and are whirled away to a swell café. Their entre causes some surprise, but the affable waiters are all attention when the children order liberally from the menu.

In the meantime the nurse and the butler have abstracted a bottle of wine and are having a surreptitious feast. The children are missed and a search is instituted. A trip through the house reveals the disorder in the room of the mother, and there is general consternation. That the house has been looted and the children kidnapped there is no doubt, and an officer is summoned.

When the waiter presents his check Madge gives him one of her mother's visiting cards, assuring him that her papa will settle the bill, and the waiter telephones to the residence. The agonized parents and their guests rush to the café, to discover the children just finishing an elaborate meal, and the mystery is explained—a happy culmination to the pranks of the little ones who took umbrage at not being invited to the dinner at home.

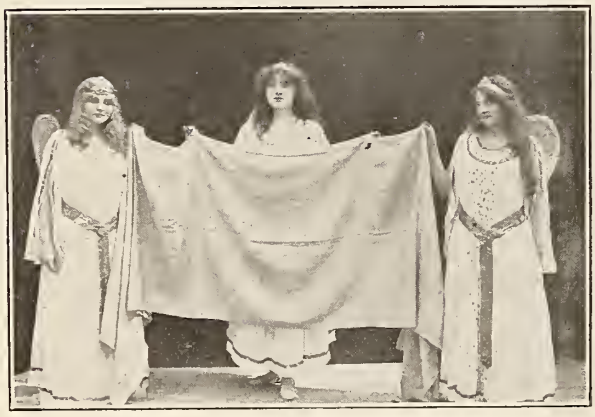
2 REELS "THE HOLY CITY" 2 REELS

A Biblical Masterpiece, founded on the American hymn "THE HOLY CITY," showing the scenes described therein

One of the remarkable scenes shown in this subject is the city of Jerusalem rising out of the ocean. It overwhelms the spectator with scene after scene of wonderment.

A minister is shown falling asleep and dreaming of the Holy City. Closely following the lines of the hymn, which are used as sub-titles and faithfully followed, the scenes mentioned are presented.



"The Holy City" will take precedence as the greatest biblical subject produced, being the first attempt to cover on a large scale such a tremendous number of incidents, which are presented in a wonderful manner. The costumes and settings are accurate, and the whole is the result of many months of patient effort and enormous cost.

No. 1000—A MOTIOGRAPH

Judge Values by Comparison and You Will Buy the Motiograph

THIS IS A CONSERVATIVE STATEMENT—THE MOTIOGRAPH IS AN UNUSUAL MOTION PICTURE MACHINE VALUE.

APPEARANCE AND QUALITY ARE TWO (only) OF MANY SUPERIOR FEATURES.

NOW LISTEN—What manufacturer first introudced the large Lamp House and heavy Arc Lamp?
What manufacturer was the first to copy us?
How many manufacturers have since copied?
Who is the latest to hring out a new Model (without improving the mechanism) with a hig Lamp House and a little Heavier Lamp?
What about the solid base or pedestal—Who was first—Who copied?

EVERYBODY'S COPYING IT—WHAT? THE MOTIOGRAPH.

To Writers:

THE EDITOR

(The Journal of Information for Literary Workers) published in your interest for eighteen years, is the magazine of which Jack London said: "I may not tell a hundredth part of what I learned from THE EDITOR, but I may say that it taught me how to solve the stamp and landlord problems." It is a monthly stimulus to the production and sale of more and better manuscripts. Besides articles of concrete, practical worth by editors or by writers successful or about to be successful, each number contains in "The Literary Market" all the news of all the magazines, new and old, that pay for manuscripts.

THE EDITOR is especially helpful to the scenario writer. It publishes from time to time helpful articles by those who are successful producers of photoplays. A copy of the current number will be sent for 15 cents. The yearly subscription is one dollar.

"THERE'S A REASON"

We've stolen the line, but it applies to this ad. a great deal more than it does to Postum. There's a reason for using it—even if it's just to Post-'em!

There's a reason for keeping your eye on Gem. "THE PRINCESS OF LORRAINE" and "HILL FOLKS" were pretty good logic, and George O. Nicholls will provide a different reason every week.

"THE REASON"

RELEASED TUESDAY, JUNE 25th

will convince you! "The Reason" is a child. A woman not its mother is the cause, and the kid is the because. The tot is the reason the story ends the way it does. If you want to know why we're bragging, get "The Reason." It's a living argument.

TWO OTHER REASONS

Tuesday, July 2nd, "TWO MEN."
Tuesday, July 9th, "THE MEDAL OF HONOR."

The tale of a struggle and a victory, and the might of a mite.

THE EXHIBITOR

THE time has now arrived when the exhibitor must be supreme. The power is his and he must use it. No longer must he be dictated to; he must now assume the role of dictator. How can he do this? By organization, of course! During the past few weeks there have been placed on the market a series of the most mediocre films it has been our province to witness, and we are now going to start a page of criticism on the films as they are shown to the Board of Censorship so that our readers—the exhibitors—may be able to select their program. We have recently returned to writers (who have asked us to publish their letters and articles) many very valuable articles about the way they are being deluded and defrauded; defrauded is the term several used, and we thought it too strong a term. During the past two weeks we have had occasion to alter our mind, and if these esteemed correspondents will once more return those rejected manuscripts we will assure their publication. Some of the three reels a week recently put out are veritable rubbish, and ought to be thrown into New York Bay before being sent to exchanges and exhibitors. Three large houses in New York have recently gone for their service to the Associated Manufacturers, and we do not blame them. Talking to a prominent exhibitor the other day, he remarked: Saunders, your last week's article was fine. If I could have had an honest service I would be independent to-day. But I could not compete with a house owned by an exchange and manufacturer to boot who was always showing first-run, while I had to take what was left, and you know some of the rubbish I had to put up with. I'll tell you what, I do get decent treatment from the General Film Service, although I hate it like poison, yet what am I to do? Again that combine of manufacturers and exchanges is rotten and is going to be detrimental to the business. They are going to ruin the business and drive more exhibitors to the association and then end by cutting one another's throats. Some of their stuff is rotten and even though they do change their name and put hair on their arms to deceive the blind old man "the hands are the hands of Esau but the voice is the voice of Jacob."

The time is now fully ripe for the exhibitor to make a great advance movement for the uplift of the whole industry and to do this he must be absolutely free to choose for himself that program best suited to his needs and the benefit of his patrons. How can he proceed? As we said before: By organization, by joining the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America, an organization absolutely free and independent, from whose ranks are debarred all exhibitors who are connected with an exchange or manufactory of films. An organization which is becoming more powerful each day, and when they establish their own Censorship Board the members may rely upon a program that will eliminate the blasé, the poor, the mediocre, the suggestive, the revolver, the thief, the roué, and all such like films from their repertoire. Is not this a consummation devotedly to be wished. If this can be accomplished the public will be given only elevating, moral, uplifting, educational subjects. Listen to what M. A. Neff, president of the M. P. E. L. of America, says:

> "Organization and co-operation make for the uplift of cinematography. We are in the cleanest and most educational line of business in the world," he said. "Where moving pictures are shown superstitions vanish as do the shadows with the morning sun." He then touched on the difficulties encountered in bringing the average exhibitor to see the necessity of organization. At the first convention called at Columbus, Ohio, only ten exhibitors attended; the next the number had increased to eighteen, and the next to thirty-five and now as the result of dogged efforts Ohio has to-day one of the most vigorous organizations in the world. "You have in your control one of the greatest powers for good in the world, and what you need to place your business interests where they ought to be is strong, vigorous organization. You have great opportunities before you now which you must grasp while you have the chance.
> "Our organization is based on the principle of a fair, square deal to every one. We do not allow any man who is interested in the manufacture of films, or otherwise interested in the moving picture except in the exhibition end of the business, to become members of our league. And of the exhibitors belonging to the organization we have only bona fide men. Through organization you men become acquainted with one another; you get to know what each other is doing; you see a certificate hung outside a theatre and you go in and chat with its manager, discuss the question of booths and other things of mutual interest, and, by the way, when you have a strong organization you can build your booths as you like; you can make them out of iron, concrete, asbestos board, or any material you like as long as it is fireproof. The great trouble is that everyone knows better how to run the moving picture theatre than the exhibitor himself. How do you expect to get in touch with Albany for relief and proper legislation unless you are banded together on a co-operative plan? You are answerable as you all know to no law that conflicts with the laws of your state. Of course, maybe we ourselves are sometimes to blame for ordeals to which we are subjected—we don't say we are not. We have to be wise as a serpent and gentle as a dove.

"I am not talking to you as M. A. Neff, I am talking to you as the president of the strongest organization in the world. We moving picture exhibitors are educating the industrial classes and the fact is as long as you have a prosperity in the tenements you have a prosperity that counts. Remember, the millionaire riding down the street in his automobile does not make prosperity."

Mr. Neff hit the nail on the head when he said, "We moving picture exhibitors are educating the industrial classes. . . ." This is just what the exhibitors are doing. Their houses are emptying the saloons, clearing the street corners, gathering together family parties. and preaching greater sermons than the pulpits of our land. And to do this thoroughly they must be organized. There is at present a great disruption in the ranks of the manufacturers. The independent forces must win. Cinematography must be free. And to this end every individual exhibitor must lend his aid, to full and complete organization.

THE FEATURE FILM

LAST week we had occasion to criticize the feature film (so-called), and for this we have been taken to task and told we are trying to ruin a paying industry. We are doing nothing of the sort. The feature film for state rights (?) is about played out. If there are any more "hayseeds" in the land who will waste money on a paying proposition—to the promoters only—then we are sorry for them. For the information of our readers we will in future publish the cost of each production, as sold here, and the fabulous prices asked. Recently a production was stated to have cost half a million of dollars ($500,000) to produce; the actual cost was $25,000 to $30,000 and this is the cost some of the state rights were asked. What was paid is another story. Promoters are now bidding for the Olympian games: the lucky (?) bidder may pay $15,000 to $25,000 for them. Already state rights are being offered to prospective "hayseeds" for ten, fifteen and twenty thousand dollars. This is a "bunco" game. Investors don't waste your money. Twelve to fifteen cents per foot should be enough for these films. "Pathe Freres" will have them, "Gaumont" will have them, "Eclair" will have them, "Great Northern" will have them, "Kinemacolor" will have them. So keep your money in your pockets where it is at least safe and belongs to you. While on the subject of saving money, another wily promoter is asking money to start another corporation. "He is a Jonah." Every company he starts—jails—it is a case of heads you lose—tails I win—just like some of the feature films. State rights are and were offered to us for advertising space. One editor lost a lot of money on this speculation; we did not.

JOE ENGEL

Present indications point to the appointment of Joe Engel to some responsible position in the Universal Co. At the present time Mr. Engel has been attempting to direct the producing departments, the advertising departments, the publicity departments, as well as handling the general sales of the company. Mr. Engel, it is said, declined the general management of the Universal Co. His experience as an employee of Wm. H. Swanson's Film Exchange and in the Rex plant eminently fits him for any of the above positions.

AN APPRECIATION

To Arthur V. Johnson from London, England

Of all the picture players,
The one I like the best
Is Mr. Arthur Johnson,
"The Hero of the West."

I watch each Lubin picture
Projected on the screen,
And wait in breathless silence,
Till He is on the scene.

I like his noble features,
His steady, upright walk;
I'd give a thousand dollars
To really hear him talk.

FREDA APPLEBY.

NOTE

On and after June 28th the Lubin Company will release five pictureplay films each week, some of which will be 2,000 feet reels.

A rising vote of thanks was extended to the convention officers. A rising vote of thanks was given to the officers, to the past officers. A rising vote of thanks was given to Mr. Neff.

Moved by Mr. Miller, seconded by Ketcham, that the meeting be adjourned at 12:45.

Albany, N. Y.—Dan Deegan has leased the Smith Opera House from M. M. Gutstadt.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Another attempt was made on Saturday, June 22nd, to form an exhibitors' association in the capital of the nation. This is attributed chiefly to the efforts of M. A. Neff, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America, who presided as chairman of the meeting. Although all exhibitors were notified, only eleven responded to the call and attended the meeting which was held at the Palace Theatre on Ninth street.

President Neff plainly set forth the advantages of a local association in many ways. He dwelt upon the unjust and arbitrary license that was imposed in many cities and how these conditions had been adjusted by the exhibitors' league. He pointed out how such a union of amusement men could effect and control legislation towards the motion picture, which had been the butt of so many injustices of law-makers who had no interest in the industry or sought to know its advantages. Especially did he see where the men of Washington could do a service in the Halls of Congress, not only for themselves but for the exhibitor all over the country. Mr. Neff also mentioned the necessity of effecting an organization at this time, so that a charter could be granted from the National Association and representatives from Washington sent to the coming Chicago convention.

At the conclusion of Mr. Neff's remarks, Fulton Brylawski, temporary secretary, spoke briefly of the need of unity of exhibitors, further strengthening the former speaker's words. He made mention of the previous attempts of forming an exhibitors' association, which had amounted to little. He reminded the company of the Johnson Sunday Bill in Congress which has appeared regularly at every session for some time past. The attitude of exhibitors to out-do their neighbor in adding an "extra reel" to his show was also touched upon.

Mr. Brylawski concluded his remarks by moving that a temporary organization be formed with temporary officers, and that a permanent one be effected at the next meeting, when a more representative number of exhibitors should be present. There was some objection to this on the grounds that there were sufficient exhibitors on hand for a permanent organization then. However, Mr. Brylawski's point was seconded and carried and the election of temporary officers was next in order.

There was no delay in the election, which resulted as follows: President, A. J. Brylawski, president of the corporation that controls a number of picture houses; vice-president, E. S. Wertz, of the Maryland Theatre; and secretary-treasurer, Fulton Brylawski, of the Senate. All of these are men of business ability, who are interested in the advancement of the motion picture industry with the needs of the exhibitors at heart.

A motion was made and seconded that a charter be applied for from the national association, and before Mr. Neff left that evening for Pittsburgh, this was put in his hands in the proper form by the newly elected secretary. Before the adjournment the next meeting was called for June 28, when a permanent organization will be accomplished.

It was indeed a treat to have the enthusiasm of Mr. Neff among the Washington exhibitors. He is a plain talker and one who believes in doing now. Two other out-of-town members were also present at this meeting. These were A. K. Greenland, of the Gaumont Company, and C. Lang Cobb, Jr., of the Reliance Company. Their attendance was appreciated and during their stay in the city they found much to interest them among the exhibitors and at the exchange.

THANHOUSER RELEASES "UNDER TWO FLAGS"

SCENE FROM "UNDER TWO FLAGS"
Thanhouser release.

With Catherine Horn as Cigarette, William Garwood as Bertie Cecil, and Flo La Badie as "The Silver Pheasant," Thanhouser Company releases on Sunday, July 1, their two-reel production of "Under Two Flags," from Ouida's well-known story. The two kinds of one-sheets, a three-sheet and attractive heralds are ready for exhibitors who want to feature the subject, which is described as better than "Jess," a picture somewhat of similar character. The film tells how Bertie Cecil, heir and eldest son of an English Viscount, fled from his regiment to shield his brother, who had committed forgery. He took the blame upon himself, and the search was soon dropped, for it was believed he had been killed in a railroad wreck. The fact was that he reached Algeria, where he enlisted in the French Foreign Legion.

In that country, strange though it was to him, he won fame as a gallant soldier, but failed of promotion because his colonel, for personal reasons, hated him. After twelve years under an alien flag, he had only reached the grade of corporal, although his merit was unquestioned.

A beautiful young vivandiere, Cigarette, met Cecil and fell in love with him. Cigarette had been with the army all her young life, and her bravery and patriotism won all hearts. She saved the detachment with which Cecil was assigned from destruction by the hostile Arabs, and to recompense her, it was decreed that she be made a member of the Legion of Honor.

When the presentation was made by a Marshal of France, a number of English people, guests of the Colonel, witnessed it. Cigarette, who watched Cecil jealously, saw that he recognized the strangers, although they did not notice him.

A day or so later, the one Englishwoman in the party unexpectedly surprised Cecil, who was kissing a tiny purse. This woman was the sister of Cecil's dearest friend, Lord Rockingham, and years before when she was a young girl, she had given it to Cecil with all her pocket money, because she was sorry when he lost a horse race. He refused the money but made her very happy by asking for, and retaining the purse.

This link of the love of long ago betrayed Bertie's secret, and he confessed his identity but made the woman promise not to breathe a word of it to anyone. They met frequently, however, and one evening were surprised by the Colonel. He made a sneering remark and Cecil knocked him down. For this serious offense Cecil was tried by courtmartial, and sentenced to death.

Cigarette, who by this time had realized that her hero was not for her, decided to save him. By a wonderful ride she reached the headquarters of the Marshal, sent in her Legion of Honor ensign as a credential, and by her argument, won a pardon for the brave soldier. Then she started back again in her race against death. On the way she encountered a sand storn, but fought her way through it. Her horse was exhausted, so she made her way to a camp of Arabs, knowing that they sought her life. She told them she would consent to be their prisoner, on condition that they speedily forwarded the pardon in time to save a brave soldier unjustly condemned.

The Arabs, won by her heroism, set her at liberty, gave her a fresh horse, and she reached the camp just as the firing squad raised their muskets. Rushing in front of the prisoner, she waved the pardon in the air, and received in her own body the bullets that were fired at Cecil. She lived long enough to tell him that she knew he would be happv with the English girl, and died. Cecil, his honor restored by the tardy confession of his weak brother, returned to England to claim the fortune and title that was his, his father having died. And although his married life was happy, he often thought of the girl who gave up her life for him.

Lewiston, Idaho.—William Burford will conduct an open-air moving picture show on Main street during the summer months.

WILLIAM LORD WRIGHT

Miss MacDonald says:

William Lord Wright's page is the Sunshine Alley of our magazine. When we want to lure forth a smile we turn to read some of the cheery lines penned by this clever young scribe. If we feel that someone has let us go by the board on a word of cheer we turn the pages disconsolately over until the name of William Lord Wright beams at us from the top of the column.

The power to make people laugh is more valuable than untold riches.

One of the most appreciated members of the staff of the Moving Picture News is William Lord Wright. Mr. Wright is a young man of great promise, an inveterate worker, full of enthusiasm in his work, and is possessed of all the attributes of personality and mental vigor which make for success. In his writings may be noticed a dash of humor, a sparkle of wit, and a good foundation of common sense theories, making in all a combination that can't be beat.

WILLIAM LORD WRIGHT

W. M. Petingale says:

Mr. Wright has made many friends for the News through his able articles, and his advice and assistance given to scenario writers in the department conducted each week for them are eagerly sought for.

Mr. Wright is a journalist, hails from Bellefontaine, Ohio, and has filled all the "jobs" on a newspaper with success, and is abundantly qualified to conduct the departments assigned to him in the News, and many a one who has worried over plots and plays have found solace in his sayings.

Mr. Wright recently stole a march on Mr. Saunders and "wrote him up" in a very clever article which appeared in a recent issue of the News, so the rest of the "staff" thought it just and proper to get together and say what we could for Mr. Wright. Look at his picture, it speaks for itself.

Alfred H. Saunders says:

We always appreciate a good thing when we see it, and William Lord Wright is a man for whom we have a great amount of respect. We have had occasionally to trim off a "little caustic" with the blue pencil. His sarcasm might have hurt some of those whom we thought were our friends; recent events prove Wright was right. It sometimes needs a pretty severe shock to awaken one as to the true situation of affairs, and we sometimes have to go away from home to learn our lesson. William Lord Wright has from now on "Carte Blanche" to write as he knows and we promise not to blue pencil the truth.

Are you satisfied now W. L. W.?

ROBERT GRAU'S VOLUME OFF THE PRESS

"The Stage in the Twentieth Century" is the title of the Third Volume of Robert Grau's works, which will be issued early next week to the thousands of subscribers.

Mr. Grau discovered that the silent drama was a subject that could not be ignored in treating of theatrical progress and the result is shown in over 200 pages of the 400 comprising the work as a whole. There are over 300 illustrations, some of which are rare and valuable.

Robert Grau has done his share to aid in the uplift of the motion picture and his new volume is eagerly awaited in the film industry.

LUBIN BASEBALL TEAM

A game of baseball was played last Saturday between the Pathé Frères team and the Lubin team at the Philadelphia Ball Park, the Pathés winning by 3 to 1. A return game will be given shortly at Jersey City. The Lubin boys, however, will be pleased to meet any moving picture manufacturing team in Philadelphia or at their home town. Negotiations to be addressed to Bennie from Lubinville, Lubin Manufacturing Co., Philadelphia.

GOSSIP

We hear that J. E. Brulator, of the Eclair Co., vice-president of the Universal Film Co., has resigned from the latter position and has severed all connection with the Universal and has sailed to Europe. Also that Eclair has withdrawn from the Universal.

We hear that Florence Lawrence (Mrs. Solter) and her husband are being approached to return to Lubin.

We hear that S. E. V. Taylor and his wife (Marion Leonard) are sizing up kinemacolor.

We hear Powers picture plays will be known in future as Victor films.

We hear that Tom Cochrane made his exit from kinemacolor and picturedom.

N. J. M. P. EXHIBITORS' ASSOCIATION

Greenwood A. Robinson, of West Hoboken, was elected president of the New Jersey Moving Picture Exhibitors Association June 20, at the organization meeting held in Heflich's Hall, West Hoboken. The newly formed association affiliated with the National League, and elected a complete set of officers.

W. F. Daly, of Paterson, was elected first vice-president; Frank T. Daley, of Hoboken, second vice-president; P. M. Kirchner, of Union Hill, secretary; C. Fred Ruhimanns, of Trenton, treasurer; L. Blumenthal, delegate to the national convention to be held at Chicago.

Addresses were made by President Neff, of the National Exhibitors' League, and Mr. Trigge, of the New York Exhibitors' League.

WASHINGTON NOTES

Among the recent visitors to Washington were C. Lang Cobb, Jr., of the Reliance; A. K. Greenland and M. A. Neff, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. The latter had with him his hobby for exhibitors' association, and did effective work while in our city. You just can't ignore Mr. Neff's enthusiasm for unity and strength among the picture men. Both Mr. Greenland and Mr. Cobb enjoyed themselves among the theatres, the exchange and exhibitors, appearing quite pleased with the condition in the Capital City, with the exception of the absence of an exhibitors' association. This, however, has been supplied now.

Manager Lucus, of the Mutual Film Corporation, is devoting his time at present to visiting exhibitors and theatres in the nearby states, with the idea of unifying matters and simplifying distribution. He is now in and around Philadelphia. During his absence, William Mack is ably handling the helm in Washington. The office here reports "very busy."

"The Pendelton Round-Up," that most natural series of reels taken by Mr. Harback, has closed a most successful run at the Majestic for a week. The fact that these pictures were not posed for the camera, but merely the daring feats of cowboys in their own "play for championships," greatly enhanced the value of this film. Tom Moore, who holds the states rights for "The Pendleton Round-Up," considers this one of the most wonderful sets of views of Mr. Harback's realistic collection.

The following extract from a letter just received from Paris will be of interest to the patrons, manufacturers and exhibitors of motion pictures in America: "The moving pictures here are not to be compared to those in Washington. The price is one franc (20 cents) for a show lasting the entire evening. Three Indian pictures (two comic ones and one drama) and the Pathé Journal comprised the exhibition I recently attended. There were three intermissions of about ten minutes each—to lengthen the show, I suppose. I could have seen in less time in Washington the same amount of films for ten cents. All desirable shows are one franc here, but when I get to Nice, in the south of France, I will find an excellent exhibition for ten cents for the entire evening with a well-balanced program. Considering that the grand opera may be heard in Paris in some places for two francs, the price of the moving picture shows seems particularly high." W. H.

THE POTENCY OF POWER'S 6A

The following letter, quoted in part, speaks for itself.

We received the two No. 6A machines from you last Saturday, and after a thorough test we must congratulate you on being the manufacturer of the best moving picture machine in the world. The machine is simply a wonder and looks as if it is built for hard work. The lamp house is a great improvement, especially the arc, which is very handy to operate.

We have had several exhibitors visit our operating room, and they all expressed great satisfaction and admiration, and we do not hesitate to say that within a few weeks you will have several orders from Washington through our influence.

Very truly yours,
MILLER BROS.,

ONE DAY'S WORK

BY VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Power's Release)

The first bright days of spring had come. The crows and blackbirds flew back and forth across a half-plowed field in excited anticipation of the seeds soon to be dropped in the soft earth. There was much calling of questions as to the disgraceful delay.

A strange man came down the lane past the field leading the old white horse. The crows flew from the fence and back across the field with a loud cawing. What in the world did such proceedings mean? That was not the way it was done at all. Things would never go along right if they were not attended to in their proper order.

There was the little girl going into the house. Perhaps she would start things going.

"Grandpa, where did the man take old Joe?" asked the child anxiously, as she ran to the old man's side.

The grandfather sat with bowed head and did not answer.

"Grandpa, why did you let the man take him to-day? We must finish the field and drop the corn before another rain, you know."

The old man put out his hand and drew her to him.

"That's what you said yesterday, Grandpa," insisted the child.

"My pet, we cannot finish the field until some of our neighbors are through plowing and will lend us a horse."

"But it will rain and then we won't get the corn planted."

"Yes."

"And our corn will be late and we won't have any to sell and then we will be very poor next winter. Didn't you say our corn paid for our food and clothes?"

"Yes, child."

"Then why did you let old Joe go to-day, Grandpa?"

"Dear little girlie, I'll tell you the truth. I had not finished paying for Joe. I could have finished after the next crop but they wouldn't wait."

The child stood for a moment looking at her grandfather with wide, wondering eyes, then the tears slowly gathered and she turned away.

"Where are you going?" called the old man as she left the room.

"Nowhere. Just out to think," replied the child.

The old man smiled sadly. To think. She was too young to think of anything but play, and yet she had the problems of a woman on her mind.

The child's mother had died at her birth and two years later the father followed her, leaving the little girl of two years to Grandfather Stevens.

The old man was not very prosperous, but he managed to make enough for himself and little granddaughter by his one field.

The section of the country in which Mr. Stevens lived was famous for its corn. He owned one large field and by working a little harder and being a little more careful in every way than his neighbors, he managed to have the first corn. And this brought enough to carry him and the little girl through the winter. But it was necessary to take advantage of all the opportunities that nature offered.

So when the old man found himself suddenly without a horse and his field half plowed, he realized what it meant.

The little girl realized, too, and she was wrinkling her tiny brows as she trudged along a path towards the woods.

Into a little glade beside a stream, surrounded on three sides by trees and bushes, the child was accustomed to take all her problems. It was to this spot she was going now to find a solution to the new difficulty.

As she parted the bushes and was about to step into the clear space, she heard voices. The child stopped instinctively and was on the alert.

"Look," said a man's voice.

"Ain't she a pretty little girl," said another.

"Come here, little girl," said a third.

The child did not speak but indignation shone through her tears.

"Come on, kid, we ain't goin' to hurt ye," said the first man kindly.

The child moved away from the bushes and stood frowning. "You've got my place," she said.

"This? This here your place? Why, bless you, there's room for us all, ain't there? Come, sit down."

"I can't."

"Why can't you?"

"My Grandpa says I can't."

"Yer Grandpa ain't got the pleasure of our acquaintance, kid."

The little girl thought a moment to fully grasp the meaning of the man's words. Then she said. "You're tramps, and my Grandpa says I must just give tramps something to eat and let them go. I mustn't talk to them, he says."

The three men laughed. "Well, he means bad tramps," said one, "and we're good tramps. Don't ye think we look good? Say now."

The little girl looked doubtful. "I—I don't know."

"Well, is yer Grandpa good to ye? Ye been cryin'. Does he ever whip ye?"

"My Grandpa?" cried the child. "My Grandpa whip me? No, he don't. My Grandpa loves me and I love him and keep house for him."

The men were silent for a while, then one said, "What's yer name?"

"Helen Stevens. What's yours?"

"Bill—just Bill. And this here fellow's named 'Rummy,' and this'n 'Hunch.' Gentlemen, bow to the lady."

The two tramps doubled over where they sat until their heads nearly touched their feet.

"My Grandpa always stands up when he bows to the ladies," said the child quite solemnly.

"Well, my gosh, ain't she perticular," said Bill.

The three tramps sat looking at the child, and she stood looking at them with big, sad eyes.

"I wish't ye'd look happier, kid," said "Rummy." "Come, play horse, if me old bones'll stand it."

The man rolled over and then raised himself onto his hand and knees. "Whoa, now, Whoa! Come, get on him, kiddie, he won't kick."

The little girl clasped her hands to her breast and exclaimed very seriously, "Oh, I wish you were a horse," and then without any warning the tears commenced to run down her cheeks.

"Gosh, what's the trouble? Do youse want a horse as bad as that?" asked "Rummy," as he crawled over and sat down at the child's feet.

"I want old Joe," she sobbed.

"Where is he?"

"A man took him away and my Grandpa's field is only half plowed and he can't plant his corn and—and—and we will be so poor." She ended with a flood of tears, and the rough tramp gathered her to his ragged breast and tried to comfort her.

"If—if you were a horse," she continued, "we could just hitch you to the plow."

"Yes, it makes me tired to think about it," said Rummy.

Bill and "Hunch" began to laugh.

"I'd like to see old 'Rum' hitched to a plow, I would," laughed Bill. Then he stopped suddenly. "Say, 'Rummy,' have ye saw a ghost?" he asked.

"No, boys," answered "Rummy" sadly, "I ain't saw a ghost but I seen a vision. It's a vision of three tramp fellers doin' hard work. Oh, Lord, it's hard."

"Ahe the three us, 'Rummy'?" asked "Hunch" in a whisper.

"Yep. Come on, let's look at the field. Helen's got to get her field plowed somehow."

"But, Rummy,' we ain't used to no such work," complained Bill.

"It'll kill us," whimpered "Hunch."

"We got it to do," replied "Rummy" with a groan.

The child led the way and the three men followed wearily after her.

"It's a big field, little girl," said "Rummy," leaning dejectedly over the fence.

"Yes," replied Helen, "and that's why my Grandpa needs it plowed right away. And my Grandpa is old, too. Oh. I wish I were a big man!" The tears began to run slowly down the child's face.

"Come on, boys, it's got to be done!" groaned "Rummy." "If we got to die, we might as well start in. Fasten the plow to me an' 'Hunch,' Bill. You drive first."

"Oh, Gawd, 'Rum,' you'll kill me," whined "Hunch," but he slowly took his place beside Rummy.

Bill gathered the reins and they started.

Back and forth they went, the child running along in high glee, trying to keep up with them.

From time to time they changed places and stopped for breath and to wipe the dirty water from their faces.

At last the final row was reached and the three men dropped to the ground.

"Why, old Joe didn't fall down when he finished," exclaimed the child.

The three tramps rolled their eyes at her but no one spoke.

"I'll go get some supper now and you can come eat it," said Helen, turning toward the house.

A glimmer of interest shone in the three pairs of half-closed eyes.

The child found her grandfather absent, but she set to work like a little woman and prepared supper for the hungry men. Bacon and eggs and coffee, and bread and butter and preserves greeted the tramps when they dragged themselves to the house.

They ate until the poor child's eyes were almost ready to jump out of her head with astonishment, but she remembered the plowed field and brought out all she had.

At last the men bade Helen good-bye, and with stomachs as comfortable as their legs were uncomfortable, the took up their way along the dusty road.

An hour later Grandfather Stevens came wearily up the lane. He lifted his bowed head to gaze sadly across his one field.

He looked and blinked his eyes, and looked again. Then he took off his glasses and after wiping them carefully, put them on again. Yes, it looked just the same. What in the world did it mean?

Helen came running down the lane to meet him.

"Helen," cried the old man, "my eyes are playing me tricks. That field looks as though it had all been plowed."

"Oh, it has, Grandpa, it has," and the child threw herself into his arms, sobbing for joy.

When the story had been told the old man carried his little granddaughter into the house, murmuring, "My little girl, grandpa's little treasure."

And that night there was not a happier old man nor a happier little girl in all the world.

As the sun sank behind the hill, throwing a glow over the freshly plowed earth, the crows and blackbirds flew back and forth across the field with much calling and much discussing of the queer things that had been going on there that afternoon.

AVIATION FILM CO. OBTAIN EXCELLENT FILMS OF PANAMA CANAL CUT

An interesting interview was obtained with Mr. Louis A. J. Geleng, the camera expert who was dispatched some little time ago to the Canal Zone in the interests of the Aviation Film Company, of 334 Fifth avenue, New York, to take pictures of the scene of one of the largest and most pretentious developments of modern times.

Mr. Geleng was accompanied by Clarence de Giers, an aviator with whom he was to fly over the Canal cut from beginning to end. The winds in Panama are, however, so treacherous that it was necessary to abandon this plan after the first ascent, when the motor, in a fit of obstinacy, refused to work.

After the abandonment of the aviation plan, bird's-eye views were taken from an electric tower 195 feet high, and which Mr. Geleng describes as being so shaky as to make the ordeal of picture taking from its top most trying. However, excellent films are the result of the careful efforts of this clever young camera man.

Many views of exceeding excellence and interest were photographed between Panama and Colon, and from Gatun to Gatun Lake. Pictures were taken of the main cut of the Canal, which is about 900 feet deep, extending a distance of ten miles, by crawling to the bottom of the cut over the most ragged places and most difficult of traverse. These pictures are of special interest. In this cut have been employed from 30,000 to 40,000 men, who are now being laid off at the rate of 2,000 and 3,000 a week, as the Canal nears completion.

A splendid view of the City of Panama was obtained as it lies against the Paific Ocean, backed by a long hill of about 875 feet in height. Very beautiful scenes were photographed around Cristobal, one of the beauty spots of Panama. Here the fire department made a special run for the benefit of the camera men. Pictures were also taken of street scenes in Colon with the trains running down the main street of the town. Also the new Masonic Temple here figures in the films, which was built at a cost of $500,000. Other important buildings were photographed, also boats leaving for New York; registering for election; pictures of rioters; annual parade of the Virgin Mary; aviator in machine; the Panama lottery on a Sunday morning at ten o'clock when a $30,000 prize was being offered. In all, 2,000 feet of negatives were brought back to New York by Mr. Geleng.

Mr. Geleng attributes a great deal of the success and enjoyment of his trip to Panama to the efforts of Captain Jack Crawford, well known as the "Poet Scout" who obtained entrée to many places which would otherwise have been closed to Mr. Geleng.

Reading, Pa.—Chas. H. Schlegel, Mt. Penn, was awarded the contract for a moving picture theatre at Cotten, near Seventeenth street, by Frank A. Gould.

Suffolk, Va.—The new Lyric Theatre has opened.

Waterbury, Conn.—Plans are being figured for a new moving picture theatre to be erected at the corner of North Main and North streets for B. E. Hausdorf.

York Beach, Maine.—The Arcade Theatre has opened for the season.

Baltimore, Md.—West Baltimore is to have another moving picture show.

PATHE BASEBALL TEAM DEFEAT LUBINS IN CLOSELY CONTESTED GAME

Giants of the Moving Picture Studios Contend for Baseball Supremacy

The Pathé team, easily the champions of all the moving picture baseball teams, greatly surprised the Lubin players last Saturday at the National League Park, Philadelphia, Pa. The game was attended by a thousand or more enthusiastic friends and employees of the Lubin firm, and a good number of the Pathé Company, who, through the courtesy and generosity of Mr. Berst, went all the way to Philadelphia to witness the game.

The excitement was intense. In fair sportsmanship and the enthusiasm it reminded one of the good old college games. Harry Sanger pitched a faultless game for the Pathé, holding the Lubin team down to one run which came in on the catcher's error. There was no end of sensational features, including a triple play neatly executed by the Pathé, when the Lubin team had three men on base and no outs. The batter fanned, on the third strike the catcher shot the ball to third base, nailing his man, the third baseman quickly threw the ball to second. The runner caught between second and third, in a quick exchange, was put out, sliding to third.

The routing for Pathé was lead by Mr. and Mrs. Handworth, and James Slevin, of the Pathé, with loud megaphones that stood off the Lubin's superior numbers.

After the game when the boys gathered around Mr. Gasnier, the general stage manager, and he realized that they had won the game, he smiled. Mr. Gasnier is a very stern and severe man, rather inclined to melancholy, but he really smiled on this occasion. It is of record that this is the first time he has ever been known to smile since he arrived in America.

ADVENTURES OF SOLAX DIRECTORS PREPARING THE EQUINE SPY—TWO-REEL FEATURE

An octogenerian bachelor stood up and cast a verbal screen around his fine old Colonial mansion. He was ready to defend it with his life against the inquisitive and truth-telling camera. But the Solax board of strategy, consisting of Edward Warren, Harry Harvey and Fannie Simpson, put the wheels of its machinery in motion and converted the bachelor.

The success of a historical production depends on the authenticity of the settings, scenes and costumes. Now, while the public may be crazy about historical romances, directors get crazy producing them. In this decade of marble, brick, cement and mortar, it is rather a difficult matter to find a house that looks like the dwellings of our forefathers. A director is obliged to travel miles looking for appropriate "locations." In the course of his journeys he meets many interesting characters.

The octogenerian bachelor whom Mr. Warren met in the wooded environments of Baltimore during the taking of "The Equine Spy," is indeed a "personality." He lives alone in a spacious Colonial mansion and rarely leaves it. He spends all of his time on his farm and has no use for the world in general and actresses in particular. He is well educated and, when a young man, had an "affair" with a New York actress. She jilted him and married his friend, and ever since he had been a recluse and a hermit without faith in mankind.

The house which this recluse inhabits is about one hundred and fifty years old. His grandfather and father lived there before him. During the Revolution it was attacked by Lord Howe's regiments and withstood the attack until aid came from General Lee. This house Mr. Warren badly wanted for his big two-reel feature, "The Equine Spy," and got it with a little diplomacy.

Harry Harvey got the "location" and apparently had it all settled for the company to come down on a certain Tuesday. Mr. Warren, however, had other plans and instead of coming down on a Tuesday, came down on a Friday. The company got ready to take the picture, relying on the bachelor's promise. But—— he came out of his house as angry as a bull. He raged to the limit of five minutes and refused to let Mr. Warren have the rise of his house because, as he expressed it, "You fellows have broken your promise to me. You said you would come Tuesday and you didn't come. On Tuesday I was ready and expected you. I will have no dealings with a man who breaks his promise to me." He stormed some more at Harvey.

It was a fine pickle. Here we were. Came all the way from New York down to a small farm in Maryland with a camera man and a number of actors, and we couldn't do a thing. Things looked blue. Then Harvey cutely spoke and said, "You see, sir, I have nothing to do with this picture. Mr. Warren is the boss."

"Yes," said Mr. Warren, in his characteristic liquid tones, "I knew nothing of Mr. Harvey's arrangements with you. I am sorry we have inconvenienced you. We are not the kind of men to break promises."

Warren and the bachelor talked until Warren began to tell of his ancestors who fought in the Revolution—the big fibber—and how his grandfather was wounded in the charge on Trenton, and so forth. That settled it. After that, Warren could have had the old man's toothbrush. He took the director all over the house, showed him Colonial cupboards, furniture and bedsteads. Oh, yes, we forgot to mention that Fannie Simpson and the old gent got chummy, and Fanny was there with the blarney, and so was the old man. Warren is eligible for membership in the Ananias Club.

SOME SPECIALS THAT THE SPECIAL FEATURE FILM CO., INC., HAS TAKEN

Mr. Beck has taken the interior of the New York Sun office, showing the editor, which will be exhibited for the employees at a banquet to be given by the New York Sun at the Hotel Brevoort, and a set of films will be made a present to the editor.

The picture that was taken has about 4 copoquets, and is one of the prettiest educational pictures that has been ever attempted. He has also taken a special film for advertising a machine to put caps on bottles at the rate of 100 per minute.

This is a scientific line that the Special Event Film Mfg. Co., Inc., are working, and have some very big contracts on hand in regards to educational work.

MATES AND MISMATES

(Powers Release)

Mabel Wentworth and Jack Allison are sweethearts and the world looks bright to the happy pair. They had never dreamed that their plans would meet with opposition, and when the mother of Jack informed him she had other plans for his matrimonial future, he experienced a rude awakening. His aristocratic parent married him to a gay leader of society and they lived beyond their means and he was bankrupted.

The father of Mabel forced her to mate with a wealthy young man of prominence in the business world and a lion in his social set, and thus the strangely assorted couples found themselves mismated and the inevitable happened. Mable, in her simplicity, was not intended as the mistress of such an establishment and she suffered by comparison with other women who came to her home. Her husband soon tired of the woman of whom he was ashamed, and found enjoyment in the society of other women. In the meantime Jack, unable to satisfy the demands of his wife in a financial way, was neglected and his wife plunged into society and there met the inevitable man. There could be but one result—Jack and Mabel were both shamed. The fickle man was accompanied in his flight by another woman and the wife of Jack deserted him for a man.

One couple was drowned while enjoying a boat ride and the other quarreled on a high eminence and both fell to the ground below to their deaths.

Mabel returned home and related her marital woes to her father, and Jack, his little fortune having vanished, became a wanderer on the fact of the earth. Fate intervened in a strange manner. Mabel repaired to a pond to end it all in a watery grace and Jack came to the lonely spot for the same purpose. He plunged in and was saved by Mabel. Nothing stood in the way of their being reunited and the lover, who had hungered so long for the sweetheart of his youth, took her in his arms and they were happy.

THE GLORIOUS FOURTH IN FILMLAND

By William Lord Wright

Raw fer th' Fourth of July!
Raw fer Taft *******???????

Also three raws, a sis boom and a ray fer the patriotic films!

What is more appropriate right now than a dissertation on patriotic films and the good work such productions have achieved in the love-of-country cause?

We sat in a picture show the other evening and enjoyed Kalem's "War's Havoc." Kalem boasts of a director that just dotes on those massive, spectacular, sis boom ah, Old-Glory kind of pictures—the kind that causes your pulse to beat overtime, and makes you want to sit right up straight and give three loud and vociferous cheers. And that is just what some members of the "War's Havoc" audience did the other evening. When the stars and stripes and the stars and bars were shown, there was a whoop and a hurrah and nobody cared if the Yanks were a-gittin' theirs. Lord! Wasn't it all in th' family?

We cannot get enough of these good old melodramatic war pictures of the halycon days of '61-'65. They relieve the monotony, foster love of country, and prove to Americans what has been done, and what can be accomplished in the future, if necessary.

Through the medium of historical drama many an urchin has been taught an abiding pride of race and of tradition that could not have been impressed upon the youthful mind in any other manner.

Give us more and more of the Washington-Crossing-the-Delaware, Stonewall-Jackson-Gettysburg, Admiral-Dewey-kind of pictures. Thanhouser, Champion, Edison, Imp, Selig and other manufacturers have been very kind to the small boy, and to his elder, too, with the patriotic film. However, like Oliver Twist, we are asking for more.

And make 'em true to history, please.

Do you know that the civilized world is indebted to the moving picture theatre on July 4th of all days? The fact is acknowledged. Ten years ago, the Fourth of July in the United States was a day of misgiving and dread. The significance of Independence Day was lost in the rivalry among boys and men to risk life and limb by medium of dangerous explosives and carelessness. With the increasing popularity of the moving picture, a radical change became noticeable. The columns of details of terrible accidents appearing in the newspapers the day following the Glorious Fourth became shortened; the death list dwindled; to-day safe and sane Fourths are in order, principally because of cinematography. It is estimated by a statistician that a half million boys and men now attend the moving picture theatres in the afternoon and evening of the national holiday. There they can satisfy their patriotic cravings with the blood-stirring, patriotic moving picture plays appropriate to the day. Before the theatre became popularized, these self-same men and boys were on the streets tampering with toy cannons and cans of powder not only dangerous to themselves but to others.

Score another point in favor of the moving picture!

THEN IT HAPPENED

I

A writer wrote a picture play
About the "Dogs of War," Cannon flashes, soldier dashes
Centered with the star.
To make the color local,
He engaged a country yokel.

II

The writer of the picture play
Was heated with his work.
"Can of powder makes it louder";
He wasn't one to shirk!
He told the sturdy farmer
How to make the picture warmer.

III

The writer with the picture dope,
The farmer and his wheat,
Started forth, upon the Fourth,
The pair was hard to beat!
Writer had a pipe to light—
Forgot about his dynamite!

EDITORIAL TRIALS

"Now what th——! Here's a 'dopster' with a July Fourth yarn that calls for two battleships, three cases of dynamite, and our leadin' heavy gets fired from the mouth of a cannon. He'll get fired, all right, but there won't be any cannon around!"

"Say, look here, old sport," exclaims a director, rushing in with a script, "how on earth am I goin' to have th' hero die with an American flag wrapped around him when Jones has got our flag up in Maine!"

"Ain't got no flag; well, ain't that fierce!"

"Mr. Johnson—Mr. Johnson. I've come in here to tell you that if I can't get a part once in a while as befits the leading lady of this concern, I'll forfeit my contract, that's all."

"Good—whatsthematternow; can't you see I've got all I can tend to without you buttin' in?"

"Matter enough, sir—and don't you address me in that tone of voice, or I shall inform my husband, sir! Here I am cast for the slender-formed beauty in "The Milkmaid's Dream," and you know I weigh one hundred and eighty."

"Well, madam, all I've got to say is for you to practice with the dumbbells, see."

"Now, old sport, th' only thing I can use for a flag is that red table cloth we had for 'The Hired Girl's Vengeance' and if the boss kicks on the picture I'll tell him you've been furnishing scripts beyond our facilities."

Director follows leading lady out of editorial sanctum sanctorum, and editor turns again to his desk murmuring absently:

"Ain't got no flag; well, ain't that fierce!"

FORGET IT!

They had a fight in dear old Chi, and one in Baltimore. Both sides chose a battle cry, and everyone is sore. To Taft and Teddy, Bill and Champ, we gently say, "Go slow"; leave aches and pains and wild refrains; attend the picture show.

They had a fight at Lexington, and one at Bunker Hill. With shot and shell and general, well, it gave both sides a chill. But Britisher and Yankee bold have forgotten it, you know. To-day they're traveling arm in arm towards the picture show!

WESTERN CORRESPONDENCE

Hot Springs, Ark., June 19.—Well, summer vaudeville did not pan out as well as was expected at the Airdrome, so exit the variety! One reason why this kind of entertainment did not materialize the profit that was expected was because there was not enough newspaper advertising done. There were posters and bills galore, but the good old press "dope," the reading notices that go with display "ads," was missing, and this is some eager public where the newspapers are concerned.

"The Bell Boy" opens a two weeks' engagement at the Airdrome this week, and this attraction makes the longest jump of any show that ever came into the city, so far as ye oldest resident knows. They are coming here in their special car, after a ride direct from Norfolk, Va., and I opine that is "some" jump. They are also bringing with them a sixty-foot car, but they won't be able to use any of their scenery, for the stage at the Airdrome isn't big enough for scenic effects such as that company has with them.

The picture houses are doing a good business in spite of the hot weather, and if ever there was a town that takes pride in keeping the theatres cool and comfortable it is Hot Springs, Ark. The moment one steps inside the door a gust of wind greets you and there are fans buzzing at you from many angles.

Biograph sent us one picture, "A Fiend at Bay," that was by far the best reel with automobile features that has been seen here in weeks. It was also the first time that I knew Little Mary could drive a car, but it remained for the "hurdle jumper" to get a rise out of the audience. I was in the New Central Theatre when this reel was being shown, and the men actually got on their feet when the auto with the guards riding on it came down the hill and made that sensational leap. They cheered as if the thing was real. It was a great feature and easily surpassed anything that the trust people sent here the past week.

Th Independent output gets the blue ribbon and if Bison will step forward we'll fittingly decorate them for "The Crisis," which came to Hot Springs and packed the Photo Play from the time the doors opened in the afternoon until they closed at night. It was a great production, Bison, and, like the others, you have contributed greatly to that phase of history that deserves preservation through the medium of motion photography.

Notes of the Week

Judging from the following quotation, moving picture audiences are on the road to self-assertiveness. And where vaudeville is concerned, it is high time that some of the managers were given an emphatic lesson on the more refined and moral sensibilities of their audiences. This quotation is from the St. Louis, Mo., Star:

"Unable to bear the taunts of scores of women and children who demanded that the 'entertainers' be removed from the stage; that the hook be used, and that a generous supply of certain vegetables and fruits would be forthcoming providing they did not make a hasty exit, two 'German comedians' hurried behind the footlights at an airdrome theatre at Eighteenth street and Franklin avenue, which displayed large signs stating that it was 'amateur night,' when they found that the audience refused to let them proceed with their 'comedy' any further. It is evident that many in the audience had been unfortunate enough to have suffered during previous stage spasms by the 'jokers,' as hardly had the latter set foot on the stage when a general roar of protest, including general hissing, cat-calls, etc., were hurled across the footlights as a fitting reception.

"Following their hasty departure, an attache of the theatre appeared on the stage and asked the audience not to be so severe in its criticism, as the performers were only amateurs. Hisses greeted his appeal, and he hurried behind the scenes to make way for a little 'miss' in short dresses, who was announced to sing.

"The child wore her dresses barely below her knees and appeared to be not more than fourteen years old, despite the fact that police regulations forbid children under sixteen years to appear at theatres in St. Louis.

"Many slurring remarks by a crowd of rowdies in the theatre were directed at the child, who in an effort to win one of several small prizes of money, contended with this display of rowdyism."

Dr. H. C. Eyman, superintendent of the Massillon State Hospital, who recently read a paper before the American Medico-Psychological Association, says that the moving pictures were used to great advantage at the meetings, in exhibiting various types of insanity. All types from the raving maniac to the bedridden were shown.

"Such films will be valuable to physicians who are so situated as to be unable to study the types of insanity," said Dr. Eyman. "Once they had seen them they would be the better able to make an accurate diagnosis, at least so far as outward indications and movements are concerned. The productions of such films means that very helpful clinics may be held in the remote corners of the land where little opportunity for wide observation is afforded."

According to the Indianapolis, Mo., News, the "movies" has made its debut in a new phase: "A new factor has made its appearance in politics and, hereafter, the wily politician who wishes to run for office must see to something else in addition to his 'organization,' the 'machine,' his 'support' and whatnot. He has now to reckon with the 'movies.' The prime question in the future will be: Are the 'movies' with you? And woe be to the man, it seems, who aspires to office and reckons without his 'movies.'"

The following from the Los Angeles Times is too good to keep:

Caution

Motion pictures at Ontario are to be closely censored. This is as it should be. Motion pictures should be made to behave. These shadow people have no business cutting high jinks on the alluring canvas and setting all the rest of us a bad example. A motion picture with bad manners should not be allowed to go out in public. We are glad to say that the morals of these pictures are so excellent that they sometimes attend church on Sunday night. Of course we do not pretend to know what kind of practitioner should be called in case a motion picture caught cold while sitting in a damp church.

Moving pictures are used by a French scientist in the study of the deformation of metals when strongly compressed by the hydraulic press. In some cases he uses a brass tube of three inches diameter and .04 inches thickness of metal and observes the appearance of the surface when the tube is flattened out by pressure. Sometimes the tubes are filled with a liquid and then compressed. Various figures appear on the surface of the metal, and moving picture views are taken at the rate of 15 a second. By throwing the views on a screen it is easier to study the effects than by direct observation.

Says the Los Angeles Examiner: The modern sanitarians and physicians interested in the welfare of the public health, are making use of up-to-date methods in the education of the public in matters related to hygiene and the preservation of health. It is well recognized that all education is better begun in early life. This is especially true of early education along the lines of general hygiene and preventive medicine, since most diseases and a great majority of deaths occur in early life. It was considerations of this sort that led the Los Angeles County Medical Association and the Los Angeles Society for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis to enter into a joint arrangement for the presentation of motion pictures dealing with health subjects.

The Los Angeles Society for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis has distributed through the schools 100,000 souvenir programs containing short descriptions of the motion pictures dealing with health subjects, and also a most complete resume of the modern methods used in the prevention and cure of tuberculosis. Besides being presented in the schools, these health pictures will be shown in a number of the moving picture theatres. Since only a small proportion of the schools are suitably arranged for the exhibition of the motion pictures, the Los Angeles Society for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis has arranged to show these pictures at the Temple Auditorium, Fifth and Olive streets, Saturday morning and afternoon, June 15. To this exhibition no admission fee will be charged ,and invitations are extended by the society to the pupils, their parents and friends.

An ingenious if cumbersome invention has been offered to the Paris police authorities for the detection of crime committed in the streets. The proposal is to install in the clock towers in the various streets a cinematograph apparatus directed by wireless. The apparatus would record all the movements in the street, at the same time fixing the hour and minute.

According to the New York Herald: More than five thousand persons were in Mount Morris Park, Harlem, last night when the Committee on the Prevention of Tuberculosis gave the first of a series of open air moving picture shows to be presented in the parks of the city during the summer. A canvas was stretched between two tall trees, eighty feet apart, and the band stand was utilized by the operators. One hundred and fifty "health" pictures were thrown on the screen, showing the benefits gained from ventilation, cleanliness and light.

Frank H. Mann, secretary of the committee, said: "The committee recognizes the popularity and general educational value of moving pictures, and we believe we can impress younger persons in this way."

EXHIBITORS' NOTES

Says the Shenandoah, Pa., News: "Every moving picture theatre proprietor in Blair County has received a letter from District-Attorney Marion D. Patterson asking him to refrain from showing films depicting murders, robberies or crime of any sort because of the effect they have on the minds of boys. He suggested comedy, travel and educational pictures. His request will be generally heeded.

At last Montclair, N. J., is to have a motion picture theatre. By a vote of seven to four the Town Council has committed in favor of motion pictures.

The sale of the Lubin Theatre (Richmond, Va.) lease by Dr. S. Galeski to W. T. Martin, of the Martin Amusement Company, and the reported transfer of the Victoria Theatre, Norfolk, to the Wells interests, are new developments in the theatrical situation. Mr. Martin's purchase is an individual venture. The Martin Amusement Company is not financially interested. It is understood that the price paid is $12,500.

Dr. Galeski recently vacated the Imperial Theatre, Washington, D. C., which had been leased to him at $16,200 a year, but is still conducting the Casino in that city. His general manager is William T. Kirby, who managed the Bijou Theatre, Richmond, last summer.

The Victoria Theatre, Norfolk, was built by a company headed by Dr. Galeski. It was opened only a few months ago.

The reform movement directed against Indianapolis motion picture theatres received a severe setback not long ago when, at a joint meeting of a committee composed of representatives of several charity organizations and the Indianapolis Moving Picture Managers' Association at the Y. M. C. A. building, the committee failed to show the owners of the theatres that reforms are necessary.

The only tangible request that members of the committee made of the moving picture men was that they employ a censor to criticise all films exhibited in Indianapolis. Owners of the theatres then asked members of the committee for specific reasons why such a censor should be employed, and when this information was not forthcoming, they said that they did not believe it necessary to appoint a "guardian" to care for their business.

Speakers were interrupted frequently, and disorder permeated the entire meeting. Dan Brown, attorney for the moving picture men, spoke in their behalf, declaring that the agitation against moving picture theatres is unwarranted.

"What do you say?" Mr. Brown asked, "when Gertrude Hoffmann appears in a local theatre wearing nothing but a smile? What do you say when in other cheap theatres fourteen men are killed in the first act?

"You will praise the presentation of 'Ten Nights in a Barroom,' but when a drunken scene is portrayed on a screen, the so-called good people hold up their hands in horror, and declare motion picture theatres must be reformed. We are willing to obey all the laws governing moving picture theatres, but we do not intend to be persecuted.

Mr. Isador Schwartz, who has been manager of the Jefferson Theatre, Roanoke, Va., for the past two seasons, has forsaken his theatrical interests and is permanently located with the motion picture firm of Lubin, Inc., of Philadelphia.

From Daily Consular Report: The proprietor of a new theatre in a foreign country (a modern vaudeville and picture house just completed with American fittings throughout) desires to be placed in communication with persons in the United States controlling film rights and also persons capable of contracting for vaudeville performers of recognized ability. The American consul who forwarded this report writes that several theatres under one management with others acting under agreements form a circuit of considerable and constantly increasing importance in the country in question. Only films of the better class or artists with established reputations are desired. References will be given and required.

George T. Stapleton, who for the past four years has been the proprietor of the Gem Theatre, Rocky Ford (Colo.), has exchanged his property here with J. A. Funk of Guthrie, Okla., for a picture theatre in that city.

No more "movies" for Lotta Crabtree, says the Boston American. The famous actress was president and principal stockholder of the Savoy Theatre Corporation of Boston. She appeared before Judge Hardy in the Superior Court June 21 and asked that the corporation be dissolved. The company was formed in May, 1910. It represented the Savoy Theatre, on Washington street, near Boylston, and was used as a moving picture house. Miss Crabtree told the court that there were no liabilities or assets. Judge Hardy granted her plea, and now Lotta is out of the "movies."

SPANUTH, STROUSE AND HOFFMAN IN AUTOMOBILE ACCIDENT

The General Film Publicity and Sales Company barely missed its doom in a recent automobile accident in which the two members of the firm, H. A. Spanuth and Joseph Strouse and the general manager, Dore Hoffman all met with slight injuries.

The firm recently purchased a sixty horsepower Locomobile for business purposes. After a pressing day of business, the three decided to take a run down to Coney Island for a brief respite from the sweltering humidity of the city. The chauffeur drove the machine to the Island and all went well until on the last stretch coming home, Mr. Spanuth took the chauffeur's place in an endeavor to learn to run the machine. The return trip was made at a late hour when there was very little traffic, and Mr. Spanuth was congratulating himself on the rapidity with which he absorbed the details of driving a large car.

The crash came when the party was driving beneath the elevated structure on Fulton street, Brooklyn, close to the steel poles that maintain the elevated. Mr. Spanuth turned to speak to his companions and in doing so loosened his grip on the steering wheel and the machine swerved slightly towards the pole. Quickly he gave the steering wheel a sharp turn, but in his excitement and inexperience, turned it the wrong way and drove the machine directly into the steel pole, causing a head-on collision. There was a crash that was heard for blocks and all that the members of the party are able to remember is finding themselves in various undignified positions.

The chauffeur, who occupied the seat in front, next to Mr. Spanuth, was thrown over the dashboard to the pavement. Strouse and Hoffman, in the rear, were thrown violently against the front seat, bruising their knees and receiving a severe shock. Mr. Spanuth received the greatest injury in that the steering wheel drove into his abdomen, causing internal injuries.

The machine, badly wrecked, was put into the hands of a nearby garage and the members of the party, after being treated at a Brooklyn hospital proceeded home by taxicab. Perhaps the only reason they escaped with their lives is that the car was running at an unusually low speed. Friends of the party are congratulating them on their narrow escape from serious injury.

THE RELIANCE COMPANY

Leave Saturday, June 22nd, for a four or five weeks' stay in the heart of the Catskill Mountains. They have a great number of extraordinarily good subjects to take while there, and with the beautiful exteriors they will have on hand some pretty good work may be expected from them.

Mr. Jas. Kirkwood, former director of the Reliance Company, has returned to New York after an extended sojourn in the wilds of Michigan, and is now hard at work on some big sensational two-reel subjects for the Reliance Company. In accordance with its recently stated policy to give the trade a two-reel subject once a month, the Reliance Company is making a number of subjects from best possible material, both in the matter of story and environment.

The highwayman had been lurking in the neighhorhood for some time—and after each of his daring robheries has heen successful in escaping the sheriff and his posse.

After the holdup of her coach, the sheriff who goes on the trail of the bandit, is desperate. But his desperation doesn't help him catch the desperado, so he gets the town council to offer a reward of $500 for the capture of the handit, dead or alive.

Somehow the impecunious little lady from the East gets an idea into her head that she can catch the handit. Although all the cowhoys laugh at her, she is determined to try and get the $500 which she hadly needs.

She sets out and after wandering for several days, comes upon the ohject of her wanderings. The handit is aware of her approach. She sees him also hut feigns ignorance of his presence and appears on the scene with suppressed excitement—hut seemingly on a stroll. The bandit jumps out and tells her to throw up her hands. He demands her hag, which she throws at him. The bandit opens the hag and begins to laugh as he pulls out a powder puff. She jumps up, snatches the bag from him, from which she takes a little mirror and proceeds to powder her nose. She then places the articles in the hag again and sits down. The handit is astonished; he returns to contents of hag and takes out a roll of bills, which he places in his coat pocket. Then he pulls out a lady's pistol and, laughing, compares it with his own. The girl smiles at him over her shoulder. The handit is flattered. She invites him to sit on the ground beside her and he does so, placing his gun on the ground near his foot. She pretends to admire the gun and reaches for it, hut he puts his foot on it and shakes his head positively. She pouts. The handit again examines the contents of the hag, in which he finds a pair of handcuffs. Looking at her narrowly, he inquires where she got them and she replies that she found them down the trail. He looks at her for a moment and then decides that she is telling the truth. She takes the handcuffs and looks them over. She asks him how they work and, illustrating his answer; he puts his hands together. Suddenly she calls to him to listen, and as he turns his head, she quickly snaps the handcuffs on his wrists and, snatching up the gun, she holds the furious but helpless handit at hay. And she gets her reward.

HOTEL HONEYMOON
Solax Release, July 12

A man who has imbibed a little too freely passes through a hotel lohhy and staggers up the stairs. An old maid, with very red hair—mostly artificial—arrives, registers and follows hellhoy No. 1 up the stairs. A hride and groom arrive and they are also taken up stairs by hellhoy No. 2, the bride dropping a glove unnoticed. The drunk not being a new guest, finds his own room, No. 45, and throws himself on the bed fully dressed. The old maid is shown to room No. 47 by hellboy No. 1, who, not heing tipped by her, through revenge, transposes numhers 45 and 47 on the doors. Bellhoy No. 2, having shown the bride and groom to No. 49, immediately after emerges from that room and, as a joke at the expense of the newlyweds, transposes numhers 45 and 49, the three adjacent rooms now showing numbers 47, 49 and 45, reading from left to right.

The hride soon discovers that she has lost a glove, which huhhy cheerfully goes in search of. In the lohby, having secured the glove, he comes upon an old friend, whom he tells of his marriage. His friend, as a means of expressing his congratulations, leads him, though he goes reluctantly, off for a drink. The hride hecomes impatient at the extended absence of her hushand and determines to go in search of him. In the meantime, the groom hids goodbye to his friend in the lohhy and returns. He enters the old maid's room, showing number 49, and as he closes the door, the bride emerges from her room and goes in quest of him. The groom, in the old maid's room, sees, as he supposes, his wife in hed asleep. He steps softly so as not to awaken her and removes part of his upper clothing. Bellboy No. 1 passing along the corridor hecomes afraid of what might he the consequences of his transposing numhers 45 and 47, and thinking he is remedying his mischief, transposes 47 and 49, the three numhers now arranged as 49, 47 and 45, left to right. The bride is assured of her hushand's proximity by the clerk and returns. Upon finding, as she thinks, her husband in bed fully dressed, she calls, and is startled when a strange man sits up and waves sillily at her. She rushes out of the room frightened and goes in the direction of the lohby, the drunk following her, but going in the opposite direction.

In the meanwhile the groom has made a disconcerting discovery. He has found the old maid's artificial, red hair. His wife's hair is hlack. He goes inquiringly over to the hed, and it is disclosed to him that he is in a room with a strange woman. He gathers his clothing and steals out without awakening her, and realizes upon seeing No. 47 on her door that he entered the wrong room. He discovers No. 49 on the next door to the left and goes in, to find it empty. This surprises him somewhat but he concludes his wife has stepped out for but a short while and makes himself at home.

There are a numher of disconcerting complications hefore the newlyweds aie happily reunited. The frantic old maid, the drunk and the mischievous hellboys add much to the fun.

AT CRIPPLE CREEK
Reliance Release, July 17

Belle Gordon, orphan, finds an advertisement in the papers for a governess to apply to the Rev. Strong, at Cripple Creek, Colo. She writes and has her fare advanced. Upon arriving there she finds the place consists of a crowd of disreputahle miners and dance-hall girls. She learns that the advertisement was merely a trap to lure her out into the dance hall of Martin Mason. She tries to get away, but cannot. Dynamite Ann, one of the worst women of the place, remembering the time that she first came to Cripple Creek through the same sort of an advertisement, wishes to help the girl. Joe Mayfield, the United States Deputy Marshal, enters and, seeing Belle's plight, rescues her. He takes her away with him and also Maggie, Mason's young daughter. He asks Dynamite Ann to go to his cabin to look after the girls. She accepts, grateful for the trust reposed in her. Reginald, a young dude from the East, dances attention on Maggie, while Joe Mayfield loses his heart to Belle. Joe is interested in a mine called the "Last Dollar," which is reputed to he worthless. Mason and his partner, Alvarez, discover gold in the mine and try to bargain with Joe for its possession. Joe refuses to relinquish it and for revenge the Mexican takes up Joe's adopted child, who is walking on the rocks, and flings her down. As he goes up, Wahketa swings out on a grapevine and catches the child in midair. The next day Mason and Alvarez go down into the mine. Joe and Belle coming down later, are surprised by them and tied hand and foot. Wahketa, who is also tied, manages to hurn the cord off his hands and releases Belle and Joe. The three make their escape in the bucket of the mine. A short time later, on the wedding day of Joe and Belle and Maggie and Reginald, Mason and Alvarez come and look in at the festivities. The wedding takes place and just as the guests are leaving the room the Mexican shoots through the window at Joe, but Ann jumps forward and receives the hullet in her own heart. She dies in Joe's arms and as she says—she dies right.

THE GYPSY BRIDE
Champion Release, July 8

Harry Mason, the petted son of a social leader, while out walking with his sister, comes upon the camp of some gypsies. The sister wants her fortune told and Harry goes with her. While here he meets the daughter of the gypsy queen. Love at first sight and many meetings follow. Harry's mother interrupts one of these meetings while passing by in her car, and Harry is ordered to get in and return home. He refuses, hut when he does come home his irate mother demands that he cease his flirtations with the gypsy. Harry assures her it is more serious.

Some time later, realizing that his mother's consent cannot he gained, Harry marries the girl without it. They are first married according to the customs of her people. A regular gypsy wedding, with the quaint and curious rites of her people, after which they are united hy the Church and the State. Being still unahle to gain his mother's forgiveness, Harry settles down in a cottage. A year later a child comes to hless their union. On learning of the arrival of a granddaughter the proud old mother hastens to Harry's little cottage to clasp the little one to her hreast.

Years go hy and all is happiness till one day the wife is out on her way to make some purchases. She is surprised to meet her gypsy mother at the gate. The trihe is again in camp near the house. The mother is invited to see her grandchild, a girl of six. The presence of the gypsy woman angers the oversensitive husband, who has just come in. Then follows the first quarrel between man and wife. The wife begins to regretfully look back over the years of free life spent with her people, and she takes out the costumes she had worn at their first meeting. He enters, prepared to ask forgiveness, but indulgently retires rather than disturb her.

Seated in the little parlor with his daughter on his knee, the young husband falls asleep. The wife returns, pensively takes her violin and softly plays a favorite melody of his. Then he dreams—the quarrel is re-enacted, his young wife returns to her people. He sees her take the child and he follows, arriving in time to separate her from his old rival, whom he engages in mortal combat. They fight furiously and the rival suffers death. At this juncture the husband awakens, and finds his faithful little wife standing by, playing to him in dreamy attitude.

A PROPHET WITHOUT HONOR
Rex Release July 4

The town ridiculed and reviled him. There might have been a few who pitied him. A few others hated him. None loved and very few tolerated him. They considered him shiftless, careless, hopeless. And his wife; she was one of those very rigid, very pious and righteous personages—you recognize the tribe. She was just a little short of a human being. There was something lacking in her composition, that something that alone makes the world worth living in. She made the villagers' opinion regarding her husband unanimous.

The prophet—you'll know why we call him that a little later—went his way in peace and patience. Meek and reserved in the presence of his wife and townfolk, he would undergo a complete metamorphosis once he left the house and the vicinity. Eyes gleaming with the glory of a great light, shoulders straight with the pride of a vast conquest, his heart beating high with the happy hopes of those who associate with things beyond the earth, he would walk along the road, playing his flute, and talking to the cosmos—yes, and hearing the thin, far-away reply.

He was an ambling, rambling prophet. That same gentleness with which he reproached the country boy for swearing at the innocent gate because it would not open, the humble force with which he taught two quarreling sweethearts to smile, the patient firmness with which he exhorted the man who was to elope with another's wife to leave her in her own home with its happiness—that sweet spirit of human love and tenderness, too spiritual to be recognized in its real value and volume by his foolish neighbors, directed and designed his every act and motive.

And one day a far-off minister heard one of his impromptu sermons, and he asked him to address his congregation at a revival meeting. The sincerity and integrity of his appeal, the genuineness and gentleness of his plea, sank into the hearts of the throng and whispered solace to their souls. The meeting was a success, and the minister wrote to the minister of the prophet's home parish, and recommended that he hold a revival meeting, to be addressed by the same eloquent exhorter.

When the people assembled in the little church saw their shiftless neighbor mount the pulpit they were dumbfounded and horror-stricken. When they heard the words of truth and the tender voice passionate with the hunger of right, when they looked into the eyes looking into theirs, lighted with a divine glow of sympathy and sincerity, when they felt that mysterious note of common joy and common sorrow that his voice betrayed, they purged their hearts of the error they had permitted to dwell there and they took him and his teachings to themselves.

THE UNKNOWN BRIDE
Rex Release, July 7

When the actress learns that if she married the man his father would disinherit him she was rather determined for his sake not to marry him. When his father, at the point of death, suddenly had a will drawn up leaving everything to his wife, and then commissioned his attorney to go out and find a woman who would marry him, it was she whom he met and to whom he broached the daring offer. And she accepted. When she learned that she had married the father of the man she loved, and that she had everything and he nothing—they arranged a plan of their own whereby the fortune would be more equally distributed.

THE MEDAL OF HONOR
Gem Release, July 2

He was old. His dim eyes had almost read the last page of the Book of Life. His heart was a battlefield where all the wars of the world had been fought and lost or won. He had seen life and heard it—in his ears had rung the shout of victory and the groans of defeat and despair, songs of merriment and the silence of misery. A thousand times he had been close to the door of death, but some power had not permitted him to enter the far-away so near, and he had lived to know, living, all the miseries and mysteries of hell. He looked back upon the dusty road of time, and he saw his youth and its reckless bravery, saw the smoke and fire of the battle-line, the storm of lead, all the ecstasy and anguish of the conflict, all the gory glory of the fray. . . . But now he was old, and in its tardy time had come the Medal of Honor that his valor had earned in the distant yesterday. Amid a solemn hush the speaker arose, and in a voice trembling with the emotion of the buried memories of the red days and the crimson carnage told of the deed that would live after what was said there would be forgotten — how, 'midst the blinding smoke of musket-rattle and death, shots falling thick and fast, in the very hell-horn roar of battle, with shot and shell screaming their dirge, all forgetful of self, he dashed across the death-line and rescued the colors. Timid, trembling, tenderly he took the medal and pressed it to his heart, while the cheers of the veterans echoed again all the din of the conflict. Only one voice was silent, only one heart envious. He, too, had been brave and valiant, had suffered and attempted much throughout the strife, hut he was one trait short of being a hero—he lacked resignation and repression. He looked with covetous eyes upon the medal, and a dangerous greed stole into his heart.

The old hero's granddaughter was a happy girl when she heard the glad news. Proudly, reverently, she caressed the symhol of suffering and sacrifice. To him the medal was everything, plus.

He became ill. The ecstatic excitement created hy the medal may have had lots to do with it. There was no money in the house. It wasn't that the girl valued the medal less. but that she loved him more—so she sold it; sold it for medicine, hartered it for the life that had so often ben placed in jeopardy to earn it; sold it to him who envied and coveted it. His life was saved, but he was more than dead when he discovered the loss of the medal. Something in the bereaved mind surrendered to the great grief that overwhelmed him, and he forgot; forgot all but the medal. and it was pitiful to see him searching, searching, always searching, and searching always in vain. The girl, hroken-hearted and desperate, raised the money and tried to redeem the medal, but he refused to part with it. If he had been a younger man he could not have resisted her tears and the pathetic, sympathetic plea in her sohbing voice; but he was old, old and selfish, selfish and vain. He refused.

At last she went to the Legion of the Medal of Honor and told the truth of the tragedy. The wrong was righted, the hero received back all that he lived for, and that he had so nearly died for. And. gee! it was sweet to see him kiss the hadge of his suffering.

MATES AND MISMATES
Powers Release, July 5

Mahel Wentworth and Jack Allison are sweethearts and love each other devotedly, although their parents have other plans for their children and their dream of love is shattered. Mahel is forced to marry Will Howard, a society man, and Alice Middleton is the convenient wife for Jack. The story concerns the two homes with the husband of the gay hutterfly repenting the choice of the mother and Mahel grieving as the true character of her hushand is revealed—two mismated couples—who are miserable. Jack struggles to maintain his wife in the society she covets and fails. He is about to hlow out his brains with a revolver, when fate intervenes in another manner. His wife elopes with the hushand of his sweetheart and he is genuinely relieved. The wife has proven false and unworthy and he uphraids his mother for choosing a helpmeet so hase.

Mabel is leading a life of uneasiness and is miserahle. Her hushand hrings a gay woman of the world to their home and openly flirts with her. There are a series of flirtations and finally an elopement and Mabel returns to her father and is grand in her indignation. She tells him all and he is shocked and repentant. He sees the injustice of it all and the saddened life of his cherished daughter. The shock kills him.

The guilty partner and the wife of Jack go rowing, and are enjoying their flight, when their hoat is upset and they are drowned together with the mother who was instrumental in wrecking the lives of two estimahle young people. The story closes with the other couple on an eminence. The glamour has worn off and they quarrel and both are dashed to their death. Mahel embarks in a hoat to end her existence in a watery grave and Jack appears on the bank, hent on self-destruction. He throws himself into the water and is rescued by the girl he has always loved. Barriers removed, they are happy and are free to marry. It is a strong and well-balanced story—a melodrama that will surely please.

A MID-CHANNEL ROMANCE
Gaumont Release, July 18

Susie Hampton is a vivacious little creature of twenty years, hut unfortunately has been born to a family and cast in an environment altogether unsuited to her nature. Her father is a slow, phlegmatic Englishman, her mother equally as deliherate and prosaic. They have selected her fiancé who, necessarily, to measure up to their standards of judgment had to be quite as lifeless and uninteresting as hoth her parents. On this particular occasion she completes a party of four with the three ahove included, on a trip to Naples. After meeting with no success in trying to encourage either of the trio for a promenade on the decks of the vessel, she finally determines to set off for herself, hut in doing so a turn came to her placid life. A young Frenchman of particular charm descried her as she passed up and down the promenade deck and decided that meet her he must, no matter how the manner. He attempts to flirt but except for the most timid encouragement, receives no satisfaction. He proves equal to the emergency, however, and determines then and there that English is an indispensable language for him. He manages to meet Susie's father and asks him for reference to a fellow passenger on board capable of instructing him in English. The father, believing this an opportunity for his future son-in-law, acquaints him with the latter, who happens to he an Episcopalian clergyman. The teacher and his pupil become great friends, wherefore their acquaintances must he known to each other, as a matter of fact. In this manner the dashing young passenger meets Susie. Complications follow. The lessons in English become irksome, while the walks with Susie monopolize all the student's time. Upon arriving at Naples the romance is continued. the hotel. They venture to kiss, only to be caught in the act by the clerical fiancé. The Frenchman, in order to make reparation, offers to fight a duel, but the Episcopalian prefers to abide by the English code of settling quarrels and informs his disowned student that the only proper reparation he can make is to marry Susie. Cupid dances with delight at such a suggestion and consent on the part of both lovers is instantaneous. The mother and father, of course, are now unable to interfere. The romance has been completed.

LOVE'S FLORAL TRIBUTE
Gaumont Release, July 21

The famous French beauty, Susie, the model of many artists and the original of many sketches, is proposed to by two different gentlemen of high birth and standing but cannot determine which one she likes better, nor which one cares more for her. In order to settle this perplexing problem she decides to employ a strategem and tells each of her lovers when they renew their suit that she will marry that one who guesses her favorite flower. At this word of encouragement, both hasten to the flower market and come back laden with flowers of all descriptions, colors and sizes; the one brings lilies, while the other brings roses. These fail to satisfy so they come back, one with gladioluses, the other with hyacinths. Again Susie rejects these flowers, whereupon they sue for her hand the one with violets, the other with orchids. Trying to find out which flower it is that Susie admires most they in turn present her with narcissus, sweet peas, lilacs, pansies, nasturtiums and clematis, but to no avail. They simultaneously think of chrysanthemums and hasten out to the market, only to return one with lavender and white and the other with yellow and pink autumnal chrysantbemums. What is their delight to learn that they have guessed the flower, but their sadness on finding out that they have not come across the proper color. Susie confesses that it is a blood red chrysanthemum she likes most, whereupon the one lover rushes headlong to the flower market to beat his rival while the other aspirant, realizing the handicap to which he has been placed, bares his wrist and slashes his arm, allowing the red blood of his own body to stain the pure white chrysanthemums to the desired color. Susie recognizes in this the valor of true love and rewards him with her hand.

JENKS AND HIS MOTOR BOAT
Comet Release, July 1

Abner Jenks decides to buy a motor boat. He visits a number of boat houses along the river front and finally decides to purchase a gasoline power boat with a carrying capacity of four persons. He purchases the boat from a dapper young salesman; pays his money, and hastens home to inform his wife of his purchase.

Mr. Jenks has two sons, one 17 and the other 8 years of age; the boys are delighted. Mrs. Jenks is a bit doubtful as to the wisdom of such purchase. Mr. Jenks requests Mrs. Jenks to prepare lunch for a little trip in the newly purchased boat. Mrs. Jenks consents reluctantly.

Mr. Jenks hastens to a nearby haberdashery and purchases yachting togs for himself and family. Dressed in up-to-date yachting clothes, the Jenks family reach the wharf and get in the boat to take a sail up the river. When Mr. Jenks tries to start the motor it fails to work. He calls the dapper young salesman to his aid and the boat is quickly started. Mrs. Jenks is very uneasy; she has her doubts about Mr. Jenks' seamanship. At last Mr. Jenks succeeds in getting the boat to work, and they disappear out of picture and up the river. Suddenly, without any apparent cause, the motor grows silent. Mr. Jenks labors faithfully to start it, without success. Mrs. Jenks demands to be taken ashore at once. Jenks tries to persuade her there is no danger. Mrs. Jenks insists. Jenks finally succeeds in starting the motor again and makes the shore where Mrs. Jenks leaves the boat. She demands that both boys leave the boat also, as she does not consider it a safe trip with Mr. Jenks at the wheel.

Mr. Jenks, to show Mrs. Jenks that it is perfectly safe, makes another trip into the river. Again the motor fails to work. Jenks labors industriously to start the motor again, but it fails to work. He imagines there is something wrong with the gasoline tank and proceeds to the bow of the boat to unfasten the cap over the tank. He cannot see whether there is any gasoline in the tank and decides to hold a lighted match over the top of the tank to illuminate the inside of the tank in order to see how much gasoline, if any, there is left in the boat. He accidentally drops the match into the gasoline tank and a terrific explosion follows. The boat is blown to splinters and Mr. Jenks is sent high in the air. He is seen coming down head-first, after which he swims to the remaining hull of the boat. He is rescued by a yachting party and taken to another boathouse where a sign painter is painting a sign which reads, "Motor Boat for Sale," and, drenched to the skin, Mr. Jenks asks the sign painter to lend him the brush and the sign painter consents. Mr. Jenks paints the figure "2" before the word motor, adds the letter "s" to the word "boat," returns brush to the sign painter, and points to the river, indicating, "My boat is out there; anybody wants to buy it, it's for sale."

THE POUGHKEEPSIE INTER-COLLEGIATE REGATTA
Comet Release, July 8

The Comet Company's alertness is again evidenced in the above film, which they succeeded in obtaining with no little effort and at considerable cost.

A vivid and truthful reproduction of this great aquatic event is shown in this picture, in which the best specimens of physical manhood, selected from six of our most celebrated institutions of learning, took part.

The importance of these several colleges, in the field of athletic sports, has given to this race an interest far greater than any hitherto shown, enlisting as it does the most ambitious efforts of the following colleges: Cornell, Syracuse, Leland Sanford, University of Pennsylvania, University of Wisconsin, Columbia, and their respective coaches, Courtney of Cornell, Rice of Columbia, Murphy of Leland Stanford, Ward of University of Pennsylvania, Vail of University of Wisconsin, and Ten Eyck of Syracuse.

The start and finish of the Freshman four, the Freshman eight, the 'Varsity four, and the 'Varsity eight are truthfully reproduced, together with views of the beautifully situated city, Poughkeepsie, resplendent in holiday attire, and the most wonderfully constructed grandstand ever erected.

This stand in itself is a marvel, being built on forty specially constructed flat cars, with seats pitched to a height of twelve feet; its seating capacity is twelve thousand persons, and its length is four thousand feet. It is transported a distance of four miles to a location below the Poughkeepsie bridge.

Along the course are massed thousands of gaily decorated craft, from which the frenzied spectators view the race, while a moving multitude lines the river banks on either side.

The "Aquatic Derby" presses into service every conceivable sort of craft, even many that are borrowed from Long Island Sound, and its tributaries.

It is the one grand and imposing aquatic event in college circles of the world, and the Comet experts have succeeded in reproducing it in every detail.

EVIL BE TO HIM WHO EVIL THINKS
Republic Release, July 2

The saying made famous by King Edward I, which caused the organization of the famous Knights of the Garter, is used as the theme of this modern story.

Hiram Perkins, a young farmer, had married a beautiful country girl, and after the novelty of the honeymoon had worn off he became blind to his wife's charms and made of her a farm drudge. His main object in life was money and to increase his income he decided to take in summer boarders.

Dick Ravenwood and his mother were the first to come there and Dick becoming charmed with Mrs. Perkins' personality did everything in his power to lighten her burdens. Perkins' mind, too cramped for any broad thought, misunderstood these innocent attentions and did not hesitate to unjustly accuse his wife of unfaithfulness. Mrs. Perkins bore all this with the spirit of a martyr and was greatly relieved when upon her younger sister's arrival Dick concentrated all his attentions upon her.

Dick's impetuous nature knew no obstacles, and he quickly won the heart of Mrs. Perkins' younger sister, Nellie. Nellie would not name the happy day until Dick had spoken to her sister, so Dick sends a note asking Mrs. Perkins to meet him in a secluded spot (where Nellie is in hiding), as he has something of great importance to tell her. This note falls into the hands of Perkins, whose brain becomes fired with jealousy and whose evil mind can see nothing but wrong in every action.

Perkins bides his time and upon seeing Dick alone in a canoe fires at him, causing Dick to fall into the water, helpless. Mrs. Perkins hears the shot and, looking toward the lake, sees Dick slowly sinking. Without a moment's hesitation she leaps into the river and rescues him. Perkins is finally made to realize his mistake, and also to appreciate his wife, whose drudging days are about over at the time when Dick marries her sister.

THE GIRL IN THE AUTO
Republic Release, July 6

An international marriage, the desire of a fond and title-loving mother, which would have turned into a tragedy, is averted by Willie's love of a pretty face, a glimpse of which he had caught during an auto trip. Willie's desire to become acquainted with the owner leads him into many strange places.

During a visit to the Immigration Office, he becomes interested in the case of an Italian woman who is seeking her husband, of whom she has a photograph which she shows Willie in her appeal for assistance.

Willie, after leaving the immigration office, decides upon a trip to the seashore and a dip in the ocean. To his surprise and pleasure, he meets the young lady whose face has haunted him for many days. Throwing convention to the wind, Willie and the young lady, mutually attracted, soon become very fast friends, and Willie plans to visit the young woman at her home.

He meets the title-loving mamma, who does not hesitate to discourage Willie's attentions to her daughter, which was not at all pleasing to the daughter.

The Count is introduced to Willie during an evening on the plazza, and Willie is immediately struck with the remarkable resemblance of the Count to the photograph that he saw at the immigrant office in the hands of the deserted wife.

Willie communicates with the authorities, who bring the wife to the seashore and in the presence of the title-worshipping mamma he proves the Count to be an impostor as well as the husband of the Italian peasant. Needless to say that both the daughter and Willie were very pleased at the outcome, while mamma ——.

THE PARSON AND THE MEDICINE MAN
Imp Release, July 8.

Love laughs at locksmiths and at many ethnographic distinctions. The little Indian girl, Fawn, took an aversion to the Medicine Man of her tribe, though commanded by her father to marry him. In effecting her escape from the red man she was befriended by a white, and the white in this case was a kind hearted parson to whom the little aboriginee promptly hands her heart. But the parson was not a very robust specimen of manhood; he was tuberculous. He fell sick, and Fawn, as she was known, nursed him.

In her ministrations she was discovered by the Indian whose suit she discouraged. He was on the point of dragging her off by main force when the poor parson rose to the occasion and saved the girl at the pistol point. Then there was another struggle, in which the jealous Indian, for the time being, was paramount. But help was at hand and he was finally secured before he could carry out his scheme of abducting the unwilling girl.

The clergyman recovers and inasmuch as the girl has probably saved his life he, out of gratitude, sends her East to school and the Medicine Man to a reservation.

The picture gives a faithful representation of modern life amongst the few remaining aborigines of the North American continent.

CAUGHT IN A FLASH
Imp Release, July 11.

Jack Gayboy is in love with Dolly Varden, a famous Broadway favorite, and true to the proverb their love affair fails to run smoothly. The father, Mr. Gayboy, objects to his son's marriage with an actress, though as the picture develops it is shown that he, too, is an admirer of the fair sex.

Jack, knowing his father's weakness for pretty women, arranges with his sweetheart to impersonate a maid in their home, and by a well-arranged plan they succeed in securing kodak evidence of the old boy's penchant for those whom he considers not in his sphere.

When confronted with proofs of his fondness for the girl, Mr. Gayhoy relents and gives his consent to the marriage of Jack and Dolly.

food and the only persons who enter the place are those who wish large bills changed. Even the animals plot against the German, for a dog contrives to steal from the counter a prime cut of beef. He and the wife, in their anger, rush from the restaurant determined to wreak vengeance on the guilty one.

While passing a store where scales are displayed an idea occurs to him; novel in the extreme. He buys a pair and places them in his restaurant and puts this notice in the window: "You pay 5c. for each ounce gained; we pay you 10c. for each ounce lost."

This attracts the attention of a shabby man and he devises a plan to get the better of the Germans. He loads his pockets with bricks, enters the restaurant and is duly weighed. He then orders his dinner and while the couple are preparing the food he removes the bricks. On again being weighed it is discovered, to the consternation of Louis, that he is fifteen pounds lighter than before partaking of the hearty meal, and Schnitz is forced to pay him the sum of $24.00.

After his departure the bricks are found under the table, and Schnitz, realizing the trick played on him, gives chase, hurling the bricks as he runs. His wife follows also, armed with the heavy missiles, and in her excitement instead of hitting the man she only succeeds in breaking a window pane, and the fugitive escapes.

The couple return, weary, after the long chase and decide the scheme is a failure, so remove the scales and sign and substitute for the latter one that reads: "Meals 15c." And business once more thrives and prosperity beams on the Germans.

TANGLED

Powers Release, July 10.

A remarkably clever story in which children are featured, the finale reuniting lovers and putting an end to a quarrel between neighbors. David Jackson resides on his country estate and is a widower. With him lives Willie, his little nephew. The story opens with Mrs. Edwards taking an adjoining estate for the summer. She has her little niece, Dorothy, with her. Dorothy and Willie meet and the girl tells the boy they have taken the adjoining house. Elsa Edwards receives a letter that her sweetheart, John Jackson is coming down to spend the summer with his uncle and that they will enjoy the country. Jackson meets the charming widow and there is mutual attraction. Dorothy and Willie become fast friends and there is a trio of love affairs.

The harmony of the situation is broken when the children quarrel over the possession of a tricycle and the widow and the widower take sides and are estranged. There is another outburst when the children meet at a pharmacy to partake of cooling drinks. Willie places a bug in the glass of Dorothy and she retorts by pouring a bitter decoction into his drink. There is another quarrel and the young lovers part in anger, leading their belligerent little relatives away.

The children go out to fly kites and the kites become entangled in the air just as they have kissed and made up. The widow and the widower and the young lovers come on the scene and all become interested in the fate of the kites. There is an ingenious reconciliation that presents a charming picture—a fitting finale to a very pretty comedy.

On the same reel:

"A Leap Year Delusion," illustrating how a young man unfortunate in his love affairs reads of leap year and of the women proposing. He dozes off to sleep and dreams, and his dream takes on a most satisfying aspect. He is proposed to by a lovely young woman and is in the height of his glory when he awakens and discovers that it is all a dream and is brought back to earth and a painful realization of his state of bachelorhood—an unique and laughable comedy indeed.

WHEN HEARTS ARE TRUMPS

Nestor Release, July 1.

Don Pedro, a wealthy Mexican, has a beautiful daughter, Juanita, who loves José, a poor boy. Her father looks with disfavor on his suit for his daughter's hand, preferring that Juanita marry Don Nedro, a wealthy Mexican. On being forbidden the house, José writes the following note to Juanita: "Dearest Juanita:—I will be waiting for you in the garden. Ever thine, José." Just as Juanita starts on her way to meet her lover, Don Nedro appears and endeavors to make love to her. Her father appears at this juncture and effusively greets the rich Mexican, forgetting his daughter. Juanita hastens to her lover, dropping the note as she goes.

Don Nedro, who has long wanted to marry the old gentleman's daughter, suggests that Juanita and he get married immediately and offers Don Pedro gold in return for his daughter. The old man readily accepts and, on searching for Juanita, they come across the note which she has dropped. Hastening to the garden, they find Juanita and José. Commanding his daughter to go to her room, he tells her she must marry Don Nedro at once and sends for a priest to perform the ceremony. In the meantime, José and Don Nedro have quarreled, and Don Nedro is knocked down.

Juanita, who has been locked in her room, comes out on her balcony and observes José anxiously watching her window. They arrange to elope and on placing a ladder at her window they disappear down the orange grove. Gardeners, Don Nedro, father and priest give chase to the lovers and José is felled by a blow from Don Nedro. They arrange for the ceremony, when José appears in their midst on horseback and, snatching Juanita in his arms, he rides swiftly away.

That evening the old man sits and sighs as he thinks of his daughter, thinking he will never see her again, when along come the happy couple, informing him that they are married, and he gladly gives them his blessing.

HARD-LUCK BILL

Nestor Release, July 3.

An old settler's daughter, Jessie, is the belle of Sycamore Dale. As she comes from the house Frank whistles for her from one side and Jim from the other, as neither dares to go to the house, having been warned by father. Selecting a spot between her two suitors, Jessie waits for them to appear, and then confides to them that the one who reaches the tree first shall have her hand. Instead of allowing Jim to try, she pulls his sleeve as he is getting ready and together they run off, leaving poor Frank to meet the old settler, who has also heard the whistling.

The old man soon finds the lovers and marches Miss Jessie into the house, putting the hired man, Tom, to guard her and telling Big Bill to keep himself in readiness to boot either of her suitors off the place.

At last Jessie manages to get a note off to Jim, reading: "Dear Boy: Meet me on the bridge at three o'clock this afternoon and we will elope. Jessie."

Father, however, gets the note, but in order to catch the culprit he allows it to be delivered. Fortunately, Tom tells Jim of the settler's intentions, so Jim sends the note on to his rival, who promptly appears with horse and buggy at the appointed time and while Frank is having a few very unhappy moments with the old man Jim and Jessie ride away in his buggy to the minister's. Here father, Big Bill and Frank soon appear, for the old settler has held up an automobile and forced the driver to take them to the minister's after the eloping couple. The young people were too quick for them, however, for while they enter the front entrance of the house, the minister, Jim and Jessie hurry out of the back door, jump into the automobile and there the minister finishes the ceremony, while Frank drives sadly away in his buggy, leaving Big Bill and father to foot it home.

YOUNG WILD WEST ON THE BORDER

Nestor Release, July 5.

Young Wild West and his party approach the Mexican border and believing themselves to be miles away from any town, they stop at a deserted house and there celebrate the Fourth of July. Pedro, the owner of the property, is informed that strangers have taken possession of the premises and immediately goes to dislodge them. Wild West pays the Mexican and orders him away.

Leaving the Chinese cook in charge of the house, Wild West and his followers go to town. Entering a dance hall, they notice a display of flags; the stars and stripes beneath the Mexican banner. Wild quickly changes the position of the flags and a big rumpus follows. The Mexicans are defeated. Pedro and his men swear to be revenged and, accordingly, they swoop down upon the deserted house to rob the Americans of all their belongings. Wild West arrives in time to save the Chinaman from the hands of the marauders while Pedro manages to slip away. Still bent on revenge, Pedro abducts Young Wild West's sweetheart, Arietta, who, after many thrilling incidents, is restored to her friends, while Pedro and his gang are railroaded to prison.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Western Scripts Not Improved

"I notice no improvement in the general average of scripts submitted during the past eighteen months," was the startling assertion of a leading pictureplay editor in writing to this department last week. We deemed the statement of such general interest that we immediately queried other well-known pictureplay editors as to their opinions, and the reasons therefor. Several came with opinions and suggestions before our query reached them; others courteously responded to the queries; and, in one or two instances, editorial friends answered that they did not desire to be quoted just at this time. These we class among those who cannot conscientiously say that scripts have improved, and do not wish to state outright that scripts have not improved. Otherwise, why should they be adverse to giving out their findings?

We believe that the opinions of various editors, one of which we shall publish each week, will be of vital interest to pictureplaywrights and will tend to aid them in future work—and which will also be of editorial benefit.

Richard V. Spencer, pictureplay editor of the Bison Company, 1719 Allesandro street, Los Angeles, California, is known to authors as a courteous and able editor. His interesting statement follows:

"Regarding your first question: 'Has the general average of scripts submitted to me the past year been a decided improvement?' my reply to the question is that my present duties consist in considering Western stories only, therefore I wish to be quoted from the Western story standpoint only. My experience, the past year, demonstrated that the general average of Western stories has NOT improved. Out of the seventeen big two-reel and three-reel feature releases manufactured by us we were only able to use three out of the hundreds of stories submitted, the remaining fourteen had to be written by our director, Mr. Ince, and myself. Of course, it can be argued that two-reel stories are in a special field by themselves, and rightly. In single reel Westerns, the percentage of acceptance is higher, for the reason that the stories do not have to be so strong, dramatically.

"The technique of pictureplay has improved. With added experience have come better plots from the technical standpoint, but owing to the immense number of scenarios produced in the past the big stories with 'punches,' 'wallops,' or, in other words, strong, vital, original themes and business are on the decline. I understand that the same conditions exist even more alarmingly in the comedy and straight dramatic fields.

"In reference to the second question as to what can be done to improve the standard, would say: Authors should remember that the production policy of each firm is different, and that it is a waste of their own time and postage, and of the firms to which the stories are sent that the particular firm is not in the market for. Authors should watch the story on the screen. Pick them to pieces mentally. Analyze them. Notice how they are constructed. Observe how the important characters are 'built up' and featured—how the climax is built up.

"The outlook for the future of the script market is bright. Each manufacturer is developing a circle of writers who are striving hard to dig up adaptable, original material and weave it into proper pictureplay form. When pictureplay editors 'find' people who have the necessary talent to weave available stories, they are only too glad to encourage them with personal letters and advice, and in other ways go out of their way to help them, because the editors themselves are graduates from the ranks of the men they try to help.

"Technique is no bar to the acceptance of stories. It is THE IDEA that the companies are paying for. At least ninety per cent of accepted stories are revised extensively by their producers. Even the stories of the editors themselves are sometimes changed so that their owners do not recognize them. Authors should watch closely the synopsis printed in the trade journals, also the criticisms of the stories, and consider carefully the valuable advice offered in the scenario pages of the trade journals, and remember that the market was never better for stories of merit, and that good, original, vital, tensely dramatic stories with a well-developed heart or love interest are always in demand and will be for a long time to come. There have been complaints among some disgruntled authors who have not and never will make good that they are not getting a square deal from the producer. It is significant that the men who are selling the most stories are doing the least objecting. When authors improve their work sufficiently to merit special recognition such as giving credit on the screen and receiving higher prices for stories they will find the producers ready and willing to meet them more than half way."

Mr. Spencer has covered the situation as he sees it in an unusually able and comprehensive manner, and his advice given above should be taken seriously by every script writer. Mr. Spencer proves our oft-repeated statement that the editors are anxious for the writers to succeed and that hard work and careful study pays in the end. While he believes there is no material improvement in the Western script at this time, still he holds out encouragement for the future. The writer will note that Mr. Spencer praises the work the trade journals are doing in their pictureplay departments and fails to recommend the services of any "schools" past or present.

Next week we shall publish the opinion of Mr. L. S. McCloskey, editor Lubin Company, on whether or not he finds any material improvement in the general average of pictureplay scripts submitted to the Lubin Company.

WE STICK TO THE SHIP

Our good friend, Epes Winthrop Sargent, prepares an upholstered seat for us in the extreme end of the apartment, anent our opinion that top-notchers in the magazine fiction field have not yet entered the pictureplaywright fold and that when they do they may very soon hit the bull's-eye. We are still sticking to the ship on that opinion. Mr. Sargent's seat kindly prepared for us had a tack in it, so we hurriedly rise to remark that the newspaper field is the best school on earth for the talented to learn to write action; to acquire style; to get the knack of condensation. Brand Whitlock, Eugene Wood, O. Henry, George Randolph Chester, yes, even Woodyard Kindling, won their spurs in the newspaper office before launching out into magazine work. So did Epes Winthrop Sargent. He learned to know human nature, how to ensnare the festive idea, and how to "boil down" six hundred words to fifty and retain the "story" before he turned to writing the comedy that made Lubin famous. Now he can write one in an hour. In our opinion, the same rule is applicable to ninety per cent of the leading writers of magazine fiction to-day, for about that number graduated from the newspaper office into the realm of higher literature. We don't say that these romancers could immediately sit down and dash off a script; we do believe, however, that their preliminary experience in newspaper work and their added experience in magazine work would make them unusually well qualified to enter pictureplay work were the remuneration tempting. Mr. Sargent will touch this newspaper argument gently, we think, for he is a member of the fraternity—one of the best on earth—and the members thereof are bound together in the opinion of the rank outsider by the most mystifying and exclusive of bonds.

MARKET IS A BIG ONE

Richard V. Spencer, pictureplay editor of the Bison Company, wishes to inform authors that Bison is now in the market for straight dramatic, split-reel comedy scripts in addition to Western stories. Five directors are to be supplied with scripts so authors are advised that the market is a big one and they are urged "to come in while the water is fine." Prompt, courteous consideration is promised.

THE COPYRIGHT LAW

A Camden, Ohio, author asks us if an author would have the right to take a single idea from a novel or, in his words, "Is there any law preventing an author from taking a central idea from a novel or book and changing the story otherwise?"

Only the copyright law, my friend, and the fact that you would be stealing the originality of another were you "to take the central idea from a novel or book and changing the story otherwise." Why should you wish to filch the property of another, which you would be doing were you to take the central idea from a "novel or book" and building a pictureplay around it. Most of the producers have magazine and book readers in the editorial departments to detect just such a custom as you mention. Even if the plot so changed should escape the eagle eye of the editorial reader (which is not likely) and should be produced, the manufacturer might become liable to copyright infringement from the book publisher. Be original. Pursue the elusive idea; maybe there is a good idea for a pictureplay right before your eyes, but your powers of observation are not sufficiently trained to see it. It is the writers of original plots in scripts that will succeed and are succeeding. You cannot afford to get into the "bad books" of the producers by building pictureplays around the central idea of a book or novel. Besides it is dangerous.

GENERAL FILM PUBLICITY AND SALES COMPANY MAKE BOW TO PUBLIC FROM NEW OFFICE

The remarkable growth of a concern which has sprung into the business world so recently as has the General Film Publicity and Sales Company, is something well worthy of note. From the very outset it was of strong and vigorous growth, weakening not one whit in its rapid expansion, but on the contrary continuing to strengthen its bulwarks every day. That a great deal of the credit of the business growth of the concern is due to the enthusiasm and untiring energy of the president of the company, Mr. H. A. Spanuth, goes without saying; and to those who know the "ins" and "outs" of transactions of great moment which are even now in the first stages of development, the splendid future of the General Film Publicity and Sales Company is an acknowledged fact.

Already the States rights of the Nat Goodwin "Oliver Twist" film have been disposed of to almost every State in the Union, and tremendous business reported in consequence from Schubert's Lyric Theatre in Cincinnati, and in fact from every theatre where this splendid set of films has been shown.

The company intends going even more largely into the feature film business, and on July 3 Mr. Spanuth leaves for Ocean Park, California, the summer home of Mr. Nat C. Goodwin, where he will remain four or five weeks, or as long as is necessary to complete another large production with Mr. Goodwin and also to make final arrangements for future productions with this wonderful actor.

The European and Canadian rights for the Nat Goodwin film have also been disposed of to large theatrical interests; also the Hawaiian and Honolulu rights.

An industrial film is being made by the General Film Publicity and Sales Company for the Canadian branch of the Victor Talking Machine Co.; and in fact orders have been pouring in almost faster than they can take care of them, showing that thoroughly satisfactory work is being done by this company.

Mr. Dore Hoffman, formerly the Film Index advertising manager, and later serving in the same capacity for the G. Melies Company, has accepted the position of general manager of the General Film Publicity and Sales Company under Mr. Spanuth and is at the same time assuming control of the publicity department, which was formerly under the direction of Mr. Daly, who has severed his connections with the company. Many other interesting developments will shortly be announced from this concern. This concern now occupies one half of the entire eleventh floor of the Forty-fifth street Exchange Building.

THE NEW MOTIOGRAPH HAND BOOK AND INSTRUCTIONS

The new Hand Book and Instructions for Operating the Motiograph is now ready for distribution, and the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company say with considerable pride that this instruction book is a great advance over anything else of a like nature that has ever been published either by themselves or any other company.

As it has been very expensive and a tedious task to get this book together, they are asking the small sum of ten cents for it simply to help pay the cost of mailing and the handling of the numerous inquiries which will be received.

For the benefit of those people who wrote in the past two months and who have been held up awaiting the appearance of this Hand Book and Instructions, they wish to say that their copies are being mailed and should be received before they have an opportunity of reading this notice.

Merrill, Wis.—The new motion picture theatre in the Hall & Foster block was opened by Manager Staehle.

New York, N. Y.—Ninety-seventh Street and Broadway Realty Co., incorporated, to build and conduct moving picture exhibits. Directors, Hugh L. Clark, 227 West 11th street; Michael J. Callahan, 103 East 10th street; John J. O'Connor, 285 Mott street, New York City.

THE PLAY OF THE MOVING PICTURE ON THE CHORD OF CIVILIZATION

By M. I. MacDonald

The moving picture is playing a peculiar tune on the variegated chord of civilization—a tune which is making music in the minds of our people—one that is living itself into the lives of our people, and that is breathing the sensation of pleasure in congested city districts that heretofore knew not the voice of joy.

There is a break in the clouds overhanging the tenement; a tiny stream of sunlight is warming the breasts of the grime-stained hundreds; but the greater light shut out by the cobwebs of a demoralized past will not break in the fullness of its glory for some years to come, when the children of the people into whose dreary lives crept the shadow pictures which gave them both education and amusement for just a nickel shall have attained maturity. These children, nurtured on shadow pictures, the butt of confused municipal authorities, sliding stealthily into the half-light of the picture theatre at the heels of some sympathetic grown-up, these will be the representatives of the splendid civilization woven into the human fibres by the influence of the moving picture.

Perhaps the most remarkable drama of history is being enacted to-day while opposing factions war on the moving picture. The psychological effect of the moving picture on all circumstances of life, education and science is more absolutely marvelous than the ordinary individual can conceive. Stop a moment in the mad rush and take a glance around at the various uses to which the moving picture is being put. There is not to-day a single industry, scientific or educational movement whose wand of knowledge is not being swayed by the moving picture. Just as the manufacturing of implements lightened the strain of manual labor, so is the moving picture lightening, or, rather, facilitating the labor of the human brain. It is doing more than this: it is fertilizing the mental and moral disposition of the individual to an extent that is without limit; it is a guiding star to the morals of the masses, and it is oil to the wheels of progress.

The manufacturer of a good brand of moving picture is as valuable an asset to the country as the manufacturer of a brand of pure food. Is it too much to assert that he means even more to the human race than the manufacturer of pure food? Is it not true that all the pure food in the universe can make of man only an animal without the cultivation of the mind? Who then can fail to have faith in the psychological power of the illustrative methods of education demonstrated by the moving picture wedging itself into the recreation of our people.

PEACH GROWING PUBLICITY BY MEANS OF THE MOVING PICTURE

By Lida May Briggs

(Special to the Moving Picture News)

Two of the biggest peach growers of East Texas, Mr. J. W. Ogburn, of Ogburn, Tex., and Mr. W. A. Nabors, of Winnsboro, are looking to the moving picture film as a means of publicity for the great peach-growing industry of East Texas.

After trying in vain to get other peach growers of the South to join them in this popular modern method of advertising, these progressive gentlemen went on alone to demonstrate what could be done by a properly conducted publicity campaign along this line.

They first engaged a publicity expert to let the good housewives of the North know that Texas peaches would not only be of the highest quality this year, put up in the best possible style, but also within reach of the most economical housekeeper.

In further discussing the best agents of publicity, it was decided that one big juicy Texas Elberta tantalizingly displayed on the moving picture screen, would bring more returns than any amount of cold-type display.

Southern plantation or cotton picking scenes have proven very attractive in moving pictures. None of them can compare in beauty or picturesqueness with a thousand acre East Texas peach orchard, the green trees bending beneath their loads of blushing, mellow fruit.

There is a tent city where the jolly student packers live, eat, sing and dance when the day's work is over.

Not many people know the tender care this queen of all fruits receives in picking, packing and marketing. The series should prove most interesting from an educational standpoint alone.

When these live pioneers have proven the value of advertising by means of the moving picture, it is expected that other "show me" peach growers of the state will be clamoring to get in line with this up-to-date procession.

"BIG VAUDETTE" THEATRE, ATLANTA, GEORGIA

One of the finest and most modern in equipment of the moving pictures of the South is the "Big Vaudette," of Atlanta, Ga. This theatre, which has a 700 seating capacity, was built by J. J. and A. C. Evins, of the Vaudette Amusement Company, to replace another theatre on a smaller and less pretentious scale which they had been occupying since Dec. 18, 1908, when they put on their first show. Independent service is being patronized at the present time by the "Big Vaudette," and its managers are desirous of communicating with all parties handling feature films of any description.

Bristol, Conn.—The Elite has been opened.

New York, N. Y.—Industrial Film Syndicate, 501 Fifth avenue, incorporated, to deal in motion picture films. Directors, J. Harvey McIntyre, 501 Fifth avenue; Harold C. Knapp, Richard H. McIntyre, Jr., 258 Broadway, New York City.

Pleasantville, N. J.—Cantes' new theatre is now open for business.

Louisville, Ky.—Incorporation articles were filed by the New Parkland Theatre Company to operate a motion picture show.

Nicholson, Pa.—Patrick Killea's new nickelet is nearing completion.

Bloomsbury, Pa.—The new moving picture theatre on Main street is rapidly nearing completion.

New York, N. Y.—The Western Theatres Limited Company has been incorporated to own, lease and operate theatres. Directors, William Klein, Jacob Klein, 346 Broadway; James A. MacMartin, 1416 Broadway, New York City.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By James Girvan

Auxiliary Local 35, I. A. T. S. E.

OFFICERS

President—Frank Brennan.
Vice-president—Robert Glodblatt.
Financial Secretary—Gus Durkin.
Recording Secretary—Sydney Dignon.
Sergeant-at-Arms—Willie Cohen.
Business Agent—Henry Weinberger.

The Auxiliary meets at Teutonia Hall, No. 66 Essex street, the first and third Monday of every month at 12 o'clock midnight. Dues can be paid to Brother Weinberger at the Union Office, No. 133 Third avenue, or to Gus Durkin, care of Berkeley Theatre, No. 19 West Forty-fourth street.

The special meeting was called to order at 12:45 midnight, June 24, 1912, to conclude the business of the previous regular Monday night meeting, and the attendance was better than I expected on such a warm night. The greatest interest was taken by one and all in the instruction of our delegate to the I. A. T. S. E. convention. Quite some time was taken up on this important matter and the members expressed their opinions in no uncertain terms, even if they did wander a trifle from the regular procedure.

The next regular meeting will be held on Monday, July 1. All members are requested to attend, as there are to be further instructions given the delegate and other business of very great importance will be transacted.

All members in arrears for dues, fines, or assessments over the three months' limit stand suspended until same is paid, and those six months in arrears are liable to be expelled after July 15th.

* * * *

Brother Bob Saunders just got back from the "road," and when you get a look at him you know he isn't stringing you when he says it was a pleasant and prosperous trip. Glad you enjoyed yourself, "Mike."

* * * *

The Midnight Owl Club went on their weekly fishing trip Sunday in their new 35-foot power boat—some boat if you believe what they tell you—and got back with sixty-four sea bass and blackfish. The yarn sounds fishy to me, because when I called in on Monday I could see no fish. All I could see was Father stretched out on one bench and Black on the other, both "dead to the world." First time I ever saw fishermen who were not game enough to go home and take their medicine.

* * * *

Brother operators in far off Africa, just heard you are doing wonders in the projection line. Let us hear from you. Special attention given to out-of-town correspondence. We can always find room in our "Chat Column" for any interesting news that may be sent by our brothers from far and near.

* * * *

Brothers, it is about time you were doing something to better your condition. For instance, just take notice of the number of our boys who have been taken sick within the past year. It seems to me we ought to be able to do something to bring about better ventilation in the operating rooms.

* * * *

LAST CALL!

All those intending to join the Union under the ten dollar initiation fee had better get busy, as next meeting is their last chance. On July 15, twenty-five dollars goes into effect.

* * * *

Now, brother operators in New York and New Jersey, it seems to me I ought to hear from you once in a while. Seems rather odd that I should hear from out-of-town operators, even from far-off Africa, before I hear from the "boys at home." Come on, get busy.

* * * *

Ding-dong; ding-dong! Seems to me the wedding bells will never cease their ringing. Here's another operator who couldn't resist the plunge in the "sea of matrimony." Yes, Bernard Greenwald, of Weiss' Avenue A Theatre, did a "Brodie" on Sunday night, June 23. Haven't heard yet whether he has survived the shock, but I guess he did—he seemed to have an iron constitution. Best wishes and good luck to you and wife, anyway, Bernie, even if you didn't give us an invite.

Who is the next to "fall"?

* * * *

Nearly 200 employees at moving picture theatres throughout the city, members of Local No. 224, I. A. T. S. E., gathered at the Eagles' Club Hall on the evening of June 20th and held the second banquet in the history of the organization. The toastmaster was Col. Robert Montague.

During the course of the banquet the diners were entertained with piano and vocal selections. Those who participated in the entertainment were Harry Chick, Pete Reynolds, Edward Wright, Joe Gross and Edward Keesey. Short addresses were made by B. A. Spellbring, president of the local union, and Emmett Adams of the Central Labor Union.

THE OPERATOR

By Tom Costello

Dedicated to Aux. Local 35, I. A. T. S. E.

For months Lew had been working overtime
In a small coop, and a hard grind
With only a few hours for food and sleep.
When no sleep came, because of the dull heat
Of his fagged brain, and he could scarcely eat,
And now on Sunday, when most men are free
He cranked and cranked, incessantly.
He was so dazed he could hardly keep
His hands from going through the pantomime
Of framing the picture on his machine—
The sleek machine that day and night.
Fed with film, and strong rays of light,
Through the glaring, flaring hours.
Shut off from God's sunlight and flowers
He ran the film through the machine;
Different tints of yellow, blue and green
With sunny fields and running streams,
Ships at sea, and golden sands,
The different people in foreign lands,
Until at times the whir and click
Of the running film made him sick.
And though at first the colors made him glad
They soon were dancing in his brain like mad;
And kept on flaring through his burning head
While the carbons hissed and flamed so red.
Now blazing green and staring blue,
But he turned, and turned, and the film flew.
Then the boss cried faster, do you hear me "Lew?"
He speeded faster the blue and green
Were blurred in one to him it seemed.
The sunny fields, the running stream,
The ships at sea, the golden sands,
The different people in foreign lands,
Until the machine with a roar and glare
Fascinated him, and with a senseless stare,
The film caught and snapped: but his hand
Almost before his brain could understand,
Had pulled off the switch, the handle stopped
Just in the nick of time, and poor "Lew" dropped,
Half senseless on the hard iron floor,
And he'd lain there dazed for a minute or more.
The rewinder helped him to his seat
And soon he was upon his feet,
Running films through the machine
Of different tints of blue and green,
The sunny fields and the running stream,
The boss cried faster, but Lew did not mind,
He told the boss, no more he'd grind
In a little coop, shut off from God's sunlight and flowers,
Where he slaved all day, for twelve long hours.
He made up his mind, there and then
That he'd join the Union and pay his ten
And work Union hours, like other men.
The boss he stormed and fumed like mad.

Told him the Union, it was bad,
But Lew, he did not seem to care,
He jointed the Union, now two men are there.
He works half a shift for Union pay
And enjoys God's sunlight half a day.
No more coop, and no more grind,
An operating room with a window fine.
Two machines that whir and click,
No longer make him feel so sick.
The different tints of blue and green,
The sunny fields and running stream,
Ships at sea, and golden sands,
The different people in foreign lands
Are enjoyed by Lew since he became a Union man.
The boss doesn't rave, but now says "please,"
Since Lew joined Aux. 35, I. A. T. S. E.

FILM DEALERS IN FIGHT

Two Arrests Made After Failure to Merge Competing Concerns

A fight which did not end until the arrival of police reserves started yesterday afternoon in the offices of the New York Motion Picture Company, on the second floor of No. 251 West Nineteenth street. Five men, representing the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, broke in the door of the Motion Picture Company and ordered the employees out.

Several women aided in the attack on the invaders. Two arrests were made. Frank Lee and John H. Sloan, of the Universal Company, were charged with assault. The row resulted from the failure of a plan to merge the two companies.—N. Y. American.

TEACHERS TO PASS ON FILMS

Moving pictures likely to corrupt youth will be no longer seen if an ordinance introduced by Alderman Morrison becomes a law.

Provision is made for a board of censors to be appointed by the Board of Education from its teaching or supervising staff, who shall pass upon all films or rolls before they may be thrown upon a screen.

The ordinance reads, in part:

"If any motion picture, for the exhibition of which an application for a permit is made, is an obscene, indecent, immoral or impure motion picture which would tend to the corruption of the morals of youth or others, or if it pictures any crime, murder, suicide, robbery, holdup, stabbing, assaulting, clubbing or beating of any human being in such detail as to offend the sense of morality or decency, it shall be the duty of the Bureau of Licenses to refuse such permit.

"Only such motion pictures as are approved by the Department of Education for Sunday use shall be used on Sunday."

BEN SCHULBERG

Who writes the Rex and Gem ads is to be transferred to the publicity department of the Universal Film Mfg. Co., which is in charge of H. J. Streyckmans. Mr. Schulberg's unique writings have attracted considerable attention in the film trade.

The above is a reproduction of the photo poster or new photographic layout that the Gaumont Company has arranged to accompany its July 4th release, "Written in Blood." For full particulars about this clever poster the reader is referred to the Gaumont Company at Flushing, N. Y.

THE BEST EVER!

Power's Cameragraph No. 6A

In this new machine we have retained the POWER'S No. 6 mechanism and have made the following improvements:

ARC LAMP—Fourteen adjustments, will carry 100 amp., carbons ¾ inches in diameter may be used, 6 inches lower, 12 inches upper.

THE LAMP HOUSE—Broader, deeper, higher. Lamp more accessible, ventilation much improved, breakage of condensers lessened.

THE STAND—Made entirely of iron. Absolutely rigid, can tilt to any angle. Lower magazine which will carry 14-inch reel is built in.

THESE IMPROVEMENTS ACCOMPLISH } LONGER HOURS OF WORK WITHOUT RETRIMMING; INCREASED CARRYING CAPACITY—SAVING IN OPERATING EXPENSE; ABSOLUTE RIGIDITY, THEREBY IMPROVING PROJECTION

WE ARE MAKING DELIVERIES NOW Let us send you catalogue D, with full details

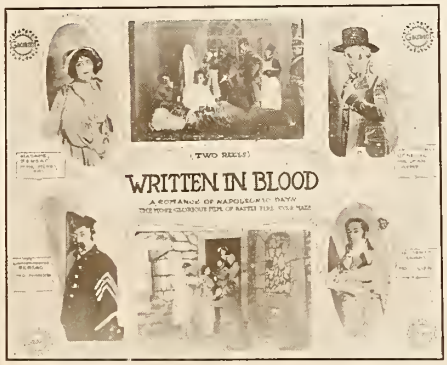
The PRISON ON THE CLIFF

Some exhibitors have been fortunate enough to see this on the recent tour of Mr. D. W. McKinney amongst their several conventions. It was shown at Chicago, Atlanta, Lexington, Cleveland, Wheeling, etc., and in each case the exhibitors have asserted their rights and demanded the exchangeman to place his order for it. There's a reason—Sensationality and Picturesque beauty were never more harmoniously combined. Watch the trade papers in their next few issues for the story and criticisms.



NOTICE!—Get this advertising novelty, Mr. Exhibitor. The accompanying picture is that of the new Gaumont WRITTEN IN BLOOD (July 4) PHOTO-POSTER or PHOTO LAY-OUT (real size 16 x 20 inches). Just like the A. P. A. photonews service. We will sell any quantity at cost price, 30c each.

Write us an order inclosing necessary stamps. POST THEM IN YOUR LOBBY or on the window of your ticket booth.
